858 This does not mean that children did not commit indecent acts. The game of ioto, in which little girls try to cook (and which is always one of their favorite games (2) as it probably is throughout the world), often gave rise to it. Small boys joined in the game in order to taste the meal. And quite naturally they began to play at "husband and wife," more or less. Often this game involved only innocent imitations, but other times touching and exhibitions occurred between children of the same sex or of opposite sexes. This game is far more dangerous nowadays, [81] because of a change in the attitude of young people toward sexual matters.

2. Some boys imitate this game in order to acquire the habit of preparing their own meals. Later they benefit from it on more than one occasion.

The game of yembankongo, in which boys, imitating monkeys, chase each other through the trees and creepers can -- and does - result in reprehensible scenes.

178 In former times most girls were married before puberty. But their husbands did not touch them until they had completed their normal development.

864 Among some individuals the fear of sexual relations was so deeply rooted that it persisted even beyond the age limit and was

582 conquered only by repeated assaults of passion. Thus it is generally 593 known among the natives that young women used to seek refuge in 864 their mother's house when the husband wanted to begin making use of his rights as a husband. The mother would try to persuade her daughter to submit to the law of life. But sometimes, if her child seemed too resistant, the mother made excuses for her and asked the husband to consider her daughter's youth. The man usually wanted to remain on good terms with his mother-in-law so he did not insist and resigned himself to waiting till nature influenced the spirit and heart of his wife.

Since young people were brought up in deep fear of dangerous relations, it should not surprise us that this feeling became a real habit and did not disappear spontaneously the moment a certain degree of liberty was permitted. As a matter of fact, could we not make similar observations in Europe?

This is the natural explanation for the praiseworthy degree of morality among adolescents in the past.

Nowadays all that has changed. The young people follow 178 where their passions lead them. Not the slightest check is placed on 836 their impulses. Parents pay only slight attention to the conduct of 864 their children. [82] It is better not to inquire into the morality of modern youth. Husbands no longer respect the bodies of their adolescent brides, who are themselves quite used to a sexual life and eagerly look forward to it; and no longer know the feeling of "the fear of men." Should we then be astonished at the frightening de-[164] crease in the birth rate (1) and the ever increasing spread of venereal diseases, which seem to have been unknown in the past?

The reasons for this change will be investigated further on, under the letter C.

836 B. Between adults. Here the Nkundó are very lenient. There is a difference, however, between the socio-legal and moral viewpoints, although as we shall see the latter is influenced by the former.

[582] A woman is entirely free, legally speaking, as long as the first payment on her bride price has not been made. No man has

1. The natives say that in the past young wives quickly became pregnant. And now ...

581 consent; they do not distinguish between this conjugal pact which changes and the bride-price agreement which alone persists. And since for them the bride-price agreement is essential, while the conjugal pact is secondary, they pay attention only to the former. Thus we can legitimately interpret their statements on the nature of unions by inheritance and by replacement [230] as referring to the bride-price contract. Thus the fact that each relative of the deceased who wishes to marry the widow must make an individual payment (bekooli), while the clan contract continues unchanged demonstrates the effective reality of the distinction between the familial bride-price agreement and the individual conjugal pact.

To summarize all these considerations; we think that we are justified in giving the following definition: Nkundó marriage is a conjugal contract between a man and a woman which is firm in itself and is linked to a bride-price agreement of prescribed nature and formalities between their families.

Therefore we can conclude that the essential nature of Nkundó marriage conforms to the definition of that institution in general as given in ethics and that it fulfills all the necessary conditions. (1)

1. I am very grateful to Attorney General A. Sohier for having, in a very specific way, drawn my attention to the legal aspect of this question and having thus suggested that I make a thorough investigation of it.

[231] Chapter IV. The Age of the Bride and Groom

582 The Nkundó may marry at any age. Their law contains no stipulation on the subject. Nevertheless, it was customary in the past for a girl to be married very young, while the boys could not take a wife until they had reached a really advanced age. Nowadays the time of marriage for the ever increasing number of girls and for the boys has been pushed forward almost universally. Let us examine the situation in detail, distinguishing between the sexes.

There is no law requiring an elder sister to be married before a younger one, but such is the common practice. Exceptions are made only under certain circumstances, and particularly if the younger girl finds a suitor earlier than the older one, a reason which includes and sums up all the others (such as disadvantageous physical and psychological tendencies of the older sister).

178 584 This practice of marrying daughters off before maturity is beginning to change because of the increase in freedom which has been introduced by colonization. Nevertheless, as this change is not especially advantageous [236] its manifestations are still very slight. The Christian education of parents must of necessity delay the time of the daughter's marriage and will do so ipso facto as soon as Christian influence becomes sufficiently strong in the region.

Article II. Boys

● 582 Except in the rare instances of an engagement of two young children, it was formerly the common and normal practice for men to remain bachelors for many years after puberty. The old men tended first to their own wants, and the youths had to wait their turn, like their elders. This was considered entirely natural. Later on they could establish a home and "profit" from life. Meanwhile they found a little compensation with the wives of certain relatives or of others, if the opportunity arose.

582 561 [556] To explain this state of affairs we can invoke the political organization of Nkundó society, which is based on age. It is therefore natural that those possessing authority should have its external signs, and one of the foremost of these is the wealth manifested in the possession of wives. But, as we will point out later, the present situation greatly weakens this explanation.

582 583 It is more natural to consider the delay in the marriage of young men a logical consequence of the marriage of girls at an early age. Suppose that a boy is fifteen years old while his sister,

582 whose bride price will fall to him, is only three. At that age, she 583x is married. The children's father is in a hurry to use the capital he has received, small as it is, rather than to let it lie unproductive and run the risk of losing it one day for some reason or other. Therefore, he uses it to obtain a wife, often a child, for himself or his brother. Thus the boy is deprived of the means which would enable him to establish a home when he attains adulthood. He will have to wait till he can acquire new wealth, either through his own work, or thanks to the assistance of [237] various relatives, or through the death of his father or his uncles, or -- frequently -- from the bride price of a daughter to be born to his sister's nkita. In the last instance, which formerly occurred very often, he was obviously forced to wait many years. Thus in the example cited in Chapter II, Article X, had the events occurred a few decades earlier, Bakutu would have had to wait for the bride price of his cousin Wǎngi, who was a good twenty-five years younger than he. If he had then been given the first part of the bride price, he would probably still have had to wait over ten years before becoming a husband in the full sense of the word, because the ikulă would have been used for an engagement with a very young child. More probably he would have been considered too young; the bride price would have been used for the benefit of another, and he would have had to wait another indeterminate number of years. Once the practice of marrying girls when they are small children is accepted, there is no other way out; everything is linked, and the result is inevitable, given the mentality of this society.

582 The elders' power to act in this way to their own advantage
428 stems from the collective nature of the people's inheritance system
585x (Chapter II, Article X and XI, 3, B). A bride price goes to the family; the right of the individual members is not personal or exclusive but is derived from their position in the hierarchy within the group.

Nevertheless, the fact that a man may claim priority to the bride price of his uterine sister over a brother born of a different mother seems to indicate that he originally held the chief rights to these valuables. The exercise of this right is postponed, and the concomitant transfers result.

● 582 We have spoken of the unproductivity of the bride price.
583x This is a Nkundó notion, and it is accurate only because the old men want to satisfy themselves before their sons. Actually, they could very easily reconcile their desire that the bride price should be productive with the aspirations of the youths, at least in many instances. All they would need to do would be to use the valuables they have received for their sons' benefit by acquiring girls of the same age for them. The productivity of the valuables would not diminish [238] in the least, of course, since the goods would remain in the family. On the contrary, it would be increased because a [842] greater number of progeny would probably be born. But our natives knowledge of physiology does not seem to be sufficiently developed [181] for them to come to this conclusion. And even more probably their egoism has greatly clouded their intelligence and silenced the voice of good sense and fatherly love to make it possible for them to multiply the number of their wives and thus increase the easy satisfaction of their sensuality, augment their wealth, and reinforce their social position. It will be their sons' turn after their death.

561 This situation is aggravated by the fact that, except for the 428 bosólo, the brothers, not the sons, of the deceased inherited the 595x widows, who thus remained in the hands of the old men.

582 Because of their attitudes the old men monopolized most of the women. They established large harems for themselves, so that it was very difficult for the young men to find a woman to marry; they had to consider themselves lucky if their father provided them with a child.

Thus it was unheard of that a young man between twenty and 582 thirty years old should marry, except for a few instances where a 178 man acquired a child who was to become his wife after a number of years. Men were usually forty years old or older before they married.

Nowadays the situation has changed entirely; the attitude of the old men favors the young much more and has become almost normal. The great majority of fathers, if they have the means, procure a wife for their sons as soon as the latter are old enough to express a desire for one. This improvement is due to the fact that it has become 582 178 much easier to get married. A great number of young men who would still be bachelors had they lived under the old regime now have wives. The young people leave home to go and work for the Whites, and the parents feel sorry for their sons and do not want to see them leave without a wife [239] to take care of them and prepare their food. This feeling has dealt the old custom a severe blow. And even for the young men who stay at home, it is no longer so difficult to obtain a wife. Paternal love has here triumphed over egoism.

Furthermore, the elders have been forced to take a more humanitarian attitude because, since the European occupation has given the young women a new freedom, they have abandoned their husbands and fled to the centers where, under the protection of the Whites, they have joined lovers who are as young as they. Therefore, it was much more intelligent to obtain a wife for their sons in an honest fashion rather than to expose themselves to loud palavers by the abandoned husband.

From all the preceding description it is clear that the man was considerably older than his wife. But because of the inheritance of widows it also happened -- and still happens -- that a man acquired wives who were older than he. When young men marry at the present time, many wives are definitely younger than their husbands; many adolescents have received prepubescent little girls for wives.

As a general rule a Nkundó woman does not like her husband to be much older than she, and she likes it even less if he is younger. Nowadays unions between persons of the same age increase continually. This increase is due more to the remarriage of divorcées, who prefer husbands of their own generation to the old men who first paid for them, than to first marriages between equals. The influence of Christian couples is called upon to play a great educational role in normalizing the situation of the girls.

561/ 582 The boys must marry in turn, according to age, because of the seniority rule which regulates social relations. That is the rule, but it may be mitigated by the application of another rule, namely the one pertaining to the direct or indirect rights to a sister's bride

582 price. The rights of a polygamist's sons over their sisters' bride 561 prices are not absolutely equal [240]. One of them can oppose the decision that one of his brothers, born of a different mother not related to his, should benefit from the bride price paid for his uterine sister. His right will incontestably prevail. But if he has other sisters, it is his duty out of brotherly love to help his less fortunate brother. If both of them have uterine sisters, there may be an exchange of bride-price rights which will hurt no one. Finally, if only the younger brother has a sister, his right to her bride price is precisely defined and personal, and it may therefore happen that he marries before his elder brother. But unless the mother is absolutely opposed to any such arrangement, an attempt is usually made to settle the matter in a friendly fashion by assigning the future bride price of a niece or cousin to the younger brother. The rules as we have explained them hold absolutely only for the present time. They also existed in the past, but the delay in the sons' marriages, as described above, resulted in a transferring of rights which could completely upset this order. Since, in practice, many men began their married lives after the death of their fathers or uncles, thus with inherited wives, the elder brothers benefited from the rules before the younger ones did. (1)

1. See also Chapter II, Article X.

593 × 578 Lastly, the eldest son may be deprived of his rights for certain reasons, such as a serious failure in his duties of respect and submission to his father. To punish him his father may curse him publicly, declare that he has lost his position as eldest son, and forbid him to acquire a wife. This practice is no longer common today; it would have little effect, for the young man would go and seek his fortune elsewhere. But history has left us some examples like that of Ikɛ́tɛ́ ya Lonkinja, the first-born son of Ikɛ́tɛ́ Elongama éâ Longɔ́mbá, the ancestor of the Bombɛ́nga wǎ Bokenda family (Besombɔ).

Chapter V. Obstacles to Marriage

M 582 There is no specific term in Lonkundo for an"obstacle to marriage." General terms are used, as in our European languages.

Our people make no distinction between obstacles which nullify a marriage and those which are prohibitive in nature. Therefore, we will simply speak of obstacles without making any distinctions among them.

Article I. "Race"

M P 582 563 The question of a diversity of races can be considered only with reference to the Batswá. Marriages with them are strictly forbidden. Nkundó rules of behavior are very strict with respect to relations between Baotó and Batswá. It is unheard of that opposite sexes of the two races should mingle, even for a simple conversation. There would then obviously be no question of marriage.

M P 563 588 Among the Bilángi, a Batswá tribe of the Injóló of the Salonga-Luilaka (who absolutely refuse to be called Batswá or Balúmbe), there have been two cases of such unions to my knowledge. Two Baotó women were involved, both, by a singular coincidence, from Lotángonda (Injóló, Engónjó). One was Njalí, daughter of Yole and sister of Lomúlú, the other Nsombola, sister of Limpema.

Njalí was taken in marriage by Bakao of Ikindatói. She wanted children desperately and, not having had any by her two successive Nkundó husbands, she ran away to the Bilángi in hopes of having better luck there. [242] She was not disappointed in her expectations. She gave birth to four sons: the eldest, Bonkono, who died some years ago; Bakao (Georges), who died in 1933; two sons, Bonkomí (Louis) and Joke (Henri), who are still alive. In 1933 the descent of the four numbered thirteen sons, six daughters, four grandsons, and one granddaughter. But there was never a legitimate marriage between Bakao and Njalí since no bride price was paid. And the descent have formed a small Bilángi clan, which is dependent on the grandmother's clan (Ilongó of Lotángonda).

P 178 588 563 164 doctor who was in charge of the dispensary at Flandria at that time informed me of the case of a Botswa fruit harvester in the service of the H.C.B. who had syphilis of unquestionably sexual origin.

M ● 582 Though a racial difference constitutes an obstacle to marriage, a tribal or ethnic one does not. Where the geographic situation permits, true Nkundó, such as the Elíngá, marry members of neighboring groups such as the Ngombe, the Mbole, or the Ekonda.

Article II. Social Status

M 554 582 [565] [571] Among the Nkundó a difference in social status is not an obstacle to marriage. They have no social classes strictly speaking. They differentiate between those with authority, those who are inferiors, and the individuals or families who are not entitled to their word in political matters; but these ideas do not come into play in ordinary social relations, [245] and especially not with respect to marriage. A person may belong to a clan which is inferior, subject, dependent, foreign, or descended from a slave; nevertheless he may marry even a member of the group's senior clan. These distinctions are in the realm of politics; a marriage is a matter of law, affection, and good relations based on the payment of a bride price.

M 567 582 Actual slaves are an exception, but here a distinction must be made between the sexes. Unions with slave women were very common, but they were not marriages strictly speaking. Before a real marriage was entered into, the woman was set free. More details on this subject will be given in Chapter VII, Article V. For men the situation is altogether different. The condition of a slave was not only inferior, it was dishonorable, though a bit less so than among the Ancients. It might be overlooked if the love between the pair was unusually ardent, and there are a few clans descended from a "free" woman and a slave man, who were united in a proper and legitimate marriage for which the master paid the bride price.

There is no longer any opposition to the union of a "free" person with the descendant of a mixed marriage. The children may always claim kinship with their maternal ancestors who in these

[554] 1. Among the Nkundɔ́ no shame is attached to not knowing the family of one's father. But not to be able to name the mother's clan is a great dishonor for it proves that she was a slave.

There is less opposition to the first generation born of a couple who were both slaves than for their parents, and it progressively decreases with each succeeding generation. There is practically no opposition now to the grandsons. The reason seems to be [597] that although receiving a wife from one's master in a regular marriage does not constitute emancipation (nsikɔ́, nsikola) for the slave, it is a kind of adoption (wɛ̌mya, -ɛ́mya). [246]

Article III. Kinship

835 Marriage between members of the same kin group (isangano, bosangema, from the verb -sangema, "to be related") is forbidden. But how far does such a kin group extend? It is impossible to give a general rule. On the one hand, it is certain that if two groups are not descended from a common ancestor there is no bond of kinship between them, even if they live side by side. But on the other hand, it is not possible to say that all those who are descended from the same ancestor are relatives and that marriage is forbidden between the various branches of the grouping they comprise. The question therefore amounts to knowing by which ancestor the exogamous grouping is defined. A decision on this point may only be made through the examination of each case individually.

614 It is impossible to deduce anything from the meaning of the term clan, for it is usually defined as "a grouping of families united to one another by kinship." This leaves us back where we started. The characteristics usually given for a clan are: generic name,

The Bongangá are divided as follows:

1) Bongangá, in the narrow sense of the term (Basékà Inanó, B. Bolaká, B. Bongénge, B. Bandúwá, B. Lokókómyá)

2) Bongangá of Bakoyó, or Bolíma

3) Bongangá of Mbómbé or Basékà Botúna

Thus Lotólá, Bakoyó, and Mbómbé each have an Etóo group and a Bongangá group. The Bongangá, in the narrow sense of the term, have in addition a "slave" group named Batsína, a part of which is located with the Bosánjo. A foreign clan is settled with the Etóo of Lotólá; they are the Bofalambóka, descendant of a man named Ekonda (Imbolo) and his sister who was married to Mbete, a slave from Bompángá (Wǎngatá) who was freed by his master.

Many villages have foreign groups living with them such as descendants of slaves (ekwála), or others (Ekonda, Bombwanja, groups related by marriage called likilo, mpámá or bowélé, and mbúsolá, (1) etc.). [249]

1. Mpámá or bowélé are any foreigners who were formerly invited by the group patriarch to remain with him in order to carry out certain tasks, especially metal-working. Mbúsolá is the term applied to a child born to a woman out of wedlock (Chapter I, Part 2, Article IV, 3). Such children are also called nkio y'ǎóme, "the husband's flying dogs," because they are not his own children but are attached to their mother's husband in the fashion of these animals, who attach themselves to trees when they sleep.

582
If we add the descendants of relatives who have married into other more or less remote groupings, the prohibition against marriage on account of kinship applies to a good many people. In accordance with the law of exogamy, such a kin group may be widely dispersed geographically, and it is understandable that it is not always easy to

614 untangle all the threads. Thus it happens that young people form
582 relationships with the intention of marrying without knowing that they are related; they are warned only by the opposition and ensuing explanations of the elders.

We may conclude that marriage among descendants of a common ancestor is generally prohibited if they live in the same village. It is frequently permitted on the other hand, if they belong to different villages, provided that they are not, at the same time, related to one of the ancestresses.

M
582 Clearly, it is difficult to say what precise degree of kinship formed the basis for the prohibition of or permission for a marriage 835 between descendants of a common ancestor, or what are the boundaries of an exogamous grouping.

M
[611] It is also apparent from the preceding observations -- as from the examination of affinity as an obstacle to marriage -- that the descent from a common mother is a more important factor than descent from the father. This does not give proof of a form of matriarchy, though it could be the remains or the beginning of one, or could provide a partial explanation for one. It stems quite simply
M
[842] from the Nkundó notions concerning procreation, in which they attribute the major role to the mother. There is also the fact that
M
[602] greater shame is attached to being united with a person descended from the same woman, and finally the fact that they feel a stronger
M
[593] affection for the mother than for the father (a sentiment [250] which is accentuated by polygamy). The three causes are closely related.

582 Finally, it should be noted that there is a group among the Nkundó we are discussing which is less strict than the others in this matter. The relatives among whom marriage is prohibited is definitely more limited; that is, their exogamous groupings are more limited. The people in question are the Bongale (see Introduction), and the same phenomenon may be observed among the Elingá. (1)

P
[582] 1. The Batswá are still more liberal, and in this respect their practices differ very little from ancient European laws and customs.

684 582 There is no sanction against the infraction of the law of exogamy. There is only the opposition of the parents and patriarchs, and a quasi-innate habit.

582 614 Note also that members of certain clans frequently marry members of certain others, among whom they prefer to choose their wives. Therefore a good proportion of the women married into any given family will belong to one particular clan. The Wafé (Bakáala), for instance take a great many of their wives from among the Bongale w'ôtóló.

[174] 582 614 We may reasonably assume that the ancestors of related groups, who now marry among themselves, formerly practiced exogamy. If this assumption is correct, it must be admitted that with the progressive growth of families, this rule has been relaxed in certain respects so that the present situation has resulted. Consequently, it would not be surprising if these legal provisions became even less rigorous in the future. Actually, some young people have begun to [178] violate the rules of exogamy and their example has freed the whole family. (2) Thus the Bokátola maintain that their two groupings, Bompela and Ilóngé, who now intermarry, formerly comprised a [251] single exogamous entity. Contemporary instances appear here and there, but they remain very rare, even between persons who are very distantly related, and much rarer between close kin. (1) For the Nkundó still feel very strongly about this law. The bulk of the people are entirely opposed to any laxity or violations and the patriarchs and notables act against them with all their power. But the strength of

2. See Chapter I, Article VII, 1.

1. A recent case was that of Elímá and Bolúfe, who both belonged to the exogamous group of Bokenyola of the Bonjoku, but one belonged to the Baséká Bokóyó family and the other to the Baséká Njoli.

582 614 their intervention is greatly reduced by the fact that much of their authority has been shifted to the chiefs named by the colonial administration, and also by all the contingencies of modern life. Since on the other hand, the young people are gradually breaking the ancient limits in order to acquire greater freedom, the elders will one day have to yield to them.

Article IV. Affinity

582 602 Affinity among the Nkundó should not be understood to have the meaning given in European civil or ecclesiastic law. Marriage is forbidden with all persons who are bakiló (Sing. bokiló). (2)

Therefore one must know what persons are called bakiló, a fairly complicated problem for us Europeans.

To make the matter more understandable, certain considerations must be developed before giving the general rules.

1. General considerations

1) Affinity is not as great an obstacle to marriage as kinship. It is possible to obtain a sort of "dispensation," and for many degrees of affinity, divorce or death removes the barrier. But there are transgressions [252], and, except for the few indicated above, these do not occur in cases of kinship.

The following legitimate reasons for a "dispensation" are given: a danger that the patrimony will be scattered because of the infidelity of a wife who absolutely refuses to remain with her husband, added to the difficulties of a divorce palaver and the subsequent reimbursements, and -- a reason closely linked to the one just given -- a passionate love between the two people who are relatives by marriage.

2. Contrary to the statement by Father Kaptein (Congo, 1922, Vol. 1, p. 541).

582 602 The dispensation is given by the ndonga acting with the family council, which often yields before the fact, particularly if the second reason is involved. (1)

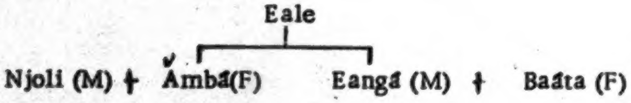
[671] 2. Contrary to European law, which recognizes only a direct affinity between husband and his wife's family, Nkundó law also recognizes an indirect affinity, so that a person is affinally related even to the spouses of his wife's relatives. That is, each person is affinally related, not only to his spouse's kin, but also to their relatives by marriage. Thus, in the example below, Njoli and Baáta are true relatives by marriage, though indirect ones. (2)

> 2. The Nkundó do not make a terminological distinction between the two types of affinity. We are using the terms "direct" and "indirect" for the sake of convenience and clarity.



There is an important difference between the two types of affinity: direct affinity is a much greater obstacle to marriage than indirect affinity, and exceptions are made only rarely and only for certain degrees of relationship.

582 602 [576] and those who owe submission and respect. The "superior" relatives are the ascendants, uncles, aunts, etc., in short, all those bearing the title of "father" or "mother," as well as elder brothers (elder sisters, elder cousins, etc.), who are batómóló (sing. botómóló). [601] The "inferiors" are the descendants, those who are called "children" (bǎna): sons and daughters, grandsons, nephews, nieces, younger brothers or sisters, and those who are classed with them and called bakúné (sing. bokúné).

[595] [587] 4) Polygamy and the inheritance of widows introduce another element. We will see that although persons of certain degrees of affinity may not marry, the prohibition is lifted to permit the inheritance of widows.

5) Our term "relatives by marriage" the Nkundó term and bakiló are not synonymous, even with respect to direct affinity. When we use the term "relatives by marriage" here, we are speaking in Nkundó terms. They do not consider certain persons whom we would include in that category as "relations by marriage." Such persons [601] are included in the group which as a whole is designated as likiló or bakiló, but when properly and accurately referred to they are called bǒme, "husband," or wǎli, "wife," because they may marry each other and therefore affinity, strictly speaking, cannot be applied to them. In other words, for the Nkundó, affinity is the relationship of a person with (only) those of his spouse's relatives whom he is forbidden to marry. It is well to bear in mind the double meaning of this term.

2. The rules

1. If after the death of his son Ikɛ́tɛ́, Bombembí wanted to marry his widow, the mother of the deceased would be so angry and ashamed that she would irrevocably leave him. Such conduct on the part of a father during his son's lifetime would give the son full rights to vengeance (assassination, war with the help of the mother's clan, etc.), for it would be equivalent to a real disavowal of his son. But the case is purely hypothetical.

B. Members of different generations in the collateral line: Marriage with older, "superior" relatives of the spouse is forbidden. The Injólǒ sometimes make an exception for an aunt of the spouse after the latter's death, but this practice is very much frowned upon.

Marriage with the spouse's inferior, younger relatives is permitted.

Example 5

The same rules apply equally to great-uncles and great-aunts, and to cousins who are not equals (related as "father" and "son"; see the table of kinship relations and terminology in the appendix).

C. Equals in the collateral line: The degree of relationship is of no importance, for example, marriage with an older sister (or cousin) of the spouse is forbidden; marriage with a younger sister is permitted. The same rule applies to women, but after the husband's death an exception is sometimes made in the elder brother's favor in order to facilitate inheritance arrangements. Only the Boángí -- like [184] the Elángá of Losanganya -- make no distinction between elder and younger siblings and always permit the marriage. They are even beginning to be imitated by the Injóló.

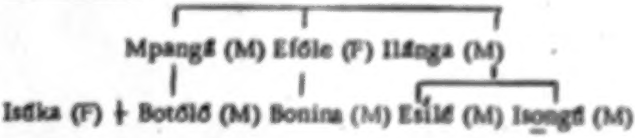
Imonɔ (F)
Ngolɔ (F)

Longanja may not marry his elder cousins, but he may marry the younger ones with the exception of Boɛkwɛ who is bɔ̌nankɛnɛ and has a "father's" rank (see above).

Similarly:

Example 15



Mpangɛ (M)
Efɔle (F)
Ilɛnga (M)
Isɛka (F)
Botɔlɔ (M)
Bonina (M)
Esilɛ (M)
Isongɛ (M)

Only Botɔlɔ's younger cousins may marry Isɛka. Bonina is bɔ̌nankɛnɛ, therefore "father," and consequently included among the uncles (see B, above).

[602] Note, finally, that the more distant the relationship, the less strict the prohibition, that is, dispensations and exceptions are more easily accepted.

2. Indirect Affinity

604

A. Marriage among those of lineal relationship is forbidden but certain exceptions are permitted. There are two possibilities: with the father's wife (Example 16) and with the son's wife (Example 17).

Example 16

Mbembe (M) ‡ Ekila (F)
Itɛ́na (M) ‡ Bokɔ́sa (F)

If Bokɔ́sa dies or is divorced from Itɛ́na, the latter may marry Ekila, but this exception is not often made because they would be very open to unkind criticism. [257]

Example 17

Etsíɛ (M) ‡ Bokolí (F)
Njoku (M) ‡ Imɛ́ngɛ (F)

After Bokolí's death Etsíɛ is permitted to marry Imɛ́ngɛ. Such a marriage is more leniently regarded if Etsíɛ himself paid the bride price for Imɛ́ngɛ, for in that case he is preserving his capital in marrying her. This consideration may also apply during Bokolí's lifetime, if Imɛ́ngɛ does not want to remain with Njoku. Under such circumstances, however, Njoku's mother would oppose the marriage with all her power. If Etsíɛ does not listen to reason, he can expect a divorce or even war with Bokolí's clan, to whom he is doing a great injury by taking away his stepson's wife. After divorce Bokolí's kin may refuse to give Etsíɛ her new bride price and may give it directly to Njoku so that he can obtain a wife to replace the one that was taken from him. [584]

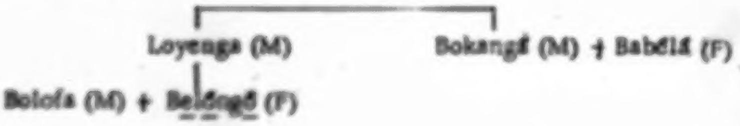
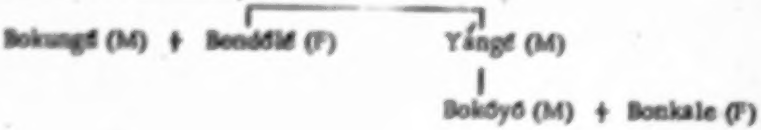
604 The same rules are applicable to aunts and uncles, but they are less strict:

Example 18 (comparable to Example 16):



Loyenga (M)
Bokangé (M) + Babélé (F)
Bolofa (M) + Belóngó (F)

Example 19 (comparable to Example 17):



Bokungé (M) + Bondólé (F)

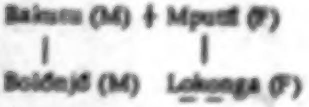
[602] B. Marriage between affines who are collaterally related through their lineal relatives:

a) Marriage between descendants [of the lineal relatives through whom the affinity is established] is strictly forbidden. Thus, the children of two spouses may not marry each other; they are considered brothers and [258] sisters. The same rule applies to two half-cousins (Example 21).

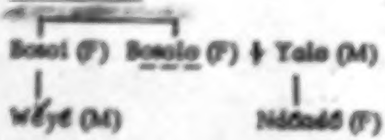
Example 20:



Bakutu (M) + Mputé (F)
Bolónjó (M)
Lokonga (F)

Marriage between Bolónjó and Lokonga is strictly prohibited.

Example 21



Bosoi (F)
Bosolo (F) + Yolo (M)
Wéyé (M)
Nóóndó (F)

Marriage between Wéyé and Nóóndó is prohibited.

592 b) Marriage between ascendants [of the lineal relatives through 602 whom affinity is established] is forbidden, but an exception is made when the affinity is broken by death.

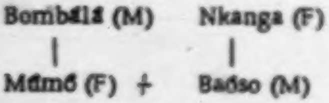
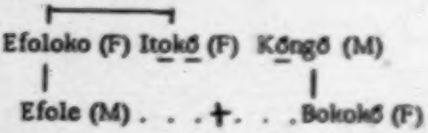
Example 22:



Bombɛlɛ (M)
Nkanga (F)
Mɛmɔ (F)
Baɔso (M)

Marriage between Bombɛlɛ and Nkanga is forbidden.

Example 23



Efoloko (F)
Itokɔ (F)
Kɔngɔ (M)
Efole (M)
Bokokɔ (F)

Marriage between Itokɔ and Kɔngɔ is forbidden, but permitted upon the death of either Efole or Bokokɔ.

Dispensations and violations of this rule do occur.

C. Affinity in collateral line arising from a marriage between relatives in collateral line: The rules are the same as for direct affinity in collateral line (see above, no. 1), C.)

Bokaɛ (M)
Lokɛnga (M)
Ndɛkɔ (M)
Bokelɛ (F)
Mbɛla (F)
Bonjɛngo (F)

Bokaɛ is married to Bonjɛngo. Neither he nor Lokɛnga may marry Bokelɛ, and Ndɛkɔ may not marry Mbɛla [Translator's note: the table shows Ndɛkɔ to be female, but I have corrected the error]. If he had married Bokelɛ, Ndɛkɔ could marry Mbɛla. Furthermore, if Bonjɛngo were Mbɛla's senior, then Lokɛnga could also marry Mbɛla. [259]

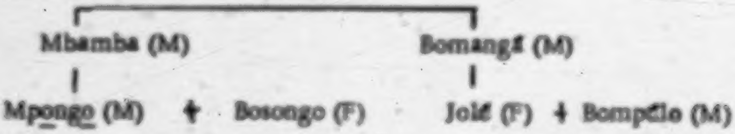
The same rule applies to cousins:

Example 25



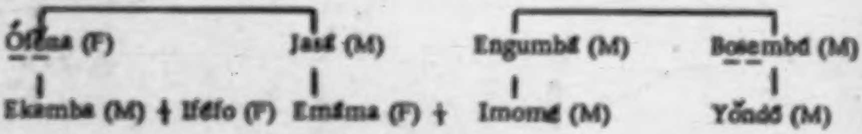
Mbamba (M)
Bomangɛ (M)
Mpongo (M)
Bosongo (F)
Jolɛ (F)
Bompɛlo (M)

Marriage between Bompɛlo and Bosongo is forbidden.

As the degrees of relationship grow more distant, the obstacles increasingly lose their force, so that exceptions are more readily accepted.

One point remains to be noted, although it has already been mentioned several times. Cousins (male or female) who are [601] bɔnankɛnɛ are "fathers" to their cousins according to Nkundɔ́ law; they are therefore treated as aunts or uncles. For them the prohibition is very severe, especially if they are nyangɔ̂kilɔ́, "mother" of a relative by marriage.

Example 26



Ófɛna (F)
Jasɛ (M)
Engumbɛ (M)
Bosembɔ (M)
Ekamba (M)
Ilɛ́fo (F)
Emɛma (F)
Imomɛ (M)
Yɔ̌ndɔ́ (M)

Ekamba is Jasɛ's bɔ̃nankɛnɛ and therefore Emɛma's "father." Ilɛ́fo, his wife, is therefore Emɛma's mother. Emɛma is Yɔ̌ndɔ́'s bokilɔ́. Consequently, Ilɛ́fo is the mother of Yondɔ́'s bokilɔ́ and therefore Yondɔ́'s nyangɔ̂kilɔ́. Marriage between Ilɛ́fo and Yɔ̌ndɔ́ is strictly prohibited, though it is not prohibited between Emɛma and Yɔ̌ndɔ́ (see Example 15).

Adulterous relations among these various persons will be discussed in Chapter VI, Article VI, 2. [260]

602 sufficient dowry at home, then I can always go and appeal to my 613 maternal uncles who are obliged to help me insofar as they are able. I even have the right to the free dowry of one of the children of my mother's nkita. I may always lay out gardens and hunt in the territory of my bonyango, and take part in the court sessions of the maternal clan when they consider the allotment of the free dowries or the division of the inheritance. If, however, I wish to leave my father's clan and establish myself for good in the maternal clan, then I receive priority in everything over my male and female cousins and become heir and clan leader directly after my maternal uncles. This is, thus, a truly princely compensation for the so-called inferiority of the woman in native society: the child of the sister (bonankana) restores her gloriously to the honor and rank which are due her.

8. Related Clan: Likilo

602 Outside my paternal clan and outside my maternal clan, I still 601 have blood relations: namely, the children of my paternal aunt and of my sisters or female cousins, each of whom belongs to the clan of his own father. Just as the children of my mother's brothers are my children, so the children of my father's sister are also my fathers. I am, thus, in the same relationship to the children of my mother's brother as the children of my father's sister are to me.

The other members of the related clans (who are thus not blood relations) all share, according to generation, in the classification of immediate relatives: all the "fathers" of the husband are "fathers-in-law"; all the mothers, "mothers-in-law"; etc. There is this single big difference, that the "superiors" of the husband are also your "superiors." According to the opinions of the Nkundo, they are the only real relatives. Those on the husband's side are called bokilo; those on the wife's side, bokanga.

/159/ The "subordinates" of the husband are not real relatives and rightly call each other "husband" and "wife." In various legally 583 defined circumstances, marriage relations and marriages are permitted between the latter.

602 601 member is, as it were, identified with that member, so that, for instance, all younger sisters and female cousins of one spouse become "wives" of all the younger brothers and male cousins of the other spouse. One must really have the legal sense and the patience and the capacity for palaver and unravelling of an old Nkundo to make sense out all of these relationships. They themselves compare them, in fact, with the inextricable clew of the intestines of a sort of dwarf crocodile: besofo bya lokekele.

9. Exogamy

613 582 ● The term, "exogamic clan," often heard or encountered in writings, is also, at least in the Nkundo-Mongo society, very misleading. The group of persons with whom marriage is forbidden does not constitute any common entity; it differs from person to person. Two half brothers can have the same paternal clan but differ in maternal clan; they can have the same maternal clan and different paternal clans. Marriages are forbidden for older brothers and sisters that are permitted for the younger ones. The rules differ from one blood relation to another, from blood relation with relative-by-marriage to blood relation with relative-by-marriage, from relative-by-marriage with relative-by-marriage to relative-by-marriage with relative-by-marriage.

If one still wishes to put the law of exogamy into European terms, then one might say: 1) blood relationship forbids marriage insofar as the blood relationship is recognized. This recognition varies from clan group to clan group. Sometimes in the same legal but extended clan, an exception is made to this recognition; mostly, however, the different autonomous clans which descend from the same distant ancestor are still bound by the law of exogamy. Generally, groups which have the same father but a different mother /160/ separate most quickly. 2) Relationship (other than blood) forbids marriage—insofar as the relationship is recognized between the parents of spouses; it sometimes permits marriage between children of spouses.

613 582 184 Here it should be observed once again, however, that the customs differ from region to region as regards this recognition; that, for instance, the stepson in many regions may marry his stepmother in a regular marriage; and that the violations are less severely judged and punished in proportion to the degree to which the forbidden relationships diverge.

Rights of the Male Children in Relation to the Nkita of Their Mother

596 We have already seen that the right of succession and father-583 hood passed to the male children of the sister, because she had been 605 sold and had brought money into the family, or rather because she had a nkita there, a sort of guarantee for the money that had been received for her. Nkita-ship brought another right to them, namely, the female children born of the mother's nkita belonged to them; they could sell them and get themselves other women with the money. They could [582] not, however, marry them, since they were their cousins, and custom was opposed to any marriage between relatives. The boys could, [602] nevertheless, take the nkita of their mother as a wife, since the Negroes have no notion of affinity or relationship by marriage. The male children were, then, the owners of the female children that the nkita
of their mother brought into the world:

These three girls, children of nkita Trees, belong to the three sons of Marie. If Marie had only one son, then Piet would have the right to trade the two other girls for money and to buy other wives with this money, either for himself or for his younger brother; but if she [Marie?] brought female children into the world, half of them belong to Marie's son.

583 If the nkita gave birth to no children of the female sex, the 604 boys of Marie could resort to the husband of the nkita of their mother, namely, their uncle, nyangobika. If, however, he had no fortune, no money, [337] no wives, no girls to sell . . . or only wives to whom others could lay claim and had more right, then they were disinherited, poor devils in society, and it cost them long years of work and much

000 What is one to do if even in such cases it is taught, "One must respect" the native customs?

587 The inheriting of wives existed everywhere; it was, in fact,
428 the only wealth left behind by the native. The details of the distribution [184] differed according to district or tribe. Thus, for instance, in some districts it was the eldest son who alone inherited all of the wives of his father. This was in order to preserve the rank and the class of the family. Prestige and power actually depended only on the number of wives that one possessed. In this case, however, this eldest son had, in place of his father, to provide a wife for his younger brothers and the sons of his sisters. As far as impediments [582] to marriage were concerned, generally they strictly observed the impediment of blood relationship; two blood relatives, even in a distant degree, should never enter into marriage, [541] with the exception of the irregularities mentioned above. As for relatives by marriage, these do not exist for them in any degree. There is, nevertheless, one case that somewhat resembles relationship by marriage, namely, the Nkita might never be in the home of a man together with the woman whose Nkita she was. Thus, the son-in-law or the brother-in-law might never take the Nkita of his wife into his home. If, however, the wife had left or died, there was no further impediment.

587 When, like the inheritance above, the family had returned
428 the bride price and had then married the woman to another man, this 431 second husband also had to give a gift to the one who, according to the law of inheritance, had the right to the wife. This gift was called a bampanga.

587 If the wife who was freed by the family had children, only a 428 part of the bride price had to be returned. Sometimes the wife was freed completely through her children. The children then remained with the family of the deceased husband, and they then represented the value of the bride price of their mother. If, however, such a woman was married again by her family, they demanded a second bride price for that.

587 Sometimes a single woman was the Nkita of several other 428 women. In the inheritance several people then had a right over 583 her, and everyone demanded his share. For instance, a young man

614 to each other than either of these groups with Nsambásélé (see Diagram 2). It was for this reason that in my dissertation I divided this rank into two different ranks (kinship subgroups I^{0} and II^{0}). (15) Since there are no obvious criteria for the two ranks and since such a division is not possible in the other villages, I no longer make such distinctions.

[582] [835] The groups of rank C are the exogamous units of the future. Although marriage is not permitted between the members of different C-groups, sexual relations between them are permitted. This permission corresponds to the lonkana of the Bokóté (16).

Groups of Rank D

614 582 The groups of this category constitute the truly exogamous units. It is true that marriages between "advanced persons" ["evolués"] take place even within rank D, but this practice is still frowned upon by the old people. In Isangi we also find the special stipulation that members of two D-groups, Ngelé and Nkoto, may intermarry, [195] but they may not enter into marriage with members of the D-group, Bolíma. Since in present-day Isangi, Bolíma is extinct, this stipulation only works to the disadvantage of the emigrants in Bolíma w'ési and of the children of sisters in other villages. The Bolíma group is regarded as the father group of Isangi (see Diagram 1); Ngelé is the group of the older brother, Nkoto that of the younger brother. This serves as an explanation for the special position of Bolíma in the exogamous system. It is said that it would not be right for a "father" to marry one of his "children" even if these children are the offspring of such distant generations that they intermarry.

15. Müller, Fürstentum, p. 125.

16. Hulstaert, "Mariage," p. 97.f.

614 582 The exogamy rules of the Ekonda do not only refer to their own, agnatic group, but also to all cognate groups to whom kinship relations can still be traced back, i.e., a span of about five generations.

Groups of Rank E

614 621 It may be assumed that these groups always extend beyond the confines of a village. Those parts of a group who have settled next to each other have their communal meeting place, but even the dispersed fractions of the group may come there to consult. In former times probably only one such group had a nkúmú, a sacred prince who lived in the main village (e.g., Isangi), while the other villages were ruled by the senior. Once the title of nkúmú was also bestowed on persons from other villages, the importance of the E-groups almost completely disappeared. Also, in this category the local group plays a much greater role. Occasionally it even includes dependent [609] villages which have not yet been "paternalized," i.e., which are still regarded as alien. In this connection it should be mentioned that probably all larger local groups tend to reconstitute themselves into kinship groups by reinterpreting the genealogy to suit their purposes. It is certain that the "kinship relation" of many "kinship groups" has been created in this manner. We may dismiss the possibility that groups which are divided from one another by the rule of exogamy will invent a kinship relation so close that a previously possible marriage would be outlawed. Also, the combination of other important functions of the lower ranks resulting from the invention of a closer relationship would run counter to the tendency of progressive differentiation (17).

17. We know through statements of the natives that about one hundred years ago the exogamy limit was lowered to the present level. Before that time only the Lonkâna was permitted among the Ngele, Nkoto, and Bolíma.

601 bananankana). As a result, the children are legally identified 602 with their mothers. Thus, my sister's child is a child (bona) to me, or a sister's child (bonankana), but to my own child he would be father (ise).

In addition, he has maternal blood relatives, children of my mother's sisters, who are thus his "brothers and sisters," or children of the daughters of his "male mothers." Since these last daughters are his "children," their children would be his "grandchildren." Again, all the members of these clans who are unrelated by blood are his bokanga.

IV. Likilo

601 There are affinal clans which have given wives (wali; pl., 602 baali) to my clan. This does not, of course, concern my mother's 582 clan, which is a clan related by blood, but rather clans which have given wives, be it to a classificatory "father," to one of their sons, or to one of the sons of the latter. The Nkundo calls all the members of these clans -- with the exception of the woman -- bokilo (pl., bakilo). The Nkundo, merely by marrying a woman, at the same time marries all her legal younger sisters, that is to say, all the bakune [Ed., bankana?] and bana of this woman.
Similarly, the woman marries not only a man, but at the same time all his legal younger brothers, that is, all the bakune and bana of this man (except the children of their own union).

Just as the clans which have received a wife from my clan thus 601 include bokanga and sisters' sons, so also clans that have given 602 us a wife include bakilo and "wives." Clans which have given a wife to my bonyango follow the same rules.

Comments

121 In several recent studies, especially in South Africa, four rules have been defined which govern classificatory terminology.
614 The first rule is that of the "unity of the lineage": The lineage 602 as a whole is classified as belonging to a particular 'generation'

843 bokeka. The same is true if the pregnancy is the result of adultery; 837 the natural father must bear all the consequences of his act. The husband is absolved from them and has no relations with his wife until the end of this particular pregnancy. The culprit must give him a pledge by which he publically recognizes his responsibility, and he is expected to fulfill all the duties of a husband. Therefore he may have relations with the woman during her entire pregnancy without paying additional indemnities. If any accident befalls the mother or the child, he is made to pay a large indemnity.

Note finally that, as we have pointed out in Chapter II,
● [583] Article XI, no bride-price payment can be made from the time the pregnancy becomes visible until after the end of the period of seclusion.

843 To facilitate childbirth the previously mentioned concoction of various leaves mixed with kaolin (isaá) is continuously ap-844 plied to the abdomen. Medical scarifications on the abdomen are 757 also performed.

Finally, as the time of delivery approaches, special douches [278] made from a concoction of the bark of the boímbo tree (1) are administered. All these treatments are called beté byà bosánjá, that is, medicines (for the purpose) of an easy delivery.

Article III. Birth

844 1. Delivery

A woman remains with her husband for childbirth; she does not go home to her family. Only exceptionally does she give birth elsewhere -- for instance, if she has been sent home for one reason or another, or during a trip, while working in the fields, near a stream, or a spring, etc. Such sudden unexpected deliveries

613 member. In the case of common use or of an exceptionally good 423 yield (large game, a rich haul of fish, large yield from a particular cultivation of common property, such as palm beer), these are divided by the clan leader and their respective shares allotted to all members.

Personal property consists of the hut and the tools of the man, the 613 furniture of the woman, and the domestic animals. These are movable 422 and can also go out of the clan through inheritance. Should they leave their husbands, married women may taken with them whatever they have received or inherited personally from their wise.

In contrast to the economic property of the clan, there is the dotal 424 or capital property, the marriage settlements, which do not have 613 economic, but only legal value. They represent the rights over people.
583 In the first place we find those persons who themselves are the source of rights: the marriageable girls (bibunanyi) of the clan /A/ and the substitutes for women married into the clan /A/—that is, the women who are married into the allied clan /B/ with the acquired bride price (nkita). /Ed. Clan A pays bride price for a woman from clan B, the allied clan. Then clan B uses this acquired bride price to obtain another woman in marriage, a "substitute." This substitute is nkita to [567] the original woman./ In addition, there are the slaves who can replace a caput. In the second place, there are the titles which represent 421 a caput: the /153/ so-called dotal securities (baumba). These dotal 613 securities or titles are kept by the clan leader and, with the knowledge of his immediate successor, hidden somewhere in the ground. With the approval of the clan council, he may also lend them out. These dotal possessions or rights are also common property of the clan and are used to procure a wife for the clan members, each in his turn.

The common ownership of the economic property makes possible the difficult sharing of woods and river, prevents the cutting up of the property, hinders the impoverishment and the proletarization of the poor, and insures the livelihood of all of the clan members. This common ownership has nothing more to do with communism than the common ownership of property in our nuclear families.

The dotal or capital property, the bride price titles, which have perhaps aroused the most indignant and lofty compassion of our civilized world, have less to do with buying and selling the wife then our own dowry and class system. They are permanent legal titles of the contract which is made between the clans of the couple on the occasion of the marriage. Our individualistic liberalism and mercantilism have regarded these legal securities only through economic spectacles and their sister, bona wa nkana. As an example:

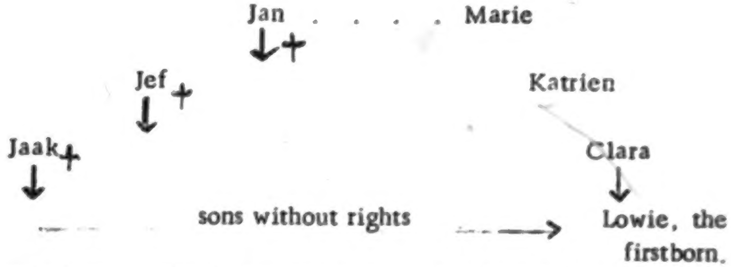
Jan
Marie
Brothers
Jef
Jaak
sons without rights
Paul becomes the successor.

Or if there were more sisters, the rights passed to the firstborn son of those sisters; for instance:



Jan
Marie
Jef
Katrien
Jaak
Clara
sons without rights
Lowie, the firstborn.

He consequently became the father and supreme head of the family upon the death of the three brothers.

562
In order to understand this peculiar custom clearly, some explanations should be given. The custom in this country is that the woman is sold; not a single one escaped that general rule in former days. With that money the father or brother bought, or rather, had to buy himself another woman. This wife belonged, however, to the daughter or sister who had been sold; the daughter or sister called her nkita, "goods" or "property." The children born of this nkita called her [the woman sold]: is'e'omoto, "female father." Even if she brought male children into the world, the rights of their mother passed to them, and [334] their mother was called father by the children of the nkita. According to our ideas, they were only nephews. That held even if the woman was still not paid for; it was enough that a ndanga, a security as proof of further payment, had been given. It was also not

583 to have received money for her; another member of the family was 567 sufficient. She was sold by her family and accordingly, wherever the money had remained or whoever had received it, she had her rights in the family. Since the family maintained itself through the sale of the children of the female sex, the male children born of them were considered as the masters, the rightful claimants, the fathers. There was no exception to this rule; it was not to be altered, and no one had ever thought of disputing the place of the claimant or of laying claim to his rights. I have only heard of one single case of that sort, namely, at the succession of the Ruki, the younger brother was said to have killed his older brother in order to take over his place. He was said to have made a hole in his brother's proa, so that it sank when it reached the middle of the stream. The matter in itself seems an impossibility; also I consider it a legend, unless an accident might have happened that was interpreted in a mistaken or deliberately false manner.

The rightful dlaimant, bona wa nkana, sister's son, might 596 still be a child; nevertheless he was called father and everyone vied 576 with one another in showing him the honor due a father. That was the unbreakable law, not only for the father common to the hamlet, boloi, but also for the father of each individual family.

583 Nkita is what the woman is called who is bought with the money 602 that the father or brother has received for his daughter or sister on the occasion of her marriage. In reality, however, she is only the nkita, goods or property, of the sold woman. Nkita ekam, "my property," this woman calls her. For instance, Jan [335] sells his daughter, Marie, to Klaas and buys another wife, Trees, with the money received. The latter woman is now the nkita, the property, of Marie.

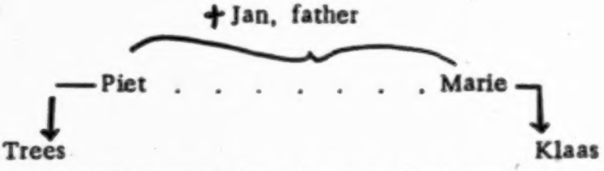
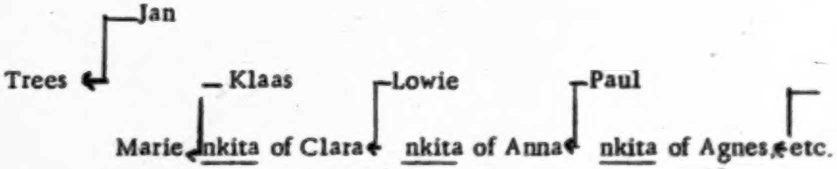
Or else, father Jan having died, Piet sold his sister, Marie, to Klaas and buys Trees with the money:



Practically speaking, Marie profited very little from her nkita. She had, it is true, certain rights over her nkita; thus, the latter considered her as her mistress, helped her in sickness and heavy work. Unfortunately for her, what she gained on the one side she lost again on the other side, in that she herself was also the nkita of another woman and consequently had the same obligations to fulfill towards the latter that her own nkita owed her. For example:



Jan, then, sold Marie to Klaas in order to buy Trees; Klaas, however, in order to be able to buy Marie, sold in turn his sister, Clara, to Lowie; Lowie acquired the necessary money to buy Clara by marrying off his sister, Anna. Thus, Trees then became the nkita of Marie, Marie the nkita of Clara, Clara of Anna, Anna of Agnes, etc. In short, every wife had her nkita and was, with few exceptions, the nkita of another wife. I say with few exceptions; for example, the wife was not the nkita of another woman if her husband had bought her with his own earned money. Practically speaking, this changed the matter very little. Also [336] there was no change if the nkita of a woman died; it was only a loss for the buyer or owner of that woman.

596 We have already seen that the right of succession and father-
583 hood passed to the male children of the sister, because she had been 605 sold and had brought money into the family, or rather because she had a nkita there, a sort of guarantee for the money that had been received for her. Nkita-ship brought another right to them, namely, the female children born of the mother's nkita belonged to them; they could sell [582] them and get themselves other women with the money. They could not, however, marry them, since they were their cousins, and custom was opposed to any marriage between relatives. The boys could, [602] nevertheless, take the nkita of their mother as a wife, since the Negroes have no notion of affinity or relationship by marriage. The male children were, then, the owners of the female children that the nkita
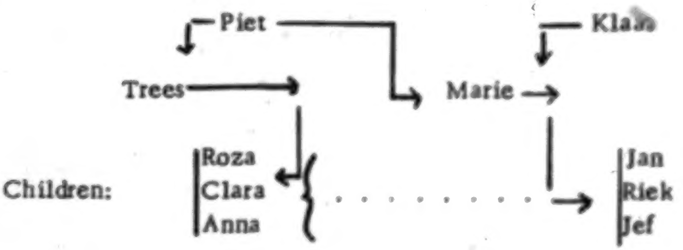
of their mother brought into the world:



These three girls, children of nkita Trees, belong to the three sons of Marie. If Marie had only one son, then Piet would have the right to trade the two other girls for money and to buy other wives with this money, either for himself or for his younger brother; but if she [Marie?] brought female children into the world, half of them belong to Marie's son.

604 If the nkita gave birth to no children of the female sex, the boys of Marie could resort to the husband of the nkita of their mother, namely, their uncle, nyangobika. If, however, he had no fortune, no money, [337] no wives, no girls to sell ... or only wives to whom others could lay claim and had more right, then they were disinherited, poor devils in society, and it cost them long years of work and much

583 searching for old disputes and old arguments about wives to get a wife.
604 And then they were still not always successful; their youth itself was against them here and robbed them constantly of the little that they 464 had saved for that purpose. The means for getting money, such as lances, knives, arm and foot bands, were extremely scarce. The Blacks do not know of workers or servants, and if one of those poor souls presented himself at the home of one who was better endowed by fortune and offered to chop wood for him, to lay out a manioc field, or to build a house for him, to gather straw and bamboo in the forest for that purpose, then the inborn laziness of the Negro would require long months to complete that work. As salary, the worker received only a few bakonga (copper arm of leg bands); these he already owed to the owner for having shown too much inclination for one or another of his wives. The result of this was that many young men remained with-589 out a wife and that those who were favored by chance, that is to say, 595 had many children of the female sex in their family, each had several 562 wives. I consider this a primary cause of polygyny. The woman had a relatively high monetary value and represented capital. Thus, it did not happen that anyone gave his daughter or sister to another for nothing, just as among us it does not happen that a farmer gives his cow or horse to a poor devil for nothing.

583 If the father or brother sold a daughter born of the nkita of his 604 daughter or sister -- a right that general custom gave him and which usually occurred, since the children of the female sex were sold very 603 young and the boys, the rightful claimants or owners, in that case were still very young -- this was done in order to buy another wife. The rights of the children shifted then as follows:

583 604 603 Jan, the father, by selling Katrien, the nkita of his daughter Marie, becomes indebted to Joseph, the son of Marie and at the same time his own grandson; and on the other side he becomes the debtor of Antonius, his other grandson, by selling his mother, Katrien.

Anna, whom he bought, was then the nkita of Katrien and the quasi-nkita of Marie. Both sons, Joseph and Antonius, were hard pressed because of Anna, the nkita of both of their mothers. If Anna bore two daughters, as I have indicated, the case was simple: the first daughter belonged to Joseph and the second to Antonius. If, however, she gave birth to only one daughter, then this child belonged to Joseph, and Antonius was left out in the cold. If father Jan had no children of the female sex by Anna, then the matter was extremely thorny for both of them, and if their grandfather or uncle possessed no money, had no more wives by whom he had daughters, there was nothing left for them to do but, at his death, to take the nkita of their mother as a wife. For this reason it happened many times that young men lived with old women, and even though there was then generally no more hope of children, those wives were then still good enough to cook the meals and do the little work that a Negro household requires.

600 I will not digress any further about the method of distribution of women, about the rights over the women which the nkita system brings with it. It would take us too far. Furthermore, not only the present, but also the past and the future are involved in it; so that one would have to be a Negro and raised in these matters to understand them clearly ... and even then they involve numerous palavers (disputes), which continually agitate the families and the villages.

The Origin of the Nkita?

576 583 562 The sale of the woman and the immediate loss of her freedom must naturally have given her cause for revolt. It has perhaps cost the man a severe struggle to make the woman content with her lot. A compensation or reimbursement had to be given to her, and most certainly the nkita system has its origin there. It was at least a partial compensation that the man gave to the woman. It gave her rights over her nkita

596 and over the children who were born to the latter; even more, it gave 583 her own children rights which exist nowhere else in the world and probably 562 among no other people: they became the superiors, the fathers of the family of their mother. Unfortunately, practically considered, the woman enjoyed very little of the gift which was given her; she remained what she was, slave of money, slave of the man. Even her children, for whom the nkita-ship secured such great advantages in her family, brought them into a false situation, in that it robbed them in the home of their own father of all the advantages that it brought them in the home of their mother's father. It was only the old and well-favored who actually gained advantage from the nkita system and enjoyed them.

1) It relieved them in the first place of all care on behalf of their daughters whom they sold while still children; and if later, after they were grown up, these daughters complained about the injustice done to them, they could answer them, "But, my dear daughter, I have done you no wrong; here in my own house is the woman whom I bought with your money; she belongs to you always, and the children that I have by her are your children; you are both their father and their mother; they will call you is'eomoto (female father), and in that capacity they will honor and serve you; the boys will at the same time be the children of your children, and the girls will be sold to give your sons the opportunity to buy a wife for themselves."

2) It discharged them for the most part from all care of providing a wife for their sons, and it denied the latter the right to make claims to the women whom the father possessed. [340] If the son begged his father for a woman, he could put him off and say to him, "But, my boy, you have the nkita of your mother; the children (girls) who will be born of her are for you. We shall sell them, and with the money we will buy you a wife." Most of those girls, however, were traded by the father for another wife, since his son was still, in that case, small. Almost all the women then ended up in the harem of the father before passing on to the son. Thus, after all, the nkita system only benefited the lust and the lasciviousness of the old Negro and made him the one and only master of the woman. Sons, daughters, wives, and children were, in contrast, the dupes and victims of the nkita-ship.

FAMILY LIFE AND CUSTOMS AMONG THE NATIVES OF EQUATORIAL AFRICA

583 The so-called marriage, or rather, the acquisition of a wife takes place:

1. Through a bride price to the family of the woman who is given;
2. Through buying, or the payment of an amount for a woman who is no longer in the hands of the family;
3. Through inheritance;
4. Through abduction.

Acquisition by bride price is called enga, njengenga: "the binding or engagement of oneself."

Acquisition by purchase is called somba, masomba: "buying."

When a woman is acquired through inheritance, the designation under which she was first acquired is retained. When the deceased father, uncle, or brother had acquired the woman by bride price or purchase, the heir will say: "I have taken this woman by bride price, purchase, etc."

Acquisition by abduction often occurred formerly in the tribal wars.

In disputes the natives often say: "He stole that woman." This is usually to announce the fact that the woman, according to them, was acquired in a dishonest manner.

The payment of bride price, purchase, etc., is usually made with a combination of money, objects, and male or female slaves.

This combined payment is called songa, masonga: "equalizing, settlement."

When a native is asked in what way he acquired his wife, he will usually say: njoloengaki (I have paid her bride price), because he [532] knows well that this is the most honest way. There are, however, many wives who have been acquired in the other way.

584 Acquisition by bride price sometimes begins before the birth of the expected daughter. The man, usually a polygynist, gives something of security to the father of the child. This security

583 584 [836] consists of a beautifully fashioned native knife, or a lance, or mitako [copper wire used as currency]. In some areas, it was the polygynist who attended the mother at the birth of the daughter. He had the wood gathered, water brought, and food prepared. If, then, the expected child was a boy, the security was usually returned, and the contract declared null and void. If, however, the one who had given the security was a village chief or a man of importance, then the father of the child tried to give him another daughter. The father had, for instance, at an earlier time given a daughter to another man of much less importance. In the above-mentioned case, he would give back the bride price received, take his daughter back, and give her to the polygynist from whom he expected a larger bride price.

583 591 While very young and still a child, the little daughter was installed in the harem of the polygynist. She was brought up there, together with other children of her age and status; or rather, she grew up there in the midst of those heathen customs without any upbringing.

585 The composition of the harem of a polygamist:

The first wife was called the Bomatsa; she preceded all the other wives in rank, and in the absence of the polygynist, she was the mistress of the harem.

The second wife was called Ekila; she was the most loved and preceded all the remaining wives. She was also called Nkonda.

The third wife was called Bolumbu. At the appointment of the nominee, a certain ceremony took place, and the wife was clothed with an animal skin. The Nku, a sort of patriarch and [302] magician, sometimes had three or four Bolumbu who served as messengers to other villages. In this capacity they had special [12] privileges. For instance, to attack a Bolumbu was a reason for declaring war.

[833] The remaining women were simply women of the harem, without distinction.

585 In the area of Monjoku, among the Bokee [Bole], the first wife was called Nkisa, with the same rank as Bomatsa. The second

000 the same rights as the other children of the polygynist.

595 The polygynist always sought to increase the number of his
556 wives, for his prestige rose and his fortune increased in that manner.
593 If anyone in civilized lands seeks to enlarge his fortune, this is done, people say, in order to insure the future of his children. The native thinks little about that; his primary idea is to enjoy himself and to surpass others in prestige and esteem. As far as the future of his children is concerned, there are polygynists who possess twenty or thirty wives or even more, and sometimes they have only one or two children. Also it is little in keeping with their notions to care for the future; he who is still alive tomorrow must take care of 595 tomorrow then, so they reason. On the contrary, instead of caring for his children, the polygynist often took great trouble to obtain a 593 wife for his son. The son, however, was not yet the owner of his 584 wife; it was, so to speak, only a loan. Not until after the death of 606 his father did he become owner. In some districts, when the father had obtained a wife for his son, he first kept this wife for some time for himself. Only after a few months did he give her to his son. In 595 other districts, when the wife was pregnant by the son, he was obliged 593 to send her for a few days to his father. He was not allowed to bear
606 the honor of fatherhood alone; his father must share that with him.
842 The father reserved for himself the honor of naming all of the children of his children. In some areas of the Congo, morals were so
835 low and common that the father even kept his own daughters in his harem. This did not occur in Equatorial Africa, but there was a custom that was not much better. The magician was sometimes 583 consulted about the bride price which the father tried to get for his 791 daughter, or the brother for his sister.

The magician then gave them the advice that they themselves should first have relations with their own daughter or sister. This custom existed almost everywhere in Equatorial Africa.

583 [535] Bride Price. In general, the daughter was given in marriage upon payment of a bride price. The father had little choice of the future husband of his daughter. The one who guaranteed the most goods in payment was certain to get her. Since, in most cases, the little daughter had not yet arrived at the years of maturity, there was naturally no question of her consent. The bride price was not paid all at once, but gradually during the years while the daughter grew up. Since the daughter was given without her consent

583 to an old, worn-out, gray-haired man, it naturally often occurred that when she arrived at maturity, she no longer wished to remain with him. She therefore left him and went to another, or back to her family. In the latter case, however, great difficulties arose concerning the return of the bride price. Indeed, with the bride price the father had received for his daughter, he bought himself another wife. This wife was then called the Nkita of the daughter. We could translate Nkita in this case as "substitute." The Nkita represented the value of the sold or married daughter. Meanwhile, the daughter herself was often the Nkita of the daughter or sister of her husband. Thus, many women were the Nkita of each other. According to their customs the children (boys) were in theory the heirs of the Nkita of their mother. The Nkita was, in fact, the value or the bride price of their mother.

One might ask whether the wife was then always content that she was, so to speak, an object of trade. In general, yes, she was satisfied with this. This is how the customs were, and nobody gave a thought to changing them. Usually the wife simply found herself in an arranged situation (fait accompli). Gradually a certain sense of honor is coming into being among the Christian wives against these heathen customs.

If the woman desired that a large bride price or purchase price be paid for her, was it also because she wished to care for the future of her children who would be heirs of her bride price? No, they say, not for that reason -- for, they add, what woman knew in advance that she would have children, and moreover boys? There [163] are, in fact, many women who have no children. Also, [536] only 573 the boys are eligible for the inheritance; the girls are heirs only in 439 name. When it came to the inheritance, the children inherited the 581 Nkita of their mother only if there were no more brothers of the mother or uncles on their father's side. The mightiest always had the greatest right.

Usually a youth had to acquire a wife with the bride price or supplement of the bride price of his sister. The inheritance of the Nkita of his mother was only secondary. Still we often see a heathen wife leave her husband in order to go to another, without bothering much about her children who remain with the deserted husband, their father.

586 583 Divorce. When the wife left her husband to go back to her family, they had to give back the bride price they had received. In general this was a very difficult business, because the bride price was used by the father or the brother to obtain another wife for himself, the Nkita. Thus, in order to be able to return the bride price, they would have to sell this Nkita or give her back to her family and ask for the return of her bride price. There were few other ways to give back the bride price; all their property consisted of wives. Since the family usually could not or would not return the bride price, the deserted husband then sought to become the master of the mother or a sister of his runaway wife, whom he then kept as a hostage. Among the heathens, this was a commonly used expedient to retrieve the wife or the bride price. When the runaway wife discovered that her mother or sister was a prisoner of her former husband, she often went back out of sympathy for her mother or sister. When the wife had gone not to her family but to another man, which was often the case, the family urged this second husband to give the bride price to the first husband. This was usually the only practical means by which the difficulty was resolved. This second husband then paid the bride price to the first. Since the [537] bride price often had been only paid in part by the first one, he then paid the remaining portion to the family.

Sometimes, if there were no way to return the bride price, the woman was forced to go back to her deserted husband. To avoid unpleasant treatment, she had to feign submissiveness.

586 587 As soon as an agreement was arrived at, either with the family or with the second husband, over the return of the bride price, the first bond was considered broken. If the woman was with her family, she was considered free to enter into a new agreement. If, however, she was with another husband, then after the argument she was considered bound to that second husband. The primary bond of their agreement thus appears to be the bride price.

586 If the wife had children, these remained with their father, and the bride price was only partially returned. The value of the children was, so to speak, subtracted from the bride price.

837 When a wife of a polygynist had illicit relations with another 586 man of the same village, this was called Bonsamba. When she had such relations with a man of another village, this was called Isoke.
As we have observed, the ordinary wives of the harem often had such relations. When the woman eloped with her bonsamba or isoke, or with whomever it was, she was pursued by her husband or owner, who tried to get her back. If the wife refused, negotiations over the bride price began.

If an agreement was reached or if a pledge was given as guarantee for the payment, the first bond was considered broken, and the woman was considered bound to this second man, even though he had been her bonsamba or isoke.

It might also happen that the first husband was so jealous that he did not want to make any agreement; then he attempted to kill either the guilty wife or her second husband. If the woman became 593 ill at the home of her husband, he went to tell her family and had to 758 give a security to the family.

583 Often the family came to get the wife, in order to be able to care for her better. If, in such a case, the wife [538] died at the home of her family, there were no further difficulties about the bride price, according to their customs. If, however, the bride price had still not been completely paid, the family asked their son-in-law to pay the remainder.

583 In recent times, now that the heathen customs have been 171 undermined by the European occupation, we see that the husbands whose wives have gone to their family when sick and have died there, demand the return of the bride price from the family, but this is completely contrary to their old customs. In one case the husband could demand the return of the bride price, namely, if the wife had left while healthy to go to her family and had died there.

562 Buying or Trading of Women. The woman was also in many 439 cases an acknowledged object of trade. The great village chiefs, among others Ibuka and Yoma, of whom we shall speak further, carried on a sort of woman trade. With European articles and also native currency, they went to other districts of the Equator [Province] to buy women with them, just like someone who goes to market, even though no public markets where women were sold actually existed.

000 What is one to do if even in such cases it is taught, "One must respect" the native customs?

587 The inheriting of wives existed everywhere; it was, in fact,
[184] tribution differed according to district or tribe. Thus, for instance, in some districts it was the eldest son who alone inherited all of the wives of his father. This was in order to preserve the rank and the class of the family. Prestige and power actually depended only on the number of wives that one possessed. In this case, however, this eldest son had, in place of his father, to provide a wife for his younger brothers and the sons of his sisters. As far as impediments [582] to marriage were concerned, generally they strictly observed the impediment of blood relationship; two blood relatives, even in a distant degree, should never enter into marriage, [541] with the exception of the irregularities mentioned above. As for relatives by marriage, these do not exist for them in any degree. There is, nevertheless, one case that somewhat resembles relationship by marriage, namely, the Nkita might never be in the home of a man together with the woman whose Nkita she was. Thus, the son-in-law or the brother-in-law might never take the Nkita of his wife into his home. If, however, the wife had left or died, there was no further impediment.

587 When, like the inheritance above, the family had returned
428 the bride price and had then married the woman to another man, this 431 second husband also had to give a gift to the one who, according to the law of inheritance, had the right to the wife. This gift was called a bampanga.

428 part of the bride price had to be returned. Sometimes the wife was freed completely through her children. The children then remained with the family of the deceased husband, and they then represented the value of the bride price of their mother. If, however, such a woman was married again by her family, they demanded a second bride price for that.

587 Sometimes a single woman was the Nkita of several other 428 women. In the inheritance several people then had a right over
573 her, and everyone demanded his share. For instance, a young man

587 428 583 had to acquire a wife with the bride price or with a supplement of the bride price of his sisters. Three of his sisters, for instance, were married, and he needed 3,000 mitako to pay for his intended wife. Now he went with presents to his three brothers-in-law and asked for 1,000 mitako from each of them. The bride price was already paid to the father; the 1,000 mitako that he asks are a supplement of the bride price.

With these 3,000 mitako, our young man pays for his wife. This wife now becomes the Nkita of the three sisters. If this young man dies, his three sisters and his three brothers-in-law all demand their share back from the widow. If she is sold, the price must be divided among the three brothers-in-law. If she remains in the family of her husband, with the uncle or brother, she continues to be the Nkita of her three sisters-in-law.

431 583 [542] There also exists a general rule and custom that the family which has received the bride price regularly give gifts to their daughter and son-in-law or sister and brother-in-law. These gifts consisted of goats, dogs (which also have a rather large value among the natives), ducks, etc., but the gifts never consisted of money. These gifts were in turn given by the son-in-law or brother-in-law to the one who had helped him pay the bride price.

For instance, if the young man of whom we just spoke received gifts from the family of his wife, he would then have given these gifts to his three brothers-in-law. These gifts were often so much that the value of them was almost equal to the bride price that the man had paid for his wife. Custom demanded, in such a case, that the man then pay a supplement to the bride price.

In case the bride price had to be given back, the gifts that the family had already given might be subtracted from the bride price. When such disputes are brought before a European, it is difficult for him to settle them, for the value is tremendously exaggerated by the parties. The husband will demand the return of a much larger bride price than he actually gave, while the family on its side will estimate the gifts that they had given as much higher than the actual value or amount.

Their first original money was as follows.

436 1. Benkata: this was thin iron or copper wire rolled into small rings; the thickness of the wire was about 3 millimeters; the length, 20 to 25 centimeters.

2. Bingetele: iron or copper bars about 8 millimeters thick and 15 centimeters long; these are still in use in Bikoro.

436 301 3. Bekata: copper wire; thickness about 7 or 8 millimeters, and 1 meter or 1.50 meters long; spiral shaped; the women wore these rolled around their legs as copper leggings.

[543] 4. Bakonga: copper rings which served as arm bands and foot bands and also as collars. The size differed for small or large persons; the weight is from one half kilo to 5 kilos.

436 5. Mitako: copper wire about 4 millimeters thick and 25 centimeters long, usually bent like a hairpin. The mitako served as a uniform currency, from which the other values and prices were reckoned, like the franc with us. The value of the mitako was formerly reckoned at five centimes.

● 583 435 Formerly the bride price, which was paid for a wife in almost all of Equatorial Africa, was from 5 to 20 bakonga. (The value of the bakonga differed greatly according to the weight. The average value, however, is estimated at 2.50 francs.) This payment was further supplemented with slaves or wives. This manner of payment and the bride price still exist in the districts where the natives have not yet, or practically not, come in contact with Europeans. Also, [567] it was sometimes paid with only slaves or women. The price for one female slave was relatively much less than for another woman.

178 583 Through the occupation of the Congo by Europeans, the family life of the natives has necessarily undergone great changes, and their customs and habits as well.

In the first place the natives have found themselves deprived of their wives by the sentinels of the Independent Congo State. [661] These black sentinels, appointed in the villages by the State to supervise the reaping of caoutchouc, assumed an unlimited power. They took as many wives of the natives as they chose and did not pay for a single one.

Next many black soldiers, servant boys, and workmen of the Europeans also took wives everywhere in the beginning, without bothering about the native customs, that is, without paying for those wives; and this often happened under the protective power of their Whites.

178 583 We can add to that also a large number of black women who became the famous "housekeepers" of the Europeans. Although payment for these women was usually given to their owners, they were still withdrawn from the family life and the native customs. Finally, the Christian women, who now live in Christian marriage, must also be mentioned.

In addition, the price of wives and the bride price have [544] undergone great changes, primarily in those districts where the natives came into more immediate contact with Europeans. Before the arrival of the Europeans, their main medium of payment was the woman herself; a woman was paid for with a woman. Now it is forbidden to use women as currency. Therefore the natives have raised the price in the payment of bakonga and mitako.

178 583 435 In some districts close to the European centers, the natives have brought the price for wives and the bride price to a height never before known. For one wife they ask several nkesi.

A nkesi is 10,000 mitako. Such a sum is much too high in relation to their means. In a village there are, for instance, 50 women; for one woman, 40,000 to 50,000 mitako are asked, while at present in the whole village together the sum of 50,000 mitako is no more to be found. Therefore to oblige someone to pay two or three nkesi is usually to make it impossible for him to pay, or rather to make it necessary for him to pay with women, which is nothing else than encouraging woman trade, which then occurs.

802 177 A remark should also be made here about the nomenclature of the numerals. Nkesi is not a word of the Equatorial peoples; it was brought in from elsewhere with the Europeans. Their amounts were as follows:

10 was jum or bonkama;
100 was nkoto; and with the arrival of the Whites and foreign population came
1,000 nkesi.

The present numerical value is: 10, jum; 100, bonkama; 1,000, nkoto; and 10,000, nkesi. Some very old Negroes, however, still say bonkama for 10.

[583] This is the probable origin of the great rise in price of wives, especially in the area of Coquilhatville.

178 439 583 When the first Europeans arrived at Leopoldville and Brazzaville, it was not long before European materials and other articles also came to Coquilhatville to the hands of the great village chiefs who carried on trade on the rivers, primarily in slaves and ivory. The village chiefs, Yoma from the village of Boyeka, Ibuka of Boyere, Yamba of [545] Eala, Nkake of Bokele, etc., carried these European articles up the Tshuapa and Ikelemba rivers, and they bought slaves and wives with them.

Returning home again, they bought wives from their own district and paid for them with the slaves and women whom they themselves had bought cheaply with the European articles. For one woman of their district they paid three or four women. [802] The arrival of the Whites and foreign Blacks acquainted them with the number nkesi which, however, in their definition was only 1,000 and which they formerly called 10 nkoto or 10 times 100.

178 583 It was not long before the Europeans had to concern themselves with hearing disputes over the wives. In the Black land such a thing is unavoidable. Whenever the Blacks came to the Whites with their disputes, they dared not or would not say, "I paid for this woman with three women, but they said, "I paid for this woman with three nkesi," that is, 3 times 1,000 mitako. Meanwhile, the nkoto and nkesi acquired their value of 1,000 and 10,000. The statement, however, that a woman was paid for with nkesi was retained, through the error of the Whites or through the greed of the polygynists or both. Indeed, later some women were paid for with nkesi, namely, when the prevalent currency in the Congo was the mitako. It was also no wonder, for the polygynists had a monopoly on the wives, and it was to their advantage to raise the price.

Therefore, if the native of Coquilhatville says now that his father or his uncle paid for that woman with three or four nkesi, this generally means that the wife was paid for with three or four women. The price of the women in Wangata, near Coquilhatville, was formerly no higher than in the other areas. Many women were paid for with only five bakonga, for instance, in Bokala, near Bamania, a village which belonged to the village chief Yoma of Boyeka.

178 583 435 It should also be noted that the nkesi which have been paid in recent years in Wangata have been paid not in mitako or in

178 currency, but in articles on which the natives fix a conventional ●583 price, usually much higher than the actual value. Thus, for in-435 stance, a pataki, or piston rifle, was always reckoned at 3,000 mitako; it did not matter that it was only worth 1,500. There are, [546] therefore, only very few women who are paid for with nkesi in real currency or mitako.

691 The tragic result of this exaggerated rise in prices is that the 583 mutual debts and difficulties among the natives have been increased, 178 so that they are almost impossible to solve. In the attempt to settle a dispute, five other disputes come into it, all equally complicated, for the simple reason that the money, the mitako, to be paid does not exist, and it is forbidden to pay with women. To settle a dispute, several months are sometimes necessary, or a whole year. Other disputes never end, but pass on from father to son and are brought by each one in turn before each new District Administrator. In the districts where the bride price has not been raised, the difficulties and disputes are not nearly as numerous and are easy to solve. In the districts where the purchase price and the bride price of the women have become excessively high, the natives themselves admit that their disputes could formerly be solved easily, but that this is at present almost impossible.

It is unnecessary to say that this situation is harmful to the task of civilizing [the country] and to the mutual good relations of the natives. The natives are constantly coming to the District Administrator of the area to lay before him their disputes over women who have not been paid for. These disputes take up a great deal of the costly time of the administrator. He must hear and settle these usually very complicated disputes, for often the general peace of a village or district depends on it.

Also the natives themselves spend whole days and weeks doing nothing besides holding meetings to discuss the unpayable debts of bride price and the purchase price of wives, simply because the prices are excessive. For lack of currency, they pay each other with each other's debts, which usually complicates the business even more.

To improve this condition, the price of women and the bride price should be lowered, greatly lowered. We have seen that this was possible and practical when once a District Administrator who knew the native customs very well in the area of Coquilhatville really began to do it.

000 [547] Unfortunately the system was not continued. Also, it must not be said that it would be unjust to lower the price of the women. Rather, injustice would thus be redressed, a degenerate custom be improved. Through the present system, ever more injustice is committed and suffered.

583 The difficulties for Christian marriages become daily still more difficult. This is true for the marriages already entered into and for the future marriages.

583 428 426 [465 511] The bride price to be paid for the wife ought to be such that every young man can pay that sum with his own money, with the money that he has earned himself by his work. This sum cannot be high, for the ordinary working man in the Congo, who makes up the large part of the population, does not earn much more than what he needs for board and clothing. Therefore to pay an excessively large sum as a bride price forces him to borrow and to run up debts among his relatives and friends. The result of this is that the system of the Nkita goes over unnoticed into the Christian marriages, and the woman remains an object for inheritance. Indeed, when the man dies the creditors will come, namely, those who have loaned him money -- and demand the wife. The disputes over the bride price then begin anew, and they will again give the wife in marriage in return for a new bride price. Thus, there is no end to it. The wife, the mother, will never achieve any rights but will always remain an object of inheritance. There has been talk about declaring the widow free at the death of her husband in order to prevent the inheriting of wives, but how will it be possible to [548] achieve that if the bride price is not lessened, considerably lessened? When a

583 428 426 young man can pay for his wife, or rather pay her bride price with his own earned money, then that wife becomes his property. At his death, no creditors or mortgage holders can come to demand the wife since she will then actually be free. There will also be no difficulty in making her heir to the property of her husband, for herself and her children. The bride price or payment for wives among the civilized Blacks could be very much simplified. To abolish it would not be so easy. Indeed, it seems to be in the customs and the habits of the whole Black race. Then too, with respect to bride price, usually still in entanglements with their heathen relatives.

000 When the price is lowered, the large number of wives of polygynists will be seen to disperse and go to the men who have no wife. Thus, single marriages will be increased, and the district, whose population is greatly decreased, will become populated again. Lowering the price will also prevent women being paid for with women; and thus the trading of women will be hindered, since then the whole bride price can be paid in currency. It is also anticipated that the woman will become less a material object; and by changing the wife from an object of inheritance to an heiress, her moral value will be raised in her own eyes and in the eyes of the men.

In order to civilize the land, Christian marriages must be established. In order to establish Christian marriages, the impediments that stand in the way must be removed, and everything be put to work to benefit what the good outcome of that can asure.

When a young man old enough to marry believes he has the 584 means to do so, he goes out to seek a wife. Naturally, he knows a number of girls, and as a rule he has no trouble finding one who suits him. The courtship is quite simple. As everywhere there are meet- [831] ings, visits, chats, and jokes; but there is no romanticism or sentimentality, for they are absolutely unknown to these peoples. Since they are in a hurry [103] to reach the objective of their relationship, namely conjugal life, -- and their progress toward this goal is facilitated by usages and customs -- there remains little time for poetry.

There is no specific term for courtship itself. The Nkundɔ́ simply speak of "talking with a woman," sooja bǒmoto, "looking for a woman," asa bǒmoto. The gil who is its object is referred to as bombɔ́yɔ́ (or boambá among the Injɔ́lɔ́).

First, the young man addresses his proposals to the girl: "ńdanga ńkokolɛ́ (ńkokumbɔ́le) la wǎlí, "I want to take you for wife." She shows her agreement by saying, "ńkolanga wɛ̌ ng'ɔ́kɔ́, "I love you also," or more frequently, "elaká ô wɛ̌, "as you wish," ǰɔ̌i ó likɛ̌, "it's up to you," or something of this sort. (1)

1. Note that for the Nkundɔ́ these expressions have quite a different significance than would appear from the words. They express a real agreement and an explicit and personal consent. In fact it is considered improper for a woman to use a more direct expression.

831 The lovers exchange gifts. The girl gives food which her mother has provided, or which she has been able to procure herself.

584 431 For his part, the young man gives her some small game animals (especially the big rat called botɔ́mba, lemurs of the genus esɛ́ndɛ́, etc.) or fish. These gifts have no specific name. The man's gifts are simply called mpatɔ́ "gift sent"; the woman's are called botɔ́mo, a term used for all presents given by a woman to her lover (see also Chapter VI, Article VII, 2). The verb used with this noun is tumba, "to make burn." Etymologically the two words are in no way related.

Sometimes the sweethearts give each other a secret mutual pledge of their desire to be married. This pledge is called bondengɛ́ or bonengɛ́ and consists particularly of a necklace of beads called bafomakɔngɔ (or, more rarely, bisɛngɛ́ or bisɛngɛla). [103]

581 In choosing their wives, the men allow themselves to be motivated by the various factors which may influence them in this realm, such as physical or moral attractions. Wealth or social rank almost never play a part in determining the choice. Youth is easily carried away by physical attraction and passionate love. Men who are already more settled as well as the more sensible young men pay more attention to moral qualities, such as general conduct, submissiveness, goodness, gentleness, and especially diligence, careful attention to work, etc. In short, we find here the full range of individual variations that are encountered elsewhere, with the exception of marriages motivated by financial or political interests or by the degree of moral elevation that can be aroused by the Christian religion, such as pure devotion.

584 After a few days of courtship the girl lets her suitor know that if he really loves her he had better settle the matter and that consequently he must obtain her parents' consent. Meanwhile they have [580 already had intimate relations several times; therefore the moment of official negotiations should not be delayed.

586 587 584 Seeking a wife who is already married is in no way different from the procedure we have just described, but a great deal of circumspection must be used so that the husband's suspicions will not be aroused. The exchange of the secret pledge we have mentioned occurs especially in this situation.

Once the divorce is completed, the woman falls in the same category as a single girl since she is free.

Seeking a future wife in an as yet unborn child or one that is very young will be discussed in a special section (Chapter IV, Article I). [105]

Chapter II

The Marriage Agreement

581 The marriage agreement (1) is primarily arranged by means of the payment of certain valuables through the agency (Article II). The first stage is the engagement (Article III). After dealing with it, we will describe the various payments subsequently made to the father, namely the walo (Article IV) and the bosongo (Article IX), and to the mother (Article V), as well as the gifts (Article VI). Nkundó law also requires that the woman's clan pay certain valuables (Article VII). Finally, we will examine various rules and customs pertaining to the bride price: its acceptance (Article VIII) and the use to which it is ultimately put (Article X). The chapter ends with some general remarks (Article XI) and a few considerations on the attitude adopted toward the bride price (Article XII).

1. These terms should be understood broadly, rather than in a strictly legal fashion. "The marriage agreement" here does not signify what is called "the marriage contract" in European law. This chapter deals with the various stages through which the condition of marriage is established among the Nkundó, and the various practices connected with this process. I have chosen this title in order to include all the multiplicity of essential and accessory elements comprised in the establishment of a marriage, as well as the various circumstances attendant upon it.

Article I. The Beginning of Negotiations

584 As we have seen at the end of the last chapter, the period of courtship is not long.

● 584 The young man informs his own parents of his intentions, and they make certain that this marriage merits [106] consideration and that there are no obstacles or too great difficulties that might cause trouble later on.

For the official negotiations the suitor and his father (or a substitute for the latter) go to the home of the girl's parents, who inquire as to the purpose of their visit, and when they discover that so-and-so would like to marry their daughter, they ask: "How do you want her?" (1). "I want her for my wife," he replies. Whereupon they tell him to make the necessary arrangements to make the first payment on the bride price. When the two parties have come to an agreement the parents of the intended conclude the conversation by saying: "We are not opposed; it is up to you."

[836] 1. That is, do you want her as your legitimate wife, or are you only planning to live with her for a time? In this fashion the parents of the intended assure themselves that the suitor has serious intentions of contracting a real marriage

[586] The formalities of the negotiations in the case of a woman who already has a husband do not differ from those for a girl who is free. Only, in the first instance the proceedings must go on with great circumspection so as not to anger the abandoned husband. In addition the woman's parents inform the suitor and his family of the amount of the bride price they must bring in order to reimburse the first husband. (2)

2. See Chapter VIII, Articles II and III.

In cases of engagement before birth or at a very early age, the same procedures are observed, but they are adapted to the special circumstances of the situation, which will be explained in detail in Chapter IV.

After the negotiations have thus begun, the suitor's father prepares the first payment of the bride price which, accompanied by his son and the ndonga, he delivers to the future wife's family. But let us first explain the ndonga.

Article II. The Ndonga

584 The ndonga is the guardian-keeper of the marriage; he is chosen by the parties involved and his participation as intermediary, witness, conciliator, or arbiter is required at every stage of the union. He is an official in the sense that his authority is derived from the very law which governs marriage in Nkundó society.

First of all, the ndonga is the indispensible intermediary for the payment of the bride price. Without him there is no legitimate marriage: Nkó ndonga ôkéka bakímba ô lontulé, bõna ale ô bonto, "Without a ndonga you are throwing your valuables away at a total loss, and your daughter is but a slave," that is, she is not a wife. Legally, only the ndonga is qualified to act as witness.

The importance attached by the natives to the ndonga's participation is apparent in every moment of daily life. Thus if a woman has been beaten by her husband, her family can be heard to say: "Our daughter (sister) is no slave; she was paid for through the agency of a ndonga," bõn'ôkiső ěla bokwěla, bowěngěkí ě la ndonga. Or she herself will retort in this manner, mutatis mutandis, to her husband or his family when in her opinion she is not being treated properly.

The absolute necessity for the participation of a qualified ndonga is very rarely mentioned by Europeans in the colonial administration. One would say that they are unaware of its importance though it is crucial.

584 178 602 In order to serve as ndonga for a particular marriage, a person must be related at the same time to both the future husband and wife or, as they say in Lonkundo, to be mbéfowě. Nowadays, because of the migrations of the natives, the ndonga who meet this qualification are rare in the centers and often cannot be found at all. Therefore, it has been necessary to adapt the traditional law to the situation. Hence a practice has developed [108] under such critical circumstances which consists in taking as one's ndonga a man whose integrity is generally recognized and who has every reason to be impartial and interested in the stability of the marriage. Thus it often happens that chief catechists assume the functions and responsibilities of this role.

584 Formerly, and even today in the interior, when two young people love each other but cannot find anyone qualified to perform the

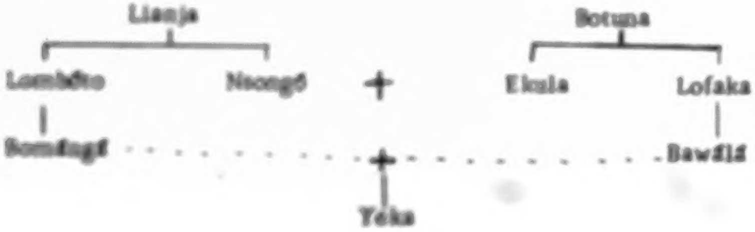
597 function of the ndonga, the parents of the young man oppose the marriage. They said: tôfimɛ́jɛ́ libála líko, tófa l'ɔ̂kofɛ́ndɛ́jɛ́ baémbɛ́, "we do not want this marriage; there is no one to transmit the valuables." Under ordinary circumstances such an occurrence is almost nonexistent.

It is up to the husband to chose the ndonga, who is then accepted by the wife and her parents. If they are opposed to him, the husband replaces another in his stead. Though this situation rarely occurred in the past, it may be encountered under present conditions.

A woman may be ndonga just as well as a man.

Its functions are hereditary. If the ndonga dies, his son, daughter, brother, or even his wife, if she remains in her deceased husband's clan, inherit his duties and prerogatives.

Similarly, if the ndonga is absent or otherwise prevented from fulfilling his functions, members of his family may substitute for him. Thus, for example:



Yoka is a qualified ndonga for the marriage of Ekula and Nsongɔ́. But since he is still too young [109] to perform the functions of this position, his father Bomangɛ́ is entirely entitled to substitute for him for the time being.

There may be several ndonga for a single marriage. All have to fulfill the necessary conditions and have the same rights and duties. It is not necessary, however, that they all be present at each occasion required by law; one of them will suffice, and it does not matter which one. Theoretically, their presence as witnesses is of equal value. Nevertheless, the first one designated is known as ndonga ɛ́á ntsína, or the chief ndonga. If it is possible to find two mbótawɛ́, both should be taken 584 as ndonga; if not, the one person that can be found will suffice.

The ndonga is entitled to remuneration for his services from each of the contracting parties.

When the ndanga is paid (see below), the wife's family gives him [the ndonga] a smoked botómba, a hen, or a bokósa fish. This is a gift with the generic name of lionja (verb bonjela). It is always obligatory.

Similarly, when the walo is paid, the wife's family must first of all give him food of animal origin (bofambe), generally a botómba, a hen, or a bokósa, as well as bananas. This present as a whole is called botómba l'oanda (1).

1. Boanda is a species of banana, but any kind may be given. As a result, nowadays people begin to speak also of botómba linkondo (or linko), or of nsóso la linko (hen and banana).

Finally after the walo is paid, the husband's family gives the ndonga 2 copper rings, and the wife's family does the same. If the amount of the bride price is very great, he may be given as many as 5 rings. The latter remuneration is called bompángé. This word literally means a domestic animal (a dog or a goat) given as payment. Nowadays its value in copper rings (konga, pl. bakonga) is given, but the old name has remained. [110]

All these remunerations are given the generic term lómbela ndonga, "to prepare for the ndonga," and the noun balómbo (sing. lilómbo), as if there were food involved. This expression fits well with the botómba and the bananas, etc. but it is used also for the copper rings. Is this an extension of the meaning? Or should we conclude that in the past the remuneration in question was made only in foods?

If there are several ndonga, the remuneration is not therefore increased; it is one and the same, and they have to divide it among themselves.

In practice the heads of the clan or family are also present when the bride price is paid; they are influential men, who have the 584/ power to settle disputes. They claim their share of the remuneration from the ndonga. According to the saying -- in archaic language -- bonɛ́ wâ ndonga nd'â dombɛ́, "the power (literally, "the medicine") of the ndonga resides in the judges." Not that the judges themselves have the right or the power to intervene in matrimonial palavers. But they are that many additional witnesses. If the day comes when there is a dispute on the subject of the bride price, especially at the time of a divorce, the ndonga can call on them to help him refresh his memory and thus avoid difficulties. For it can easily happen that after several years the official witness has only a vague and approximate recollection of what was paid. If the judges do not receive anything at the time of payment, they will refuse to give their assistance at the critical moment. It is therefore an intelligent policy to acquiesce to their desires even though strictly speaking they can invoke no real prerogatives.

622 At the present time the colonial government, having established districts and named chiefs, the latter have had attributed to them the right to officially act as ndonga in matrimonial matters, or at least they have taken advantage of the powers given them and done so. In general [111] they summon the judges of the district at the same time, and the matter is entered after a fashion in the register of settlements. The chief's presence as a witness may have some value, since he can provide additional testimony and writes down the amount of the bride price. But his presence, on the other hand, has the disadvantage of involving him in matters which all in all are none of his business. We are not speaking here of cases in which he or some relatives of his are interested parties in the palaver. If he would be content to be a passive witness and enter the transactions that take place, the situation would be perfect.

194 It is probable that etymologically the word ndonga is derived from the verb root long, intransitive longam, "to be in order, arranged," transitive longy, "to arrange, make as it should be." In addition to the word ndonga, which is used west of the Luilaka, we find the word bokɔ́lo used among the Bodɔngɛ and the Boɔ́yɛ (as well as the Elɔ́ngɛ), and ngombi among the Injɔ́lɔ. The latter term could be the same word as its homonym which means "spy" and is derived from the verb

191 tamba, "to spy": the former may be an extension of the meaning of 164 the word bokifo, "promise." (1)

[572] 1. Note in passing that a ndonga is also necessary for the bosaka, or contract of friendship and mutual assistance. (See Chapter I, Part 1, Article III.)

Article III. The Engagement

585 1. The payment of the ikulá

The engagement begins with the first bride-price payment, which in former times was an arrow and for that reason is called likulá [554] or ikulá. If the suitor was very rich, he sometimes gave an ingfulá knife or even an empifo. A poorer one would merely give the shaft of an arrow. Nowadays 1 or 2 copper rings are given. But the original name of this payment has been retained.

Arriving at the home of the father of his intended, [112] the suitor, his father (or a substitute for him), the ndonga(1) and often other relatives as well, sit down on one side of the lofalá (the court in front of a dwelling), after an exchange of the usual courtesies. The girl and the representatives of her family sit down on the opposite side. As in all matters that a Nkundó has to settle, the host begins by inquiring into the reason for the visit. The young man's father answers: "We have come to ask for your daughter for our son." "How do you ask for her?" "We ask for her in marriage." These preliminary negotiations are called simply fwana mango, "to ask each other for news."

Then the girl's father asks: "Who will bring the liting (banana) or the bonyfio (partially ripe banana), that is, the gifts?" Through this figurative expression he asks who has been proposed as ndonga. The young man's father replies: so-and-so, and so-and-so. When they have been accepted, the fiancée's father has bananas, smoked fish, and sometimes hens brought in, and the witness passes them over to the future husband's group.

584 585 When the presents have been accepted, the ndonga plants the arrow in the ground in front of the wife's parents. Hence the expression -tumya likulá or -lobya likulá, "to plant the arrow," which remains very much the fashion even though nowadays the ndonga deposits rings in its place.

2. Comment

584 Asked by her parents or the ndonga, or on her own initiative, -- depending on her own inclinations, -- the girl pulls up the arrow or picks up the rings and gives them to her father. That is how she expresses her consent to the proposed engagement.

Her promptness, her nonchalance, or even the recalcitrant manner in which she performs this gesture show her [113] feelings. Usually her movements are lively. As we have explained, the union will have been anticipated for some time, and a Nkundó girl glories in being the object of a man's love and in having a husband. Nevertheless there are cases where the girl has to be persuaded to make the decision, especially if she is still young. Within herself she is not enthusiastic about the marriage. But in the end she bows to her father's wish, preferring a union which is contrary to her desires to fairly serious trouble with her family. 584 586

Naturally we find the whole range of variations which depend on individual temperament and on circumstances. A categorical refusal must certainly be very rare. It would be the act of a very strong-willed woman. But the union would have been called off much earlier, so that such an extreme situation would not be allowed to occur.

The case of a woman who submits to the ceremonies with resistance and against her wishes is more frequent. Not only does she have to be urged and persuaded, but her frowning face expresses her discontent. She picks up the objects with an apathetic gesture, turns her back to her father, and drops the valuables behind her without even looking at him. None of the people present misunderstand the meaning of such gestures. Consequently members of the family and the notables who are present never fail to attract the father's attention to 584

584 the gravity of this situation. They try to make him change his mind and to dissuade him from accepting the bride price. To that end they try to make him see the consequences of his obstinacy: at the first favorable opportunity the woman will take flight, leading to palavers (and in the past often war), imprisonment, all sorts of [57] troubles, and finally the bride price will have to be returned for the divorce. Sometimes they succeed; other times all their wisdom and eloquence are in vain. Cupidity, the need to obtain the means of a [58] [114] bride price for a wife (for oneself, a son, a brother, etc.) and the profit he reaps from the union silence all other feelings. Here again, everything depends on the character of the individual. Nowadays the greater freedom resulting from colonization has reduced the frequency of such cases. Nevertheless, because of the reasons given, they still occur. But more frequently the ceremony takes place in a normal fashion. As long as it has not taken place, no further bride-price payments are made. This fact is sufficient to show the importance of the ceremony in Nkundó law, and thus the importance of the woman's public and official consent to the marriage proposed, though this consent is not expressed in words but only implied in a special, meaningful act. Cases which seem in contradiction to this statement are clearly breaches of that law.

In normal cases the father accepts the arrow or the rings from his daughter's hands and thus establishes his consent to the engagement and consequently to the marriage.

In other forms of marriage, which we will discuss later on (Chapters III and IV), consent is expressed in an entirely different fashion.

3. Abduction

583 Even before the coming of the Europeans there were instances where lovers persisted in their desire to marry in spite of the opposition of the woman's parents. When the parents refused to accept the [illegible], the engaged pair arranged an opportunity to flee. The woman tried to win her brother over to her cause, and out of brotherly love he usually 583 *accepted the arrow from the hands of the ndonga. Otherwise the latter secretly planted it in the roof of the parents of the woman who was fleeing. Later, when it was apparent that their daughter's marriage would hold good, and their son-in-law had pacified them by his good conduct towards them (giving them gifts, showing them respect, etc.), the parents no longer refused their consent. Subsequently the payments were made in the usual fashion. [115]

4. The departure of the fiancée

● 584 Through the payment of the ikulé a woman is at least partially bound to her husband (bóme). The maxim cited in the last chapter (Part 2, Article III, 2, B) is applicable here: "Boimbo fruit which is still under the tree belongs to no one." As long as a girl lives in her parents' home she is bound to no man. But as soon as someone has paid the ijulé, she has been "picked" and belongs to a husband.

Therefore, either immediately or within a few days, she leaves her parents and follows her husband. (1) Actually, the father may dismiss his son-in-law and promise to bring his daughter himself, or send her by someone he has delegated. Meanwhile he collects a few small provisions. When the fiancée arrives in the village of her future husband, all the inhabitants gather at the first cries of "bompáka wâ bómpáká ahvé, "X's fiancée has arrived," and acclaim her joyfully.

The term bompáka is not used until that moment. (2) But does

1. As we will see suo loco (Chapters IV and VIII) this was only rarely possible in precolonial times. Nowadays it has become a common practice because of the changes that have taken place, which will be described at the places cited.

2. This word also means "engagement." The Ekonda say esengí or ebengí.

584 not a woman become bompáka through the payment of the ikulá? That is what I had always understood, and it seemed logical to me. But in the course of a discussion on the subject, natives contradicted me and said that I was entirely mistaken. I could not make them accept the idea that although a woman is called bompáka when she arrives in her fiancé's clan, she actually becomes bompáka with the official payment of the ikulá, so that nothing but a manner of speaking is involved. They said, "No, as long as a woman has not gone to her husband she is not bompáka."

"But after all," said I, [116] "a very minor difference is involved; the essential thing is in any case the payment of the ikulá.

"It is true that a woman belongs to her husband from the time the ikulá is paid, but she is nevertheless not called bompáka. She is not given that name until she leaves her parents and goes to her husband's home."

"But why?"

[illegible] "Because otherwise the man runs the risk of being mocked and ridiculed. Suppose that after the ikulá he comes back home alone. His future wife is to join him in a few days. He announces the great news to his friends. Then on the day set she does not appear. What shame for him! On the other hand, if everything is kept secret until the moment when no change is to be feared, there are only cries of joy."

On the other hand, this data should be related to the indisputable fact that the payment of the bride price alone very seldom establishes a marriage according to the laws and customs of the various peoples of the Congo. There is almost always another ceremony which in most cases is the handing over of the woman. Because of these facts we are inclined to consider the explanation of the Nkundó, an explanation of convenience which shows the practical aspect of the rule but does not account for it. It actually does not explain why a woman does not become bompáka from the time of the payment which establishes the engagement. On the other hand, it is undeniable that she is not given that name until she has arrived at the home of her husband. It is possible that the fundamental reason for this phenomenon has been forgotten or lost sight of by the natives. The explanation which fits best with the facts that are certain is that the essential

584 element of the engagement is not the payment of the ikulá but the woman's act of leaving her family and joining the man to whom she is engaged. (1) [117]

1. I am deeply grateful to the attorney general, Mr. A. Sohier, for having drawn my attention to a comparison of these practices with the law and practice of other peoples of the Congo and having made me investigate the legal aspect of this question.

5. The fiancée's arrival at her husband's home

As I have said, the fiancée is welcomed by her husband's clan and enthusiastically acclaimed by the population in general.

According to most cases, her husband-to-be receives her and takes her to his home or to that of his parents. The latter await her arrival, having gathered together their daughters, sisters, and various relatives and associates. The fiancé introduces the woman of his choice to them. She is greeted in the usual fashion: "w'ȏng oȏkita, oȏyȏ; oȏtswa, etc.," depending on the extent of their previous intimacy.

Then gifts are given to the fiancée. First the parents-in-law give her a welcoming gift, called bosambelo, literally translated as "handclasp." It usually consists of a ring or a knife. Then they give her their hands. (1) Following them, all relatives and associates must do the same. The men usually give a ring and the women a knife. These objects are considered as part of the bride price, and the [585] 1. The Nkundo clasp hands as a sign of friendship. The gesture is a sort of greeting. They don't press the hand as do Europeans but place the hands lightly over each other and then withdraw them, rubbing gently.

584 woman sends them to her family. Distant relatives fulfill their obligations by bringing meat or fish, and nowadays also money or some small present, which is not included in the bride price.

The husband's gifts consist of a small knife and a few (5) arrows (at the time of the Independent State a bundle of copper wires called nggelo or mitako and at the present time 5 or 10 francs, for example). These presents from the husband are not bosambelo, for he does not give his fiancée his hand; they are yěkola (greeting) and are not part of the bride price. The woman sends them to her parents.

591 If the husband does not yet have a house or cultivated fields of his own, [128] as was formerly often the case, (1) the engaged couple live in the hut of the parents for the time being. The woman obtains food from her mother-in-law's fields and prepares it at the hearth of the latter, until the young man has built his hut and established his own fields.

Nowadays it no longer happens that a young man who wants to take a wife still lacks his own house. From the time of puberty on, young men moved by the desire for freedom leave the parental home and build huts for themselves where they can live alone or with some companion or other and enjoy their freedom.

6: The life of the engaged couple

584 The bompaka lives in the home of her husband, goes there to talk to him and to sleep with him. During the first three or four days she does not work, unless she is a very active person. Subsequently she takes care of all the household tasks and prepares meals at the hearth under the supervision of her mother-in-law. Only after a few weeks, when she has become accustomed to her new way of living, is she introduced to the customs of her new family: only

[736] 1. Orphans were almost the only ones who had their own houses and cultivated fields. Of course, we are not speaking of men who were previously married.

584 then does she acquire her own establishment. From that moment on she lives permanently with her husband-to-be.

She has come from her parents' home empty handed, without any utensils whatsoever. In her new dwelling she finds everything. Her mother-in-law and sisters-in-law give her what she needs: baskets, pots, gourds, mats, mortars, pestles, and even chickens.

It will be apparent from the preceding that there are no particular rites or ceremonies nor is any special attire worn.

584/ 595 By this time the bompáka is already considered a wife; [118] she has all the rights and duties of that status: cohabitation, household tasks, etc. Everything she produces or earns belongs to her husband. Her own family no longer has any rights to the fruits of her work. If, after the payment of the ikulá and before any further payment, [684] the husband discovers that there are relations between his fiancée and another man, the latter is considered an adulterer and is liable to the sanctions designed to check such infractions. The older the woman, the greater the indemnity, which may be as high as 5 to 10 rings (see Chapter VI, Article VII).

It is logically consistent with what we have described that the fiancé has no special name. Since he is actually a husband, that is what he is called (bóme).

During this period the engaged pair get to know each other physically and morally (sexual relations, work, temperament, virtues, faults). A figurative expression is used to describe what happens -- bafáfngola mpoké, "they are trying out the pot." The explanation [585] [252] for this saying is that before a new pot (mpoké) is used, it is placed on a shelf above the fire and left there for several days, so that it will harden and become heat resistant. If it cracks it is not suitable for food preparation; if not, one can cook in it without fear. This process is called báfngola mpoké, and the term has been transferred to the trial period of the newlyweds. Thus it is a sort of novitiate, and the English term which can be used to approximate this situation most closely is clearly "engagement," "engaged."

This first period can last several months. Meanwhile the husband seeks the valuables needed for the nkomo payment.

7. The ndanga

583ᶜ Originally the ndanga for marriage was the payment of a 584 knife (hence it is still called [120] ifakɛ, "knife"); it was later replaced by 2 to 5 copper rings, and now by 5 to 10 or even more.

At the present time ikulɛ and ndanga tend to merge, since both have become payments of rings, and they are often given together at the same time without being distinguished one from the other.

In the main the handing over of the ndanga takes place in the same manner as the payment of the ikulɛ, but with greater solemnity. The young man and his father (or a substitute for the latter), together with the ndonga and a few close relatives, especially the mother, go to the home of the fiancée's parents. They are received with the usual marks of courtesy and affection. They sit down on one side of the [illegible], and the woman's family sits on the opposite side. First of all, the latter ask for news, that is, they inquire into the purpose of the visit. The young man's father answers: "We have come to pay the ndanga," toôy'ôkɛkya ndanga (or ifakɛ) meaning literally, "we have come to hang the ndanga (or the knife)." Then the father-in-law gives the ndonga a gift of welcome (lionja). It is a smoked [illegible], or one or two [illegible] fish, or a hen; a bunch of bananas is added.

The fiancé and his family will receive, for example, a goat, a dog, and some hens, which are considered part of the nkomɛ (see below, Article VII), as well as meat, smoked fish, and a few bunches of bananas, which he will dispose of with his wife and family and which are not considered part of the nkomɛ but are simply a present.

They then proceed to the payment of the ndanga valuables. It must be done through the medium of the ndonga, who also had to hand over the presents, etc. It is not necessary that the fiancée participate or even that she be present. [121]

Sometimes when the ndanga is paid, the woman's family ask for [illegible] gifts which should theoretically be made only on the occasion of the next payment, (see below, Article VI). Sometimes the husband satisfies these requirements; other times he gives only a pledge ([illegible]). He could also refuse the greedy parents. But he 584 cares too much for his wife, so he acquiesces to their desires without 585 a murmur.

What is the purpose and the significance of the ndanga? The natives reply: the ndanga is given so that the daughter would not burn herself at the fire, bɔ̃n'ɔ̀kɑ̃ɔ́ ɛ́fɔ́y'ɔ́longola tsɪ̃. This is a sign that the man takes responsibility for any accident (represented by the general term "burn") which might befall his fiancée. In the hands of the woman and her family, it constitutes public and official evidence against the husband. (1) Consequently, it is also a guarantee to the parents that the husband will take care of their child and treat her properly.

But what then is the ikulɛ's reason for being? The Nkundɔ́ reply: "The ikulɛ is evidence, a sign that the woman belongs to a particular man."

In practice, then, there is hardly any difference between the purposes of the two payments. Actually they have identical consequences, both with respect to the duties and rights of the engaged couple and to the indemnity to be paid under certain circumstances.

Thus if a woman runs away with her lover and he has not given the ikulɛ, and some accident befalls her, her family can make no claim as they have no evidence against him. In former times this would have been a purely hypothetical situation; nowadays it does occur, but it is quite unusual in the native areas.

Nevertheless, a slight difference may be noted between the explanations for the two payments given by the natives. [122] The ikulɛ is simply proof of the engagement; the ndanga, on the other hand, is the recognition of responsibilities and their acceptance. The fiancé beats his breast, as they say (ɛyakɛ́ndela ntɔ́lɔ́).

We have said that the ikulɛ and the ndanga are in the process 178 of merging. This development is probably due to the fact that both
584 payments are made nowadays in the form of brass or copper rings.

1. Hence, probably, the origin of the word ndanga. The root is langa, "to love," "to desire," therefore "to accept." In Lokonda, see lolanga.

584, 585 178 But if the indicated difference between them were fundamental, this fact would by no means provide a sufficient explanation. On the other hand, if it were only a slight nuance without practical consequences, it would not, it seems to me, adequately explain the existence of the two payments, especially since in the past quite a long time could elapse between them.

Therefore we can wonder whether the basis of a greater difference might not be found in the hypothesis of its being a primitive custom. 179 583

584 For instance, the ikulɛ could have been the payment accompanying a proposal of marriage comparable to our European engagement. Then, when unresolvable palavers developed out of this situation, a system may have been devised which would not prevent disputes from arising but would make possible their resolution according to proper and just legal regulations. This system would have been the payment of a ndanga.

While this is a possible explanation, it is not a very plausible one. Native law appears in all domains so reasonable, cautious, and wise, and so well adapted to circumstances, that it would hardly have left a way open to so great a source of difficulties in so important a matter. Such a possibility can hardly be admitted by any one who is even slightly familiar with the mentality of the Nkundɔ. Then, too, the modern blending of the ikulɛ and the ndanga suggests that one of two is duplicating the function of the other. And the consequence of this development would have been the uniting of the two payments into one, with a single purpose, or more probably, in conformity with the general practice, the transferring of the significance of a pledge, theoretically assigned to the ndanga, to the ikulɛ. [123] The existence of a single engagement payment would have been much more in accordance with the present hypothesis than the practice of making two distinct payments, which are independent and separated in time. We should add here that the acceptance of a responsibility is always and under all circumstances accompanied by the handing over of a ndanga.

We could conceive of a second hypothesis, which seems more in accordance with reality. The ikulɛ may originally have been an engagement payment, as in the first hypothesis, only the girl may

174 not have accompanied her husband to his home. She would have re-
● 584 mained with her parents, and her fiancé would probably have had per-585 mission to visit her and to have sexual relations with her; as we have seen in the preceding chapter, native law does not oppose such relations. Since the mutual desire for cohabitation could not be put off for the period of time -- often long -- required before the bride-price payment itself could be arranged, the girl's parents would have given their child permission to follow her heart's inclinations which -- let us repeat -- could provoke only difficulties of a legal, "civil" nature. And before the fiancé could take his future wife home with him, he had first to reassure the parents and free them from their responsibility by taking it upon himself in an official manner, that is, by giving proof of his willingness to accept all the consequences of his action. In Lonkundo such a pledge is called ndanga. Later on, the time of cohabitation may have been begun earlier, by permitting it from the time of the ikulá. Thus in practice the reason for the existence of the ndanga would have been transferred to the ikulá, and the ndanga would have been retained simply as a payment imposed by custom, until the day when the overthrow of ancient customs made the Nkundó perceive the logical consequences of the facts, resulting in the merging of the two payments into one. This hypothesis is also confirmed by the fact that the very name ikulá is tending to disappear, [124] yielding to the use of the single term ndanga. Finally, to align this hypothesis with the facts pertaining to the term bompáka presented in number 4, we must assume that in the past the fiancée moved to the home of her husband only after the ndanga and consequently became bompáka only at that time.

8. The breaking of an engagement

The breaking of an engagement does not involve great legal difficulties. Both the man and the woman are free to break it if they find that they are basically incompatible, or that the prospects for happiness are not good, or for any other reason. There are certain practical stipulations, however.

●584 A young man who renounces his fiancée places her in the hands of the ndonga, who sends her back to her family.

The woman who does not want to continue their life together leaves her fiancé, perhaps telling him and perhaps not, first goes to the ndonga and then returns to her parents (nowadays she sometimes does not see the ndonga, although not doing so must be considered an infraction of the rule).

In practice she may also go directly to another man. Formerly it was dangerous to do so, since a war could result, and such an action was considered against the law. At the present time the greater freedom resulting from colonization has eliminated the dangers involved. Thus this lack of proper procedure has become more frequent and is even coming to be recognized as normal.

585 In any case, even if the woman has neglected to go to the ndonga, the latter is sent by the fiancé to examine the situation and to claim restitution of the payments that have already been made.

Strictly speaking, the breaking of the engagement consists in the restitution of the ikulé-ndonga through the mediation of the ndonga. But, as we will explain more fully in the chapter on divorce, gifts given by the woman's family are deducted. [125] Complete restitution of everything must be made. The woman's family cannot even invoke the work done by their daughter for the husband's benefit.

584 Nowadays, however, the custom of dividing the amount of the bride price in excess of the nkomé (1) is taking hold. The woman's parents demand a certain indemnity because they consider that the husband has lost the right to his valuables; if they do not withhold them altogether, it is because of the respect and embarrassment they feel toward the ndonga, who is related to the fiancé as he is to them.

The natives try to explain this change in the ancestral law as follows:

1) An engagement is meant to develop into a regular marriage, and that is its only validity. The fiancé's right to the woman's work

1. See below, Article VII.

584 is based solely on the nature of this state, which is a direct prepara-589 tion for married life. Therefore, if the union is not completed, the 177 fiancé is enriched at the expense of the parents-in-law.

2) When an engagement is broken, the parents lose the legitimate and normal expectation of a full bride price; they consider this loss lucrum cessans.

The natives' justification is not sufficient to explain the origin 584 of the change, however, for:
1) It seems likely that the Nkundó have simply imitated the 174 practice of other peoples of the Congo with whom they have become 177 acquainted since colonization, and that their explanation is but an explanation of convenience.

2) The reasons invoked in favor of the change are not new; they were equally valid in the past, and such as they are and in themselves they are therefore insufficient.

3) If we examine the reason concerning the benefit that the fiancé derives from the [128] woman's work, we find that it is based on a fallacious argument. For Nkundó law recognizes, on the one hand, the legitimacy of this gain and, on the other, the right of each party to break the engagement. Simply the breaking of the engagement cannot, therefore, result in the payment of an indemnity, since one cannot possibly be punished for having made use of a right.

4) The above objection is also applicable to the second reason given by the Nkundó: the possibility of the bride price not being paid is inherent in the essence of the engagement, since both parties are free not to go through with the union.

Thus the reasons given as such must be rejected.

Nevertheless, it is possible that modern circumstances have to some extent modified the nature of the problem. Thus:

1) The introduction of European wage labor and trade has given the Blacks a new idea of wealth. Consequently, the benefits reaped from the engagement have become much greater (through the development of trade and the availability of more varied goods and greater riches), and therefore the economic value of a woman has increased in considerable proportions.

Theoretically, these changes might justify some indemnification. In practice, however, economic development has increased the 585 amount of the engagement payment and thus counterbalances the in-584 crease of the profit brought by a woman.

174 Indemnification for economic reasons would also have one
177 good result, namely that it would prevent a possible skewing of the system into a form of exploitation which would consist of taking fiancées for a time when they are needed for some special work and sending them back when the work is finished. [127]

But it must be noted that though the precaution may be good in itself, it is not called for under present circumstances, for the Nkundó do not even think of such a corruption of engagement customs.

2. Colonization has considerably reinforced -- or perhaps even introduced -- in native thinking the idea that the favors of a woman deserve a salary. I think that these circumstances have contributed much more to the origin of the new practice than economic changes -- or rather, that the justification for it is primarily based on this idea of venal love. And in that case we have before us a pretium stupri of a sort that could foster prostitution, and which is therefore in opposition to morality and public order.

Just as we must applaud the normal developments of the custom and its adaptation to the possibilities of social and moral elevation that colonization has created, so we must react against its corruption, aberrations, deviations, and a drift toward the exploitation of faults and vices.

Another objection against the innovation may be made on the grounds of its inconsistency within Nkundó law. Since there is no indemnification in the case of divorce, how is it possible to accept it in the case of the breaking of an engagement, which is a much weaker commitment than marriage itself? It is true that a Nkundó engagement is almost a marriage, since it includes cohabitation, etc.; nevertheless, it is not as tight a bond as a permanent union, from which it is clearly distinguished. The new custom leads logically to the conclusion that it is preferable to complete the union and make it definitive by paying the entire bride price and then to break it by means of a real divorce, which does not involve this financial loss.

Finally, although an indemnity based on the increase in the fiancé's profit from the engagement cannot be [128] condemned as

585 unjust in itself, it certainly becomes so if it is considered a penalty
584 inflicted for the rupture. For the indemnity is restricted to the man, 179 whether or not he is in the wrong. Furthermore, to accept an indemnity 177 even when the engagement is broken because of the woman tends to favor frauds and real swindles on the part of the woman and her parents, in short a kind of traffic in women.

It is also evident that the rich (polygamists) suffer much less [585] from the innovation than do monogamous men, especially those who [179] adopt monogamy as a principle and more especially the Christians, who do not condone divorce. Thus I am of the opinion that the desire to defend polygamy against the doctrine of the missionaries is not entirely unrelated to the transformation of this custom.

If the breaking of the engagement is due to wrongs, the new custom could perhaps be tolerated, though it is not without serious dangers, but the indemnity should be imposed exclusively on the party at fault. Furthermore, the wrongs would have to be serious, and on the other hand, the indemnity would have to be, not in the nature of a forfeit, but of a payment of damages commensurate with the extent of the damage suffered and the seriousness of the wrong. And here those cases should especially be considered where the breaking of the engagement is accompanied by proceedings of a vexatious and insulting nature. And though it is a very delicate task to evaluate all these elements, we must not forget to take them into account.

It seems to me that the ancient law must still be maintained when the engagement is broken simply because of a change of feelings for which neither party is to blame, if such a case occurs. For it is better not to innovate than to innovate too fast. (128)

Article IV. Walo -- Bomboluku

589^4 The walo or bomboluku is the bulk of the bride price paid for a marriage. Between the payment of the ndanga and that of the walo, 53| give of Nkundó marriage, and what is its legal nature? First let us briefly recall certain facts essential to the problem by adding some observations which will appear in the pages to follow but which are indispensable here if we are to obtain a picture of the whole. Then we will try to deduce the legal basis of Nkundó marriage.

According to Nkundó law, the indispensable conditions necessary for a legitimate marriage are the following:

1) The payment of a bride price.
2) One or more qualified witnesses who act as intermediaries in this payment.

The stability of the marriage is weakened by the recognition of divorce, which is inevitable in a society like this one. But everything is done to limit its frequency -- the payment of bride price and dowry, opposition on the part of family authorities, etc. (1)

1. See Chapter VIII, Articles I and II.

The extent to which the spouses have exclusive rights to each other's bodies will be examined in Chapter VI. Let us say only that adultery is not considered lawful, although the Nkundó conception of it is quite different from our own that they permit some departures from the principle of fidelity and tolerate certain forms of license.

A very important question for our purpose is that of consent.
53/ But it is very difficult to examine because the natives relegate it to 54 a place of secondary importance, while they stress the factor of the bride price. This should not surprise us because the material and palpable nature of the latter holds their attention more readily. (2)

2. This same observation may be made about impious Europeans with respect to legal questions and other matters.

Note first of all that for the Nkundó [220], a lack of consent never casts doubt on the validity of a marriage. One finds many women who refuse the husband for whom they are intended as replacements by invoking the fact that the bride price was not paid for them, 581 that is, that they did not consider themselves the contracting parties. 584 But to my knowledge, their opposition is not considered to invalidate the marriage. I say "to my knowledge" because there is much confusion in the native mind on this question, and it is possible that later discoveries will show that the Nkundó attach a greater importance to consent than we perceive at the moment. As a matter of fact, the inclusion of a ceremony expressing consent in a normal marriage is an indication in that direction.

Let us now examine our data on the value of consent and its expression.

Except in an unusual case, which we are justified in leaving out of consideration in this synthesis since it does not influence our conclusions, there is always consent by the spouses in a standard marriage. Such a consent is first attained in private and then revealed to the parents, who give their approval. At the time of the first bride-price payment, the fiancée expresses her consent by a public and official act, while the husband shows his in accompanying his father in all the proceedings and in taking his intended to his home. In the eyes of the Nkundó that is entirely sufficient.

Another question arises in this connection. The consent of the couple is expressed at the time the ikulá is paid. And the real payment of the bride price occurs only later, without a renewal of consent. Can the expression of consent at the beginning, at the time of engagement, be considered sufficient, since it is virtually continuous? In my opinion there is no reason why it should not be.

In the case of a marriage by inheritance, the usual formalities 587 of the expression of consent are omitted, because [226] no new bride 584 price is paid. Nevertheless, we note that the heir must go and fetch 567 the widow from her family and make a special payment. The Nkundó explain this action as a mark of respect toward the widow's family, but we may interpret it as an expression, adapted to the particular situation, of the new husband's wish to marry this woman. The woman's willingness to accompany the heir is really a manifestation of her consent to the union. This interpretation is confirmed by the legal requirement that another bokondi payment be made by each of the

584 price contract remains unchanged. This payment, unlike the bride-
587 price agreement, does not come from the family; it is clearly a personal act of the man who wants to take the widow for his wife.

In the case of a replacement after divorce, the external expression of consent is more vague, since it is limited to the husband's overture's to his father-in-law on the one hand, and the fact that the woman goes with the husband, on the other. The same must be said of the inheritance of a bandio (Chapter III, Article III). It would be contrary to reality, however, to conclude that because the form of the woman's consent is less prominent, such consent does not exist; with respect to these questions, their attitude is entirely different from ours. To be a replacement is considered a duty and accepted as such. Psychologically, the acceptance of this duty often involves consent; it does not exclude the presence of the will any more than the duty to submit to holy commandments, and to religious and civil laws. Even reverent fear, the fear of punishments, etc., does not prevent a free exercise of the will, although they do diminish it. Nevertheless, there are cases where fear or constraint can be so great as to remove freedom completely. [227]

With respect to unions before maturity (Chapter IV), the 583 question is even more difficult. Only the engagement is made in early 584 childhood. The husband's consent is expressed in a manner which is entirely adequate. Since the union does not move from a tentative stage to a final one before the girl approaches puberty, she may be considered capable of giving her consent sufficiently to make a valid marriage, and she gives this consent in going to the home of her husband. Nevertheless, if we compare this expression of consent with those we have observed in the other types of union, it seems very much attenuated and greatly inferior to them.

We may therefore assume that in a general way and under ordinary circumstances freedom is safe and consent is expressed in an adequate fashion.

Having recapitulated these facts, let us try to define the legal 581 nature of Nkundo marriage. In ecclesiastic law and in European civil law, a marriage is effected through the official exchange of

Article I. Girls *

584 According to Nkundó custom it is acceptable for an expected child, not yet born or still very young, to be promised in marriage to X or Y. This practice was formerly very common and is still quite prevalent today. It is called banda bǒna or bǒmoto, literally, "to count a child" or "to count a woman." The ikulɛ is paid at the time of the promise. Later the matter is carried out in the usual fashion; the other parts of the bride price are paid either while the fiancée is young or, preferably, at the time when she goes to her husband.

584
855 Until that time, if one of the girl's relatives is already a wife of a polygamist husband-to-be or of one of his relatives, the child is brought up in her husband's family from a fairly early age, depending on the circumstances. She lives with her relative. She may be barely seven or eight years old, for example. If no one in her husband's clan can take care of her, [232] she spends only one or two weeks there to become acquainted, little by little, with people and places; she repeats the visit from time to time. Her mother accompanies her, for being so young she could not get used to being there alone, without support, without her parents. Therefore it is necessary to wait till she is old enough to be somewhat independent and able to manage by herself. That time usually comes around the [145] beginning of puberty, thus sometime between the ages of twelve and fifteen.

833 Like an adult woman, she is already called bompáka or wǎlɛ, depending on the portion of the bride price that has been paid. She has all the duties and privileges of a wife: sexual relations, food preparation, care of the household, etc. There is no set date or age for the beginning of cohabitation. This matter is settled between the husband and his parents-in-law. The latter do not have the right to [606] delay the time, even if their daughter is still too young, but they can make use of their great influence over their son-in-law. The modern [178] [571] generation is not shocked by sexual relations between an adulterer [sic] and a girl who has not reached puberty. Besides, all is in order from the legal standpoint; since the man has paid the bride price, he is the

593 on his personal attitude, his passion, or his respect for the body of his young wife. If he is reasonable he will be very careful during his relations with her or will abstain altogether, so as not to "damage" her body. But from the legal standpoint he may do as he chooses. Thus there are adults who have regular relations -- one way or another -- with a wife whose breasts are not in the least developed. In such cases marital relations take place before nubility. (1) The consequences with respect to the birth rate may easily be guessed. [233] It may also happen that the husband himself has not reached puberty. This fact presents no obstacle to cohabitation. As soon as he feels that he is a man, he builds his hut and the couple live there together. In all these cases the girl often goes to her parents' home, and sometimes her visits extend for weeks during which she does not see her husband.

Formerly things did not work out in this fashion. The young wife often refused to participate in the sexual act, especially if the husband was considerably older than she. Her reaction was due to her natural modesty and timidity, together with her education. A polygamous husband usually respected her feelings, till she gradually came around. When her normal physiological development was completed and her love reached a sufficient intensity, she would begin to follow her instincts. In the light of what was said in Chapter I, Part 2, Article IV, 2, A, we may readily accept our informants' statements on this score; the situation seems altogether natural.

584 572 When an engagement is arranged for an expected child, the events may betray the hopes of the parents; and the child for whom the ikulé has been paid may turn out to be a boy. This mischance is dealt with in the following manner: either the suitor waits for the birth of a girl, or an alliance of friendship and mutual assistance (bonsaka, see Chapter I, Part 1, Article III) is established between him and the newborn child. Such an alliance is called libála jă jwende, "the marriage of men," (matrimonium viri). In no case is restitution made for the ikulé that has been paid. If the friendship between the two men remains unbroken later, it results in the marriage of the daughter of the man for whom the ikulé was paid before his birth, to the man who paid it or to his son or grandson. No new ikulé is paid for such a marriage; the payment of the bride price simply has to be completed in the usual fashion.

584 A man may acquire a young child for himself, or for a son, a younger brother, etc. In the past the former was more frequently the case, for the old men kept the women for themselves and wanted [234] to benefit from having them before leaving them to the youths as inheritance. But the latter situation also arose.

The purpose [of obtaining a young child as wife for a relative] was to prevent inexperienced youths who were not able to defend themselves from being deprived of the means of obtaining a wife should the father die prematurely and the heirs monopolize the harem and bride-price valuables to their own profit, which theoretically they have a right to do. This practice is thus a means of favoring a son or other relative by furnishing him with a wife earlier than is customary. Nowadays this is even a stronger reason than in the past, because boys marry earlier than formerly. [178]

Other reasons for obtaining a child as a wife are involved in the two above-mentioned instances. There is a greater certainty of getting one's money's worth; valuables can disappear for various reasons during long unproductive years.

584 855 But the most fundamental reason, in my opinion, is the one very often invoked by the Nkundó, namely the opportunity of personally attending to the future wife's education. There is no

584 855 question lies that it is in the husband's interest to take care of it himself. He can accustom her from childhood on to special circumstances, to the laws of the clan, to the particular habits (virtues, faults, way of living, etc.) of his family, his wives, and, last but not least, himself. He can mold her according to his tastes and desires. Enormous advantages result from his success in doing so. This does not mean that he takes care of her personally, for he knows he is not a born educator. He therefore usually prefers to hand this [593] task over to his mother (or aunt or sister), who enjoys this obligation and likes to help her son and to participate directly and intimately in his household.

584 572 A childhood engagement between their respective offspring often results from an alliance between "friends." If the children later on do not want the marriage, that is all there is to it. Restitution of payments is made, or a substitution is arranged. Such a situation arose while this book was being written. [235] At least twenty years ago, Lokota of Bolingo and Imilo of Bongolo made a bond of friendship (bosoka). The former begot a boy (Itswo), the latter a girl (Lokoko). The parents arranged the engagement of their children by means of the ikula payment. When Itswo grew old enough to marry, he had no desire to marry Lokoko, for his heart was taken by another. But he had a younger brother, Itoko, who had affectionate feelings for Lokoko. Itswo explained the situation to his mother (since his father had died in the interim), and she resumed the relationship with Imilo. They all came to an agreement without difficulty. Itoko therefore married Lokoko in place of his elder brother, after paying the bride price for her.

584 If a little girl is not satisfied with the union that has been arranged she is free, according to the rules of law, to break it -- and not simply by failing to give her consent. Note that in such a case the husband is not entitled to any compensation for having raised this child.

In spite of the advantages involved in childhood unions, they should be rigorously held in check, since the affections often stray from bonds formed at such an early age. More should be done to 584 safeguard freedom, and the impression should not be given that childhood unions are encouraged -- as it sometimes is -- by the exemption of immature wives of polygamists from a supplementary tax.

There is no law requiring an older sister to be married before a younger one, but such is the common practice. Exceptions are made only under certain circumstances, and particularly if the younger girl finds a suitor earlier than the older one, a reason which includes and sums up all the others (such as disadvantageous physical and psychological tendencies of the older sister).

This practice of marrying daughters off before maturity is beginning to change because of the increase in freedom which has been introduced by colonization. Nevertheless, as this change is not especially advantageous [226] its manifestations are still very slight. The Christian education of parents must of necessity delay the time of the daughter's marriage and will do so ipso facto as soon as Christian influence becomes sufficiently strong in the region.

Article II. Boys

582 Except in the rare instances of an engagement of two young children, it was formerly the common and normal practice for men to remain bachelors for many years after puberty. The old men tended first to their own wants, and the youths had to wait their turn, like their elders. This was considered entirely natural. Later on they could establish a home and "profit" from life. Meanwhile they found a little compensation with the wives of certain relatives or of others, if the opportunity arose.

[556]
To explain this state of affairs we can invoke the political organization of Nkundó society, which is based on age. It is therefore natural that those possessing authority should have its external signs, and one of the foremost of these is the wealth manifested in the possession of wives. But, as we will point out later, the present situation greatly weakens this explanation.

It is more natural to consider the delay in the marriage of young men a logical consequence of the marriage of girls at an early age. Suppose that a boy is fifteen years old while his sister, 654 576 576 591 Any of the types of evidence listed above is sufficient to legitimize the application of one or another of these penalties. Nevertheless, the husband is required first to notify the elder members of his family and the ndonga, who do not permit him to act unless the misdeeds have occurred repeatedly. The readiness to accord the husband permission depends on the temperament of the interested parties and on a great many circumstances, the most important of which is the respective social prominence of the parties involved.

The need to ask permission of the "fathers" and the ndonga, which we have already encountered in reference to other situations (above, Article III, 4), does not weaken the husband's rights [318], but it limits their use. It is not a legal obligation but one that is imposed for family reasons, which are as follows:

1) The respect due to the "fathers" in this as in all important matters;

2) The respect due to the ndonga, who in marital matters is the husband's superior and whose intervention must be called upon in any serious situation;

3) The repercussions of any inconsiderate or rash action on the entire family (enmities, wars, etc.).

If forbearance and patience are fruitless, no one can blame the husband any longer. And when the woman's family compares the censurable conduct of their daughter with the generosity of their son-in-law, they will naturally be inclined to find that he is in the right and so usually will not intervene against him.

Note also that the Nkundó invoke the need to maintain their honor as justification for the obligation to notify the authorities. They must be able to inform the unfaithful woman's clan and thus safeguard their good reputation as defenders of order and public peace.

685 595 A woman whose husband loved her very much was subjected to the etóka only. He would reprimand her and strike her, and would try to correct her behavior by means of gentleness and leniency.

As we will see suo loco, a husband who is exasperated by the incorrigible infidelity of a wife whose performance of other wifely

684 578 certainly happen that a husband who was too jealous or impetuous would wound, kill, or sell his rival. But this was an exception and was always condemned since it was absolutely lacking in chivalry. In any case there can never be any question of demanding an indemnity; such an act would be absolutely shameful.

The culprit is notified of the demand for an indemnity by 684 594 the ndonga, who in difficult cases is accompanied by various notables. If the husband foresees strong opposition on the debtor's part, he gives the ndonga a special present of a bunch of bananas and two fish (or a hen) "so that he would not be forced to eat the rival's food."

A persistent and categorical refusal to pay the indemnity is 684 unusual. For it can have serious consequences: the taking in custody followed by enslavement because of debts, or [the taking of] compensation in the person of his wife or of a relative, or the retention [by her relatives] of a relative of the creditor who is married into the debtor's clan (ikɔ́kɔlɔ). Since these practices of taking hostages and of bodily constraint have been abolished, there remains the intervention of the courts, seconded by the police.

What is the Nkundó idea of this payment which we have called an indemnity in order to facilitate its description? The question is difficult to answer. Here are the linguistic facts which may provide elements of the solution:

The payment for adultery is called nyongo, and the word is 684 172 used together with the verb ka, "to give." The expression is equivalent to the verb lingala fɛ́ta (from which the noun bofɛ́to is derived). It signifies "payment" in the broadest sense and thus also covers our words "pay," "salary," "remuneration." In addition to its application in the case of adultery, it is also used in many other situations, such as remuneration for work, payment for a service, etc. Nyongo does not mean "compensation," which is called lowɛ́ɛla, nor "a payment making amends [222] and apologizing for an offense," which is bɔ́ɔndo, nor "indemnification" (mbɛ́laka). What the expression has in common with the last term is the concept of a

The term universally employed to signify the breaking up of a marriage by the wife is bokilo, derived from the verb kila. This word is not used for a wife's repudiation by her husband. Therefore, its meaning is not equivalent to "divorce"; it means rather "to break the union with the husband." The transitive causative form (kilya) means "to provoke this break." It actually does happen that the woman's family causes the dissolution of a marriage for the sake of a more advantageous union. This should be understood in the context of what we have explained concerning reasons for divorce. Serious failures in the husband's fulfillment of his duties to his parents-in-law are mainly involved here. The [587] remarriage of a divorcée is described by the generic term kumbwa, "to be married to someone."

B. Second hypothesis: a husband wanted to get rid of his wife. Old natives stated very categorically that such behavior on the husband's part was due not to the cooling of his love, but to [202] incorrigible conduct on the wife's part. He was reduced to this extremity by the impossibility of continuing conjugal life with her.

586^x ●684 He did everything in his power to forestall the flight of his wife by making the first move. After having vainly tried to bring her around through the intervention of her parents and especially the ndonga, he had recourse to one of the following means, which he could in fact use successively. But first he was required to inform the witness and to obtain his approval as well as that of the family authorities. The measures were as follows:

a) Submission to the etáka, a heavy wooden fork fastened to [684] the neck. When the husband has placed the etáka on his wife, the ndonga informed her parents of what had happened. They could then come and free their daughter by returning the bride price. If the husband applied the etáka against the wishes of the witness, the latter could release the prisoner. But in so doing he became guarantor of the reimbursement of the bride price; he became personally responsible for it.

586^x The husband was authorized to keep his wife under this form of torture for months. If his parents-in-law would not or could not

586* make it possible for him to recover his claim, he had recourse to the second means:

b) Reducing his wife to slavery (bosoamó, from the verb 586* oyamola). The husband had the right to use this means immediately, 587 without having first tried the étaka. But such action was not approved of and was undertaken only if the woman's family were themselves exasperated by the endless suits and the continual shame that their unworthy daughter caused them.

[721] The reduction of a woman to slavery usually caused a war, for her clan would not put up with such an insult. In some instances they did not seek revenge, however, either out of fear, because they did not feel in a position to resist, or because they recognized that the husband had good reasons for what he did. [204]

The woman's relatives could subsequently buy her back. (1)

> [181] 1. If the Nkundó sold an Elinga woman into slavery, her people never troubled them with a war. For they did not know how to attack, were not good at marching, were strangers to the forest, and were inferior in military valor. Therefore they were satisfied with buying back their kinswoman.

In some instances, not wanting to be exposed to further palavers or further shame caused by their daughter's continued misconduct after having bought her back, they left her to her fate. Their love for their child and their desire to preserve their honor and good reputation were in conflict, and which of the two sentiments triumphed depended on circumstances of men and things. In such a situation, as with respect to theft and other habits that brought dishonor, it was not rare (nor is it even today) to find that the desire to preserve honor triumphed over affection or financial interests.

● [584] Before reducing a wife to slavery, even more than before confining her to the etáka, a man was required to communicate his intentions to the ndonga. Otherwise, the latter would declare war 586 on his own authority, for the offense was considered very serious.

589 We can assume that the reason for this rule was to allow time for [567] the woman's family to intervene and keep their daughter from becoming a slave by refunding the bride price paid for her.

c) In exceptional instances an exasperated husband resorted to the immolation of his wife when someone died. People cite the case of Bongilongó of Bongili (Bosombé, Bombwanja), who had his wife, Litáli of Bosenjo, decapitated at the ikwei at the death of his father, Bongilongó byá Yese.

If the woman had children old enough to intervene on her behalf, her husband could be prevented from carrying out his violent intentions. The proverb says, bibóni ntáwólá, "a mother [578] does not perish." The husband also abstained if the woman had [579] a co-wife (ekíba) who was her sister or other close relative -- either out of a feeling of shame, [282] or out of fear of undesirable repercussions. Sometimes, when a husband was caught between his wish to use the etíka and his shame or his fear of the ekíba, he hid [607] the wife who was confined by this fork. Preferably, he asked a brother-in-law to give her hospitality. In that way he got around the difficulty to a great extent, because through the law of exogamy such an arrangement placed the wife in another village, sometimes a considerable distance away. This practice was called isingyá; ntumba walí isingyá.

Instead of resorting to the procedures listed, a husband could 586 also place his wife in the hands of the ndonga. However, it was a
589 very unusual thing to do. The natives maintain that such action was due to a lack of affection for the wife, together with the husband's certainty that he could recover his valuables -- either because he was assured that his father-in-law was well disposed toward him (and would reimburse him or provide a replacement), or because he knew he could use the ikfanjo.

As we have said, direct repudiation was extremely rare. Here we are not speaking of repudiation caused by a wife's incorrigible misconduct -- which we have just discussed -- but of repudiation against the wife's wishes. If it did occur the husband was expected to hand her over to the ndonga, and the latter, seeing that there were no further means for a reconciliation, returned her to her parents. No violence was used against her, nor could the husband demand an immediate and direct reimbursement of the bride price. The husband had to wait until the wife he had repudiated found a new husband and the latter had paid a bride price for her. If the parents-in-law showed ill will toward him, however, [202] they could expect a war.

The conclusion that can be drawn from the preceding data is that although Nkundó law is very severe against the wife who does not acquit herself of her marital obligations, it does not leave the husband entirely free to do as he pleases. Ancestral law demanded grave reasons as the basis for any measures he took against her, [203] and the application of this law was well regulated. The differences between the various situations are an eloquent demonstration of this fact.

As we have seen above, the term bohófo is not applied to repudiation by either party. In the case of the husband the Nkundó say that he atóna, "no longer wants her"; the noun is lotóno. This term does not apply specifically to this situation; it refers to any person or thing one does not want. The special manner in which the wife is sent back by being handed over to the ndonga is also called by a generic term émola, "to cause to start moving, to make go away"; the noun is njémó.

2. At the present time

Considerable changes have been introduced as a result of colonization. Wars, torture, human sacrifice, and slavery have been abolished. The possibilities are now reduced to the woman's flight, with or without notification of the ndonga, or a repudiation pure and simple. The intervention of the ndonga is only rarely omitted; it is still considered important. As a matter of fact, it would be against his financial interests to make an enemy of him. A woman who leaves her husband returns home, goes directly to another man, or lives a debauched life in some center, large or small. There is nothing left but to proceed with the refunding of the bride price. Thus everything is reduced to its simplest form.

A Nkundó woman is held back only by the fear of punishment and other consequences of her action, or by her love for her husband.

178 from more than one native who was clearly and truly wronged
586 by the system. For these reasons, it would not seem impossible that before the native courts were organized, some government agent had spoken and acted in approval of the system in question.

This digression on the subject of the practice to be adopted with reference to the reimbursement of the bride price has become long. But special emphasis is necessary because of the crucial importance of this question in the future development of native society.

3. The formalities of restitution

586 The only formality involved in the restitution of the bride
584 price is the obligation to carry it out through the intervention of the ndonga(s). Since he is the official witness, he is the one who is qualified to say what has been paid. There is no recognized obligation to make restitution of any payment or gift that has not passed through his hands or that he has not seen. Sometimes certain payments actually have been made without his participation, and restitution for them cannot be demanded. The official witness has had no knowledge of them, and he is consequently [406] under no obligation to take them into account. But the possibility of friendly transactions always remains.

Should the ndonga all have died in the interim, the procedure would not be adversely affected, for Nkundó law recognizing the inheritance of that office. The brother, son, or other relative of the deceased can act in his name, and sometimes long before his death he will have given the latter all the necessary and useful explanations. The testimony of the successor is recognized as legal and valid.

Moreover, the ndonga may be assisted by other upright and influential men who were present when the payments were made and who can corroborate or even correct his testimony. It is clear that this practice was established by common law for the sake of obtaining the best possible results in the exercise of justice.

The custom is all the more easily understood since there are many different payments, separated by intervals and made throughout the duration of the marriage. Therefore long arguments and contestations occur.

It is not pointless to draw special attention to the necessity of the ndonga's testimony in the reimbursement of a bride price, for this rule is not always properly observed. For example, I know of the following case: A ship's captain from Upper Ikelemba took a girl from this region as concubine. The absence of a ndonga and the omission of a real bride price showed their desire not to involve themselves in a legitimate marriage. Nevertheless, the man paid valuables (especially money and fabrics) to the woman's parents. By the end of the concubinage, which lasted many years, the sum total of these gifts had risen to a value of more than 1,000 francs. After the separation, the husband demanded the possession of the daughter born from the union. The court charged with examining the case commanded -- with the approval of the administrator and in accordance with customary rules (see the next article) that restitution of the [407] payments made should be carried out and assigned the child to its natural father. The woman's father had a sufficient sense of honesty to return the gifts -- even though, legally, he had no obligation to do so -- but he claimed his daughter's child. However the court was not willing to hear his claim, although according to Nkundó law they should have recognized his right.

Apart from the participation of witnesses, no special formality is involved in the restitution of the bride price. It is carried out in accordance with the rules prescribed by Nkundó customs and conventions, appropriate for any discussion held in a family or clan gathering. When everything is settled, the person entitled to the reimbursement collects his due and takes it with him.

4. Gifts and payments subject to restitution

Restitution must be made of all payments made by both sides; the bride price in all its parts, the mother's portion, gifts, payments at the time of death, etc., made by either side, the dowry (nkomí), and various presents. All these are subject to restitution.

764 for it was necessary first to celebrate the farewell feast, and the widower's family had to gather to discuss the matter and collect the valuables needed for the funeral payment (see the article which follows). Only after all that did the young men belonging to the [462] husband's family take the mortal remains upon their shoulders -- wrapped in a mat or enclosed in a coffin, depending on the case.

If possible all the husband's relatives take part in the procession. The pallbearers walk at the head. The men are armed with bows and arrows, knives and sticks, seldom with spears. The women accompany them [433], wailing. The husband and, if necessary, a few relatives carry with them the various objects they will need for the payments. Some men have a lonfosi (an [534] ocarina) (1) or an antelope horn on which they play intermittently. (2)

1. See my "Note sur les Instruments de Musique à l'Equateur (Note on Musical Instruments at the Equator)" in Congo, 1935, Vol. 2, July, p. 187, figs. 1 and 2 (p. 189).

2. Sometimes there is also an accompaniment of drums.

[201] At the time the corpse is lifted and while passing through villages between their own and their destination, the lokolé is struck with regular and equal blows (-kómya) to announce the arrival of the funeral procession.

764 The chief personage among those who follow the corpse is not the husband, but the ndonga. He may never be absent at that time. Even if the husband is deceased and the procession is that of a widow who has not remarried, the ndonga must always be in the party. The duty of bringing the corpse of a married woman is above all his.

The ndonga may go ahead of the procession to inform the family of the deceased of her death, and if there is a great distance between the wife's village and the husband's, he may not be able

The act of carrying a corpse to its native clan is not designated by any specific term. The expression is simply mika ilâko, "to go and return the corpse."

764 431 In one or more places near the entrance to the village, a barrier (bokôko, lokombé, or lofíaka) made of posts and palms is set up. There the relations of the deceased, armed, wait for the procession of the husband's relations, who are also armed, and forbid them to continue their march. Before passing, the latter must make a payment. The valuables given are called byêko by'ôkôko or simply bokôko (or lofíaka). The family of the deceased calls to the procession, "Halt! You will not pass here." The latter reply, "We come to bring [426] you the corpse of your child; we want to break down the barrier. Let us pass; here are the gifts." The ndonga hands over a knife, a brass or copper ring, [594] or some equivalent object (for instance, money, nowadays). Thereupon the members of the deceased's clan move away. The bánambótswá (persons related to both clans) break down the barrier, and the procession passes, headed by the ndonga and the bánambótswá. The husband follows the coffin.

764 579 In the past it was almost always necessary to force a passage through the barrier. The wife's family did not want to open and the husband's family did not want to pay, and so they came to blows. The group bearing the corpse tried to break down the barrier, while their adversaries tried to prevent them from doing so. The arms used in that struggle were chiefly pointed sticks which the members of the two camps threw at each other; more rarely, arrows were used. The specific name for this sort of brawl is gbebélá. Certain clans specialize in this sport. Thus between Bofimbo and Lileko, there is a regular battle every time. In such serious cases the barrier is heavily fortified; the posts are thick and hard, and intertwined with thorny creepers (bokau, longolé, wanganjíla, etc.) and thorny shrubs (wéngé, etc.). A quantity [125] of venomous biting ants (bafumba, mbómbá, byémbo, etc.) are added. If the brawl becomes serious, the ndonga and the other bánambótswa intervene and impose peace by requiring the husband's clan to pay.

This does not mean that the natives attribute the cause of death to the husband and his family. In most cases they are convinced that the latter could not prevent it. Although they express themselves in these terms: _Bótomomela wána_ (_nkína_, _eóto_), "you have killed our child (sister, relative)," they do not maintain that the husband's clan has really killed her, but only that she died among them. Under the circumstances do they feign anger to obtain valuables, for example? I do not think so. The Nkundó do not say that they simulate anger; they categorically state that they feel it and that they want to show it in the manner described. We should not be astonished at this since -- as we have noted in the study on the funeral customs of the Nkundó (_Les Coutumes funéraires des Nkundó_), the emotions of anger and sorrow seem to be intimately related among these peoples.

764 When the funeral procession passes through the last barrier, that which bars the entrance to the village, the husband's clan puts down the body, and it is subsequently lifted up by the family of the deceased, who carry it into the house of the head of the family. They are followed by the _ndonga_, the _bánambótswá_, the husband, and his relatives. The family of the deceased wail over her. Her kinswomen (_bóínanyi_) show their sorrow-anger by mistreating the clan wives (_baájââla_), by smearing their bodies with mud, dressing them in _basáki_, and hitting them with stinging plants (_bansǎnsǎ_). For the deceased is the _baájââla_'s "husband," that is, a kinswoman of their husbands. The _baájââla_ treat the widower and his relatives in the same way, because "their husband" has died among them.

The corpse is thus deposited in the hut of the head of the family. Each time that kinswomen who are married elsewhere arrive [422] to mourn over the deceased, the _baájââla_ forbid them

764 Before proceeding with the burial, the two families settle the question of funeral payments, which we are about to examine. A "farewell feast" is given by the clan of the deceased. The interment itself has no special features, so that it will suffice to refer the reader to the study of this subject that has been cited.

766 As we noted in Chapter VII, Article II, a husband can buy the corpse of his favorite. Unless the execution of this intention meets with some obstacle, the corpse is not transported to the favorite's native clan but is buried next to the husband's tomb in his clan cemetery. As a result, all that accompanies the transporting of the corpse is omitted, as is the funeral payment which is compensated for by the purchase of the corpse. The husband or his family only send the wife's relatives the payment that usually accompanies the news of her death.

Article IV. Funeral Payments

764 As we have just said, before the husband proceeds with the transportation of a deceased wife's corpse, he collects the valuables to pay the nkunjí. This is the term (derived from the verb kunda, "to bury") that designates the various payments a widower is required to make to the clan of the deceased.

First of all, as soon as the death is known, the ndonga goes to the parents of the deceased and brings them the nsango (news), which consists of a copper ring or a knife. He presents them with these, saying: "Know that your daughter so-and-so, has just died."

At every barrier the procession must cross to reach the village of the deceased, the husband must make payment of some object [431] (usually a knife or a ring) in order to obtain free passage. [584] The ndonga always serves as intermediary. These payments are called byako by'okáko or simply bokáko, loálaka (barrier), or, among the Bombwanja, ifaká yĭ ekálaki, "knife for felling (the barrier)."

The ndonga walks at the head of the funeral procession; he (or another bonambótswá who takes his place) carries a spear

584 431 [862] These consist of various foods: manioc, bananas, smoked meat or fish, caterpillars, salt, hens, etc., one or several dogs (bompúngá) that are alive (mbwá éá nkunja, "dog with hair") or their value in specie (2 rings or 1 ring and an equivalent knife, which for this purpose is called mbwá éá bokóndé or éá botongo), as well as a knife for killing and cutting up animals called lokóola. The bónanyi and the badjála each brings his part. Note that this gift never includes vegetables (bitumbélé).

584 519 When everything is collected and considered adequate, the ndonga is called, together with the deceased's own sons, so that they can thus give their opinion and later have a good basis for testimony. As remuneration for his services, the ndonga receives a payment (nyongo) of a bokóna fish or a bonsómbe rat, as well as a bunch of bananas (for which a ring is sometimes substituted). With reference to this subject I should like to recount an interesting part of the negotiations at which I was present one day. The ndonga expressed his dissatisfaction with the fact that he was given only a single bokóna. "It is so little," he said, "in comparison with all the trouble I had to take. I had to settle the matter of the bride price; I had to reconcile man and wife when they quarreled; I had to intervene many times; I always had to run between the two clans; for many years I wore myself out without ever having any rest. And for all that trouble I get such small recompense." I was asked my opinion. I could only express approval of the ndonga's view. One of the relatives [433] of the deceased also considered him to be right: "He was always obliged to come and go between the two families; his voice has become hoarse from his endless interventions in palavers and quarrels; he well deserves that another bokóna be added." Everyone sided with our opinion, and the ndonga was satisfied.

After receiving his present, the ndonga detaches himself from the group. Together with the other banambótswá and any intelligent strangers who may be present and might be able to give an opinion to settle an incidental argument, he sits down between the two opposing clans, a slight distance from each.

764 584 All the payments must pass through the ndonga. He is the one who transmits the desired objects from one group to the other. He intervenes in the disputes that arise in order to settle them and re-establish peace. He explains the various points of view, elucidates some consideration whose significance the other group does not seem to fully comprehend, etc.

As has already been said many times, there can be several ndonga. Legally all of them can intervene personally or through their officially recognized representatives. Thus, several months ago (1933) at Bonjoku, Baémbe, wife of Ikomo of Besombó, was present at a nkunjí discussion. No one paid any attention to her. At one point she threw herself into the discussion by reprimanding the chief ndonga and the families involved, asking them on what basis they were excluding her from this affair. Did not her husband have the right to intervene? Was he not also a ndonga? Since he had gone fishing in the Jwalé, it was impossible for him to come. She could therefore legitimately substitute for him. Then why was [576] she being left out? She was quickly pacified, and the persons involved admitted that she was right and apologized for their forgetfulness and negligence.

764 584 431 The wives of the deceased's clan place the gifts of food at the ndonga's feet. The bokúné (the youngest) of the clan goes and explains to him what they are and for whom [434] the gifts are intended. (1) One portion goes to the bakalé of the deceased, that is, the baájâála of the husband's clan; another portion goes to the baóme (the husbands), that is, to the widower and his family; a third part is set aside for kinswomen of the deceased who have come from villages into which they are married in order to be present at the funeral.

764 The clan of the deceased first asks the other clan "for news" (ũola nsango). The latter reply that one of their members had

1. In the Nkundó hierarchy it is always the youngest who is charged with the execution of all such small tasks, at the behest of the head of the family.

768 428 men are generous enough to renounce all of it. If the deceased had an ebísa, or if the parents-in-law give their son-in-law a substitute, the possessions fall to her. She even inherits the fields [culture] that have been set up by her kinswoman, to the extent that they have not been destroyed. Under other circumstances the cultivated lands [plantations] are never left to the family of the deceased.

The only items to which a woman is entitled strictly speaking are the various portions of the bride price and similar payments awarded to her by Nkundó law: goats and spiral bands and the mother's gifts as part of the bride price; the cloth and belt given at a funeral. At a wife's death these possessions pass to her clan, if she has not previously given them to her relatives. In no case may they be appropriated by the husband.

Finally, when a wife dies she may leave a tool (knife, hoe, etc.) to her daughter. This custom is observed particularly by very active women in order to inculcate their daughters with the love [523] of work. Such an object often became an heirloom, transmitted from mother to daughter for several generations. It is called botsíkéjwá (from tsíkela, "to leave to"; see the Latin reliquiae) or, among the Bombwanja, elíli. These terms are also applied to other objects included in the inheritance when these are considered separately (altogether they are called lokutu, "patrimony,""property," or lisangó, "inheritance"). Such a botsíkɛ́jwá can never be appropriated by a husband. [447]

Article VIII

768 584 Here we shall deal with the situation resulting from the death of a husband during the engagement, after the payment of the ikulá or the ndanga but before the walo. The procedure for dissolving an engagement may already lead us to suppose that death also breaks it without any special difficulties. And in fact, if the fiancé dies the woman is free. Therefore she may go home, and the family of the deceased is reimbursed for the payments that have been made.

768 ●584 She can also remain in her fiancé's family and there be taken in marriage by one of his kinsmen. If everything favors the continuation of the union, the new husband-to-be pays the bride price, but he need not repeat the engagement payments, which retain their validity. If he belongs to a distant branch of the family, however, the kin of the deceased will not want to give up their property, and the new fiancé himself will have to acquit himself of all the bride-price obligations, beginning with the ikulá.

[763] Sometimes the dying man, in making his last requests, enjoins his family to maintain the alliance. In that case one of his kinsman must marry the woman. If later on a breakup becomes inevitable, the spouses separate. For that matter, if the woman lacks the inclination to remarry in her fiancé's kin group, she will not be forced to do so.

This practice is based on the stipulation of Nkundó law that engaged persons have all the duties and privileges of married couples.

[587] There is nothing among the Nkundó that resembles a levirate. Even in the case we cited of a last will, the obligation derives solely from the sacred nature of that will. [448]

Article IX

The Death of the Woman Before the Payment of the Bride Price

Two situations must be distinguished: 1) The woman dies during the engagement; 2) she dies before the bosóngo.

1. Before the walo

As has already been said, engaged persons enjoy all the duties and privileges of a married couple. If the girl dies the fiancé must fulfill all obligations toward the deceased and her family (transporting the corpse, sacrifices, nkunjí). But his obligations do not end there.

Through the payment of the ndanga (and, in practice, already through the ikulá) he is considered responsible for any accident that might befall his fiancée in his home; and he has assumed the obligation of completing the union by subsequent payments.

The consequence of this fact is that if the fiancée dies before he has fulfilled his obligations, he is forced to pay a large indemnity (mbɔ́laka) to his parents-in-law, who have been disappointed and deprived of their rights. The amount of this payment varies. Usually it is about equal to what ordinarily would have been paid as the walo, whence comes the expression used in these cases: énga ilɔ́kɔ́ (ikombe among the Injɔ́lɔ́ and the Boángɛ́), "to pay the bride price for the corpse."

Sometimes the woman's family is less demanding. This is especially true if they are very fond of their son-in-law and know that he is wealthy and generous enough to considerably increase the amount of the nkunjɛ́, the ibɔ́leɔ́ko, and the bride price for a substitute. The principle of the indemnity is secure, but its external form is altered and made less humiliating.

In other cases the woman's family raises the amount to be paid as indemnity, either out of greed or because they are not pleased with the union or even opposed to it (this happened rarely in the past but has become more frequent nowadays). [449] Under such circumstances, up to 100 and 150 rings are demanded, as in the following instance whibh occurred quite recently. Ilumbɛ́ of Mpámá (Boéndé) took Lokokú of Bongíli wǎ Ndongó for his wife. He paid 10 rings as ilmlá-ndanga. When some time later he brought 40 rings for the walo, his father-in-law considered them insufficient (and he was entirely right). The small amount of valuables showed the son-in-law's poverty and foreshadowed his insolvency, so Lokokú's family was not greatly pleased with the marriage. Consequently, they refused to accept the rings, which therefore remained on deposit with the ndonga. After two years of cohabitation, Lokokú died (July 16, 1933). The family of the deceased demanded 100 rings. Ilumbɛ́ could not invoke any excuse or attenuating circumstance. For if he had wanted to fulfill his obligations, he could have done so, as the interval was long enough, and if he knew he did not have the means, he should have given up the woman.

584 In the past the widower and his family sometimes refused to pay, with the result that the parties took up arms. The right of war was involved. For when the hostilities ended, the culprit was required to indemnify all the families on his side for any member who was killed or wounded. Therefore he ran the risk of seeing all his property confiscated and being sold as a slave if they did not suffice. He found it was wiser simply to submit to normal sanctions rather than run such serious risks.

The situation with which we are dealing in this article may involve further complications if the woman has been living with her own family, or if she belongs to another man whose bride price has not yet been refunded. But it is preferable to deal with these complications in separate articles.

768 2. Before the bosóngo

If the woman dies before the bosóngo is paid, the widower is not required to pay an indemnity. However, he must complete the bride price by handing over "the slaves" [450]

If he does not do so: (1) the alliance is broken ipso facto, and therefore he cannot bring the ibóleóko and does not receive a substitute; 2) the family of the deceased is entitled to one of the daughters if there are any, or to one of the boys if there are none. This is a compensation for the loss of the bosóngo.

Naturally, the woman's family can in practice refrain from claiming their rights. Thus, they may do so out of regard for their son-in-law who is influential, generous, and well disposed toward them, in anticipation of greater financial and social benefits. The similar remarks made throughout this study have already [157] familiarized us with the "broad-mindedness" of these peoples.

It might be observed that this situation is in no way different from the preceding one, since the woman's family is indemnified in either case. But, first of all, if the woman has left no children, the situation is not at all identical. Secondly, even if the financial aspect of the two situations is the same, the legal aspect is entirely different. The taking of a child and the refusal to accept the ibóleóko are not considered as compensation. The

FAMILY LIFE AND CUSTOMS AMONG THE NATIVES OF EQUATORIAL AFRICA

583 The so-called marriage, or rather, the acquisition of a wife takes place:

1. Through a bride price to the family of the woman who is given;
2. Through buying, or the payment of an amount for a woman who is no longer in the hands of the family;
3. Through inheritance;
4. Through abduction.

Acquisition by bride price is called enga, njengenga: "the binding or engagement of oneself."

Acquisition by purchase is called somba, nsasomba: "buying."

When a woman is acquired through inheritance, the designation under which she was first acquired is retained. When the deceased father, uncle, or brother had acquired the woman by bride price or purchase, the heir will say: "I have taken this woman by bride price, purchase, etc."

Acquisition by abduction often occurred formerly in the tribal wars.

In disputes the natives often say: "He stole that woman." This is usually to announce the fact that the woman, according to them, was acquired in a dishonest manner.

The payment of bride price, purchase, etc., is usually made with a combination of money, objects, and male or female slaves.

This combined payment is called songa, nsasonga: "equalizing, settlement."

When a native is asked in what way he acquired his wife, he will usually say: njoloengaki (I have paid her bride price), because he [532] knows well that this is the most honest way. There are, however, many wives who have been acquired in the other way.

584 Acquisition by bride price sometimes begins before the birth of the expected daughter. The man, usually a polygynist, gives something of security to the father of the child. This security

583 consists of a beautifully fashioned native knife, or a lance, or 584 mitako [copper wire used as currency]. In some areas, it was the [436] polygynist who attended the mother at the birth of the daughter. He had the wood gathered, water brought, and food prepared. If, then, the expected child was a boy, the security was usually returned, and the contract declared null and void. If, however, the one who had given the security was a village chief or a man of importance, then the father of the child tried to give him another daughter. The father had, for instance, at an earlier time given a daughter to another man of much less importance. In the above-mentioned case, he would give back the bride price received, take his daughter back, and give her to the polygynist from whom he expected a larger bride price.

583 While very young and still a child, the little daughter was 591 installed in the harem of the polygynist. She was brought up there, together with other children of her age and status; or rather, she grew up there in the midst of those heathen customs without any upbringing.

595 The composition of the harem of a polygamist:

The first wife was called the Bomatsa; she preceded all the other wives in rank, and in the absence of the polygynist, she was the mistress of the harem.

The second wife was called Ekila; she was the most loved and preceded all the remaining wives. She was also called Nkonda.

The third wife was called Bolumbu. At the appointment of the Bolumbu, a certain ceremony took place, and the wife was clothed with an animal skin. The Nku, a sort of patriarch and [202] magician, sometimes had three or four Bolumbu who served as messengers to other villages. In this capacity they had special [721] privileges. For instance, to attack a Bolumbu was a reason for declaring war.

[533] The remaining women were simply women of the harem, without distinction.

595 In the area of Monjoku, among the Bolee [Bole], the first wife was called Nkisa, with the same rank as Bomatsa. The second

000 the same rights as the other children of the polygynist.

595 The polygynist always sought to increase the number of his
556 wives, for his prestige rose and his fortune increased in that manner.
593 If anyone in civilized lands seeks to enlarge his fortune, this is done, people say, in order to insure the future of his children. The native thinks little about that; his primary idea is to enjoy himself and to surpass others in prestige and esteem. As far as the future of his children is concerned, there are polygynists who possess twenty or thirty wives or even more, and sometimes they have only one or two children. Also it is little in keeping with their notions to care for the future; he who is still alive tomorrow must take care of 595 tomorrow then, so they reason. On the contrary, instead of caring for his children, the polygynist often took great trouble to obtain a 593 wife for his son. The son, however, was not yet the owner of his
● 584 wife; it was, so to speak, only a loan. Not until after the death of 606 his father did he become owner. In some districts, when the father had obtained a wife for his son, he first kept this wife for some time for himself. Only after a few months did he give her to his son. In 595 other districts, when the wife was pregnant by the son, he was obliged
593 to send her for a few days to his father. He was not allowed to bear
606 the honor of fatherhood alone; his father must share that with him.
842 The father reserved for himself the honor of naming all of the chil-
551 dren of his children. In some areas of the Congo, morals were so 835 low and common that the father even kept his own daughters in his harem. This did not occur in Equatorial Africa, but there was a custom that was not much better. The magician was sometimes 583 consulted about the bride price which the father tried to get for his
791 daughter, or the brother for his sister.

The magician then gave them the advice that they themselves should first have relations with their own daughter or sister. This custom existed almost everywhere in Equatorial Africa.

583 [535] Bride Price. In general, the daughter was given in marriage upon payment of a bride price. The father had little choice of the future husband of his daughter. The one who guaranteed the most goods in payment was certain to get her. Since, in most cases, the little daughter had not yet arrived at the years of maturity, there was naturally no question of her consent. The bride price was not paid all at once, but gradually during the years while the daughter grew up. Since the daughter was given without her consent

548 available to me, the government recognizes the presence of 702 free women out of a population of 8,386 persons who are not permanent residents.

Article IV. Premarital Sexuality

836 Under this heading we will examine:

1. What the Nkundó think about virginity.
2. Relations between single people.
3. The Nkundó's attitude toward births outside of wedlock.

1. Virginity

The word "virginity" has a double meaning. It may signify the presence of the hymen, the wholeness of the body, or it may have the meaning given in the dictionary: "virgin, a girl who has never had intercourse with a man."

Because of the practice described in Article II, 1, Nkundó girls who remain physically virgin until adulthood are extremely rare. Even if a girl does not begin sexual life until after her body has reached maturity -- a situation which occurs rarely today but which was formerly common, (2) [78] she will not give herself up to carnal pleasures until after she has broken her hymen.

836 What is the Nkundó attitude toward virginity? This question must be divided into two parts:

1) Does the future husband attach any importance to the physical virginity of his fiancée? Evidently not from what we have seen.

2) Does he attach any importance to her moral virginity? That is, is it a matter of indifference to him whether or not he is the first to have intercourse with her?

2. See no. 2 of the present article.

● 585 836 To say that it makes absolutely no difference to him might be too extreme a statement. But it is certainly not very important to him, since the primary purpose of his marriage is to obtain progeny and to follow his natural instinct in an honest fashion. This does not mean that he likes to marry a woman of loose morals; quite the contrary.

171 585 836 What is the linguistic data on the subject of virginity? In an interesting paper entitled "The Principles of Bantu Marriage" (Africa Vol. 2, No. 3 (1929), p. 255), E. Torday says, "Some of the most competent philologists assure us that in most Bantu languages there is no word for 'virgin'; . . . . The Wachagga, who may be an exception, use the word 'unimpaired,' and it is perhaps in the use of similar expressions, not exclusively applied to physical virginity, that we shall find the explanation of the absence of a specific term."

585 836 192 Thus the Lonkundó have a noun: ekɔ́tɛ́. It is derived from the root kɔ́t (the verb is -kɔ́tema), which means "to be firmly attached, to be tenacious" (e.g., lokɔ́tɔ́, "tenacity"). Ekɔ́tɛ́ designates something which is difficult to open, to separate, to break up, especially fruit with a tough, hard, thick rind. It is applied to the litɔ́fɛ́, lisɛ́njá, and the lindongó when it is impossible to break the shell which contains the edible portion even though the fruit is ripe. [79] This term is used in a figurative sense for a woman who resists seduction, who "does not allow herself to be opened." It is not at all specific and in no way the equivalent of our word "virginity," rather it seems to signify "chastity."

Other Nkundó tribes seem to have a specific word, bokotó. I learned this term from natives living between the Ikelemba and the Tshuapa, both east and west of the Julɛ́, as well as from some Basɛ́kɔ́ Bongwalanga from the old Lulonga District. The missionaries of the Apostolic Prefecture of Basankusu use it in their publications to mean "virginity, virgin." I was not able to get an exact idea of its precise meaning, but as far as I was able to make out it is much closer to "virgin chastity" than ekɔ́tɛ́. In any case it includes no reference to physical virginity. (1)

1. We should not be astonished that "primitive" tribes have no word in their language > which specifically expresses our idea of virginity, nor deduce from its absence that the thing itself is unknown to them. The Greeks and Romans were well acquainted with it, yet they had no precise word for it. Parthenos and Virgo mean simply "unmarried girl." The Germanic words such as Maagd and Jungfrau, which now signify "virgin," originally had the same meaning as the Greek and Latin terms.

The foregoing does not imply that every Nkundó girl is free to have sexual relations and that public opinion approves of libertinism among single people. We will examine this question in the following paragraphs.

2. Sexual relations between single people

In dealing with this question we must distinguish between relations between adults and the contacts between nonadults. We will therefore examine the two situations separately so that at the end we can attempt to explain the changes in native attitudes in this realm that have occurred. [80]

A. Before physical maturity. We will first relate what the natives tell about customary practices in the past, and then describe the practices of the present day.

In the past, sexual contacts between young people not yet marriageable were severely punished by their parents. The children were taught that those who were guilty would be struck down by a very serious illness which was inevitably fatal. This illness was called by the generic term ndota (1), and the more specific one, esɛ́mbɛ́ji.

> 1. Ndota is the name of the illness which is the punishment for an infraction of a sexual 562 836 [539] exclusive rights over her. Hence the proverb: Mbímbo ǐle nd'âns ɔ̂imbo ńa la nkɔ́lɔ́, "boimbo fruit found under the tree have no owner; they belong to the first person who gathers them." Thus a girl for whom nothing has been paid belongs to no one. A woman free in this manner does not infringe on the rights of any man in her sexual relations. There are therefore no sanctions against her licentiousness.

836 864 Furthermore, the discovery of her activities gives rise to no shame. At most more serious parents will rebuke children who go too far -- the girls because they abuse the body and reduce their value for a prospective marriage (2), the boys because they [83] run the risk of financial difficulties (the dangers of adultery, indemnity for childbirth with death as a result, etc.).

626 836 Public opinion is even more lenient than the parents. This attitude is easy to understand: strangers need fear no unpleasant consequences. Errors of this sort are generally considered natural weaknesses, provided that they do not occur too frequently. For public opinion is hard on people who run from one to another; they are stigmatized with the name ebábɔ́á, "unfaithful, flighty, without intelligence or reasoning powers," or ebɔ́ngá, a stronger term with the same meaning.

836 From all the foregoing should we deduce that every woman is free to indulge fully in fornication? On the basis of the above considerations we could frankly conclude the affirmative. The behavior that can be observed from day to day fully confirms this answer. Some people stray more or less accidentally, but for others the practice quickly becomes a habit. And it can be said of all of them that

● [585] 2. Not that a smaller bride price would be given for them. But a serious man would rather not take a woman for wife who has "run around" a great deal and therefore is more likely to commit adultery, to be unfaithful, and less likely to become the mother of a numerous progeny.

583x In the second register only three out of sixty-eight cases show a payment of over 100 bakonga (no. 24: 131; no. 44: 130; no. 66: 120); there is one Wǎngatɛ-Ntɔ́mbɛ case of a payment of 202 (no. 12). The latter like the Bombomba have raised the amount of the bride price above 200; they imitate the Ekonda, who have really misused the freedom brought by the white men (see Article XI, 3).

5. Paying the walo

589x 585 On the day agreed upon, the young man, his father, and the ndongɛ go to the home of the fiancée's parents. Other close relatives make sure to attend this remarkable event if they are not detained elsewhere. After the usual greetings but before any other step is taken, the woman's family offers the ndonga a dish of bananas and some animal food (often botɔ́mba, hen, or bokɔ́sa fish). Then they give the husband various foods: meat or smoked fish (a basketful, for instance), several bunches of bananas, and then, through the medium of the ndonga, a dog, a goat, and some hens which must be included in the nkɔmɛ (see Article VII).

Then they inquire for news, that is, they begin to explain and discuss the matter of the bride price. If the woman's family is not satisfied, the discussion is prolonged, and the young man adds the supplement required (usually such a possibility is foreseen in advance and some extra valuables are left with a relative or associate). Sometimes certain rings or knives are not considered suitable; then two may be counted as one, for example, or the objects that have been refused are replaced with others of better quality.

The ndonga places the valuables in front of the group of the woman's relatives.

It is not indispensable that the woman and her fiancé be present. Thus it sometimes occurs that one or the other of the pair is absent. But such cases are very rare and usually occur [142] if it is very difficult for the individual to be present because, for example, he or she is in the service of a European, or if they themselves do not want to lose a few days or weeks and are sure that their respective fathers get along very well with each other so that everything will go beautifully. Usually, the couple themselves want to be there as much as their parents want them to be, for this is a very important matter.

583x 587 If the woman has not yet publicly given her consent because -- as may happen in the case of remarriage after a divorce -- ikulá, ndanga, and walo are all being paid at the same time, she now performs that ceremony. We need not describe it again; it is performed as indicated in Article III, 2. But in this instance the woman hands her father one or two rings, or a ring and a knife.

As soon as the walo is paid, the bompáka becomes walí or "wife." As has already been said, this word has no connection with walo, or with the root bal, "to marry"; etymologically it is related to analogous terms denoting "wife" and "woman" in other Bantu languages.

Article V. Valuables for the Mother

583x 431 Directly after he has conveyed the walo valuables to the woman's father, the ndonga asks the husband to pay the valuables for her mother: vɛlá ntaa la nkando [143] yǎ nyang'ɛ́y'ǒna, "bring the goat and the nkando for the child's mother." The following gifts are given:

1) At least one nanny goat and sometimes two or more according to the situation; never a billy-goat.

2) Two nkando, which are copper spirals worn on the legs. [301] Formerly, two more for the arms were also required, and old women are still sometimes seen wearing them, but they have become much rarer than the spirals worn on the legs. Instead of nkando, the Elíngá, the Wǎngatá, the Bakáala, and the Ionda use the term nsongá. (1)

1. In Lokonda the term is njekɛ́.

301 Among the peoples of Lake Leopold II, hair ornaments are rare. Hairpins seem to be unknown; combs are made of raffia splints. A woman prefers ornaments of metal, iron, brass, or copper, while the chiefs and great dignitaries like to wear belts, necklaces, bracelets, and trimmed with cowries. The necklace of solid brass is very popular. The heavier it is, the more it is liked. We saw women wearing necklaces weighing as much as 25 pounds. These necklaces are riveted around the necks of the favorite wives of great chiefs or wealthy dignitaries. In case of divorce or separation, the owner of the necklaces removes them without regard for the suffering or cries of the victim. The women seem to be in no way inconvenienced by these cumbersome ornaments. On rare instances they wrap cloth around them to keep them from rubbing against the collarbone. [183]

589x 43/ [301] 3) In the past the mother was also entitled to a bongembwɛ or bongombwɛ (depending on the dialect) (2) a heavy copper necklace.

2. The Lokonda term is lonkaɛ.

It was worth 5 bakonga. Nowadays this type of adornment has disappeared almost entirely. It is no longer demanded, for the mother prefers more interesting objects (see the following article).

Furthermore, at the present time substitutions for the goat and the nkando are being asked for in the form of shoes, suits, fabrics, etc.

The mother justifies her demands by recalling the suffering she has endured in bringing her daughter into the world and bringing her up. The valuables she receives belong exclusively to her and her family; they never pass into her husband's clan. She wears the nkando herself, or, if she already has some, she gives them to her sister or her brother, who may have need of them for his wife's bride price. The goats she similarly keeps or gives to her family, depending on her own preferences. Upon her death these valuables are inherited by her relatives, never by her husband or even her own children.

Obviously, the mother's clan has exclusive rights over this payment.

[586] [422] The situation does not change if the mother divorces the girl's father and is married to another man. The "mother's" valuables [144] still belong to her. Even if the separation occurs before her daughter's marriage, she retains her rights to nyang'ɛy'ǒna.

If she dies before her daughter's marriage, the valuables to which she would have been entitled are given to the representative of her clan (her father, brother, sister, uncle, etc.)

[illegible] In case of divorce the husband must be reimbursed for these valuables as for all the rest; but the restitution must be made by the mother's clan, who has received them.

If the husband does not have the valuables for the mother on hand, he gives her a pledge for the payment (wěko; verb, ékya), consisting of one or two knives or bakonga. He could never settle 595^x Thus a favorite is in every way the object of her husband's [431] preference. He divides with her all presents he receives, while the other wives are not included in this expression of generosity. [853] But in the matter of sexual relations, apart from his trips, he has obligations to all of them. The most he can do is to add one night to the usual number (see below).

The co-wives adapt fairly well to this preferential system. Nevertheless, there is a good deal of backbiting on account of it. It may also happen that one or another of the wives is jealous to the point of being unable to bear it. [347] The signs of her rancor ●[586] multiply, and a divorce results in the end.

The nkɔ́ndɛ́ does not have to go into mourning for anyone [766] other than her husband. Even then she does not remove her clothing. But she does not have to abide by mourning regulations either for her parents or her own children.

Like the other wives, the favorite is passed on through inheri- [587] tance. But she cannot be taken as a bosɔ́lɔ́ by anyone except an elder brother of the deceased.

595^x Nkɔ́ndɛ́ is the specific term by which a favorite is designated. 192 Its etymology is unknown to me. The word is used everywhere, although the Injɔlɔ́ often say lokílo (whose etymology is equally obscure). Another less common (older?) term known to the Bonkoso, Bongili, Wɛ̌ngatá, and Bakáala is bongilɛ or bongijí (1). In addition to the term ikundaka, already cited, there is also the word ebɛlɛ́kɛ́, a generic term meaning "preference, predilection" or, when applied to a child or a slave, "an object one does not want to dispose of." The favorite is also called ɛ́fɔ́kɛtámɛ́, "untouchable," because other men may not have relations with her.

421 613 have seen them as money transactions. We have obtruded our point of view and destroyed the whole legal system of the natives. It is through our materialization of those securities that we have lowered the native woman to a plaything of money and a piece of merchandise.

586 595 As for the two outgrowths of the native system, divorce and polygamy, neither is inherent in the legal system as such. They are only abuses which have taken root and which clash with the principles of the native law itself. By its nature, native marriage is also indissoluble, and polygamy has only been able to exist through a popular confusion between paternal and marital law.

4. Legal Power in the Clan

613 627 In Nkundo society all individuals do not have equal rights or powers, as in the Napoleonic law books, /154/ but the natural rights concerning people are still completely recognized. All value and power comes from God, through the ancestors. Those who are nearest to God are thus the highest in position, his first representatives. There is no question of absolutism or despotism. Just as the blood is divided among all clan members in a descending line, so also are authority and legal power. They are one as a legal entity in relation to the outside world; nevertheless, each member takes part and has a vote in the internal administration of justice, so that, when clan interests are discussed and dealt with, each member may sit in the place accorded to him and take part in decisions. In a legal sense there is, therefore, no question of a separate family council, which would assist the clan leader, but all decisions are made communally.

594 627 A single exception to this does exist, namely, that which gives the head of the nuclear family legal power over his wife and children, and then only with the acknowledgment and approval of the clan. Differences between autonomous clans are settled by the clans involved, a sort of international court of law where friendly clans may also be brought in as arbiters.

627 Such an arrangement made the court absolutely "paternal." The whole procedure was one of a reconciliatory character, which resorted to coercive measures only when necessary, and did its utmost to save the honor and the welfare of the involved clans, and to compensate for, to restore, and to prevent further offenses.

595 wife was called Lonkata. This was, however, more a category, for there were sometimes four Lonkata in a harem. The rest were ordinary wives. Among the Ekonda, the first wife was called Nkumokolo, just like the Bomatsa. The second wife was called Ekila or Nkonde. The remaining wives were the ordinary wives of the harem.

595 484 The first wife, Bomatsa, always remained at home and never left the harem. The second, Ekila or Nkonde, accompanied the polygynist everywhere; she was at his side on all his trips. The Bolumbu usually went completely alone to do errands in other villages.

595 These old customs of priority among the wives are now gradually beginning to disappear.

684 It was forbidden under severe penalty to have relations with the first, second, or third wife of the polygynist. The penalties were death, slavery, or a large fine.

This was their law concerning adultery, enforced with severe punishment.

595 837 The ordinary wives of the harem were less strictly guarded. This often depended on the jealousy or indifference of the polygynist. Anyone who had relations with these wives had to pay a fine, or rather, a price of prostitution. Since the wives were almost all in the possession of the polygynists, there were naturally many men without a wife. These, then, often had relations with the ordinary wives of the polygynists. Also, the sons of the polygynist had relations with them; the polygynist himself sometimes even had relations with the ordinary wives of his neighbor. This was the bad consequence and the immorality of polygyny.

595 586 It is easy to understand that the ordinary wives of the polygynist, having relations with others, often left their husband, or rather, their master in order to go to another. The ordinary wives constituted the largest number. It is because of this that one now finds many women who have had three or four, sometimes even seven, different husbands in succession. Among some tribes, [534] the Ekonda among them, they were stricter; a wife who had already left her husband or master two or more times was considered to have little worth.

567 595 The female slaves who were taken in war were given by the polygynist to his male slaves as wives. They could also be installed in the harem among the ordinary wives. Their children could have the same rights as the other children of the polygynist

583 If the wife was content and if she insisted that a large bride price be paid for her, it was out of vanity and also to procure money for her family (father or brothers), and not out of concern for her children.

583 family, they had to give back the bride price they had received.
In general this was a very difficult business, because the bride price was used by the father or the brother to obtain another wife for himself, the Nkita. Thus, in order to be able to return the bride price, they would have to sell this Nkita or give her back to her family and ask for the return of her bride price. There were few other ways to give back the bride price; all their property consisted of wives. Since the family usually could not or would not return the bride price, the deserted husband then sought to become the master of the mother or a sister of his runaway wife, whom he then kept as a hostage. Among the heathens, this was a commonly used expedient to retrieve the wife or the bride price. When the runaway wife discovered that her mother or sister was a prisoner of her former husband, she often went back out of sympathy for her mother or sister. When the wife had gone not to her family but to another man, which was often the case, the family urged this second husband to give the bride price to the first husband. This was usually the only practical means by which the difficulty was resolved. This second husband then paid the bride price to the first. Since the [537] bride price often had been only paid in part by the first one, he then paid the remaining portion to the family.

Sometimes, if there were no way to return the bride price, the woman was forced to go back to her deserted husband. To avoid unpleasant treatment, she had to feign submissiveness.

586 As soon as an agreement was arrived at, either with the fam-587 ily or with the second husband, over the return of the bride price, the first bond was considered broken. If the woman was with her family, she was considered free to enter into a new agreement. If, however, she was with another husband, then after the argument she was considered bound to that second husband. The primary bond of their agreement thus appears to be the bride price.

586 If the wife had children, these remained with their father, and the bride price was only partially returned. The value of the children was, so to speak, subtracted from the bride price.

837 When a wife of a polygynist had illicit relations with another 586 man of the same village, this was called Bonsamba. When she had such relations with a man of another village, this was called Isoke.
As we have observed, the ordinary wives of the harem often had such relations. When the woman eloped with her bonsamba or isoke, or with whomever it was, she was pursued by her husband or owner, who tried to get her back. If the wife refused, negotiations over the bride price began.

If an agreement was reached or if a pledge was given as guarantee for the payment, the first bond was considered broken, and the woman was considered bound to this second man, even though he had been her bonsamba or isoke.

It might also happen that the first husband was so jealous that he did not want to make any agreement; then he attempted to kill either the guilty wife or her second husband. If the woman became 593 ill at the home of her husband, he went to tell her family and had to 758 give a security to the family.

583 Often the family came to get the wife, in order to be able to care for her better. If, in such a case, the wife [538] died at the home of her family, there were no further difficulties about the bride price, according to their customs. If, however, the bride price had still not been completely paid, the family asked their son-in-law to pay the remainder.

583 In recent times, now that the heathen customs have been 178 undermined by the European occupation, we see that the husbands whose wives have gone to their family when sick and have died there, demand the return of the bride price from the family, but this is completely contrary to their old customs. In one case the husband could demand the return of the bride price, namely, if the wife had left while healthy to go to her family and had died there.

562 Buying or Trading of Women. The woman was also in many 439 cases an acknowledged object of trade. The great village chiefs, among others Ibuka and Yoma, of whom we shall speak further, carried on a sort of woman trade. With European articles and also native currency, they went to other districts of the Equator [Province]
to buy women with them, just like someone who goes to market, even though no public markets where women were sold actually existed.

593x defended her husband. Finally, since they could not agree, Bompelɛ 159 ordered his sister not to return to her husband, so that she could be 579 married to another man. For he had decided to test the valor of Bonyeme by making war on him, and she could not see her husband taken prisoner by her own brother. Nevertheless, Bolɔmbɔ remained determined and departed in haste. When she reached her husband she told him everything. In the meantime all the Boɛndɛ and other Bombwanja clans were taking up arms. Enyukɛ, for his part, passed the news on to all Bonkoso villages, as well as their relatives by marriage, dependents, and Batswá. The various groups of combatants stationed themselves near the village of Bonganda in what is today the forest of [41] Boɔngɔnjou, between the Lomekɛ and the present location of Besombɔ, Lofelɛ, and Engɔnjɔ. The Boɛndɛ army was taken unawares by the Bonkoso, who attacked and after furious combat routed them, leaving a number of dead on the field. Bonyeme proposed a peace. He took pride in not being surpassed in generosity. With a truly princely munificence he was not satisfied with only paying all the clans who had lost members but in addition sent Bompelɛ all that the latter needed in order to compensate Bombwanja groups for the loss of their members and, on top of this, brought him a whole fortune to complete Bolɔmbɔ's bride price.

The Nkundɔ are well acquainted with cases of widows who, 589 having reached middle age, take a solemn oath not to remarry or 587 ever go near a man again. Among the stronger sex such cases are almost nonexistent. Cases of women who, when sick and dying wanted to remain near their husbands, cited later (Chap. VI, Art. II, 4) should be noted here, as well as preferences for monogamy (Chap. VII, Art. VI, VII).

Bearing in mind the explanation given at the outset, I think I 581 can state that most marriages contracted by the Nkundɔ are love
593x matches. Marriage for political reasons or for certain material advantages have certainly existed. And especially at the present time, there are parents who push their children into marriage for the sake of financial or social gains.

Our conclusions may not be accepted by a number of colonials. Yet I feel they are valid in the limited sense indicated here. Arguments

584 431 For his part, the young man gives her some small game animals (especially the big rat called botómba, lemurs of the genus eséndé, etc.) or fish. These gifts have no specific name. The man's gifts are simply called mpató "gift sent"; the woman's are called botúmo, a term used for all presents given by a woman to her lover (see also Chapter VI, Article VII, 2). The verb used with this noun is tumba, "to make burn." Etymologically the two words are in no way related.

Sometimes the sweethearts give each other a secret mutual pledge of their desire to be married. This pledge is called bondengé or bonengé and consists particularly of a necklace of beads called bafomakongo (or, more rarely, bisengé or bisengéla). [103]

581 In choosing their wives, the men allow themselves to be motivated by the various factors which may influence them in this realm, such as physical or moral attractions. Wealth or social rank almost never play a part in determining the choice. Youth is easily carried away by physical attraction and passionate love. Men who are already more settled as well as the more sensible young men pay more attention to moral qualities, such as general conduct, submissiveness, goodness, gentleness, and especially diligence, careful attention to work, etc. In short, we find here the full range of individual variations that are encountered elsewhere, with the exception of marriages motivated by financial or political interests or by the degree of moral elevation that can be aroused by the Christian religion, such as pure devotion.

584 After a few days of courtship the girl lets her suitor know that if he really loves her he had better settle the matter and that consequently he must obtain her parents' consent. Meanwhile they have [836] already had intimate relations several times; therefore the moment of official negotiations should not be delayed.

586× 587 584 Seeking a wife who is already married is in no way different from the procedure we have just described, but a great deal of circumspection must be used so that the husband's suspicions will not be aroused. The exchange of the secret pledge we have mentioned occurs especially in this situation.

Once the divorce is completed, the woman falls in the same category as a single girl since she is free.

Seeking a future wife in an as yet unborn child or one that is very young will be discussed in a special section (Chapter IV, Article I). [105]

583x The chief reason for the amount of the walo being reduced has always been, and still is, the payment of the bosóngo (see Article IX) at the same time with, or immediately after, the walo. It explains the low walo payments in cases 21, 25, 27 and 38b in the list which follows. Nowadays there may be new reasons. Among Christians; for example, a brother may want to help his widowed sister so that she will not have too long to wait before remarrying; or orphans born somewhere in a distant center may have been more or less abandoned by their families (as in case 17). To give some idea of the walo amounts, 583x 797 I have copies a few cases out of our bride-price records of Flandria Mission. Next to the women's names I have indicated their tribe of origin, then the amount paid for them (in bakonga), and finally the year of marriage. [139] The numbers at the left denote their order in our books. (1)

(1) These records are kept because we require that at least the walo be paid before the marriage is celebrated. I should point out that, in an isolated instance, the ikulá-ndanga may

583x 585 Subsequently, the ndonga conveys the valuables to the woman's parents. He asks the husband: yɛ́lá baómba bá walo, "bring the walo valuables." The latter replies: "Here they are; hand them over to my father-in-law." The witness takes a few rings and places them in front of the latter, or rather he touches them and makes a gesture of pushing them toward the woman's parents, and they pull them toward themselves.

As soon as the walo is paid, the bompáka becomes walí or "wife." As has already been said, this word has no connection with walo, or with the root bal, "to marry"; etymologically it is related to analogous terms denoting "wife" and "woman" in other Bantu languages.

Article V. Valuables for the Mother

583x 431 Directly after he has conveyed the walo valuables to the woman's father, the ndonga asks the husband to pay the valuables for her mother: vɛ́lá ntaa la nkando [143] yǎ nyang'ɛ́y'ǒna, "bring the goat and the nkando for the child's mother." The following gifts are given:

1) At least one nanny goat and sometimes two or more according to the situation; never a billy-goat.

[301] 2) Two nkando, which are copper spirals worn on the legs. Formerly, two more for the arms were also required, and old women are still sometimes seen wearing them, but they have become much rarer than the spirals worn on the legs. Instead of nkando, the Elíngá, the Wǎngatá, the Bakáala, and the Ionda use the term nsongá. (1)

1. In Lokonda the term is njekɛ́.

Article II. Marriage by Inheritance

428 This form of marriage is called liála jǎ lisangó or simply lisangó. The meaning of lisangó is "inheritance," from the verb sangol, "to inherit." The word is used in the broad sense and is applicable to any object.

The death of a husband does not in itself free his widow. She remains bound to the deceased's family.

After the celebration of the end of mourning, the widows of the deceased, required to abstain from all sexual relations until that time, go back to their respective families. During the last period of mourning they have already had the opportunity of being courted or of resuming their relationships with their former lovers, whether or not they are relatives of the deceased husband.

A person wishing to marry the widow must address himself to her own family. Therefore, except in the case of the bosóló, to be discussed in the article which follows, the distribution of wives among the heirs cannot be considered as a distribution [189] of persons as such. Rather it is a division based on the valuables which these persons represent. Theoretically, the wives are inherited by the brother of the deceased, but other relatives, especially nephews, may have partial or total rights over one or another among them. (1) These rights are based on the source of the bride prices by means of which the wives were acquired. We have already touched on this subject in the preceding chapter in relation to certain relatives. Still other situations may arise, but instead of going into a long discussion I shall explain them by giving two case histories.

Imote of Eleke (Bongíli), one of the Lokongo clans, married Iloko of Imomo (Bongili). With valuables received from his mother's family their son, Bolófo, married three women: Wǎngi, Bosoí, his favorite, and a slave from Bolaká (Wǎngatá). When he died, his widows went to the Eleke clan which was the source of his wealth. [601] Two claimants appeared: Eengé (first cousin of the deceased but in Nkundó terminology his son) and Bakutu of Bokenda (Besombó) also a first cousin, and considered one by the Nkundó. They were to divide the widows. But both of them chose the deceased's favorite and quarreled over her. In the end she was assigned to Bakutu who was the "father" of his rival and the "elder brother" of the deceased. The slave also went to Bakutu, (2) while Eengé had to be satisfied with the first wife. But he and his clan retained a right over these women and their [190] progeny. This is rather an old case; in fact two grandsons of Bakutu and Ikándó respectively, whom I know very well personally, are now between fifty and sixty years old.

When Bolɔ́mbɔ́ became a widow she was inherited by Likɔ́ndá, the first cousin of the deceased on his mother's side, so that the patrimony would not be scattered. She gave Likɔ́ndá a daughter, Bosukankele, whose bride price he used to get himself a wife, Bombɔ́la (Teresa), daughter of Ilito of Bolɛ́ngɛ́ (Bongíli). At Likɔ́ndá's death the rights returned to Ntombɛ́ (Joseph) in the person of the widow Bombɔ́la, the nkita of his uterine sister.

he must not only bring bekooli to the woman's parents but also give a bompángá called nsǎsangɔ́ or bosangɔ́jwá a goat, a dog, or 5 to 10 copper rings, depending on the circumstances) to the heir. This is not part of the bride price, which is a payment to the woman's family. It is a gift intended to assuage the feelings of the heir and to secure or strengthen his good will. It is equivalent to a request for permission to cohabit with this woman and to profit by her work.

587 Thus we must distinguish between two types of marriage by inheritance:

1) The new husband and heir belongs to the immediate family of the deceased; he is eɔ́to ɛ́â ntsína -- a son, brother, uncle, nephew, or cousin.

2) The new husband and heir is distantly related; he is eɔ́to ɛ́â nsɔ́ngɛ́.

In the first instance the marriage is considered fairly stable and difficult to break, but nevertheless more easily dissolved than a marriage by nkumbɔ́. With how much difficulty it is dissolved depends on the degree of kinship. The reason given by the Nkundɔ́ for the greater ease with which such a marriage is broken is that the heir-husband did not himself pay the bride price; he only received the woman from someone else. Thus, if he no longer wants her, he justifies sending her away by saying, "It was not I personally who paid your bride price." For her part, the woman will invoke the same reason, mutatis mutandis. In all other respects the union is like a marriage by nkumbɔ́. Therefore, [192] when the woman leaves her husband the term kɔ́fa is used here as in the case of a marriage by nkumbɔ́.

471 The second type of marriage by inheritance is clearly different from the first. The new husband is not a husband from the legal standpoint; he is only a husband in the improper sense, physically. In spite of the nsǎsangɔ́ paid by the common-law husband, the legitimate heirs, hence the close kin of the deceased, especially the relative who was entitled to the woman and to whom she was given when the

471/
● 587 428 inheritance was divided, remain her masters. This is apparent from all the consequences resulting from the situation:

1) Children born of the union belong, not to their natural father, but to the owners of the woman, the bankɔ́lɔ́. They are the ones who will eventually consent to the children's marriages and receive their bride prices. They alone have the right to give the children a name. [553]

2) The man functioning as husband has only partial rights to the results of the woman's activities. Thus, if she finds a treasure buried in her field, captures a fleeing slave, or finds any valuable object that has been abandoned or lost and whose owner is not known, such as, for example, rings, objects of worked metal, elephant tusks, etc., these will not belong to her husband, as they would in a marriage by nkumbɔ́, but to the masters. The latter are also entitled to a part of the fruits of her labor: fish, caterpillars, and even food she has prepared.

3) If, on some occasion or other, the new husband wishes to make a gift or a payment to the woman's family, he has to request the intervention of the husband-owner. He therefore asks the latter to accompany him, saying: ɔ́ndakɛ́ likilɔ́, "make me acquainted with my parents-in-law; introduce me to them." They go there with the ndonga.

428 587 It may even happen that the bosɔ́ngo has not been paid yet and that the common-law husband has the slave [193] or the equivalent valuables needed for the payment. With the permission of the owner and accompanied by the ndonga he may make this payment. Nevertheless, he obtains no additional rights over the woman.

If one day the woman returns to the immediate family of the deceased, who are her "masters," the latter must make restitution to the common-law husband for these supplementary valuables and for all the payments he has made. If any stranger marries her by nkumbɔ́, the entire bride price is returned to the heirs of the deceased, who must reimburse the man who has acted as her husband for all the bride-price payments he has made.

587 This practice of ndǎlaka likiló is not without disadvantages. It may be feared that the heir deny that the payments were made and refuse to reimburse the man for them. His refusal is facilitated by the fact that the ndonga involved is the same one who participated in arranging the marriage agreement. Thus, there is a tendency to omit the practice.

Note that the expression ndǎlaka likiló is not applied only to this situation; it is also used in the obvious sense -- for instance, when the man is simply to make the acquaintance of the woman's [431] family without presenting any payment (though of course it is in-[574] conceivable that such a visit would be made without bringing presents), or in the case of a man who wants to be united with a relative of the wife of one of his relatives or friends.

4) Any presents given by the woman's family to the common-[431] law husband, for instance during a visit or for a service rendered, etc., do not belong to him; by right they go to the heirs. If the latter are kindly disposed toward him, they will allow him the usufruct of a portion of these goods, but he has no right to them strictly speaking.

429 5) If the woman breaks this union the verb used is not -kófa
586 but -kumbwa, "to be taken in [194] marriage." If she returns to a 587 close relative of the deceased, that is, to one of his bankóló, the Nkundó say that "she has returned to her husband," aôlut'ěka bǒm'ǒkáé. For his part, the man who has taken the woman in common-law marriage may repudiate her at any time. He says to her: kendá ɛ́ka baóm'ǎkě, emí ntsíkwěngáki, "go to your husbands; I did not pay your bride price." The valuables he has given as nsásangó will be refunded.

6) Lastly, if the woman dies while living with this man, he has to pay an indemnity (-foma mbálaka), usually a slave or its equivalent, to the legitimate heirs.

428 Thus the second type of marriage by inheritance has none of 587 the characteristics of a legitimate Nkundó marriage. The husband has only the enjoyment of the woman. Only the heir of the deceased may truly and legally call her his "wife." Usually a woman involved in such a union is called the heir's "thing" (yǒmba). The heir is called her "owner," her "master," and the term "husband" is reserved for the man who cohabits with her.

428 587 581 Because of all these obvious differences, the Nkundɔ́ tend to consider this second type of union nonmarital. It resembles actual marriage only externally; in the final analysis, the difference is fundamental, since it has none of the specific properties of a marriage. Therefore such a union is not a marriage, but a continuous concubinage.

A man who cohabits in this manner with a woman for whom others have paid the bride price is often the object of humiliating allusions. He is treated as nkolasangɔ́, "inheritance taker" (that is, of inherited women). If a woman involved in the type of union described quarrels with one who has been "bought" in the regular manner, the latter will sometimes clap her hands (-foma losáka) to indicate her superiority. That is why such a woman is sometimes called wǎlɪ ɔ́â fomalosáka in contrast to the other. [195]

Present-day circumstances make all this even more clearly [797] apparent. Nowadays, even pagan natives almost everywhere are aware of the intransigence of the Catholic Church on the question of the indissolubility of a marriage which has been effected through the religious ceremony. For this reason the "masters" of a woman who is legally theirs but who is actually living with another man in the manner described, will not permit her to enter into a religious marriage with this man unless he pays the bride price.

Therefore we may consider the type of union described above a concubinage which does not satisfy the moral conditions for a true marital union. As to the first type of marriage by inheritance, namely a union with a close relative of the deceased, the question is more complicated; but it is my opinion that such a marriage is valid from the moral standpoint. I hope, however, that in order to attain greater certainty on this point, others will re-examine the case in the light of the various aspects of the solution that have been presented.

The following historic case pertaining to individuals whose genealogy appears below will illustrate the preceding discussion:

Elongama (the younger) married Ikókó of Bongíli, daughter of Bolékélá wǎ Nkunja and Tómpénda. After his death, his widow was taken as inheritance [196] by Bonyongela, to whom she gave a daughter, Belóngó. Bakutu (the younger) and his first cousin Bolófo were the ones who disposed of the daughter's bride price and were responsible for the marriage palavers; her father, Bonyongela, (since deceased) and his brother, Bonkoso, were not. Out of kindness, Bonyongela was given 18 rings. Bolófo added the other 30 to his sister Wǎngi's bride price to obtain his wife Ióngó (of Likolí, now deceased). After x number of years, Ikókó left Bonyongela for Botálé, a sister's son who, being a close relative, gave no nsǎnsangó. That which had been paid by Bonyongela was returned to him by Bakutu, since the union was broken. Five years later, Ikókó left Botálé with whom she was dissatisfied because he was lazy and did not bring her enough game, clothing, etc. She went to live with Ilumbé of Ngombe Mbálanga (Bongíli), who was a distant maternal relative and therefore gave the prescribed nsǎsangó.

Another instance turned up recently (May, 1933). One of our Christians, Babolá Michel of Ianda (Bonkoso) wanted to take a wife.

428 He had set his heart on Bolúmbɔ́, daughter of Ntando ɛ́y'ilengu of ●587 Bofalambɔ́ka. Upon the death of Bolúmbɔ́'s husband, Esalɛ́ ɛ́â 581 Lonkongɔ́, (in 1926), she had been asked for by Bombɔ́ngo, a distant relative of Esalɛ́. Proceeding in the customary fashion, Bombɔ́ngo had made his request through the medium of his elder brother Engambɛ́ and had paid a bompɔ́ngɔ́ of 4 bakonga and 20 francs. In the meantime, Babolɔ́ reached adulthood; he left our school and returned to his native village. Being a true nephew of Esalɛ́ ɛ́â Lonkongɔ́, he had a direct right over this woman, who left Bombɔ́ngo. Since the latter protested, however, the priest was faced with a moral problem; the question was whether or not there was a real marriage between Bombɔ́ngo and Bolúmbɔ́. If there were, there would be no question of a marriage between Babolɔ́ and Bolúmbɔ́, since the Church could not break a valid marriage between Christians. I have said above that a union of the sort involved in this case is not, in Nkundo eyes, a typical marriage. However, I wanted to have every assurance and to be as certain as possible. To that end, I went to Bonjoku at the time of the tax collection. I found many men gathered there. I raised the question of marriage by inheritance. The discussion ended on the unanimous expression of the opinion that in the instance involved nothing opposed the new marriage. The men gathered there added that all similar cases are rather a sort of concubinage accepted by ancestral law, but lacking all characteristics of a true marriage.

In order to avoid the many disadvantages inherent in this second form of marriage by inheritance, the husband, if he has any wealth, will do everything he can to collect the valuables needed for the bride price and pay his father-in-law. The latter will use the bride price to reimburse the heir. By making this payment, which is handed over through a new ndonga designated by him, the husband obtains complete possession of the woman. The marriage by inheritance than changes into a marriage by nkumbɔ́. The besangɔ́jwɔ́ which the husband had previously given the heir must be returned, and the heir's ties with the woman are broken by these formalities.

[579] It sometimes happens that the heir takes a very dim view of this new payment and takes offense. In the past a war, through illegal, could result -- after which, as always, the matter was settled just the same.

428 587 581 On the other hand, it also happens sometimes, and even quite often, that although the woman loves her "husband" (in the improper sense) she does not want any change. At heart she remains attached to the kin of her deceased husband, through her love for him or because of her affection for his family, who have always treated her well. It is not unusual for the common-law husband to encounter unalterable opposition to a regular marriage. The woman may [198] [578] even take such offense at the proposal that she will leave the man for a close relative of the deceased.

In this type of situation another sort of development may also occur, although it is quite rare. For example, there is the case of Lowâka, daughter of Bompɛ́kɛ́ of Bontole. After the death of her husband, Botɔ́na of the Basɛ́ka Ilɛ́ka (Lofelí), she was taken in marriage by one of his relatives, Nsenge, who gave the prescribed besangɔ́jwá to Imomo of Bofalambɔ́ka, Botɔ́na's bonankɔ́ná. After a certain time Imomo, who had had a slight palaver with Nsenge, did not want the situation to continue. He demanded a regular marriage so that he could make use of his rights to Lowâka's bride price. Nsenge agreed and paid 60 bakonga to the woman's parents, who reimbursed Imomo. Imomo returned the besangɔ́jwá he had received, and thus Lowâka became the true wife of Nsenge.

One can see that the gamut of individual variations comes into play here, depending on the temperament and the feelings of the persons involved. But the most common practice is for the widow to remain attached to the family of the deceased or to remarry in the prescribed fashion.

In the latter case the widow goes to a man who is not related to the deceased, either immediately after mourning or after a period of conjugal life with the heir. The latter is entitled to a reimbursement of the bride price. The new husband must make all the customary payments through the medium of his own ndonga, exactly as he would for a first marriage by nkumbɔ́. Consequently, this union is not considered a "marriage by inheritance," with which it has nothing in common.

428 587 431 In any marriage by inheritance -- that is, where no bride price payment is involved -- the husband, whether he be the heir or

431 simply a relative of the deceased, must give the woman a present called isangó, or inheritance gift. The woman either hands this gift over to her family or keeps it for her personal needs. In any case [199] it is not considered a part of the bride price.

Finally, when a widow remarries, either by inheritance or by a new nkumbó, her husband must make her a present of one or two rings or knives of equivalent value before having conjugal relations with her. This present is given either on the same day as the isangó or on another, depending on the circumstances. It is called boɛ́ngɛ́, "couch," or, more commonly, ikondeyantangɛ́ (from -kondeya, "to make someone get on," and ntangɛ́ "bed"). It is a gift of consolation for widowhood. This gift of ikondeyantangɛ́ is probably what Engels referred to in his study on the Wângata we have already cited, when he spoke of "buying off mourning."

587 An examination of marriage by inheritance shows that the widow is free to remarry a man of her choice, whether he be the heir or another relative of the deceased or some stranger. The only exception is a woman who has been willed to someone by the deceased. (1)

> 1. The Nkundó scrupulously observe the stipulations of a will (boango or bowâko) because they fear the vengeance of the deceased. When a person expresses his last wishes he usually adds the threat, "If you don't carry out my wishes, you will follow me in death."

If the heir subsequently does not fulfill his obligations toward her, she can react the same way as in a marriage by nkumbó. As for the special case of the bosóló, we will deal with it separately.

Another law may be deduced from the facts observed: as long as no new bride price is paid, the woman continues to belong to the family of the deceased. Only a restitution of the bride price breaks the contract and destroys all its consequences. (2)

> 2. We will come back to these points in Article IX, and in Chapters VIII and IX.

587 Lastly, these facts demonstrate collective ownership within the clan or the extended family. When a close relative, such as Bosɛ́lɔ́ for instance, marries a widow, he considers her legally as his legitimate spouse, just as she was the legitimate spouse of the deceased. [200] No new bride-price agreement is necessary, since the preceding one continues to be valid. The only new element introduced is that another person in the family of the deceased enters into a marriage bond with the widow. Whether the person marrying the woman is the legitimate heir or a close relative makes no difference because of the community of interests that exists (the children belong to Bosɛ́lɔ́ as much as to the heir, for example). (1)

1. We will come back to this question further on (see Article IX).

837 Because of the superficial resemblance between different situations, it should be mentioned here that the enjoyment of a woman in a common-law relationship is not asked for exclusively in the case of a widow. Such a request may also be made in connection with the wife of a polygamist while the husband is still living, but this is done only by a close relative and even then is not well regarded. Usually the situation is as follows: a man falls in love with one of the wive's in his relative's harem, and she shares his sentiments. He takes her home with him. There is a palaver. The husband is furious, breaks of all relations with the seducer, and wants no more of his invitations or his gifts, which means the quarrel is serious. Therefore, other relatives intervene to try and reconcile the two adversaries; seeing that there is no way to prevent the cohabitation of the pair or judging that such action would not be expedient, they try to pacify the legitimate husband. Through the agency of his elder brother, the lover sends him a gift in entreaty. The husband, finding no one on his side, bows down before the fait accompli, accepts the gift (bompángɔ́), and yields the enjoyment of the woman. Instead of going about the matter in this cavalier fashion, the lover may also make his request in the normal manner. If for one reason or another the lovers want to stop living together, they separate without further

837 ceremony. If the husband is kindly disposed toward them, he gives back to his relative the valuables the latter has paid, and the incident is closed. [201]

That is what happened some time ago to Insɛ́lo, of Bokenyola (Bo̱njo̱ku). (1) In the harem of his maternal uncle, E̱fo̱nja Is'Ôfuwa, who was originally from Bo̱njo̱ku but had been integrated into the Bongale, he had noticed a certain Mbilɛ́eyenga, originally from Bosɛ́ɛ́, and "his heart was rent asunder," as the Nkundɔ́ say. Through the agency of his older first cousins Mpe̱tsɛ́ ɛ́â Lingo̱mo̱, ye sent E̱fo̱nja a bompɛ́ngɛ́ of 6 rings, asking him to be kind enough to allow him to cohabit with this woman. His request was well received. But after a certain number of years their passion cooled, and Insɛ́lo wished to contract a proper marriage to give himself posterity. He therefore parted from Mbilɛ́, who went back to her husband. The latter returned the 6 rings to Insɛ́lo̱, because he did not want to enrich himself at the expense of a relative.

Article III. The Bosɔ́lɔ́

428 The marriage of a bosɔ́lɔ́ is a special form of the inheritance
587 of women.

768 The term bosɔ́lɔ́ is used everywhere. The Injɔ̱́lɔ̱́ also use a synonym, njɛ́mɔ́, an incorrect term derived from the verb ɛ́mola, "to make [someone] get up." Thus they say ɛ́moja bǒna njɛ́mɔ́, "to give the child (son, daughter) a bosɔ́lɔ́. (2) Among the Beloko and their Elɛ́ngɛ́ the term bombɔ́jɛ́ is used as well as bosɔ́lɔ́.

On the day when the widows are "lifted from the ground" and

2. The Elanga tribes in the Losanganya region also use this expression.

428 permitted "to return to the bed," (3) all those entitled to the rights of a father -- that is, those who have precedence, whether men or women -- gather with the sister's son to proceed with the ceremony. As always, each person yields his right to speak out of mutual respect. Finally, the eldest again has the floor [202]; it may be the deceased's father, brother, or paternal aunt (isɔ́moto). This individual who is in charge, makes a short speech appropriate to the occasion, and then gives one of the widows to the first-born of the children (nsɔ́mí). He takes the latter's preferences into account, having made sure of them in advance. The widow is given to him with the statement: "We have wrested for you the bosɔ́lɔ́ which your father has left you," tɔ́kokumela bosɔ́lɔ́ bɔ̌kí isɛ́ okotsíkɛ́láká. The actual meaning of kumá is "to seize by pulling toward oneself, to pull up," and includes the idea of strength. The word is primarily used in such expressions as kuma bafílo, "to pull up weeds," kuma nsálá, "to pull out feathers," etc. But it is also employed whenever anything is taken or pulled forcefully toward oneself, as in kuma mbombo, "to pull a chikwangue out of a heap."

The bosɔ́lɔ́ is always given to the first-born, regardless of sex, to the exclusion of the other children. If the eldest is a girl, she passes the bosɔ́lɔ́ on to her brother, first-born among the boys. This is a real seniority right, and it must be bought, or rather paid for, by the brother by giving his sister a present which most frequently consists of hens, money, small useful objects, or often a quantity of beer. The same rule applies if the eldest yields his right to a younger brother because the latter is passionately in love with her or -- nowadays -- because he does not want to take a second wife.

3. See "Les Coutumes funeraires des Nkundo" [The Funeral Customs of the Nkundɔ́] (in press, Anthropos). The Elíngá perform this ceremony only a few days after the burial; the Boangi do so even before it. The Injolɔ́ are beginning to imitate the Elíngá.

428 In addition a bósoló is also given to the bǒnankáná. Only the 768 eldest son of the sister whose bride price was used by the deceased may 587 claim this right. If the bride price of the nephew's mother was not involved in the establishment of the harem which is to be divided, he is only entitled to a bosóló who is not someone else's nkita, that is, who was acquired by means of riches procured through the deceased's own efforts. If the deceased obtained wives with the bride prices of two sisters, both of whom have left sons, only the eldest son of the eldest sister has this right. (1) [203]

> 1. It may happen that one of the sons of the deceased is disinherited because of the rights of the bǒnankáná. If that happens and the latter at least has a wife or can obtain the necessary valuables in his father's clan, he is supposed to yield the woman to his unfortunate cousin. This is a duty imposed by the love of family (lióta), and he may not evade it.

The practice of handing over a bosóló to relatives other than the son or daughter of the deceased seems to be an extension of a right originally reserved for his child.

The desires of the person entitled to the bosóló are taken into account when she is handed over. However, the eldest son can never obtain his father's favorite; only an elder brother may inherit her.

It is thus possible for a son to receive his own mother as bosóló, but only if there are no other widows and if he has no way of obtaining a wife. Naturally, he may not marry her. She is given to him so that when she remarries he will receive the amount of the bride price which will be repaid.

If the deceased leaves no harem but does leave a good deal of other wealth, the bosóló consists of some object of great value. This practice would seem to indicate that the word bosóló is applied to a woman only by an extension of its basic and original meaning, "inheritance by right of seniority."

428 768 587 As soon as the bosóló is assigned to the person entitled to her, she leaves the group of widows and goes to the home of her new husband. From then on she may cohabit with him, since from that moment the pair are absolved from the observance of the regulations and prohibitions of mourning. Because of her affection for her deceased husband and her sorrow, the woman sometimes begs her new husband to be patient and wait a while. Her wishes are respected, for a refusal to acquiesce would be a very serious offense, which could lead to an immediate rupture of the relationship.

The woman chosen as bosóló may refuse the husband for whom she is intended, though such cases are rare and in the past were even unknown. The following instance [204] goes back to 1932: Mpía of Mbanja "acquired" Bôngongo of Ilángá as wife for his eldest son, Bo̱mpe̱lí. But the young man did not want her. So as not to waste his money, the father incorporated the woman into his harem. When the old man died, Bôngongo was given to this same Bo̱mpe̱lí as a bosóló. This time it was she who did not want him, and, to make matters worse, all the other widows also refused. Subsequently, a second cousin of Bo̱mpe̱lí named Bosénjá wanted to marry Bôngongo. But out of spite, Bo̱mpe̱lí did not want to yield her to him except against the payment of a bride price.

Even if the woman makes no objection -- and she generally does not -- and accepts the new husband without loving him, either out of indifference, or to be able to come out of seclusion, or for any other reason, she may always find a way to leave him, if she wishes, for another close relative whom she prefers. This fact indicates that, although theoretically the union of the bosóló is supposed to be more stable than a simple marriage by inheritance, in practice it is not; and it does not attain the degree of permanence characteristic of a marriage by nkumbó. The reason is probably to be found in the fact that the union with a bosóló and the ordinary form of marriage by inheritance are fundamentally identical, and the rights of the family play a great role in both of them. The following is a recent case history: Ifungá, daughter of Esukúlu of Bongangá (Boéndé) and widow [684] of Bolékélá of Bongíli was assigned as bosóló to her husband's eldest son, named Boongo. Later she claimed that she did not love Boongo but

429 that she wanted to become the wife of his brother Ekamba. Ekamba
768 did not object. But very soon she broke this union as well. This time 587 the chief decided she was going too far and to please Boongo, who 684 had settled with his mother's clan of which he also was a member, he sentenced her to several weeks in prison. All sensible people approved of the chief's attitude. In spite of the suppression of such excesses, a suppression which is necessary, the woman's freedom is protected.

We have already indicated that from a moral point of view the 428 marriage of a bosɔ́lɔ́ may be considered on the same level as the in-768 587 heritance of any woman if she remains among the close kin of the deceased. The only difference is that such a union is somewhat more difficult to break.

Article IV. The Replacement or Substitution

586 When a marriage is broken, instead of completing the divorce
587 by restitution of the bride price, the woman's family often has recourse to the practice of replacing the divorcée by one of her relatives (such as a sister, cousin, or niece). The act of replacement, as well as the woman substituted, is called bankitsá. (1) This name is plural noun derived from kita, "to become," kitana, "to replace, to succeed." The singular would be linkitsá, but it is never applied to this situation.

The substitute usually does not object to the social obligation that falls upon her, unless she feels an unusual repugnance toward the husband. In that case an attempt is made to find someone else in the family. A family may go so far as to take one of its members away from her husband in order to substitute her for the divorcée, especially if no other substitute is to be found and if they care more about the marriage that has been broken than about her union.

The Nkundɔ́ give the following justifications for the practice of substitution:

1. The Ekonda say nkitsá.

586x
587 1) The reference for the continuation of a happy relationship by marriage as against the creation of a new one which has yet to prove itself.

2) The desire to avoid the palavers and troubles involved in the process of restoring the bride price and to hasten in providing the husband with a new wife even if there has been no undue delay in reimbursing him).

3) Concern for the children born of the union which has been broken. [206] This is a very important reason, for it is completely in the children's interest that their stepmother should be a close relative who considers them her own children and who is therefore to be preferred over an entirely strange woman.

586x
587 Just as there is no restitution of the bride price in the case of a replacement, so there is no new bride price to pay. But it is inconceivable that the visits necessary for the negotiations should be made without gifts. Thus a replacement inevitably results in an increase of the bride price, since the new payments made on each occasion are added to the former bride price. The more successive replacements are made, the more the amount of the bride price is likely to increase. Thus I have known instances where a bride price which at the beginning consisted of 100 rings had in the end reached the sum of close to 300 rings.

586x
587 In the opinion of the Nkundɔ́ the handing over of a bankitsɛ́ constitutes a true and valid marriage. But it is not a new union but simply the transfer to a different person of obligations which have never ceased to exist, which derive from a marriage agreement that has never been annulled. Thus the woman for whom the bride price was paid is known as the one who began, or founded, the marriage, the second woman simply succeeding her in it: X. ɛ́mangɛ́kí liɛ́la, Y. aɔ̂sulungana (manga, "to begin," or bondola, "to found," or mɔ́mola, "to begin [at the very beginning]"; as against sulungana, "to succeed [someone]," kitana, "to replace," mumola, "to continue"). For them a true succession to a position is involved. The replacement is not simply physical and external; it is fully legal in the same way that an heir apparent succeeds his father as king (there

586ˣ is only one royal power and dignity which continues to exist through the ● 587 various individuals invested with it) or as in law when, in spite of a change in the identity of the debtor, there is no novation. (1) [207]

1. We will return to this question in Article IX.

Because of the way the Nkundó view this substitution, the bankitsá occupies the same rank in the harem as the woman she is replacing, and she is handed over to the husband by the same ndonga who participated in arranging the initial agreement.

What evaluation should be placed on this union by substitution from the standpoint of natural law? Does it bear the taint of a real vice or does it not? The right of civil powers to break a marriage legitimately contracted is debated. (1) Let us assume that this right exists and, furthermore, that the woman being substituted really consents. Her view, as well as the view of everyone around her, is that this is a matter of submitting to a family duty imposed by the laws which govern her people. One may wonder whether this requirement can be defended before basic principles of the law in general and in the light of morality. In any case the unanimous opinion of the natives that this substitution constitutes the continuation of a marriage through another person is certainly false. It is undoubtedly the result of an insufficient analysis, which leads them to lose sight of the crux of the problem by focusing primarily on the involvement of the clan in the marital union (see Article IX).

Whatever the case may be, it is possible to say without fear that in the great majority of cases a native woman submits to this law because she considers her submission an obligation which, for the good of her family, she is not permitted to escape.

[797] Moreover, the younger generation is beginning to oppose this practice. For example, here with the Sisters there is a young daughter

586x of Boɔ́mbo, named Ngongo, who was given to Bokungɔ́ of Bongíli as a ●587 replacement for her sister Ilumbɛ́ when she was a very small child.
797 Since she was not yet nubile she continued to live with her parents. When they became Christians, Ngongo was also baptized. On the other hand, [208] Longála, a son of Bokungɔ́, had become a catechumen and, after coming to the school, was baptized. His father yielded Ngongo to him as his future wife. Ngongo (who was now about seventeen) wanted nothing to do with this marriage. It was not that she refused to have Longála as her husband; she did not want to be married simply as a bankitsá. She insisted on a marriage by bride price, in spite of the difficulties involved in the procedure, which was doubly useless and, for the Nkundɔ́, stupid.

583x There is a second form of substitution: replacement after death. When a man has lost his wife and both he and the parents of the deceased want to maintain their alliance, he brings them 20 to 25 rings through the medium of the ndonga for the purpose of obtaining a new wife. This payment is called ibɔ́leɔ́ko, a term derived from -bɔ́l, "to beat" (for instance the clay in the ground) and eɔ́ko, "the site of a house." The Injɔ́lɔ́ designate it by a different name which however has the same meaning. It is sangɔ́lɛ́kojí, "the inheritance of a dwelling site."

The procedure is as follows: When the widower has fulfilled all his funerary obligations and, at the end of his second visit to his parents-in-law, he is about to take leave of them, they ask him:

"Well, you're leaving. What are you planning to do now?"

He answers, "I loved your daughter very much. She is dead, and I have buried her. I have fulfilled all my duties. I have always lived on good terms with you, and I would like to continue our relationship. But first I must consult my family. Then we will see." That is how he expresses his wish to continue being their son-in-law. After asking his relatives' opinion, he returns to his father-in-law with the ibɔ́leɔ́ko. "Here, I bring you the ibɔ́leɔ́ko; I come to beat the house site; give me a wife." The father-in-law will have already chosen the daughter, sister, or other relative who is to replace the deceased and has already privately mentioned her to his son-in-law.

587 He hands over to him the woman intended for him, saying "Here is 583x your wife." (1)

> 1. Among the Ekonda, the ibóleóko payment has no special name. Moreover, before giving the husband a substitute, the parents require 20 to 30 additional rings which are supposed to pay for the mother's mourning and are therefore called basáki ba nyangó.

For a replacement after death, as for one after a divorce, the parents-in-law will sometimes take a daughter from her legitimate husband so that she may serve as substitute.

The 20 to 25 rings comprising the ibóleóko are only the beginning of the payment. A complete bride price is required, as it is for a marriage by nkúmbó, but the subsequent installments are not as large as for ordinary marriages. Nevertheless, the replacement is thought of as the continuation of a pre-existing union, though this concept is less apparent here than in relation to a substitution due to divorce. Consequently, in a harem the substitute assumes the same rank as was held by the deceased.

The replacement after death is made for the same reason as after a divorce.

Although the two types of replacement resemble each other in that both involve the substitution of one wife for another, there are considerable differences between them.

A substitution of another wife following divorce does not result in the payment of another bride price nor, consequently, in the standard expression of the woman's consent. But on the contrary, the payment of another bride price is required for a replacement after death, and there is a public expression of consent. It occurs when the husband pays the valuables comprising the ibóleóko and is done in the same way as in a direct marriage by nkumbo. These two differences, and especially the second, make the replacement for a deceased wife a standard marriage from the legal standpoint. [210]

581 584 that is, that they did not consider themselves the contracting parties. But to my knowledge, their opposition is not considered to invalidate the marriage. I say "to my knowledge" because there is much confusion in the native mind on this question, and it is possible that later discoveries will show that the Nkundó attach a greater importance to consent than we perceive at the moment. As a matter of fact, the inclusion of a ceremony expressing consent in a normal marriage is an indication in that direction.

Let us now examine our data on the value of consent and its expression.

Except in an unusual case, which we are justified in leaving out of consideration in this synthesis since it does not influence our conclusions, there is always consent by the spouses in a standard marriage. Such a consent is first attained in private and then revealed to the parents, who give their approval. At the time of the first bride-price payment, the fiancée expresses her consent by a public and official act, while the husband shows his in accompanying his father in all the proceedings and in taking his intended to his home. In the eyes of the Nkundó that is entirely sufficient.

Another question arises in this connection. The consent of the couple is expressed at the time the ikulá is paid. And the real payment of the bride price occurs only later, without a renewal of consent. Can the expression of consent at the beginning, at the time of engagement, be considered sufficient, since it is virtually continuous? In my opinion there is no reason why it should not be.

581 584 587 In the case of a marriage by inheritance, the usual formalities of the expression of consent are omitted, because [226] no new bride price is paid. Nevertheless, we note that the heir must go and fetch the widow from her family and make a special payment. The Nkundó explain this action as a mark of respect toward the widow's family, but we may interpret it as an expression, adapted to the particular situation, of the new husband's wish to marry this woman. The woman's willingness to accompany the heir is really a manifestation of her consent to the union. This interpretation is confirmed by the legal requirement that another bekooli payment be made by each of the

587 price agreement, does not come from the family; it is clearly a personal act of the man who wants to take the widow for his wife.

In the case of a replacement after divorce, the external expression of consent is more vague, since it is limited to the husband's overture's to his father-in-law on the one hand, and the fact that the woman goes with the husband, on the other. The same must be said of the inheritance of a bosóló (Chapter III, Article III). It would be contrary to reality, however, to conclude that because the form of the woman's consent is less prominent, such consent does not exist; with respect to these questions, their attitude is entirely different from ours. To be a replacement is considered a duty and accepted as such. Psychologically, the acceptance of this duty often involves consent; it does not exclude the presence of the will any more than the duty to submit to holy commandments, and to religious and civil laws. Even reverent fear, the fear of punishments, etc., does not prevent a free exercise of the will, although they do diminish it. Nevertheless, there are cases where fear or constraint can be so great as to remove freedom completely. [227]

584 question is even more difficult. Only the engagement is made in early childhood. The husband's consent is expressed in a manner which is entirely adequate. Since the union does not move from a tentative stage to a final one before the girl approaches puberty, she may be considered capable of giving her consent sufficiently to make a valid marriage, and she gives this consent in going to the home of her husband. Nevertheless, if we compare this expression of consent with those we have observed in the other types of union, it seems very much attentuated and greatly inferior to them.

581 Having recapitulated these facts, let us try to define the legal nature of Nkundó marriage. In ecclesiastic law and in European civil law, a marriage is effected through the official exchange of

582 602 [576] and those who owe submission and respect. The "superior" relatives are the ascendants, uncles, aunts, etc., in short, all those bearing the title of "father" or "mother," as well as elder brothers (elder sisters, elder cousins, etc.), who are batómóló (sing. botómóló). [601] The "inferiors" are the descendants, those who are called "children" (bǎna): sons and daughters, grandsons, nephews, nieces, younger brothers or sisters, and those who are classed with them and called bakúné (sing. bokúné).

[595] [587] 4) Polygamy and the inheritance of widows introduce another element. We will see that although persons of certain degrees of affinity may not marry, the prohibition is lifted to permit the inheritance of widows.

5) Our term "relatives by marriage" the Nkundó term and bakiló are not synonymous, even with respect to direct affinity. When we use the term "relatives by marriage" here, we are speaking in Nkundó terms. They do not consider certain persons whom we would include in that category as "relations by marriage." Such persons [601] are included in the group which as a whole is designated as likiló or bakiló, but when properly and accurately referred to they are called bǒme, "husband," or wǎli, "wife," because they may marry each other and therefore affinity, strictly speaking, cannot be applied to them. In other words, for the Nkundó, affinity is the relationship of a person with (only) those of his spouse's relatives whom he is forbidden to marry. It is well to bear in mind the double meaning of this term.

2. The rules

1. Direct Affinity

582 603 606 A. Marriages are prohibited in the direct line. Nevertheless, in accordance with consideration number 4, a son or grandson may inherit or marry the widows of his father or grandfather, but not the reverse. [254]

835 the relations between a wife and her husband's parents are closely connected with the rules pertaining to the prohibition related to affinity and seems to spring from the same source. Therefore it will be useful to have in mind what we have said in the preceding chapter, Article IV.

607 The husband's elder brothers treat his wife as their sister. The wife calls her husband's sisters [300] bakiló, but out of respect she often gives them the title of "mother." (1)

587 After the husband's death, as has been said suo loco, his father or his brother may marry his widow. But this practice is not well regarded and is permitted only rarely, chiefly when the scattering of the family patrimony is feared or if the two interested parties have an unusual love for each other.

602 With respect to children or younger brothers and all those who fall into that category, the situation is altogether different. Illicit relations with wives of their father, grandfather, uncle, elder brother, or elder cousin, are judged much less severely. Generally, misconduct does not give rise to claims for payment, or the payment is demanded "for form's sake" and consists of a hen and a bunch of bananas. By means of this payment the guilty one recognizes his error and renders homage to the right of his elder.

[626] In general public opinion condemns these relations and often with great severity. The question of degree of kinship as well as other considerations result in a great diversity among the cases, so we will examine each situation separately and distinguish each time between the husband's reaction and that of public opinion.

[601] 1. Among the Elángá the wife also calls her husband's sisters bongíli (pl. bangíli); they call her bǒnongíli (pl. bǎnangíli). A wife often calls her husband's mother nyangôngíli. Bǎnangíli l'ǎnangíli means "the brother's wives and their sisters-in-law."

837 A. A woman's misconduct with her husband's son does not re-
626 sult in the payment of an indemnity. Nevertheless, the husband who 595x has been wronged takes action; he defends his rights and is enraged, 593x whether the situation is very serious or not, and especially if he is monogamous. If he has several wives, he is more apt to pass over the matter, unless it involves his favorite. Sometimes he takes revenge by striking the guilty son's mother, taking her hens away from her, etc. But such action may lead to complications: [301] the brother of the woman so treated might intervene, and if the reaction of the husband who has been wronged is too violent or recurs too often, a divorce may result. In any case the father never hurts his heedless son's wife, since he loves her like his own daughter.

The father may apply a direct sanction against the offender by delaying the acquisition of a wife for him and refusing his blessings for his son's travels and undertakings -- still a serious thing in purely native society.

Such relations are always greatly criticized by public opinion, even if relatives intervene on the culprit's behalf. The latter is disgraced as a result; he is mocked with the epithet etɔ́onjɔ́lɔ́, to which [578] often is added the explicative phrase l'ɔ́ála banyangɔ́ b'âningá. Etɔ́onjɔ́lɔ́ is derived from etɔ́o, "masculine clothing" and, figuratively, "virility in the physical sense," and from bɔ́lɔ́, "strength." Thus the epithet implies that the culprit is so virile that he goes so far as to unite even with his brothers' mothers.

● 587 Marriage with the father's widow after his death is legitimate.
626 Nevertheless, if the widow has left children, public opinion does not entirely refrain from judgment, and though the severity of the criticism cited above will be attenuated, it may still be heard. Such was the case of Yoká of Bokenyola (Bonjoku), which is well known in this region. He married Lokokú, widow of his father Insílo y'Ɔkátola and mother of Insílo Antoine, present chief of the Bonkoso. (1).

1. With reference to the above-mentioned attitude, an exception must be made with regard to the inheritance of a widow by right

587 626 of seniority (she is then called bosɔ́lɔ́ -- see Chapter III, Article III). The giving of a widow who is in the position described is preferably avoided.

837 626 Illicit relations between a son and his father's wife are judged with especially great severity if the young man's own mother is still alive. He is reproached for his behavior in terms which are clear and crude: Oôy'ɔ̌sanganya mbindo ǐkɛ̌ la mbindo y'îs'â nyangɔ́, "you unite your stains (impurities) with those of your father and [302] mother"; Outɛ́ ńk'eki wɛ̌ wǐmánáká, "you are returning from whence you came." To these expressions is often added ɔ́wa lɔ́í ɛ́! olekí liloka, "you will die because of your too great wickedness." To the [761] Nkundɔ́ this last statement is a kind of curse, and if it is repeated by several persons it will not fail to have its effect. Or, to speak as our people do, if everyone greatly wails over and against this man, he will really die. (1)

If the son in question is not married, especially if he has already reached a relatively advanced age, and if he approaches the wives of his polygamous father, the matter is considered less serious. The latter cannot be too angry, especially when only isolated instances are involved; for other relatives will allow their affection for this young man to speak, since they are aware of his passion and therefore understand his temptations and follies. They would intervene to pacify the father and urge him to prevent the repetition of such occurrences by obtaining a wife for his son. In exceptional cases the family council may even judge the father to be in the wrong because of his harshness toward his son and may allow the latter to take his father's wife away from him (never, however, the first wife, the favorite, or the bolɔ́mbu); such was the case we described in

The co-wives adapt fairly well to this preferential system. Nevertheless, there is a good deal of backbiting on account of it. It may also happen that one or another of the wives is jealous to the point of being unable to bear it. [347] The signs of her rancor [586] multiply, and a divorce results in the end.

The nkɔ́ndɛ́ does not have to go into mourning for anyone [765] other than her husband. Even then she does not remove her clothing. But she does not have to abide by mourning regulations either for her parents or her own children.

Like the other wives, the favorite is passed on through inheri- [587] tance. But she cannot be taken as a bosɔ́lɔ́ by anyone except an elder brother of the deceased.

595x 192 Nkɔ́ndɛ́ is the specific term by which a favorite is designated. Its etymology is unknown to me. The word is used everywhere, although the Injɔ́lɔ́ often say lokílo (whose etymology is equally obscure). Another less common (older?) term known to the Bonkoso, Bongili, Wǎngatá, and Bakáala is bongilɛ́ or bongijí (1). In addition to the term ikundaka, already cited, there is also the word ebɛ́lɛ́kɛ́, a generic term meaning "preference, predilection" or, when applied to a child or a slave, "an object one does not want to dispose of." The favorite is also called áfɔ́kɛ́támɛ́, "untouchable," because other men may not have relations with her.

1. The Ekonda call the favorite bokɔ́lo. The Elanga of Losanganya say bofiɛ́, a name borne by certain women among the Nkundɔ́ between Jwalɛ́ and Boloko. Might this also be an old name?

The term universally employed to signify the breaking up of a marriage by the wife is bokőfo, derived from the verb kőfa. This word is not used for a wife's repudiation by her husband. Therefore, its meaning is not equivalent to "divorce"; it means rather "to break the union with the husband." The transitive causative form (kőfya) means "to provoke this break." It actually does happen that the woman's family causes the dissolution of a marriage for the sake of a more advantageous union. This should be understood in the context of what we have explained concerning reasons for divorce. Serious failures in the husband's fulfillment of his duties to his parents-in-law are mainly involved here. The [587] remarriage of a divorcée is described by the generic term kumbwa, "to be married to someone."

B. Second hypothesis: a husband wanted to get rid of his wife. Old natives stated very categorically that such behavior on the husband's part was due not to the cooling of his love, but to [383] incorrigible conduct on the wife's part. He was reduced to this extremity by the impossibility of continuing conjugal life with her.

586x 584 He did everything in his power to forestall the flight of his wife by making the first move. After having vainly tried to bring her around through the intervention of her parents and especially the ndonga, he had recourse to one of the following means, which he could in fact use successively. But first he was required to inform the witness and to obtain his approval as well as that of the family authorities. The measures were as follows:

a) Submission to the etâka, a heavy wooden fork fastened to [584] the neck. When the husband has placed the etâka on his wife, the ndonga informed her parents of what had happened. They could then come and free their daughter by returning the bride price. If the husband applied the etâka against the wishes of the witness, the latter could release the prisoner. But in so doing he became guarantor of the reimbursement of the bride price; he became personally responsible for it.

> of this rule, however, could trouble the religious feelings of native Christians and thus produce an effect that is the reverse of the one desired. A religious marriage is in fact indissoluble, and in such cases the obligation to make restitution would be equivalent to a recognition that a religious union could be dissolved. And not only would the native consider this an opposition between the public authorities and Christian morality, but in addition the stability of marriages in general would greatly suffer.

here it must be noted that certain parents use hypocritical circumventions rather than openly showing their refusal. This is how they go about it: if the woman has really abandoned her husband and he, for good reasons such as those given above, no longer cares for his wife with whom he can no longer live (especially if he is monogamous), the question of reimbursement arises. The woman, in connivance with her parents, who do not want to make restitution of the bride price, publicly and officially declares that she is not leaving her husband and wishes to return to the conjugal household, whereas her only intention is to help her parents avoid paying the bride-price valuables. In time she will manage to get out of it one way or another.

3. Special cases

586x There are some rather special cases in the dissolution of marriage. The first has occurred more frequently since colonization, while the last has practically disappeared.

586x 837 587 1) Njangó. This word is the noun form of the verb angola, "to seduce or lead astray" (another's wife, his laborer, his slave, etc.). Therefore, it is a generic term, but it is primarily applied to the seduction of a married woman in order to make her leave her husband. It therefore denotes a man's act. Of the woman it is

586 simply said that she has left her husband (aòkófa) and has been taken 837 in marriage by X (aòkúmbwa éka Sóngóló). Having fallen in love
587 with another man's wife [390] and desiring to marry her, a man tries to win her favor. If she consents he collects the valuables necessary for the bride price. He then asks the woman to come to him and pays the bride price as for any marriage.

Instead of going directly to her seducer, the woman may also first go to her parents, especially if they are in favor of her plan. If they are not she would not succeed, because they would prevent her from carrying it out.

[721] Cases of njangó were formerly rare because they were risky. As a matter of fact, they constituted a casus belli. Anyone who undertook such a venture had to be in a position to take the conse-
[178] quences of his act, especially with respect to the payment of an indemnity. Nowadays, on the other hand, these occurrences are much more frequent, even when the new husband does not have the means to pay the bride price at once. Nevertheless, the reversal in government policy is beginning to produce good results. The woman, or her mother, is often imprisoned; rarely the seducer. This penalty is often sufficient to restore order. But to keep from being exposed to further difficulties caused by the woman who no longer loves him, the abandoned husband sometimes refuses to take back his unfaithful wife.

The rarity of cases in former times as well as the fact that [671] they constituted a legitimate reason for war shows that the njangó did not have the approval of Nkundó law but that it was more or less considered an infraction.

586 2) Taking refuge. Because of the change in circumstances,
577 the practice of taking refuge is no longer common today. It used to be done as follows: A woman who absolutely wanted to leave her husband and had no means of doing so, since no man had asked for her in marriage and her parents were powerless to help her, went secretly to a rich and influential man whom she would have liked as a husband. She arrived unexpectedly, stood before him, or even threw herself at him, crying, [391] Bejwó békě! ónjéngé,

586 x In most cases the husband and his parents-in-law try to continue their relationship despite the breakup. If the woman persists in not wanting to go back to her husband despite the pressure, the entreaties, and even the curses of her family, the parents sub-
[587] stitute a sister or relative (bankitsa) for her, unless, of course, no relative is available. For in that case they must resign themselves to the restitution of the bride price and a permanent dissolution of the relationship. No new bride-price payment is made for the substitute, as the original bride price is valid for the new union, as we have explained in Chapter III, Article IV.

Finally, there is an exception to the general principle: there is no restitution of the bride price if for some reason there is equivalent compensation of some sort. Nowadays this exception is seldom encountered, as will be apparent from the following details: for example, such an exception occurs if the right of ikɔ́kelo has been exercised, or if the wife of one of the relatives-in-law has been seized. Even if the amount of one bride price is larger than the other, the excess is not returned. Nor is there any obligation to restore the bride price if the wife has been reduced to slavery or has been killed. There are also the cases of the dissolution of marriage cited in Chapter V, Article IV, 2, no. 2, example 17, and in Chapter VI, Article V, 4. If the breakup caused [727] a war and the number killed on each side was considerable (three, five, six corpses), the matter rests there; when the families of those killed have been indemnified, there is no more talk of reimbursement. Occasionally, an influential and rich man who at the same time was spiteful or excessively proud, would take up arms a second time. He claimed that he would not stop until he had the bride-price valuables in his hands. Such behavior met with disapproval everywhere, and even his own family tried to stop him. If the opposing clan was sufficiently strong and stubborn in the struggle, the husband obtained nothing at all. But the desire to [855] get revenge or to be famous as a warrior sometimes caused a man to scorn financial losses. Finally, according to the notions of our natives, a case of enmity between two clans (which we have cited in relation to a woman's application for refuge) should be included in the category of compensations.

586 x to be touched. Even if the belonga and other payments total less than the bride price, nothing can be subtracted from the bosóngo. It must always be returned in its entirety.

As to slaves or domestic animals, not only are they subject [422] to the reimbursement law, but in addition restitution must be made of all their progeny, even when it includes several generations. This regulation applies to the maternal line (compare it with the ancient Roman adage: partus sequitur ventrem). Hens and ducks are excepted, however.

To indicate that each side must make restitution of absolutely everything that has been paid, the Nkundó use the expression: lâ nsọngi lá lọtéű, "even the needle and the tiny razor."

[409] The reimbursement of the bride price in a case where the woman is returning to her first husband is governed by no special rule. The second husband simply obtains restitution of what is due him. The wife's family often appeals to the first husband's generosity in order to hasten the reimbursement.

If the woman leaves her second husband as well as her first, without the latter having been previously reimbursed, restitution is made to both.

We have seen that the first husband can seize his rival's bride-price valuables as indemnity for the damages the latter has caused him. The woman's family is not required to return those valuables, since they have not received them. This affair therefore does not concern them and involves only the two rivals. In spite of the first husband's every right, such an action often resulted in war. Because of the fear of quarrels and other unpleasant consequences, this custom is no longer practiced. Nevertheless, the idea is not dead as the following case shows. It occurred in 1932.

x Engóngó de Lǒngá (Nkóle) made the acquaintance of Bosénjâ, 586 daughter of Bokelé wǎ Yelemeya of Ntómbâ (Wǎngatâ). She was
● 587 married to a Lǒnga (Ekonda) laborer named Isongű, a native Boángí, but left her husband to follow her new lover. The latter paid the ikulâ-ndanga (9 rings and 35 francs). After a certain number of months, the union broke up. Bosénjâ was found unsuitable as a wife. Among the faults with which she was reproached was a lack of affection for her fiancé's mother and other relatives, and a

Yet all this was in flagrant opposition to Nkundó law. 1) Engóndó was wrong to take another man's wife home with him. 2) Isongú could have taken Engóndó's valuables away from him at the time the latter was making the payment; it was his right. But 3) Bokelé was also in the wrong. The question [410] of seduction and adultery was none of his business but Isongú's. If he did not like Engóndó's behavior, he could have handled the situation differently. Now he had valuables to which he no longer had any right; he had to return them.

Conclusion

586x The nature of the reimbursement of marriage payments and the various circumstances under which it is made might suggest the conclusion that these goods are not acquired permanently, but rather that they constitute securities. The few exceptions where there is no reimbursement could not change this view. In fact the reason for them is clear -- compensation for that which is not restituted is made in other ways. (1)

Nevertheless, this conclusion does not hold up if we compare all the foregoing with what occurs when a marriage is broken through death. For in the latter case nothing at all is returned; everything that was given by each party remains permanently theirs. No payment is demanded even for the children (see below).

[721] 1. This observation -- like others made earlier -- might lead us to believe that in the mind of the Nkundó war and other bloody practices are only means which have little to recommend them and that basically our people disapprove of them.

152 rough behavior, only strangers married to village men (those known 593x as bɔ́ajɔ̂ɔ́la). This ill treatment is often extended to close relatives of the widower, that is, to those whom the women in ques-
764 tion call bɔ́ome, "potential husbands," never to fathers and higher relatives. (1) The purpose of this practice seems to be to intensify, by physical pain, the sorrow caused by death. In addition, provocatively obscene words, gestures, and movements remind the widower that from then on he must be continent, as described in extenso in the study cited above.

765 Afterwards, relatives dress the widower in a lisɔ́ki, a banana leaf which is torn all over horizontally. For all other mourning garments, as well as for all regulations and prohibitions that apply to all cases, see the detailed study.

The ill treatment described is not inflicted on the widow. It is meted out exclusively to men.

The general rules pertaining to seclusion apply to a widower; in fact they are especially severe for a man. His kinswomen prepare his simple meals. However, if his relations with his father-¶[587] in-law were excellent, the latter sends a woman [420] to him who will attend to his needs. She often becomes his wife when, after the lifting of mourning, he brings the ibɔ́leɔ́ko (Chapter III, Article IV).

During the entire first period of seclusion, he cannot go anywhere, at least ostensibly. If he needs to go out, he must go through the back. If he wants to visit a relative or friend, he must go behind the huts, in the banana grove, even if it is evening. In any case, he may not leave the village. Such was the ancient law, though nowadays it is observed less and less.

Furthermore, he cannot have the slightest contact with any woman who is not a relative. He cannot even shake her hand, greet her out loud, or look at her even in passing.

765 expected to attend. It is usually at this time that the negotiations occur relative to a replacement for the deceased (Chapter III, Article IV).

Article II. Seclusion of Widows

As I have described in the article cited, widows (bituka, sing. etuka, or, among the Bombwanja, besámanyi, sing. bosámanyi) are compelled to remain in seclusion for a long time. Before the ceremony of being lifted from the ground, they are ostensibly not permitted to go out. Later they are allowed more freedom; they can go everywhere to do their work, even to the markets. But they are required to spend their nights in the communal seclusion hut.

[620] A widow who did not conform to these rules would meet with serious criticism. She would be said to have not loved her husband (and consequently suspected of having caused his death by sorcery). Moreover, she would be exposed to the avenging anger of the deceased, who would disturb her sleep, thrash her if she went to the forest alone, [422] or would even come to take her into the next world with him.

Insofar as possible all the widows are brought together in one and the same hut. To complete their separation from the world, the entrance is closed by means of a circle of palms, the same as for the seclusion hut of a nursing woman, a bolúmbú, or a woman possessed by the spirit of bongóli (yebola). This is to prevent widows from having relations with passers-by.

The name of the seclusion hut is lokásá (the same as the word for "leaf."). The Bombwanja use the word lokombí (from komba, "to shut," "to enclose"); the Injóló and the Boángí say lonkíndá. (1)

1. The Ekonda use the word itálé.

587 During the last period of seclusion, although the widows may not be visited by lovers who wish to court them with the object of

M 765 marriage after the end of mourning, they have the right to accept 587 various foods and firewood from them. But a rather dim view is taken of these services rendered by strangers, that is, by persons not related to the heirs. For theoretically the widows belong to the heirs and are their wives, since the financial marriage agreement continues. (2) Nevertheless, if these men are not at enmity with the heirs, they encounter no opposition. For once the period of seclusion is terminated, the widows are free to go back to their respective families and be taken in marriage by anyone able to pay the bride price. Nevertheless, suitors are not permitted to enter the seclusion hut even in the last period. They must therefore transmit presents through the agency of the biũnanyí (sing. eũnanyí), that is, the relatives of the deceased.

M 765 This last period begins with the ceremony of being lifted off the ground. The widows are made to get up onto the beóngá --
M [423] bákondeja bituka ndá beóngá. The beóngá consist of split
P branches of the parasol tree, placed on long branches, which are [352] in turn attached to posts, forming a small primitive bed, which is [513] the usual bed of the Batswá that is sometimes also used by the Baotó, if the latter have nothing better. From then on the widows can rest on these; they may "rise from the ground." The parasol tree branches are called beóngá (sing. boóngá), "dead, dry wood." The same root is also used with other prefixes: eóngá, pl. bióngá; loóngá, pl. mbóngá. The verbs used are áta, "to split, rend" or fanja, "to cut." Nowadays the severity of this custom is mitigated by the substitution of beánga, transportable wicker beds, for the beóngá.

The ceremony is accompanied by a few dances and a bit of beer. The head of the family addresses the widows as follows: "We have split beóngá for you; climb up on them." Then he presents them with a few hens, given by relatives of the deceased. The widows prepare them and eat them all.

In every case at least a few beéngo in addition to the 764 bombémbé and the bọtsá w'îlaká are always claimed. The latter payments can never be omitted. The belt is a payment made exclusively to the mother and by rights it goes to the mother's clan.

764 606 607 The higher the amount of these funeral payments, the more the son-in-law is welcome. The alliance is perfect. Therefore, not only will the wife's family reciprocate his fine feelings by adding a few more dogs, but in addition the son-in-law will be well received and successful in his application when, after the period of mourning, he brings the sum of the ibóleóko in order to obtain a substitute for the deceased. (2) In addition, if the relations with his in-laws have been excellent, he will easily obtain the substitute in advance, so that she can care for him during the entire mourning period.

764 689 There are severe sanctions against the omission of the funeral payments. [439] Neglecting to send the notification gift alone is enough to set these in motion. They are: the breaking off of the affinal relationship; the loss of the children, since the father's offense is equal to a repudiation; and finally molestation of the culprit by the spirit of the deceased. Thus at Bokátola (Bompela) one can find two boys, Botétsí and Ikembá, the children of Bonyongela of Ilángá and Etáka of Bokátola. They have now been incorporated into their mother's clan, because their father did not send a nsango. On stronger grounds the same is true for the whole nkunjí.

Article V. The Social Position of a Widow

768 587 In Chapter III, Articles II and IV, we have already noted that in the eyes of the Nkundó, the death of the husband does not dissolve a marriage. The union continues, and even after mourning it is not broken ipso facto. Even to have the woman taken and treated as a wife by another man is not enough to end it. As

2. See Chapter III, Article IV.

768 long as there has been no restitution of the bride price, the widow 587 continues to "belong" to the heirs of the deceased and to be their wife in the sense described in the chapter cited above, Article IX. The various forms in which this marriage can be continued post mortem have been described in Chapter III, Article II.

There we also saw that nothing prevents the widow from remarrying outside the inheriting family and therefore from becoming involved in a really new and different union. On the other hand, nothing obliges her to do so. She is entirely free. The only exception -- if this instance can be called an exception -- is a widow who is the object of a will, and a bosóló (Chapter III, Article II, in fine, and Article III). As to the latter, it is even difficult to consider her remarriage to the eldest son of the deceased as a limitation on her freedom. For although according to law it is obligatory, in practice it is voluntary and accompanied by guarantees of freedom that are adequate for ordinary cases. Indeed, it is known that she agrees [440] to this union. And she can always resort to divorce if later the heir disappoints her or if the continuation of the union becomes morally impossible.

It would be useless and tedious to repeat all that we have said on this subject in Chapter III. Let us simply reiterate that the distribution of widows should not be understood as a distribution of persons, depriving them of the freedom to be directed by their wills and their hearts, but rather as a distribution of the bride-price claims which they represent. The legal freedom to remarry remains as complete as it is when they are unmarried. This freedom may be subject to influences and even to real attacks, whose seriousness varies with the circumstances, but these are matters of fact and not of law.

If the widow considers herself -- or is considered -- too old for remarriage, or even if she desires to remain continent in faithfulness to her deceased husband, she may continue to reside with the clan of the deceased, instead of returning to her own family. The heirs usually do not oppose such an action and respect her wishes. If she has children or grandchildren there is no question about it; they are glad to keep their aged mother or grandmother near them.

768 584 She can also remain in her fiancé's family and there be taken in marriage by one of his kinsmen. If everything favors the continuation of the union, the new husband-to-be pays the bride price, but he need not repeat the engagement payments, which retain their validity. If he belongs to a distant branch of the family, however, the kin of the deceased will not want to give up their property, and the new fiancé himself will have to acquit himself of all the bride-price obligations, beginning with the ikulá.

[763] Sometimes the dying man, in making his last requests, enjoins his family to maintain the alliance. In that case one of his kinsman must marry the woman. If later on a breakup becomes inevitable, the spouses separate. For that matter, if the woman lacks the inclination to remarry in her fiancé's kin group, she will not be forced to do so.

This practice is based on the stipulation of Nkundó law that engaged persons have all the duties and privileges of married couples.

●[587] There is nothing among the Nkundó that resembles a levirate. Even in the case we cited of a last will, the obligation derives solely from the sacred nature of that will. [448]

Article IX

The Death of the Woman Before the Payment of the Bride Price

Two situations must be distinguished: 1) The woman dies during the engagement; 2) she dies before the bọsọ́ngọ.

1. Before the walo

As has already been said, engaged persons enjoy all the duties and privileges of a married couple. If the girl dies the fiancé must fulfill all obligations toward the deceased and her family (transporting the corpse, sacrifices, nkunjí). But his obligations do not end there.

Through the payment of the ndanga (and, in practice, already through the ikulá) he is considered responsible for any accident that might befall his fiancée in his home; and he has assumed the

768 legal importance. The solutions given are the same whether the 672 cause of death be organic or criminal. If the latter is the case, 682 however, the murderer must pay an indemnity, which is given to the person who has been wronged, whether it be the woman's husband or her family; in any case he thus satisfies the requirements of justice.

A woman may be murdered while she is visiting one of her husband's kinswomen in accordance with her husband's wishes. In that case the sister-in-law's husband bears the responsibility. He must indemnify the victim's husband, and he himself is entitled to indemnification by the murderer. To simplify this procedure, the murderer can make his payment directly to the widower; justice is still safeguarded. But in no case does the indemnity go to the victim's father, for legally and economically it belongs to the husband, not to the father, who is indemnified through the funeral payments. [461]

Conclusions

1) A marital union is broken by death only for the person who 581 dies. For the one who remains alive, the dissolution is completed 768 only after other procedures. If the husband dies the widow remains the wife of the heirs and is free only after restitution of the bride price has been made. At the death of the wife the husband can marry a substitute.

A widow's remarriage without restitution of the bride price
581 (and therefore without a new bride price), or that of a widower
587 with a substitute, is considered a continuation of a pre-existing 768 union which has not been dissolved. This continuation is not absolute, however, Actually, it is perfect only in the case of the husband's death, in which case his kin group inherits all his rights and therefore also the rights to the wives he has acquired by means of his capital. On the other hand, if a widower is to continue the relationship after his wife's death, he must pay another bride price.

The difference between the two instances is due to the connection of the bride price with the "ownership" of a woman; she remains subject to it and as a result becomes legally the spouse

768 of her husband's heirs after his death. Only her own death takes 581 all power away from the bride price, which then becomes a purely 587 material value.

That is why the Nkundó expression "continuation of marriage" is ambiguous. For a widower the marriage continues from the standpoint of ties between families. But from the legal point of view there is a new marriage, since he pays a new bride price for the substitute, and there is therefore an entirely new contract. Only for a widow does the marriage really continue, as long as there is no divorce between her and the deceased husband's heirs. The agreement retains all its validity in her person, whereas the husband's obligations are transferred to the heirs. There is only a change of the persons subject to the agreement, which is therefore in no way annulled. The question here is a substitution in the role of husband. [462]

The preceding should be understood as relating to the financial agreement or bride-price contract as we have explained in Chapter III, Article IX. For the conjugal pact or consent agreement is annulled by death, since an heir as well as a widow must interpose new acts in order effectively to become man and wife. What the Nkundó call the continuation of marriage is therefore only the continuation of the bride-price agreement between the families, and not of the conjugal pact between individuals.

It would be desirable to have a moralist thoroughly examine the philosophico-theological validity of the continuation of this marriage after the death of one of the parties. Personally I think that for the widow, and on condition that nothing else opposes it, it is valid. For consent is expressed by the man through the payment of the bekooli and by the woman through the act of accompanying the man as his wife.

2) From the economic standpoint, death does not change
768 the situation that existed during life. The various bride-price valuables remain in the hands of the respective parties. The difference between the consequences of death and those of divorce are therefore very clearly delineated, as was indicated in the Conclusion of Chapter VIII, Article III.

583 to an old, worn-out, gray-haired man, it naturally often occurred that when she arrived at maturity, she no longer wished to remain with him. She therefore left him and went to another, or back to her family. In the latter case, however, great difficulties arose concerning the return of the bride price. Indeed, with the bride price the father had received for his daughter, he bought himself another wife. This wife was then called the Nkita of the daughter. We could translate Nkita in this case as "substitute." The Nkita represented the value of the sold or married daughter. Meanwhile, the daughter herself was often the Nkita of the daughter or sister of her husband. Thus, many women were the Nkita of each other. According to their customs, the children (boys) were in theory the heirs of the Nkita of their mother. The Nkita was, in fact, the value or the bride price of their mother.

One might ask whether the wife was then always content that she was, so to speak, an object of trade. In general, yes, she was satisfied with this. This is how the customs were, and nobody gave a thought to changing them. Usually the wife simply found herself in an arranged situation (fait accompli). Gradually a certain sense of honor is coming into being among the Christian wives against these heathen customs.

If the woman desired that a large bride price or purchase price be paid for her, was it also because she wished to care for the future of her children who would be heirs of her bride price? No, they say, not for that reason -- for, they add, what woman knew in advance that she would have children, and moreover boys? There [163] are, in fact, many women who have no children. Also, [536] only 583 the boys are eligible for the inheritance; the girls are heirs only in 428 name. When it came to the inheritance, the children inherited the 587 Nkita of their mother only if there were no more brothers of the mother or uncles on their father's side. The mightiest always had the greatest right.

Usually a youth had to acquire a wife with the bride price or supplement of the bride price of his sister. The inheritance of the Nkita of his mother was only secondary. Still we often see a heathen wife leave her husband in order to go to another, without bothering much about her children who remain with the deserted husband, their father.

583 If the wife was content and if she insisted that a large bride price be paid for her, it was out of vanity and also to procure money for her family (father or brothers), and not out of concern for her children.

586 583 Divorce. When the wife left her husband to go back to her family, they had to give back the bride price they had received. In general this was a very difficult business, because the bride price was used by the father or the brother to obtain another wife for himself, the Nkita. Thus, in order to be able to return the bride price, they would have to sell this Nkita or give her back to her family and ask for the return of her bride price. There were few other ways to give back the bride price; all their property consisted of wives. Since the family usually could not or would not return the bride price, the deserted husband then sought to become the master of the mother or a sister of his runaway wife, whom he then kept as a hostage. Among the heathens, this was a commonly used expedient to retrieve the wife or the bride price. When the runaway wife discovered that her mother or sister was a prisoner of her former husband, she often went back out of sympathy for her mother or sister. When the wife had gone not to her family but to another man, which was often the case, the family urged this second husband to give the bride price to the first husband. This was usually the only practical means by which the difficulty was resolved. This second husband then paid the bride price to the first. Since the [537] bride price often had been only paid in part by the first one, he then paid the remaining portion to the family.

Sometimes, if there were no way to return the bride price, the woman was forced to go back to her deserted husband. To avoid unpleasant treatment, she had to feign submissiveness.

586 ●587 As soon as an agreement was arrived at, either with the family or with the second husband, over the return of the bride price, the first bond was considered broken. If the woman was with her family, she was considered free to enter into a new agreement. If, however, she was with another husband, then after the argument she was considered bound to that second husband. The primary bond of their agreement thus appears to be the bride price.

586 If the wife had children, these remained with their father, and the bride price was only partially returned. The value of the children was, so to speak, subtracted from the bride price.

567 Everywhere there were also abducted women and female
439 slaves; these were simply sold. Furthermore women were bought 562 and sold with women [as payment]. Also women who were inherited and no longer in the hands of their family were sold by their second, third, or other subsequent husband. In all of these cases, the family no longer came into consideration for the bride price. One would have to stretch the point in order to consider the sums paid in these cases as a bride price, and consequently as a native custom which one must respect.

Or one should have to assume that such a native woman re-562 mains a "bride" for her whole lifetime. It will be said that the 439 woman consented to her sale by one man to the other.

Often this was indeed the case, but not always by any means, [858] for children and slaves were also sold. Even the consent of the woman did not prevent it from being a sale; her consent was rather an extra transaction that simplified the sale of a human article of trade. It still remains woman trade.

764 The Inheritance. Upon the death of a polygynist, the burial ceremony was conducted according to the class and rank of the de-567 ceased. One or two or several [539] slaves were killed and buried with the polygynist in the same grave. Sometimes the arms and legs of those male and female slaves were broken, and then they were buried alive in the same grave with the body.

When these slaves still had family, it might happen that the family members, having learned of the unfortunate lot of their relative, would hasten from faraway districts to buy him or her free if it was not yet too late. Several Negroes have told us of those heart-breaking scenes at which they were present as children. The mourn-
[765] ing and the lamenting over the dead lasted from a week to a month.

768 The eldest son immediately succeeded his father in position
428 and immediately took one of the wives of his father.

The other sons divided among them the lances and knives of 587 their father.

If the deceased had left no son, or if he was still too young, the oldest brother succeeded the deceased. All of the wives had to remain in their own home, except the wife who was immediately taken by the eldest son. They were obliged to await the day of the distribution. This day was put off for from one to four months.

768 Meanwhile, these wives were subjected to a certain discipline. They 428 were called Bituka, which we translate here as "widow." During 587 this time they were allowed to speak with the relatives of the deceased, but they had to remain at home; it was not permitted for anyone to take these wives.

When the time came for the distribution, the one in charge, namely, the son or the brother of the deceased, called together the heirs and parties concerned. On the day of the distribution, in the morning before dawn, the bituka left their dwelling place and went to the man with whom they had already come to an agreement, so that by daybreak all the huts of the bituka stood empty. Each of the wives of the polygynist usually has her own hut. At the appointed hour, the meeting was announced by the usual beating of the tomtom. The wives, the heirs, and all parties concerned then came together.

If there were many wives to distribute, the order of distribution was as follows: in the first place the brothers of the deceased received their share; in the second [540] place came the sons; and in the third place, the grandsons, that is, the sons of the daughters who received their share from the Nkita of their mother. If at this time the wife did not want to go with the man for whom she was designated, she was sold to another. Sometimes the family of the wife was not satisfied with that, and if they could, they gave the bride price back in order thereby to free their daughter or sister. Such a wife then came back to her family, where, however, she was again married in return for another bride price. The family acted thus to prevent its daughter or sister from simply being sold. When the grandsons were still too young, their share of the Nkita of their mother went to their uncle, the son of the deceased. The latter had then to provide a wife for them later, which he usually never did without making a great deal of trouble. If the daughters had no sons who could inherit their Nkita, they received some of the father's personal property as inheritance: goats, dogs, lances, knives, proas, etc. If the deceased had left a daughter but no sons or brothers, the daughter had to supervise the distribution of the inheritance.

Our civilized idea that the wife, the mother of the family, is the first heir, is thus not taken into consideration there. Indeed, the wife, the mother herself, is inherited if she is not too old.

000 What is one to do if even in such cases it is taught, "One must respect" the native customs?

587 428 [184] The inheriting of wives existed everywhere; it was, in fact, the only wealth left behind by the native. The details of the distribution differed according to district or tribe. Thus, for instance, in some districts it was the eldest son who alone inherited all of the wives of his father. This was in order to preserve the rank and the class of the family. Prestige and power actually depended only on the number of wives that one possessed. In this case, however, this eldest son had, in place of his father, to provide a wife for his younger brothers and the sons of his sisters. As far as impediments [582] to marriage were concerned, generally they strictly observed the impediment of blood relationship; two blood relatives, even in a distant degree, should never enter into marriage, [541] with the exception of the irregularities mentioned above. As for relatives by marriage, these do not exist for them in any degree. There is, nevertheless, one case that somewhat resembles relationship by marriage, namely, the Nkita might never be in the home of a man together with the woman whose Nkita she was. Thus, the son-in-law or the brother-in-law might never take the Nkita of his wife into his home. If, however, the wife had left or died, there was no further impediment.

587 428 431 When, like the inheritance above, the family had returned the bride price and had then married the woman to another man, this second husband also had to give a gift to the one who, according to the law of inheritance, had the right to the wife. This gift was called a bampanga.

587 428 If the wife who was freed by the family had children, only a part of the bride price had to be returned. Sometimes the wife was freed completely through her children. The children then remained with the family of the deceased husband, and they then represented the value of the bride price of their mother. If, however, such a woman was married again by her family, they demanded a second bride price for that.

587 428 583 Sometimes a single woman was the Nkita of several other women. In the inheritance several people then had a right over her, and everyone demanded his share. For instance, a young man

587 428 583 had to acquire a wife with the bride price or with a supplement of the bride price of his sisters. Three of his sisters, for instance, were married, and he needed 3,000 mitako to pay for his intended wife. Now he went with presents to his three brothers-in-law and asked for 1,000 mitako from each of them. The bride price was already paid to the father; the 1,000 mitako that he asks are a supplement of the bride price.

With these 3,000 mitako, our young man pays for his wife. This wife now becomes the Nkita of the three sisters. If this young man dies, his three sisters and his three brothers-in-law all demand their share back from the widow. If she is sold, the price must be divided among the three brothers-in-law. If she remains in the family of her husband, with the uncle or brother, she continues to be the Nkita of her three sisters-in-law.

431 583 [542] There also exists a general rule and custom that the family which has received the bride price regularly give gifts to their daughter and son-in-law or sister and brother-in-law. These gifts consisted of goats, dogs (which also have a rather large value among the natives), ducks, etc., but the gifts never consisted of money. These gifts were in turn given by the son-in-law or brother-in-law to the one who had helped him pay the bride price.

For instance, if the young man of whom we just spoke received gifts from the family of his wife, he would then have given these gifts to his three brothers-in-law. These gifts were often so much that the value of them was almost equal to the bride price that the man had paid for his wife. Custom demanded, in such a case, that the man then pay a supplement to the bride price.

In case the bride price had to be given back, the gifts that the family had already given might be subtracted from the bride price. When such disputes are brought before a European, it is difficult for him to settle them, for the value is tremendously exaggerated by the parties. The husband will demand the return of a much larger bride price than he actually gave, while the family on its side will estimate the gifts that they had given as much higher than the actual value or amount.

436 Something about prices, the bride price for wives, and native money value.

Their first original money was as follows.

Chapter V. Obstacles to Marriage

M 582 There is no specific term in Lonkundo for an "obstacle to marriage." General terms are used, as in our European languages.

Our people make no distinction between obstacles which nullify a marriage and those which are prohibitive in nature. Therefore, we will simply speak of obstacles without making any distinctions among them.

Article I. "Race"

M P 582 563 The question of a diversity of races can be considered only with reference to the Batswá. Marriages with them are strictly forbidden. Nkundó rules of behavior are very strict with respect to relations between Baotó and Batswá. It is unheard of that opposite sexes of the two races should mingle, even for a simple conversation. There would then obviously be no question of marriage.

M P 563 588 Among the Bilángi, a Batswá tribe of the Injóló of the Salonga-Luilaka (who absolutely refuse to be called Batswá or Balúmbe), there have been two cases of such unions to my knowledge. Two Baotó women were involved, both, by a singular coincidence, from Lotángonda (Injóló, Engónjó). One was Njalí, daughter of Yole and sister of Lomúlú, the other Nsombola, sister of Limpema.

Njalí was taken in marriage by Bakao of Ikindatói. She wanted children desperately and, not having had any by her two successive Nkundó husbands, she ran away to the Bilángi in hopes of having better luck there. [242] She was not disappointed in her expectations. She gave birth to four sons: the eldest, Bonkono, who died some years ago; Bakao (Georges), who died in 1933; two sons, Bonkorú (Louis) and Joke (Henri), who are still alive. In 1933 the descent of the four numbered thirteen sons, six daughters, four grandsons, and one granddaughter. But there was never a legitimate marriage between Bakao and Njalí since no bride price was paid. And the descent have formed a small Bilángi clan, which is dependent on the grandmother's clan (Ilongó of Lotángonda).

P M 563 598 The second case is somewhat more recent. It occurred at the beginning of the European penetration of the area. During the general upheaval at that time, the natives of Bosáka village (Bilángi of Lingonju) took advantage of the absence of many adult men whom the soldiers had taken on an expedition against the Mbole. They were able to capture a woman named Nsombola and take her home with them. She loved one of the men of Bosáka, and after many years, he "purchased" her for the price of two slaves. She lived there happily until quite recently, when she was overcome with a desire to return to her own race. (She leaves no descendants.)

In this second instance, then, the Nkundó bowed to the woman's wishes and, in accepting a bride price for Nsombola, gave in to the inevitable. This example shows that they can be flexible in their customary requirements if the situation warrants it.

Nevertheless, there have been no admirers or imitators of these exceptional cases, and the opposition against unions between the two races remains firm. Mixtures are not desired. The position P M [851] which the hybrid family of Bakao occupies in the village of Lotángonda is highly significant. For it is an exception to the rule applicable to such cases, namely, that a child who has no legitimate father is incorporated into his mother's clan. The descendants of Bakao and Njalí are dependents of Lotángonda and are a part of it politically, but [243] they are not included in the kin group. For they have inherited a Bilángi nature from their father, and therefore, contrary to the logic usually applied, they have not become relatives of their ancestress. Here, too, the "racial principle" has prevailed against common law.

P M 563 588 595 Nor does one hear of temporary relationships or concubinage between them. I know only of one instance; its outcome was not happy, and it did not invite imitators. It happened around 1913. A certain polygamist, Lokóta of Bokeke (Bombwanja) fell in love with the wife of Bonkíngó, who at the present time is headman of Bosáola (Batswá of Ntómbá, Bombwanja). He became the laughing stock of the entire region, but because of his love, it did not deter him. In his own household, however, the situation was more serious. One of his wives (Ámbánsele) soon left him. The others refused him their bodies and prepared for divorce. Consequently, Lokóta was obliged to give up his unreasonable love, and in the end everything was set to rights. (1)

1. No children were born as a result of that relationship.

Instances of mixing have occurred because of colonization, outside the usual environment, between Batswá and members of tribes which are not acquainted with this race. At the Bokóma Mission there lives a Botswa woman of the Ekonda who was taken away by foreign soldiers and had two children by a Mbole man. These children are held in contempt by both the Baoto and the Batswá in the vicinity, and they will only be able to marry if they settle in their mother's clan.

In the veterans' village of Ingende there lives a Botswa of Bofilama (Bombwanja) who married an Urundi woman while he was a soldier in the war. She probably did not know her husband's race. They came to this region, and the marriage has proved to be excellent, and the wife has always remained deeply attached to her husband. Their five children are not treated with the slightest contempt. Their situation would undoubtedly [244] be different if they lived in truly native surroundings, where they would certainly be incorporated into the Batswá.

The introduction of the Batswá into the economic life of the Europeans and their training in it may favor, and result in, a mixing of the races. The wealth thus placed within their reach may serve to seduce some of the more lascivious or greedy Baoto women, particularly those who always hang about the centers, camps, and markets and in whom vice has extinguished all feelings of propriety and honesty. The danger increases when Batswá bachelors are hired as laborers for some purpose and sent far from home to do their work, especially if the proportion of married men in the group is insufficient.

This is not a description of an existing situation -- for the barrier between the two races is still impassable -- but of a possibility that is not out of the question, as an occurrence in 1932 would indicate. The

593 defended her husband. Finally, since they could not agree, Bompelɛ́
159 ordered his sister not to return to her husband, so that she could be 579 married to another man. For he had decided to test the valor of Bonyeme by making war on him, and she could not see her husband taken prisoner by her own brother. Nevertheless, Bolɔ́mbɔ́ remained determined and departed in haste. When she reached her husband she told him everything. In the meantime all the Boɛ́ndɛ́ and other Bombwanja clans were taking up arms. Enyukɛ́, for his part, passed the news on to all Bonkoso villages, as well as their relatives by marriage, dependents, and Batswá. The various groups of combatants stationed themselves near the village of Bonganda in what is today the forest of [41] Boóngónjou, between the Lomekɛ́ and the present location of Besombó, Lofelɛ́, and Engónjó. The Boɛ́ndɛ́ army was taken unawares by the Bonkoso, who attacked and after furious combat routed them, leaving a number of dead on the field. Bonyeme proposed a peace. He took pride in not being surpassed in generosity. With a truly princely munificence he was not satisfied with only paying all the clans who had lost members but in addition sent Bompelɛ́ all that the latter needed in order to compensate Bombwanja groups for the loss of their members and, on top of this, brought him a whole fortune to complete Bolɔ́mbɔ́'s bride price.

589 The Nkundó are well acquainted with cases of widows who,
587 having reached middle age, take a solemn oath not to remarry or ever go near a man again. Among the stronger sex such cases are almost nonexistent. Cases of women who, when sick and dying wanted to remain near their husbands, cited later (Chap. VI, Art. II, 4) should be noted here, as well as preferences for monogamy (Chap. VII, Art. VI, VII).

595 can state that most marriages contracted by the Nkundó are love matches. Marriage for political reasons or for certain material advantages have certainly existed. And especially at the present time, there are parents who push their children into marriage for the sake of financial or social gains.

Our conclusions may not be accepted by a number of colonials. Yet I feel they are valid in the limited sense indicated here. Arguments

846 ● [590] For a young unmarried mother, the meal is prepared by a girl who has not reached puberty or a woman who is quite old, that is, by someone who does not engage in sexual intercourse.

2) Various regulations. From the time of the preparation of the first meal until the end of the bokeka, that is, until the day the umbilical cord becomes detached, the hearth of the seclusion hut is sacred, so to speak. Apart from the couple and the assistants, no one may enjoy it or profit from it, either to light anything from it or eat anything that has been prepared there. However, some men have a means of lifting the prohibition pertaining to the fire. Upon the hearth and all the hearths of the village or a group of houses, depending on the situation, they let fall a few drops of a special concoction.

It is also forbidden to sweep or pick up the ashes from the fire. Everything must stay put until the umbilical cord of the newborn child becomes detached.

During the entire period of seclusion, the mother is assisted by a kinswoman (or one of her husband's kinswomen; among the Bombwanja there are always two), who is the wujisa, "the one who makes the seclusion" (from the verb uja). The seclusion should not be thought of as that of a hermit; the mother may go out as soon as her condition permits, and the helper goes about her occupations, but she does not do so more than necessary. Rather the hut is a house of prohibitions.

[834] During this period the mother and her helper do not do farm work. In addition they must abstain from carnal relations and from all contacts with the opposite sex, in conformity with the customs explained in Article II, 3, above. The ekelś extends to the husband and to any other person who enters the hut. Any infraction results in the death of the mother or the child in the same manner as in the case of the bokeka (see loc. cit) . [488]

[833] 3) The end of the bokeka. When, at the end of four or five days, the umbilical cord becomes detached, the news is announced to the whole village, so that everyone may go back to their work that has been suspended. The following night the father and mother perform the conjugal act to "destroy the bokeka and

583 searching for old disputes and old arguments about wives to get a wife.
604 And then they were still not always successful; their youth itself was against them here and robbed them constantly of the little that they 464 had saved for that purpose. The means for getting money, such as lances, knives, arm and foot bands, were extremely scarce. The Blacks do not know of workers or servants, and if one of those poor souls presented himself at the home of one who was better endowed by fortune and offered to chop wood for him, to lay out a manioc field, or to build a house for him, to gather straw and bamboo in the forest for that purpose, then the inborn laziness of the Negro would require long months to complete that work. As salary, the worker received only a few bakonga (copper arm of leg bands); these he already owed to the owner for having shown too much inclination for one or another of 589 his wives. The result of this was that many young men remained without a wife and that those who were favored by chance, that is to say, 595 had many children of the female sex in their family, each had several 562 wives. I consider this a primary cause of polygyny. The woman had a relatively high monetary value and represented capital. Thus, it did not happen that anyone gave his daughter or sister to another for nothing, just as among us it does not happen that a farmer gives his cow or horse to a poor devil for nothing.

583 If the father or brother sold a daughter born of the nkita of his 604 daughter or sister -- a right that general custom gave him and which usually occurred, since the children of the female sex were sold very 603 young and the boys, the rightful claimants or owners, in that case were still very young -- this was done in order to buy another wife. The rights of the children shifted then as follows:

584 woman sends them to her family. Distant relatives fulfill their obligations by bringing meat or fish, and nowadays also money or some small present, which is not included in the bride price.

The husband's gifts consist of a small knife and a few (5) arrows (at the time of the Independent State a bundle of copper wires called nngelo or mitako and at the present time 5 or 10 francs, for example). These presents from the husband are not bosambelo, for he does not give his fiancée his hand; they are yékola (greeting) and are not part of the bride price. The woman sends them to her parents.

591 If the husband does not yet have a house or cultivated fields of his own, [138] as was formerly often the case, (1) the engaged couple live in the hut of the parents for the time being. The woman obtains food from her mother-in-law's fields and prepares it at the hearth of the latter, until the young man has built his hut and established his own fields.

Nowadays it no longer happens that a young man who wants to take a wife still lacks his own house. From the time of puberty on, young men moved by the desire for freedom leave the parental home and build huts for themselves where they can live alone or with some companion or other and enjoy their freedom.

6. The life of the engaged couple

584 The bompáka lives in the home of her husband, goes there to talk to him and to sleep with him. During the first three or four days she does not work, unless she is a very active person. Subsequently she takes care of all the household tasks and prepares meals at the hearth under the supervision of her mother-in-law. Only after a few weeks, when she has become accustomed to her new way of living, is she introduced to the customs of her new family; only

583 584 [336] consists of a beautifully fashioned native knife, or a lance, or mitako [copper wire used as currency]. In some areas, it was the polygynist who attended the mother at the birth of the daughter. He had the wood gathered, water brought, and food prepared. If, then, the expected child was a boy, the security was usually returned, and the contract declared null and void. If, however, the one who had given the security was a village chief or a man of importance, then the father of the child tried to give him another daughter. The father had, for instance, at an earlier time given a daughter to another man of much less importance. In the above-mentioned case, he would give back the bride price received, take his daughter back, and give her to the polygynist from whom he expected a larger bride price.

583 Sometimes too the boy was taken by the polygynist and remained in his family until the father could trade a daughter for him.

583 [illegible] While very young and still a child, the little daughter was installed in the harem of the polygynist. She was brought up there, together with other children of her age and status; or rather, she grew up there in the midst of those heathen customs without any upbringing.

595 The composition of the harem of a polygamist:

The first wife was called the Bomatsa; she preceded all the other wives in rank, and in the absence of the polygynist, she was the mistress of the harem.

The second wife was called Ekila; she was the most loved and preceded all the remaining wives. She was also called Nkonda.

The third wife was called Bolumbu. At the appointment of the Bolumbu, a certain ceremony took place, and the wife was clothed with an animal skin. The Nku, a sort of patriarch and [202] magician, sometimes had three or four Bolumbu who served as messengers to other villages. In this capacity they had special [721] privileges. For instance, to attack a Bolumbu was a reason for declaring war.

[533] The remaining women were simply women of the harem, without distinction.

595 In the area of Monjoku, among the Bolee [Bole], the first wife was called Nkisa, with the same rank as Bomatsa. The second rather high and closes on an inner slide. Since nse-nse and ndele are lacking in this region, the framework of the huts is made of stakes and pieces of raffia, and the walls and roof are covered with raffia leaves plaited flat in the form of a mat.

The huts are built singly, a method which again reminds one of the customs of the Oshwe-Bumbuli region. The native does sometimes cover his hut with grass, but this is very rare.

In this region we also observed that in certain villages the huts 361 were arranged in family groupings and that each group had a spe- 592 cial area clearly set apart from the rest of the village. The 592 various huts of a single group are inside a fairly solid stake fence 351 from one and three-quarters to two meters high and sometimes covered with mats of raffia leaves. The doors of all the huts within an enclosure open toward the interior of the courtyard.

The whole forms the lupango. By counting the number of huts in 592 a lupango one may determine how many wives the chief or head of the place has, since each one has her own home. [52] The lupango are of recent introduction and are derived from Arab in- [177] fluence. One cannot take them into account in establishing relationships of kinship or ethnic affinity between the different peoples. There is no connection whatever between the lupango of the Bena Dibele-Kole region and the familial grouping of huts

[55] Chapter 3

The Native's Means of Subsistence

Animal husbandry: chickens, goats, dogs. -- Agriculture: manioc, maize, rice, bananas, peanuts. -- Hunting: weapons, snares, nkisi, individual method, communal hunting. -- Fishing: general method, dams, basket weirs, traps, harpoons, bows and arrows, cord nets, screens.

231 The peoples of the Congo-Kasai-Lake Leopold II region and of the Lukenie do very little animal husbandry. They possess no large animals. At most one may find a few chickens, rare goats, and some hunting dogs in their villages. The dogs get a share of the game and live as best they can the rest of the time.

No care whatever is given to the goats. They wander freely during the day and graze in the forest or plain. Sometimes they venture into the planted fields, from which the hunting dogs chase them at first sight. At night they return to the village and take shelter where they will. During our stay in the village of Toipolo, [485] they even came and disturbed us at night while we were lodged in the hut reserved for strangers.

235 The chickens wander around the village and planted areas during the day and sleep [56] at night in the native's hut, where they have their nest for laying eggs and a place to hatch them.

262 439 435 The native does not eat the eggs. He sells them to agents of the state or of commercial concerns, who collect them for hatching. The chicken itself is rarely eaten by the native. Most often it goes to the kitchens of the Europeans. In 1913-14 the average price of a chicken was half a franc, that of an egg, five centimes, and the price of a goat was from five to 15 francs.

595x The bomátsa takes her task to heart, for her husband's glory is her own as well. The bomátsa is conscious of her role in spite of the presence of a favorite, for it is less that of a wife in the sexual sense of the word than of a wife who is mother of the family. It is of a higher order than the roles of the other wives; it is more serious, more unselfish, and based on a deeper love and a more deliberate will. According to the native point of view, it is rightly the source of a legitimate pride; it is an honor, while the position of the favorite is closer to an object of vanity. Therefore the bomátsa likes to show her importance.

It may seem strange to us that the bomátsa puts her heart into working to increase the number of women in the harem. But this is altogether natural for the Nkundó. The growth of the harem is a source of glory, and she has been brought up to this attitude since her youth. After the first ardor, her affection becomes more serious. She becomes a perfect matron in the Roman manner. Although she continues her relations with her husband and takes care of her children, she is chiefly occupied with her duties as mistress of the whole family. Her husband loves her with a deeper and more reasoned emotion than he shows toward his other wives. Without cease he shows his consideration and attachment for her. If she is sterile it is very likely that he will give her a child belonging to his family or born of a wife who has left him, so that she can bring it up as if it were her own.

595x The bomátsa's house is located at the right end of the row
● 592 of wive's huts. She deserves this location because of her function as bomóngó loánjá, "owner, mistress of the polygamist's compound. The Nkundó say: ábéla loánjá, "she stretches, or extends, her husband's group of dwellings in order to enlarge it."

595x A polygamous husband undertakes nothing of importance without first consulting the bomátsa (be it the creation of a bolúmbú or a nkóndé, or the acquisition of new wives, etc.). He respects her and treats her with deference, as if she were his mother, our people say.

[789] The bomátsa is the only one of all the polygamist's wives who plays a part in the acceptance of the Nkundó offensive and defensive

595x [724] When a piece of game is divided, the bomátsa is entitled to the lintóla (the lower portion of the breast), which would go to the man's mother (or his father's or his elder brother's wife) were he a bachelor.

In the bomátsa's absence, her place is taken by her ebísa (see below, Article IV) or by the wife who follows her in seniority. At her death, the same rules govern her succession.

The name bomátsa is probably derived from the root mátsa, "to begin." She is the one who founds the family. Sometimes she is also called ikókóyõnjemba, literally "bachelor's love." The Bombwanja say itókóyõnjemba (the Ekondà, nkómukolo).

In addition to the bomátsa, reference is sometimes made to [344] bomátsa w'îáli, or "bomátsa of the left." The bomátsa in the strict sense of the term is contrasted to the latter as bomátsa w'îlóme ("of the right"). The bomátsa of the left is a polygamist's second wife. She is given this name because her house is at the left end of ● [592] the loánjá. She has no special rights or duties, however, unless the actual bomátsa delegates to her the task of looking after her end of the compound. If the harem is large, the husband may set aside [224] for her a special portion of the game, called itómbantóta, or nape of the neck. In her absence it goes to the eldest daughter.

Article II. The Favorite

595x 556 All polygamists of any importance have a favorite wife, or nkóndé. But only the rich and the notables have a true nkóndé. The minor polygamists, of course, imitate the others (nkóndé éâ weólí or éâ itsió, "without great importance"), but they do so without

595x at least, they use the name banyangɔ́, "mothers." Daughters use only the second term. (See Chapter VI, Article VI.)

A polygamist may have a house of his own, but he is often 592x 595 satisfied with a shed, where he spends his days when he is not called elsewhere by his pursuits; he eats his meals there, receives his guests, etc. This shed is called ingɔ́mba (or esamba), (1) exceptionally jɔ́já. The last term refers to the location of this "parlor," which is by itself in front of the row of wives' huts, sometimes in the middle of the street; in rare cases it is placed on the opposite side of the street, facing the women's huts.

Each woman has her own hut, consisting of a fairly large area, open in front, which serves as a kitchen, and a smaller room with a bed. Or she may have a kitchen in the form of a shed, and a separate house a slight distance away which serves as a bedroom.

The huts are placed in a row stretching around both sides of the husband's house, if he has one. The nkɔ́nde's house is right next to the husband's or behind his shed. The bomátsa's is at the far left, and so on. The bolɔ́mbɔ has no special place. The ebísa's hut is next to her relative's.

Some polygamists are beginning to build double houses. On each side of a common kitchen there are the bedrooms of two women under the same roof. This has been done by Bokwála, the present chief of the Boángɛ at Bokála (2). In each double hut he has placed one elderly woman and a younger one. Thus, he explained to me [359] one day, the old ones watch over the young ones, and as a result there are fewer instances of adultery.

595x A husband has obligations toward all his wives. He must bring firewood to each and take care that each one has her land to

2. Since deceased.

614 He represents the A-group in the council of elders of the village and of the other large units. Since no members of ~~the~~ group [672] are considered capable of conducting affairs, all the legal transactions which they undertake are treated as though they had been sanctioned by the patriarch. To a large extent the members of the group may represent one another. In the absence of the elder, a younger member may act as the representative of the [623] group at council meetings. When the senior member dies, his function will be taken over by the next oldest member of the group.

614 An A-group will split up only through internal conflicts
602 which cannot be bridged or through a large population increase.
The newly-formed A-groups continue to maintain a close relationship which, at first, is much closer than among the B-groups whose A-groups have split much earlier. In the higher ranks cohesion after the split diminishes only gradually; thus many gradations develop in the feeling of cohesion. These gradations could not be even approximately reproduced in a diagram with any degree of exactitude. There is no formula by which the split takes place, as there is, for example, among the Tallensi (13) where it is determined by a certain number of generations.
614 Theoretically the A-groups are "eternal." The A-groups are 596 subdivided into small families. Within the polygynous families
592 nuclear families [Familienkerne] (14) have a ~~semi-~~independent position economically. Each wife has her own house. A husband's wives and the wives of his sons have their houses within the same homestead. As the master of the homestead, the father has an open shelter where the men spend their time and [768] hold their meetings. Upon the death of the master of the

614 596 592 [768] homestead, it is deserted by the inhabitants. On the new dwelling site the sons each build their own shelter. In contrast to the groups of the type A-E, the group living within a homestead is finite: its existence ends with the father's death. Only a man whose father (in the European meaning of the term) has died may have a shelter. Thus the homestead community is interposed between the A-group and the small family.

To sum up the characteristic features of the A-groups:

614 Membership determined by male descent; unity of legal power, especially insofar as landed property and inheritance law is concerned the senior has full power; succession by simple seniority; theoretically unlimited existence of the group. The A-groups consist of small families who live together in homesteads under one father in each case.

Groups of Rank B

614 793 There is usually a friendly, neighborly relationship between the A-groups which form part of a B-group. People assist each other to a large extent, and there is joint consultation on most matters. Group B has only one Nkúmú ilọki, "master of the hidden power," the priest of the kinship group, who is consulted by all the members of the group. He functions during the magical preparations for the hunt; he is consulted before any important undertaking. During the leave-taking ceremony after a burial, he converses with the deceased, and people turn to him when the ancestors have appeared to them in their dreams to transmit their desires, orders, or other information to the living. He protects the people of his group from the ill will, ndọki, of the dead and the living. The priest of the kinship group is used as the criterion [194] to determine which group of homogeneous A-groups represents a B-group. The priest of the kinship group is descended from a certain one of the related A-groups.

614 554 There is a difference in rank among the A-groups of a B-group -- one group will be regarded as older -- but this is

000 the same rights as the other children of the polygynist.

595 The polygynist always sought to increase the number of his wives, for his prestige rose and his fortune increased in that manner.
556 If anyone in civilized lands seeks to enlarge his fortune, this is 593 done, people say, in order to insure the future of his children. The native thinks little about that; his primary idea is to enjoy himself and to surpass others in prestige and esteem. As far as the future of his children is concerned, there are polygynists who possess twenty or thirty wives or even more, and sometimes they have only one or two children. Also it is little in keeping with their notions to care for the future; he who is still alive tomorrow must take care of 595 tomorrow then, so they reason. On the contrary, instead of caring for his children, the polygynist often took great trouble to obtain a 593 wife for his son. The son, however, was not yet the owner of his 584 wife; it was, so to speak, only a loan. Not until after the death of 606 his father did he become owner. In some districts, when the father had obtained a wife for his son, he first kept this wife for some time for himself. Only after a few months did he give her to his son. In 595 other districts, when the wife was pregnant by the son, he was obliged
593 to send her for a few days to his father. He was not allowed to bear
606 the honor of fatherhood alone; his father must share that with him.
842 The father reserved for himself the honor of naming all of the chil-
551 dren of his children. In some areas of the Congo, morals were so 835 low and common that the father even kept his own daughters in his harem. This did not occur in Equatorial Africa, but there was a custom that was not much better. The magician was sometimes 583 consulted about the bride price which the father tried to get for his
791 daughter, or the brother for his sister.

The magician then gave them the advice that they themselves should first have relations with their own daughter or sister. This custom existed almost everywhere in Equatorial Africa.

583 [535] Bride Price. In general, the daughter was given in marriage upon payment of a bride price. The father had little choice of the future husband of his daughter. The one who guaranteed the most goods in payment was certain to get her. Since, in most cases, the little daughter had not yet arrived at the years of maturity, there was naturally no question of her consent. The bride price was not paid all at once, but gradually during the years while the daughter grew up. Since the daughter was given without her consent

586 man of the same village, this was called Bonsamba. When she had such relations with a man of another village, this was called Isoke. As we have observed, the ordinary wives of the harem often had such relations. When the woman eloped with her bonsamba or isoke, or with whomever it was, she was pursued by her husband or owner, who tried to get her back. If the wife refused, negotiations over the bride price began.

If an agreement was reached or if a pledge was given as guarantee for the payment, the first bond was considered broken, and the woman was considered bound to this second man, even though he had been her bonsamba or isoke.

It might also happen that the first husband was so jealous that he did not want to make any agreement; then he attempted to kill either the guilty wife or her second husband. If the woman became
● 593 ill at the home of her husband, he went to tell her family and had to 758 give a security to the family.

583 Often the family came to get the wife, in order to be able to care for her better. If, in such a case, the wife [538] died at the home of her family, there were no further difficulties about the bride price, according to their customs. If, however, the bride price had still not been completely paid, the family asked their son-in-law to pay the remainder.

583 In recent times, now that the heathen customs have been
178 undermined by the European occupation, we see that the husbands whose wives have gone to their family when sick and have died there, demand the return of the bride price from the family, but this is completely contrary to their old customs. In one case the husband could demand the return of the bride price, namely, if the wife had left while healthy to go to her family and had died there.

562 Buying or Trading of Women. The woman was also in many 439 cases an acknowledged object of trade. The great village chiefs, among others Ibuka and Yoma, of whom we shall speak further, carried on a sort of woman trade. With European articles and also native currency, they went to other districts of the Equator [Province] to buy women with them, just like someone who goes to market, even though no public markets where women were sold actually existed.

621 have seen them as money transactions. We have obtruded our point 613 of view and destroyed the whole legal system of the natives. It is through our materialization of those securities that we have lowered the native woman to a plaything of money and a piece of merchandise.

576 As for the two outgrowths of the native system, divorce and polyg-586 amy, neither is inherent in the legal system as such. They are only abuses which have taken root and which clash with the principles of the native law itself. By its nature, native marriage is also indissoluble, and polygamy has only been able to exist through a popular confusion between paternal and marital law.

4. Legal Power in the Clan

613 In Nkundo society all individuals do not have equal rights or powers, 627 as in the Napoleonic law books, /154/ but the natural rights concerning people are still completely recognized. All value and power comes from God, through the ancestors. Those who are nearest to God are thus the highest in position, his first representatives. There is no question of absolutism or despotism. Just as the blood is divided among all clan members in a descending line, so also are authority and legal power. They are one as a legal entity in relation to the outside world; nevertheless, each member takes part and has a vote in the internal administration of justice, so that, when clan interests are discussed and dealt with, each member may sit in the place accorded to him and take part in decisions. In a legal sense there is, therefore, no question of a separate family council, which would assist the clan leader, but all decisions are made communally.

594 A single exception to this does exist, namely, that which gives the 627 head of the nuclear family legal power over his wife and children, and then only with the acknowledgment and approval of the clan. Differences between autonomous clans are settled by the clans involved, a sort of international court of law where friendly clans may also be brought in as arbiters.

627 Such an arrangement made the court absolutely "paternal." The whole procedure was one of a reconciliatory character, which resorted to coercive measures only when necessary, and did its utmost to save the honor and the welfare of the involved clans, and to compensate for, to restore, and to prevent further offenses.

583 unjust in itself, it certainly becomes so if it is considered a penalty
584 inflicted for the rupture. For the indemnity is restricted to the man,
174 whether or not he is in the wrong. Furthermore, to accept an indemnity
177 even when the engagement is broken because of the woman tends to favor frauds and real swindles on the part of the woman and her parents, in short a kind of traffic in women.

[585] [174] It is also evident that the rich (polygamists) suffer much less from the innovation than do monogamous men, especially those who adopt monogamy as a principle and more especially the Christians, who do not condone divorce. Thus I am of the opinion that the desire to defend polygamy against the doctrine of the missionaries is not entirely unrelated to the transformation of this custom.

If the breaking of the engagement is due to wrongs, the new custom could perhaps be tolerated, though it is not without serious dangers, but the indemnity should be imposed exclusively on the party at fault. Furthermore, the wrongs would have to be serious, and on the other hand, the indemnity would have to be, not in the nature of a forfeit, but of a payment of damages commensurate with the extent of the damage suffered and the seriousness of the wrong. And here those cases should especially be considered where the breaking of the engagement is accompanied by proceedings of a vexatious and insulting nature. And though it is a very delicate task to evaluate all these elements, we must not forget to take them into account.

It seems to me that the ancient law must still be maintained when the engagement is broken simply because of a change of feelings for which neither party is to blame, if such a case occurs. For it is better not to innovate than to innovate too fast. [128]

Article IV. Walo -- Bombuluku

583 The walo or bombuluku is the bulk of the bride price paid for a marriage. Between the payment of the ndanga and that of the walo, 583ˣ payment of the bride price with the boséngo as he was committed to do through the payment of the ikulɛ and the ndanga. If he does not, the bond between him and his father-in-law is automatically broken, and consequently he is unable to obtain another wife to replace the deceased, and he loses the rights over one of his own daughters. Actually, we will have to come back to this question in Chapter IX, Article IX, 2.

These rules show how great a difference exists between the walo and the boséngo; in the one case, upon the death of the woman prior to the payment, an indemnity is imposed for a transgression in the eyes of the law; in the other, there is a transaction to stabilize the financial rights of the clans involved.

From all the above considerations we may conclude that because of the special nature of the payment, the boséngo is very important for the stability of the marriage and the social position of the woman's clan. But from a legal point of view it is far less important than the walo, through which a woman becomes truly [164] a wife; for the payment creates no new social relationship either between the spouses or between the husband and his in-laws.

Article X. Purpose of the Bride Price

607 Theoretically, the bride price is meant to procure a wife for one of the members of the family that has received it.

The woman who is married thanks to the bride price paid for another is called the latter's nkita. It seems to me that this word is etymologically related to nkitó, "profit, benefit" (the verb is -kitola). In the final analysis, both words may be derived from the root -kit, "to become."

[164] A synonym of nkita is bongíli (bongíji): it is used primarily by the Injóló but it is also known, though seldom employed, by the other tribes.

The woman whose bride price has served to procure the nkita is the latter's nkóló (literally, "mistress"). The Injóló as well as the [illegible] Bosángɛ also call her by the more tactful name, nyangóngíji, "mother 583^ of the bongíji." (1)

●[595]

1. This term also designates the wife of a polygamist who has brought along one of her relatives as co-wife; she is the nyangôngili [sic] of the latter. (See Chapter VII, Article IV.)

For "to obtain a nkita" the Nkundő say -umba nkita, literally, "to fell a nkita," as one fells a tree or an adversary. Or they may say -bɛ̂ta nkita, "to possess a nkita" (umba or bɛ̂ta so-and-so, la nkita). "To become a nkita" would be rendered as -kwɛ nkita, "to fall into being a nkita."

583x
596 The hierarchy of those entitled to the bride price is based on the general hierarchy of family members, which gives precedence to the older generations and, within each generation, to the older members. Consequently, as long as a member of the family having the title of isɛ (father) is unmarried (unless he is physically or mentally incompetent), no bǒna (son) is entitled to a bride price, even if it is that of his own sister. Within the same generation, the older members have precedence over the [165] younger ones, but boys have priority rights to the bride price of their uterine sisters. (1)

1. For limitations and exceptions to this right, see Chapter IV, Article II.

It occurs quite often, and was even more frequent in the past, that the person entitled to the bride price is still too young to get married, either in reality or in the opinion of his "fathers." (2) The bride price is consequently used for the benefit of another member of the family. The creditor reaps the benefits later in the form of inheritance.

2. See ibid.

[602] Even if the woman or women meant for him should die or be taken in slavery, he can obtain the bride price of a cousin to which 586x on his own authority, for the offense was considered very serious.

[584 We can assume that the reason for this rule was to allow time for [567] the woman's family to intervene and keep their daughter from becoming a slave by refunding the bride price paid for her.

c) In exceptional instances an exasperated husband resorted to the immolation of his wife when someone died. People cite the case of Bengóngó of Bongilá (Besombó, Bombwanja), who had his wife, Litúli of Bontole, decapitated at the ikweí at the death of his father, Bengóngó byá Yese.

If the woman had children old enough to intervene on her behalf, her husband could be prevented from carrying out his violent intentions. The proverb says, Mbótsi ntáwáká, "a mother
● [595] a co-wife (ebísa) who was her sister or other close relative -- either out of a feeling of shame, [385] or out of fear of undesirable repercussions. Sometimes, when a husband was caught between his wish to use the etáka and his shame or his fear of the ebísa, he hid
[607] the wife who was confined by this fork. Preferably, he asked a brother-in-law to give her hospitality. In that way he got around the difficulty to a great extent, because through the law of exogamy such an arrangement placed the wife in another village, sometimes a considerable distance away. This practice was called isángyá; tómba walí isángyá.

586x also place his wife in the hands of the ndonga. However, it was a 584 very unusual thing to do. The natives maintain that such action was due to a lack of affection for the wife, together with the husband's certainty that he could recover his valuables -- either because he was assured that his father-in-law was well disposed toward him (and would reimburse him or provide a replacement), or because he knew he could use the ikákelo.

As we have said, direct repudiation was extremely rare. Here we are not speaking of repudiation caused by a wife's incorrigible misconduct -- which we have just discussed -- but of repudiation against the wife's wishes. If it did occur the husband was expected to hand her over to the ndonga, and the latter, seeing 421 613 have seen them as money transactions. We have obtruded our point of view and destroyed the whole legal system of the natives. It is through our materialization of those securities that we have lowered the native woman to a plaything of money and a piece of merchandise.

586 595 As for the two outgrowths of the native system, divorce and polygamy, neither is inherent in the legal system as such. They are only abuses which have taken root and which clash with the principles of the native law itself. By its nature, native marriage is also indissoluble, and polygamy has only been able to exist through a popular confusion between paternal and marital law.

4. Legal Power in the Clan

613 627 In Nkundo society all individuals do not have equal rights or powers, as in the Napoleonic law books, /154/ but the natural rights concerning people are still completely recognized. All value and power comes from God, through the ancestors. Those who are nearest to God are thus the highest in position, his first representatives. There is no question of absolutism or despotism. Just as the blood is divided among all clan members in a descending line, so also are authority and legal power. They are one as a legal entity in relation to the outside world; nevertheless, each member takes part and has a vote in the internal administration of justice, so that, when clan interests are discussed and dealt with, each member may sit in the place accorded to him and take part in decisions. In a legal sense there is, therefore, no question of a separate family council, which would assist the clan leader, but all decisions are made communally.

594 627 A single exception to this does exist, namely, that which gives the head of the nuclear family legal power over his wife and children, and then only with the acknowledgment and approval of the clan. Differences between autonomous clans are settled by the clans involved, a sort of international court of law where friendly clans may also be brought in as arbiters.

627 Such an arrangement made the court absolutely "paternal." The whole procedure was one of a reconciliatory character, which resorted to coercive measures only when necessary, and did its utmost to save the honor and the welfare of the involved clans, and to compensate for, to restore, and to prevent further offenses.

583 searching for old disputes and old arguments about wives to get a wife.
604 And then they were still not always successful; their youth itself was against them here and robbed them constantly of the little that they 464 had saved for that purpose. The means for getting money, such as lances, knives, arm and foot bands, were extremely scarce. The Blacks do not know of workers or servants, and if one of those poor souls presented himself at the home of one who was better endowed by fortune and offered to chop wood for him, to lay out a manioc field, or to build a house for him, to gather straw and bamboo in the forest for that purpose, then the inborn laziness of the Negro would require long months to complete that work. As salary, the worker received only a few bakonga (copper arm of leg bands); these he already owed to the owner for having shown too much inclination for one or another of his wives. The result of this was that many young men remained with-589 out a wife and that those who were favored by chance, that is to say, ●595 had many children of the female sex in their family, each had several 562 wives. I consider this a primary cause of polygyny. The woman had a relatively high monetary value and represented capital. Thus, it did not happen that anyone gave his daughter or sister to another for nothing, just as among us it does not happen that a farmer gives his cow or horse to a poor devil for nothing.

583 If the father or brother sold a daughter born of the nkita of his 604 daughter or sister -- a right that general custom gave him and which 603 usually occurred, since the children of the female sex were sold very young and the boys, the rightful claimants or owners, in that case were still very young -- this was done in order to buy another wife. The rights of the children shifted then as follows:
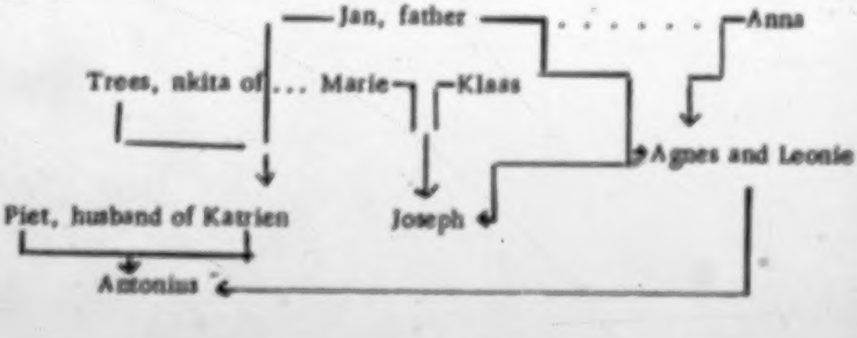
[338]



583 584 [836] consists of a beautifully fashioned native knife, or a lance, or mitako [copper wire used as currency]. In some areas, it was the polygynist who attended the mother at the birth of the daughter. He had the wood gathered, water brought, and food prepared. If, then, the expected child was a boy, the security was usually returned, and the contract declared null and void. If, however, the one who had given the security was a village chief or a man of importance, then the father of the child tried to give him another daughter. The father had, for instance, at an earlier time given a daughter to another man of much less importance. In the above-mentioned case, he would give back the bride price received, take his daughter back, and give her to the polygynist from whom he expected a larger bride price.

583 Sometimes too the boy was taken by the polygynist and remained in his family until the father could trade a daughter for him.

583 591 While very young and still a child, the little daughter was installed in the harem of the polygynist. She was brought up there, together with other children of her age and status; or rather, she grew up there in the midst of those heathen customs without any upbringing.

●595 The composition of the harem of a polygamist:

The first wife was called the Bomatsa; she preceded all the other wives in rank, and in the absence of the polygynist, she was the mistress of the harem.

The second wife was called Ekila; she was the most loved and preceded all the remaining wives. She was also called Nkonda.

The third wife was called Bolumbu. At the appointment of the Bolumbu, a certain ceremony took place, and the wife was clothed with an animal skin. The Nku, a sort of patriarch and [202] magician, sometimes had three or four Bolumbu who served as messengers to other villages. In this capacity they had special [721] privileges. For instance, to attack a Bolumbu was a reason for declaring war.

[533] The remaining women were simply women of the harem, without distinction.

595 In the area of Monjoku, among the Bolee [Bole], the first wife was called Nkisa, with the same rank as Bomatsa. The second

595 wife was called Lonkata. This was, however, more a category, for there were sometimes four Lonkata in a harem. The rest were ordinary wives. Among the Ekonda, the first wife was called Nkumokolo, just like the Bomatsa. The second wife was called Ekila or Nkonde. The remaining wives were the ordinary wives of the harem.

595 484 The first wife, Bomatsa, always remained at home and never left the harem. The second, Ekila or Nkonde, accompanied the polygynist everywhere; she was at his side on all his trips. The Bolumbu usually went completely alone to do errands in other villages.

595 These old customs of priority among the wives are now gradually beginning to disappear.

684 It was forbidden under severe penalty to have relations with the first, second, or third wife of the polygynist. The penalties were death, slavery, or a large fine.

This was their law concerning adultery, enforced with severe punishment.

595 837 The ordinary wives of the harem were less strictly guarded. This often depended on the jealousy or indifference of the polygynist. Anyone who had relations with these wives had to pay a fine, or rather, a price of prostitution. Since the wives were almost all in the possession of the polygynists, there were naturally many men without a wife. These, then, often had relations with the ordinary wives of the polygynists. Also, the sons of the polygynist had relations with them; the polygynit himself sometimes even had relations with the ordinary wives of his neighbor. This was the bad consequence and the immorality of polygyny.

595 586 It is easy to understand that the ordinary wives of the polygynist, having relations with others, often left their husband, or rather, their master in order to go to another. The ordinary wives constituted the largest number. It is because of this that one now finds many women who have had three or four, sometimes even seven, different husbands in succession. Among some tribes, [534] the Ekonda among them, they were stricter: a wife who had already left her husband or master two or more times was considered to have little worth.

567 595 The female slaves who were taken in war were given by the polygynist to his male slaves as wives. They could also be installed in the harem among the ordinary wives. Their children could have the same rights as the other children of the polygynist

000 the same rights as the other children of the polygynist.

● 595 The polygynist always sought to increase the number of his
556 wives, for his prestige rose and his fortune increased in that manner.
593 If anyone in civilized lands seeks to enlarge his fortune, this is done, people say, in order to insure the future of his children. The native thinks little about that; his primary idea is to enjoy himself and to surpass others in prestige and esteem. As far as the future of his children is concerned, there are polygynists who possess twenty or thirty wives or even more, and sometimes they have only one or two children. Also it is little in keeping with their notions to care for the future; he who is still alive tomorrow must take care of 595 tomorrow then, so they reason. On the contrary, instead of caring for his children, the polygynist often took great trouble to obtain a 593 wife for his son. The son, however, was not yet the owner of his 584 wife; it was, so to speak, only a loan. Not until after the death of 606 his father did he become owner. In some districts, when the father had obtained a wife for his son, he first kept this wife for some time for himself. Only after a few months did he give her to his son. In 595 other districts, when the wife was pregnant by the son, he was obliged
593 to send her for a few days to his father. He was not allowed to bear
606 the honor of fatherhood alone; his father must share that with him.
842 The father reserved for himself the honor of naming all of the chil-
551 dren of his children. In some areas of the Congo, morals were so 835 low and common that the father even kept his own daughters in his harem. This did not occur in Equatorial Africa, but there was a custom that was not much better. The magician was sometimes 583 consulted about the bride price which the father tried to get for his
791 daughter, or the brother for his sister.

The magician then gave them the advice that they themselves should first have relations with their own daughter or sister. This custom existed almost everywhere in Equatorial Africa.

[535] Bride Price. In general, the daughter was given in 583 marriage upon payment of a bride price. The father had little choice of the future husband of his daughter. The one who guaranteed the most goods in payment was certain to get her. Since, in most cases, the little daughter had not yet arrived at the years of maturity, there was naturally no question of her consent. The bride price was not paid all at once, but gradually during the years while the daughter grew up. Since the daughter was given without her consent

000 [547] Unfortunately the system was not continued. Also, it must not be said that it would be unjust to lower the price of the women. Rather, injustice would thus be redressed, a degenerate custom be improved. Through the present system, ever more injustice is committed and suffered.

583 595 A few polygynists would suffer some material loss through the lowering of the price of the women, namely, by receiving less for one woman than they (sometimes) paid for them, for they inherited most of the women. But they are also the ones who are responsible for the irregular situation. In a large part of the district, the polygynists are by far the minority of the population. They are the ones who are hostile to the Colonial Administration. They are in possession of the women and have a monopoly on them. They fix prices which a young man can almost never pay, namely, two nkesi at least.

583 The difficulties for Christian marriages become daily still more difficult. This is true for the marriages already entered into and for the future marriages.

583 428 426 [465 511] The bride price to be paid for the wife ought to be such that every young man can pay that sum with his own money, with the money that he has earned himself by his work. This sum cannot be high, for the ordinary working man in the Congo, who makes up the large part of the population, does not earn much more than what he needs for board and clothing. Therefore to pay an excessively large sum as a bride price forces him to borrow and to run up debts among his relatives and friends. The result of this is that the system of the Nkita goes over unnoticed into the Christian marriages, and the woman remains an object for inheritance. Indeed, when the man dies the creditors will come, namely, those who have loaned him money -- and demand the wife. The disputes over the bride price then begin anew, and they will again give the wife in marriage in return for a new bride price. Thus, there is no end to it. The wife, the mother, will never achieve any rights but will always remain an object of inheritance. There has been talk about declaring the widow free at the death of her husband in order to prevent the inheriting of wives, but how will it be possible to [548] achieve that if the bride price is not lessened, considerably lessened? When a

624 thus, Nsono is a very prominent figure. Still arrayed as previously described, she sits outside the nongo near the road on the special stool of the nkumu. Nobody may pass her with food, a humane law, considering that she must spend the day fasting. If anyone attempts to do so she catches the unlucky individual, helps herself to as much of his food as she wants, the victim meanwhile begging her to be merciful and leave him a small portion, and the booty is taken into the ipana. During this sentinel duty Nsono must still keep the parrot's feather in her mouth and maintain silence, so, in case she catches an unsuspecting bearer of food, the remonstrance and argument are all one-sided.[1] After the first day Nsono no longer sits outside the nongo but goes from place to place in the village, choosing spots where people may least expect her, hoping thus to reap a bigger harvest for her pains. This is kept up for eight days, which comprise two Tumba 'weeks' of three days' work and one of rest. The rest-day is appropriately named beina bo nsono after the duty of Nsono of sitting doing nothing day by day. The eight days of this ceremony over, Nsono lays aside her gourd and plantain stalk, which are placed at the foot of the first central supporting post [302] of the ebanga on entering. She is given a fresh coating of chalk and three coloured stripes are drawn the length of her back and down her arms. She still remains close to the nkumu.

624 Mpenge is the name taken by the wife first married by the nkumu. From henceforth she no longer accompanies her husband, and their cohabitation ceases unless the
● 595 nkumu is willing to pay her each time the sum of one hundred rods. But the nkumu is obliged to eat all food she cooks for him even though they have a quarrel. Mpenge does not honour her husband with the special greeting accorded to nkumu, but greets her husband and all other nkumu as she would ordinary people.[2] The second wife of an nkumu must assume the name of Iyombo Anganda, but no importance attaches to her position.

624 Among the Tumba generally, apart from the Bonginda, a woman is chosen from 516 the molembe to bear the title Bolumbu Itina i Ekopo (Bolumbu, the 'raison d'être' of the ekopo). She is, it would seem, a symbolical figure, a reminder that the ekopo owes its existence to the molembe of which this woman becomes the titular head. While the nkumu is still in seclusion the chosen woman is taken to the open space between the ipana and the row of sons' houses, known as the nsanda. Here, in the presence of the assembled crowd she is praised by being addressed, 'Bolumbu Itina, bototo!' and the crowd exclaims, 'Bwoo!'[3] Strips of leopard skin, about eighteen

[845] [1] It is interesting to note that there are some exceptions to those who may be caught and robbed by Nsono during her eight days of watching. No member of the molembe may be thus treated, twins and their parents are exempt, and also all children born to the nkumu before he attains office, these being termed [illegible].

121 to present anything we have not thoroughly investigated. We have not stepped outside the geographic limits set forth except for a few incidental remarks. Although the cultural uniformity of the Nkundó-Móngo is remarkable it is not, of course, absolute. And if we have used the title Mariage des Nkundó (Marriage among the Nkundu), we have done so because it was difficult to find one which would be more appropriate for the geographic and ethnic limits of [14] this study. It is very likely that in most cases our data are valid beyond the limits we have laid out, but to generalize upon it before making a thorough study of each group would be contrary to all scientific method. The reader is therefore earnestly requested to take these remarks into account and to abstain from giving our conclusions too broad a scope.

Familial institutions in themselves and in their totality are outside the scope of this book. But since they are based on marriage, they have an important place within our framework. We must necessarily touch upon them, but we will limit our excursions into that realm to what is required to make the general description intelligible. On the other hand, the study of marriage throws a good deal of light on familial institutions.

128 596 614 The words "family," "clan," "group," etc. recur frequently. The family is an entity smaller than the clan, and the latter is subordinate to the group. Since it is very difficult to give a precise definition, however, we have taken the trouble to make a clear distinction only when necessary. (1) [Editor's Note: Elsewhere we use them more as generic terms or even as synonyms. In order to make family relationships and the expressions used by the Nkundó to designate them more comprehensible, we are attaching an example of a genealogical table.]

113 I know of the following previous studies on the same subject:

Engels, "Les Wangata," Revue Congolaise, 1910, which also deals with marriage.

G. Kaptein, "Familieleven en -zeden bij de Inboorlingen van den Evenaar," Congo, 1922, Vol. 1, p. 531. [15] This study covers

593x sides with his family against his wife does not have the approval of 578 those who judge the conflict simply as neutral spectators. In such a case it is usually felt that the couple do not love each other very much. And often the marriage soon breaks up. But if the union is maintained nevertheless, its continuation is generally attributed to a fear of the consequences of dissolving the marriage, which would be even worse. The same sort of variation among individuals is to be found in the matter of a wife's devotion to the interests of her husband's family.

593x It is not possible to compare a native household to the 596 households of good simple people at home, where [40] the family is composed solely of parents and their children. Here it extends further; the husband's interests are also those of his parents, brothers, uncles, etc. As we will see in connection with marriage by inheritance it is not unusual for a woman to remain attached to her deceased husband's family. Others are more interested in enriching their own families.

593x The following is a historical instance of a wife who was very 159 devoted to her husband's interests, though there seemed to be room
579 in her make-up for pride and personal glory. (1): Bolɔ́mbɔ́ wǎ nsánjí, daughter of Bo̲ko̲mbe̲ of Litɔ́li (Bombwanja), was married to Bo̲nye̲me̲ w'ɛ̌nyukɛ́ of Bonganda (Bonkoso). One day (her father having died in the meantime) she went back to visit her brother, Bo̲mpe̲lí w'ě̲lo̲mbo̲, who had left Litɔ́li to settle in his maternal village, Etɔ́o of the Boɛ́ndɛ́. They began to quarrel. Bo̲mpe̲lí maintained that Bo̲nye̲me̲ wasn't worth much, that his wealth was exaggerated, that it was a mistake to honor him, etc. Bolɔ́mbɔ́

1. According to my estimates, this episode is about a hundred years old. I knew two men who had recollections of it: the eldest (Longwokɔ́ of the Basɛ́kɛ́ Bengɔ́ngɔ́, Bongíli) was about twenty years old when it occurred. A greatgranddaughter of Bo̲nye̲me̲ (Mputɔ́ Sofie) is now in her forties.

848 has precedence over them and can become head of the family after his grandfather and uncles. In his natural father's clan, on the other hand, he has nothing to say.

596 If a man pays the bride price for a girl who has had a child by him, he asks his father-in-law to let him have his illegitimate child. This wish is almost always granted. The father-in-law well understands his son-in-law's fatherly sentiment of love and considers it quite legitimate and proper that a father should himself possess the [583] fruit of his own flesh. The only condition laid down is that because of the child the son-in-law must increase the amount of the bride price valuables by an extra slave or his equivalent. (1)

1. This transaction may even take place after the mother's death.

The father is not in a position to invoke any rights strictly speaking. The child is not considered as his because of his physical paternity, but only because of his father-in-law's kindness. If the latter were to refuse the father's request, he would not be acting in violation of justice. But his behavior would be considered as inhumane toward his daughter's husband and his grandson, and it would be criticized.

178 Nowadays, among the Beloko and their Elinga, the practice of "buying" the child has sprung up. That is, if a man does not marry a woman who has had a child by him, he pays her parents a certain amount in order to obtain the child. There does not seem to be much opposition to the introduction of this custom, which springs from an honorable feeling for paternity and its duties. Its only disadvantage is that in such a case the child may never claim any rights in his mother's clan. (1)

1. See Chapter VIII, Article IV.

583x 604 These rights prevail even if the nephew has wealth at home. In that case -- which is extremely rare since ordinarily he prefers to remain with his own clan -- he does not make use of them if his uncle has only two or three wives (whom, however, he can inherit), ●[596] or if other close relatives [136] are in need. For to do so would show a great lack of affection for the family (liɔ́ta), and he would be severely reprimanded.

Because of all that, the nephew (bɔ̌nankɛ́nɛ́, "sister's son") sometimes abuses his rights. That is the basis for the following proverbs: nkoi ɛ́kumb'omɔ́ngɔ́ lokombo, "the leopard takes the owner of the hunting enclosure" (that is to say, the hunter); bɔ̌nankɛ́nɛ́ ɛ́fonola nyangɔ́mpɛ́mɛ́ walí nd'ɛ̀ɔ́ko, "the nephew abducts the uncle's wife even in his own domain"; bɔ̌nankɛ́nɛ́ ale inganja v'åliko, "a nephew is a stick overhead." This last proverb is the Nkundɔ́ version of the sword of Damocles.

In short, a nephew has a right to the assistance of his maternal uncle if he settles with him and is adopted by him. Upon the death of his uncles he becomes heir and head of the family. But his rights are second to those of his uncle's brothers, who are also his "mothers." If he remains in his own clan, he receives help and can even obtain the bride price of one of his female cousins born of his mother's nkita. He may even receive part of the inheritance, if it is large. His rights are based on the fact that his uncle was enriched by the valuables given him by the nephew's clan in payment for his sister's marriage.

589x 556 Finally, if a young man does not even have any close relatives, because all are deceased, and if for some reason he has no patrimony (because of dissipation, debts, exploitation of the weak by the strong), he is forced to procure the bride price through his own labor: carving, hunting, fishing, setting elephant snares, making traps and hunting enclosures, clearing fields, or, nowadays, working in the service of the Whites. In former times there was also the possibility of war or raids by which he could obtain valuables or prisoners to sell as slaves. The wealth which someone acquires by his own work is called baɛ́mbɛ́ (bakonga, etc.) bɛ́ mpambɔ̌gɔ (literally, "by the strength of his arms"). [137]

583x Nkundó often express through the reciprocal form -ánga, bokilé l'okanga bé-ngana, "father-in-law and son-in-law are acquired through marriage payments." Thus many men try to come as close as possible to the amount of the bride price in the nkomí payment, so that there will be a certain balance between the two. Then to keep that balance between the assets, every payment of the bride price is equaled by new nkomí valuables. The purpose of this action is to equalize the influence of the two contracting parties lest that of one become excessive and predominant, a development which is not always conducive to the stability of the marriage and harmonious relations.

Article VIII. Acceptance of the Bride Price

583x
•596 When the husband, his family, and the ndonga have departed, the valuables brought are collected and placed before the woman's father. In the family hierarchy this task falls to the father's sons and younger brothers. Then the elders deliberate on how to use them. They bend down (bésunama), as the Nkundó say in their metaphorical language. Here as in all gatherings of family councils and deliberations of any jury, the father is asked to give his opinion. But without even making a statement, he immediately yields the floor to someone to whom he owes respect -- his elder brother, his nephew (that is, his sister's son), etc. The latter does likewise, yielding to the next person, and so the process continues. Finally, the father is again asked to speak; he asks the others each to take from the heap whatever object he wants whether it be a ring, a knife, or a spear. Together with the family patriarch he decides what to do with the bride price that has been received. They have to act in accordance with the laws of justice in protecting the rights of all and of each individual (see below, Article X).

583x What happens if the parents do not accept the bride price placed before them? Such a thing can happen. The following is a recent case: Etanda, daughter of Isia of Ekalakolél (Boléngé, Bakâala) was engaged to Ilonga of Bofaka l'Asomba (Wângatá), who had paid the ikulá and the ndonga for her. At the time of the walo

585^ 607 [595] of the bongíjí." (1)

For "to obtain a nkita" the Nkundó say -umba nkita, literally, "to fell a nkita," as one fells a tree or an adversary. Or they may say -bɔ́ta nkita, "to possess a nkita" (umba or bɔ́ta so-and-so, la nkita). "To become a nkita" would be rendered as -kwɛ nkita, "to fall into being a nkita."

585x 596 The hierarchy of those entitled to the bride price is based on the general hierarchy of family members, which gives precedence to the older generations and, within each generation, to the older members. Consequently, as long as a member of the family having the title of isɛ́ (father) is unmarried (unless he is physically or mentally incompetent), no bɔ̂na (son) is entitled to a bride price, even if it is that of his own sister. Within the same generation, the older members have precedence over the [165] younger ones, but boys have priority rights to the bride price of their uterine sisters. (1)

1. For limitations and exceptions to this right, see Chapter IV, Article II.

It occurs quite often, and was even more frequent in the past, that the person entitled to the bride price is still too young to get married, either in reality or in the opinion of his "fathers." (2) The

2. See ibid.

bride price is consequently used for the benefit of another member of the family. The creditor reaps the benefits later in the form of inheritance.

[602] Even if the woman or women meant for him should die or be taken in slavery, he can obtain the bride price of a cousin to which

In these instances there is a temporary suspension of rights or rather a change in the individual entitled to them. These adjustments are made very frequently and can affect several people. Bride prices may even fall to fairly distant relatives, even in the maternal line. The transactions are performed by the patriarchs for the greatest good of the family as a whole. New rights benefiting the person originally entitled to the bride price are being created, and 585x 607 the woman married by its means has become the equivalent of a nkita in relation to him -- as is the following instance:

Bakutu b'Ōfóngé (Boniface) of Bombéngá w'Ōkenda (Besombó, Bombwanja) has a sister Wétsi, whose bride price serves to provide his paternal uncle, Elongama éy'itsuta, with a wife, Ikɔ́kɔ́ of Ndongó-Bongíli. Bakutu's rights over his niece, Bakutu, daughter of Bolófo, are transferred to Bofénda d'Ekɔ́kola, son of his paternal great-aunt Etáka and therefore, in Nkundó terminology, to his father. As a result he obtains the rights over the bride price of Wángi, the daughter of his uncle [166] and Ikɔ́kɔ́. At the same time he acquires a certain authority over Bofénda, the beneficiary of the bride price that was originally intended for him, and over the latter's children.

When the bride price is meant to procure a nkita, there is nothing to prevent the remainder, should there be any, from being used to pay a debt, a fine, etc., or, more especially, from being given to a relative so that he can procure a wife for himself.

If, in an exceptional case, the bride price is not used for its [684] original purpose, this deviation constitutes an infraction of the law, because it is a violation of the rights of the girl for whom the bride price was paid, for she is thus deprived of her nkita and consequently of certain advantages. It may happen, however, that there is a conflict between this law and some other. In such cases of circumstances beyond one's control, it is up to the legal authorities to determine which of the two has priority.

Such was the case of Bolɛ́i, daughter of Ifolí y'Engámá, of the Basɛ́kɛ Longwâne of Bonjoku (Bonkoso). She was married to Bombɛ́lenga

B. Those who are entitled to the bride price

583x
586 It is apparent from everything we have said that the bride price is placed in the possession of the father of the woman for whom it has been paid. In his absence it goes to his eldest brother or, if his bǒnankɔ́nɔ has settled there and inherited the father's authority, he is the one to receive the bride price of his niece (cousin in our terms). Otherwise it goes to the eldest son. In short, the rights to a bride price are passed down in the order of the family hierarchy.

The mother's clan receives the copper spirals, the goat, and certain of the befɔ́ngɔ. [176]

There are circumstances, however, under which this order can be destroyed so that the father's clan does not get the slightest portion of the bride price. This happens if the daughter who is to be married has left her father's clan for a sufficiently good reason and has been adopted by her mother's family. The following is a historic example of such a case:

671 The events took place at Bompɔ́ma (Injɔlɔ) between 1890 and 1900. One of the inhabitants, Ilɔ́njɔ yà Hɔmbɔla had had two children by his wife, Eale of Bokɔ́ndela (Bofangi): a boy, Mpulɔ́ɔnɔ and a girl, Embɔ́mbi. The girl was abducted by one of the black soldiers who had come to occupy the region and was taken by him to his native village, somewhere near Coq. The wife of another man from Bompɔ́ma, named Inɛ́ntulu, was carried off and taken away by another soldier. Ilɔ́njɔ owed Inɛ́ntulu a dog. The latter took advantage of the disorder caused by the beginning of the occupation to demand his due with violent threats. Ilɔ́njɔ, having no dog and probably frightened, handed his son over to his creditor. Inɛ́ntulu hastened to find the soldier who had taken his wife and offered to give the latter the slave boy in exchange for her. The pair came to an agreement, and the soldier took away the boy, who died in his master's hands in a manner unknown to me.

Still during the time of the Independent State, Embɔ́mbi was able to make her way back to her country. Passing her mother's village, she heard how her father had acted toward her brother Mpulɔ́ɔnɔ. Indignant, she decided not to continue on her way; she 595 596 601 declared that she was breaking with her father and wished instead to live at the home of her maternal uncle Isɛla. After a time, a certain Belekɔ came to ask for her in marriage and paid the bride price to Isɛla.

In 1922, Ilɔnjɔ went to Bokɛndela and presented a complaint to Chief Efɛle against Isɛla, because the latter had taken his daughter's bride price. Efɛle, assisted by the messenger Bongimɔ and by notables, decided in favor of the accused; Since the plaintiff had gravely offended his daughter by delivering her brother into [177] slavery, which resulted in his death, he first had to be reconciled with her. If she accepted his apologies, the father would receive her bride price. They agreed on the nature of the reconciliation gift (bɔsɔndo): Ilɔnjɔ would pay a goat. Since he did not have it with him he handed over his knife as a pledge (wɛkɔ). Iomɛ, the bɔnanikɔnɔ of Isɛla (who by then had died), promised to make restitution of the bride price and in anticipation paid 12 rings and 3 knives. Ilɔnjɔ went back home. They awaited him in vain; they did not see him again -- neither him nor his goat.

Act three: February, 1933. Efɛle, Bongimɔ, and the rest had been removed as a result of a reorganization of districts. Bokwɛla had been made chief of the Bofɛngɛ. The district tribunal began to function again, and our Ilɔnjɔ took advantage of the situation and recommenced his attack. He brought complaint against Iomɛ and against Isɛla's brother, Engongolo, who was not there in 1922 but who now had returned home. On March 6, 1933 the palaver was settled. Naturally, the men who newly held their authority found this a good opportunity to strengthen their position and did the exact opposite of their predecessors. They condemned Iomɛ and Engongolo and decided in favor of Ilɔnjɔ.

Here we see a real abuse of power. For according to Nkundɔ law, only Ilɔnjɔ was in the wrong. He had conducted himself badly all the way down the line. His daughter had no obligation to recognize him as father, since he had virtually disowned her in the first place. And her mother's clan could have, even should have, received the bride price (see also the case described in Chapter IX, Article IV).

583 Which of these payments is the essential component of the bride price? The ikulá and the ndanga can unquestionably be excluded. The nature, purpose, and names of these payments as well as the title accorded to the woman after they have been handed over show that they are simply engagement payments. Of the other two payments, we can conclude that the walo is the essential one. For the bosongo adds nothing legally to the marriage, and its significance lies only in secondary matters which need not be repeated here.

6. The role of the family

● 596 As we have seen, it is always the father or his successor, who arranges everything, who takes care of everything, who plays the leading role. A marriage cannot be arranged in the absence of the head of either the husband's or the wife's family.

As this book is being written, a young man, Ilotomo of Bongíli (Lófóé, Ekanda), who is in possession of the valuables necessary for the bride price of his intended, Etéli, daughter of Mpokâ of Lofalé (Bongíli), has for many months been awaiting the arrival of his uncle Ekamba, who is head of the family [183] and who has been detained by his duties as catechist of the Protestant mission at Longa.

Although the mother receives a certain portion of the bride price, she has no right to intervene in establishing and arranging her child's marriage. Her husband informs her of everything and even pays more or less serious attention to her views, opinions, and wishes; but he does so solely out of the spirit of harmony and conjugal love, not because she has the slightest rights, legally speaking.

This would be the place to make a synthesis of what we have seen up to now and to try and deduce from it the legal concept of Nkundó marriage. But since some very important questions still remain to be studied, this synthesis must be put off till the end of Chapter III. [186]

Any of the types of evidence listed above is sufficient to legitimize the application of one or another of these penalties. Nevertheless, the husband is required first to notify the elder members of his family and the ndonga, who do not permit him to act unless the misdeeds have occurred repeatedly. The readiness to accord the husband permission depends on the temperament of the interested parties and on a great many circumstances, the most important of which is the respective social prominence of the parties involved.

The need to ask permission of the "fathers" and the ndonga, which we have already encountered in reference to other situations (above, Article III, 4), does not weaken the husband's rights [318], but it limits their use. It is not a legal obligation but one that is imposed for family reasons, which are as follows:

1) The respect due to the "fathers" in this as in all important matters;

2) The respect due to the ndonga, who in marital matters is the husband's superior and whose intervention must be called upon in any serious situation;

3) The repercussions of any inconsiderate or rash action on the entire family (enmities, wars, etc.).

If forbearance and patience are fruitless, no one can blame the husband any longer. And when the woman's family compares the censurable conduct of their daughter with the generosity of their son-in-law, they will naturally be inclined to find that he is in the right and so usually will not intervene against him.

Note also that the Nkundó invoke the need to maintain their honor as justification for the obligation to notify the authorities. They must be able to inform the unfaithful woman's clan and thus safeguard their good reputation as defenders of order and public peace.

[illegible]

A woman whose husband loved her very much was subjected to the etika only. He would reprimand her and strike her, and would try to correct her behavior by means of gentleness and leniency.

As we will see see later, a husband who is exasperated by the incorrigible infidelity of a wife whose performance of other wifely

684 duties is also unsatisfactory, may sometimes resort to divorce or to 586 selling her into slavery, but rarely to killing.

Colonization has abolished torture, slavery, killing, and the 684 legitimacy of assassination. A husband has no other sanction against 671 an unfaithful wife than to insult and beat her. And even there European law forces him to restrain himself lest he commit excesses which [319] involve him in a trial before the white man's court. Fortunately for marital fidelity, a reaction in favor of the repression of adultery has recently begun, following the official establishment of native jurisdiction. In the not too distant future, this reaction will culminate in a return to ancestral law in a form adapted to present circumstances.

8. Against the accomplice, the injured husband has the right
684 to make use of two sanctions: violence and the payment of an
596 "indemnity."

1) If the husband catches the accomplice in the act, he always has the right to wound him, or even to kill him, or reduce him to slavery. The last two forms of vengeance were not practiced unless the respective villages of the husband and the culprit were fairly distant from each other and not bound to each other by any special ties (friendship, mutual assistance, or affinity). This reservation existed because of consideration for the offender's relatives, the desire not to bring them excessive sorrow. Another cause for caution and calm is the economic or military inferiority of the husband's clan, or the fearlessness, the valor in battle, in a word, the strength of the culprit's family. A special case which makes all other considerations disappear is adultery with a favorite, whose husband's love for her is especially passionate and jealous.

If the offender's adultery was not limited to a few isolated acts but was becoming a real habit, or if he had already seduced many women, resulting in many palavers for his family, the husband could be bolder. For the rake's close kin would finally be exasperated with his incorrigible and disastrous misconduct and would rather be rid of him. (1) [320]

1. See also Chapter VIII, Article II, 2, A.

595* 837 Some men are strict on this point, while others are more tolerant. Clearly, the technique of such men is most subtle. The more a wife's lover is permitted his freedom, the greater is the likelihood that other women, who prefer a young man passionately enamoured of them to their husband, will ask the polygamist to marry them. A [59] man who is sufficiently wealthy and influential can in this manner build up a harem from which he does not benefit physically but which assures him of a dominant social position.

This practice exists almost exclusively in conjunction with polygamy, but cases do occur among monogamists. And among more "civilized" tribes, such as the riverain people of the Lower Congo, a tendency in that direction is developing.

A request for concubinate made by a relative of the husband cannot be considered in the same category with the situation we have just examined. Such a request is more closely related to the request for an inherited wife (see Chapter III, Article II). The difference is obvious. The only thing the two situations have in common is the fact of legitimate cohabitation with another man's wife. One perceives this immediately upon comparing the two.

Article IX. The Family's Role in Marriage

● 596 591 We have found that there are situations in which a woman is to some extent considered and treated as the wife not only of her husband, but also of certain of his relatives (Article VI). Moreover, we have seen in Chapter II the big role that the families play in the arrangement and continuation of their children's marriage. In discussing the question of the inheritance of wives, we have seen that the close relatives of the deceased have rights over the widow; one of them may marry her without any obligations toward the chief heir, and the new union is not a new marriage but a continuation of the previous marriage, which is not broken in spite of the first husband's death. A similar observation was made in relation to the practice of wife replacement (Chapter III, Article IV).

All this leads us to raise a question: To what extent does the family have collective rights over the wife? The following answer is 576 the one which seems to me to conform to reality.

591 A wife is acquired by means of a payment of valuables. These valuables belong chiefly and in the first instance to the one who has obtained them, either through the marriage of his daughter or sister or through his own efforts. In the last instance, the husband has more direct and personal rights over his wife. In the first instance, the closer the husband's kinship with the woman who has furnished the bride price through her marriage, the stronger are her rights over the wife. Other members of the family, however, also have secondary rights over her in proportion to their position. For they are bound to the husband by ties of kinship as descendants of the same ancestor and therefore share in varying degrees the duties and rights of the moral entity based on a community of blood. [340]

The family's participation in the husband's rights is based on the one hand on the economic nature of the marriage agreement and, on the other, on the solidarity of clan and family.

That is why a marriage continues despite death. From the personal point of view it is broken -- so that, for example, the woman may subsequently become another person's legitimate wife, which she could not have done during the first marriage, but from the financial and social point of view it continues to exist. The same is true for wife replacement. As to the relations of a younger brother with his elder brother's wife, they are permitted only under certain conditions which are clearly defined and limited. This fact proves that the younger brother may only very inaccurately be termed "husband." The woman does not have two husbands; she has only one: the elder brother. The relations with the younger brother are permitted not as a personal tie, but only because of the community of financial interests between the brothers, and the elder's pity for his unmarried junior.

Everything considered, and despite all, a woman has only one husband. Taking into account the explanations given and the description of the formalities through which certain persons may intervene in their relative's household and the extent to which they may do so, it is apparent that a husband's rights over his wife are basically personal and exclusive in spite of his recognized prerogative to yield these rights to others.

586 unproductive. Nowadays, they occur somewhat more frequently.
[582] A feeling of generosity has developed toward sons and younger brothers, and the valuables are often set aside for their use.

If the bride price has already been transferred, the solution [400] is less clear cut. Under the old regime the matter was fairly clear, which is no longer true at present. But let us proceed by stages.

In the past the question was as follows: Theoretically it was assumed that the woman's family was not in a position to make restitution. In practice, however, they managed to do so, either by substituting another woman, or by borrowing the needed valuables, or by giving the husband a bride price received by one of the divorcée's relatives. The husband had certain means of forcing his father-in-law to pay (see above). Other times the notables of the clan were moved by a threat of war. They unceasingly urged restitution, and unless the debtor himself was the most influential member of the group and of an unyielding nature, he gave in to their entreaties. If, on the other hand, the husband did not have recourse to the means mentioned, he simply had to wait until his father-in-law received a new bride price.

178, 586 Nowadays the ancient customs have been abolished, and the whole question has changed as a result. Nevertheless, in spite of the external changes, the colonial administration wishes to act in the spirit of ancient native law;

By establishing regular native courts and giving them the right to judge in accordance with the laws of the tribes themselves, adapted to changed circumstances, the decree of April 15, 1926 has armed these courts with the means of working for this adaptation. But in practice it has not yet been accomplished. This fact must be attributed to the difficulties of finding a solution which would, on the one hand, perpetuate the spirit of the ancient system and, on the other, satisfy legitimate aspirations toward better regulations, aspirations which as a matter of fact are favored by the colonizing power. In this connection one must think especially of the gradual abandonment of polygamy.

The European authorities do not seem to have come to a clear decision as yet with respect to what method of restitution

THE FAMILY HEAD AMONG THE NKUNDO NEGROES

The family among the Negroes is organised in a patriarchal fashion. The father is lord and master, not only over his children, but also over all of his descendants. The power over his daughters and daughters' children, however, escapes him through his selling them.

All important things were dealt with and settled by him. Thus, for instance, to speak of only the most important, if one of his sons or grandsons had to be helped to get a wife, then it was for him to decide whether or not it was time for that. It was he who negotiated over that transaction and finally decided about the purchase of the wife. If one of his children or grandchildren shot an animal, then it was brought to him, and the distribution was made according to his decision and under his supervision. If one of his children had difficulties with his wife, the matter was judged by him. If one of the wives of his children say away, he went to look for her if the matter was of a serious nature. If he was not able to settle the matter, then it was up to him to decide if the return of the money must be demanded or whether the matter must be decided by means of arms.

To the end of his days, sickness and insanity notwithstanding, he remained the only lord and master, and nothing was dealt with without his knowledge and approval. He was honored and respected up to his last breath.

Law of Succession

The law of succession is very much askew in relation to the patriarchal fatherhood mentioned in our history. Here it was not, it is still not today, the oldest son who was considered, even when he was of age. At the death of the father, these full powers passed to his brother. The children [333] female as well as male -- of the deceased brother, even though they were older in years, called him father and also showed him all the honor attached to the title of father. All their disputes and matters of importance were brought to him and settled by him. At his death the powers of family government passed again to his younger brother, and so on until all of the brothers had died. At the death of the last one, all rights passed, not to the oldest, second, or third brother [among his sons?], but to the oldest son of their sister, bona wa nkano. As an example:

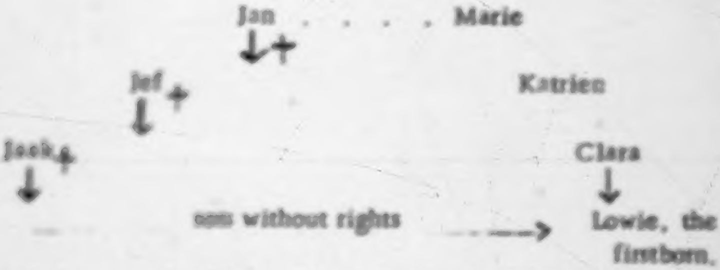
Jan . . . Marie
Brothers
Jef
Jaak
son without rights
Paul becomes the successor.

Or if there were more sisters, the rights passed to the firstborn son of these sisters; for instance:



Jan . . . . Marie
Jef
Katrien
Jaak
Clara
son without rights
Lowie, the firstborn.

He consequently became the father and supreme head of the family upon the death of the three brothers.

596
562
In order to understand this peculiar custom clearly, some explanations should be given. The custom in this country is that the woman is sold; not a single one escaped that general rule in former days. With that money the father or brother bought, or rather, had to buy himself another woman. This wife belonged, however, to the daughter or sister who had been sold; the daughter or sister called her nkita, "goods" or "property." The children born of this nkita called her [the woman sold]: is'e'omoto, "female father." Even if she brought male children into the world, the rights of their mother passed to them, and [334] their mother was called father by the children of the nkita. According to our ideas, they were only nephews. That held even if the woman was still not paid for; it was enough that a ndonga, a security as proof of further payment, had been given. It was also not

596 necessary for her father or brother to have brought her to the man and 583 to have received money for her; another member of the family was 56 sufficient. She was sold by her family and accordingly, wherever the money had remained or whoever had received it, she had her rights in the family. Since the family maintained itself through the sale of the children of the female sex, the male children born of them were considered as the masters, the rightful claimants, the fathers. There was no exception to this rule; it was not to be altered, and no one had ever thought of disputing the place of the claimant or of laying claim to his rights. I have only heard of one single case of that sort, namely, at the succession of the Ruki, the younger brother was said to have killed his older brother in order to take over his place. He was said to have made a hole in his brother's prow, so that it sank when it reached the middle of the stream. The matter in itself seems an impossibility; also I consider it a legend, unless an accident might have happened that was interpreted in a mistaken or deliberately false manner.

The rightful claimant, bona wa nkana, sister's son, might 576 still be a child; nevertheless he was called father and everyone vied
57 with one another in showing him the honor due a father. That was the unbreakable law, not only for the father common to the hamlet, boloi, but also for the father of each individual family.

Nkita

583 Nkita is what the woman is called who is bought with the money
602 that the father or brother has received for his daughter or sister on the occasion of her marriage. In reality, however, she is only the nkita, goods or property, of the sold woman. Nkita ekam, "my property," this woman calls her. For instance, Jan [335] sells his daughter, Marie, to Klaas and buys another wife, Trees, with the money received. The latter woman is now the nkita, the property, of Marie.

605 We have already seen that the right of succession and fatherhood passed to the male children of the sister, because she had been sold and had brought money into the family, or rather because she had a nkita there, a sort of guarantee for the money that had been received for her. Nkita-ship brought another right to them, namely, the female children born of the mother's nkita belonged to them; they could sell them and get themselves other women with the money. [582] They could not, however, marry them, since they were their cousins, and custom was opposed to any marriage between relatives. [602] The boys could, nevertheless, take the nkita of their mother as a wife, since the Negroes have no notion of affinity or relationship by marriage. The male children were, then, the owners of the female children that the nkita of their mother brought into the world:

These three girls, children of nkita Trees, belong to the three sons of Marie. If Marie had only one son, then Piet would have the right to trade the two other girls for money and to buy other wives with this money, either for himself or for his younger brother; but if she [Marie?] brought female children into the world, half of them belong to Marie's son.

604 If the nkita gave birth to no children of the female sex, the boys of Marie could resort to the husband of the nkita of their mother, namely, their uncle, nyangobika. If, however, he had no fortune, no money, [337] no wives, no girls to sell ... or only wives to whom others could lay claim and had more right, then they were disinherited, poor devils in society, and it cost them long years of work and much

Anna, whom he bought, was then the nkita of Katrien and the quasi-nkita of Marie. Both sons, Joseph and Antonius, were hard pressed because of Anna, the nkita of both of their mothers. If Anna bore two daughters, as I have indicated, the case was simple: the first daughter belonged to Joseph and the second to Antonius. If, however, she gave birth to only one daughter, then this child belonged to Joseph, and Antonius was left out in the cold. If father Jan had no children of the female sex by Anna, then the matter was extremely thorny for both of them, and if their grandfather or uncle possessed no money, had no more wives by whom he had daughters, there was nothing left for them to do but, at his death, to take the nkita of their mother as a wife. For this reason it happened many times that young men lived with old women, and even though there was then generally no more hope of children, those wives were then still good enough to cook the meals and do the little work that a Negro household requires.

600 I will not digress any further about the method of distribution of women, about the rights over the women which the nkita system brings with it. It would take us too far. Furthermore, not only the present, but also the past and the future are involved in it; so that one would have to be a Negro and raised in those matters to understand them clearly . . . and even then they involve numerous palavers (disputes), which continually agitate the families and the villages.

The Origin of the Nkita?

562 The sale of the woman and the immediate loss of her freedom must naturally have given her cause for revolt. It has perhaps cost the man a severe struggle to make the woman content with her lot. A compensation or reimbursement had to be given to her, and most certainly the nkita system has its origin there. It was at least a partial compensation that the man gave to the woman. It gave her rights over her nkita

583 her own children rights which exist nowhere else in the world and prob-
562 ably among no other people: they became the superiors, the fathers of the family of their mother. Unfortunately, practically considered, the women enjoyed very little of the gift which was given her; she remained what she was, slave of money, slave of the man. Even her children, for whom the nkita-ship secured such great advantages in her family, brought them into a false situation, in that it robbed them in the home of their own father of all the advantages that it brought them in the home of their mother's father. It was only the old and well-favored who actually gained advantage from the nkita system and enjoyed them.

1) It relieved them in the first place of all care on behalf of their daughters whom they sold while still children; and if later, after they were grown up, these daughters complained about the injustice done to them, they could answer them, "But, my dear daughter, I have done you no wrong; here in my own house is the woman whom I bought with your money; she belongs to you always, and the children that I have by her are your children; you are both their father and their mother; they will call you is'womoto (female father), and in that capacity they will honor and serve you; the boys will at the same time be the children of your children, and the girls will be sold to give your sons the opportunity to buy a wife for themselves."

2) It discharged them for the most part from all care of providing a wife for their sons, and it denied the latter the right to make claims to the women whom the father possessed. [340] If the son begged his father for a woman, he could put him off and say to him, "But, my boy, you have the nkita of your mother; the children (girls) who will be born of her are for you. We shall sell them, and with the money we will buy you a wife." Most of these girls, however, were traded by the father for another wife, since his son was still, in that case, small. Almost all the women then ended up in the harem of the father before passing on to the son. Thus, after all, the nkita system only benefited the lust and the lasciviousness of the old Negro and made him the one and only master of the women. Sons, daughters, wives, and children were, in contrast, the dupes and victims of the nkita-ship.

THE NKUMU OF THE TUMBA

RITUAL CHIEFTAINSHIP ON THE MIDDLE CONGO

H. D. BROWN

[10] [133] [747] [771] THE tribes living round Lake Tumba, a lake some thirty-five miles long by twelve wide lying north of Lake Leopold II (approximately 0° 50' south latitude, and 18° east longitude) and draining into the Congo River at the confluence of the Ubangi, lack cohesion and show a considerable variety of custom and language. But they are known collectively as Tumba, the Government adaptation of the Native term Ntomba. Most of them are found to the east of the lake, the whole group numbering perhaps little more than forty to fifty thousand at the present time, though there is evidence that the last twenty years have seen a great decrease in population. European occupation of this area goes back barely fifty years, Protestant missions having been established for about the same length of time. The first mission post was established at Ikoko on the north-east shore of the lake, one of the villages of a group known as Bongindo. In pursuing this investigation particular attention has been given to the practices of this group, but mention is occasionally made where considerable differences have been found elsewhere.

105 13 The Tumba are agricultural, hunting, and fishing people. Their country is flat and swampy with dense forests, and there are many watercourses flowing into Lake Tumba. There are occasional small, low swampy plains, and one such area, more open, with quite wide stretches of prairie, is a haunt of buffalo. The forests are fairly well supplied with game, and the swamps, streams, and lakes with fish. A heavy rainfall and no distinct dry season make agriculture reasonably easy and famine unknown. Every family has its plantation of manioc, the staple diet, which is supplemented by plantains and bananas. The people make their own tools, formerly smelting their own iron for this purpose, are fairly skilled at making dug-out canoes, engage in weaving raffia and making mats out of split cane, and are efficient at pottery production.

624 401 178 The role of the nkumu in the socio-religious activities of the community is one of the most interesting features of Tumba life. As a result of European contact the ceremonies connected with the nkumu are rapidly disappearing, but it has been possible to collect considerable information from the older men and women among whom the details are still vividly remembered.[1] The following report refers to the period previous to European occupation and control, a time within the memory of a large number of people, but already sufficiently remote to become a matter of hearsay before the lapse of many more years.

[illegible] [775] An understanding of the place of the nkumu among the Tumba requires a glance at the tribal organization. According to the people themselves, they migrated westward, and coming into these parts chose land for themselves. Among the several Hensey has briefly outlined some of the forms of [illegible] observed among the nkumu of the district adjacent to that of the present study. These more detailed notes are, however, timely if a record is to be preserved that approximates to accuracy.

596 invading groups of kinsfolk there was always one who was considered as the family head, and this man could claim the title of monene mokonda, the owner of the land. Round this man the rest of the members of the family group clustered, and he had the general direction of their affairs. He could scarcely be termed a chief, having a paternal oversight rather than exercising any wide authority demanding organizing ability and political astuteness. The succession of monene mokonda runs collaterally through younger brothers in the first place; hence if a first-born male happens to hold that position, the succession among his younger brothers is in the order of their birth. When these have all died the succession passes to the next generation. If all the males of a group die, it is possible for a daughter's son to leave his father's side in order to assume the position of monene mokonda on his mother's side.

A monene mokonda can delegate his duties as head to another member of the family, who is then termed mobomi e ele, the husband of the settlement. For such a privilege payment is generally made to the monene mokonda. Round these monene mokonda and their immediate kinsmen others gathered, forming, it may be, another section of the same settlement, known then as an etuka, or, if numerous, another settlement.[1]

624 [593] The monene mokonda (or mobomi e ele) hears and judges cases that come to him, aided always by a group of elders, and directs the activities of the settlement. However, this does not entirely satisfy the Tumba; they want an nkumu also. The nkumu is chosen, not by the whole settlement, but by a single village, or it may be even one etuka of a village. If the villages of a settlement were without an nkumu it would generally, but not necessarily, be the etuka of the monene mokonda which would lead off by seeking one out. The group desiring an nkumu are known as the mokonda, and they look about for a man of the same tribe but not of the same settlement or village, an outsider. He must be a man of some wealth, for actually he will buy his right of authority and pay heavily for it. If the man who is approached accepts, he is known from then on until his accession as Nkomo Akalo, the term nkumu not being used until he is finally invested with the insignia of office, the mantole, or hat of special design. Nkomo Akalo's family is known as the elepa, or mange. This man, [556] once having accepted the invitation to become nkumu, sets about amassing wealth in the form of wives and brass rods. He may be years about it, but he does not thereby forfeit his right to the office, nor apparently weary those who extended the invitation. Should Nkomo Akalo die before he is installed as nkumu, or should he wish to withdraw from the honour bestowed upon him, the succession passes to another member of his elepa. The succession would normally pass to the eldest male of the elepa, [787] but many circumstances may interfere to give it to another member of the family. A dream dreamed by a male of the elepa to the effect that he should be the nkumu is sufficient to give him the right of succession over the eldest male. When asked [689] whether it was common to lie about such a dream having occurred, in order to gain the right of succession, those questioned received the suggestion with emphatic negatives, for this is no time to lie; any man so doing would be sure to die, and the fear of death would drive him back, [illegible].

[1] Where practical, the invested chiefs set up by the Belgian Colonial Government are men chosen because of their right to be known as monene mokonda or mobomi e ele. Often, however, the settlements are so small and lacking in cohesion that it has been necessary to set up chiefs arbitrarily over chiefdoms very much larger than were their own hereditary spheres of influence.

624 tion, Nsoso is a very prominent figure. Still arrayed as previously described, she sits outside the nsaga near the road on the special stool of the nkumu. Nobody may pass her with food, a humane law, considering that she must spend the day fasting. If anyone attempts to do so she catches the unlucky individual, helps herself to as much of his food as she wants, the victim meanwhile begging her to be merciful and leave him a small portion, and the booty is taken into the ilomo. During this sentinel duty Nsoso must still keep the parrot's feather in her mouth and maintain silence, so, in case she catches an unsuspecting bearer of food, the remonstrance and argument are all one-sided.[1] After the first day Nsoso no longer sits outside the nsaga but goes from place to place in the village, choosing spots where people may least expect her, hoping thus to reap a bigger harvest for her pains. This is kept up for eight days, which comprise two Tumba 'weeks' of three days' work and one of rest. The rest-day is appropriately named bzina la nsoso after the duty of Nsoso of sitting doing nothing day by day. The eight days of this ceremony over, Nsoso lays aside her gourd and plantain stalk, which are placed at the foot of the first central supporting post of the ekepe on entering. She is given a fresh coating of chalk and three coloured [302] stripes are drawn the length of her back and down her arms. She still remains close to the nkumu.

[50] Various personalities are connected with the nsaga of an nkumu. The Bonko is a male slave, clothed in a skin loincloth, whose duty it is to receive callers at the ilomo before admitting them to the presence of the nkumu.

624 585 Mpaay is the name taken by the wife first married by the nkumu. From henceforth she no longer accompanies her husband, and their cohabitation ceases unless the nkumu is willing to pay her each time the sum of one hundred rods. But the nkumu is obliged to eat all food she cooks for him even though they have a quarrel. Mpaay does not honour her husband with the special greeting accorded to nkumu, but greets her husband and all other nkumu as she would ordinary people.[2] The second wife of an nkumu must assume the name of Ipembe Angenda, but no importance attaches to her position.

629 586 Among the Tumba generally, apart from the Bongindu, a woman is chosen from the [illegible] to bear the title Bolumbo Itina i Ekepe (Bolumbo, the 'raison d'être' of the ekepe). She is, it would seem, a symbolical figure, a reminder that the ekepe owes its existence to the [illegible] of which this woman becomes the titular head. While the nkumu is still in seclusion the chosen woman is taken to the open space between the ilomo and the row of wives' houses, known as the [illegible]. Here, in the presence of the assembled crowd she is praised by being addressed, 'Bolumbo Itina, [illegible]!' and the crowd exclaims, 'Boo!'[3] Strips of leopard skin, about eighteen

[875] [1] It is interesting to note that there are some exceptions to those who may be caught and robbed by Nsoso during her eight days of wandering. No member of the [illegible] may be thus treated, twins and their parents are exempt, and also all children born to the nkumu before he attains office, these being counted nkumu.

[594 595] [2] Besides Mpaay, a mother of twins is also exempt from according nkumu special salutations, and among some groups the father of twins is also exempt.

[3] This ceremony gives husbands of any village, whether they are members of the [illegible] or not, the opportunity to single out a favourite wife for special honour, for at this time any woman may be given the name of Bolumbo, though not with the significant complement of Itina i Ekepe. The ceremony is similar, is performed at the [illegible], but besides receiving the strips of leopard skin, she must be divested of all her clothing, a new loincloth and [illegible] are then placed round her, and the strips of skin then attached to the new belt.

The first male child which was born to the nkumu before he acceded to the office is known as Ijomi Nkoi. If he has none, then the right to this name passes to the first male child to be born to his younger brothers. Any child born on the day that the nkumu is given his mantele is also called Ijomi; if a male he will be Mole Ijomi, if a female, Mpembe Ijomi.[6] These children must not see the nkumu until they are old enough to know his name and greet him properly, and so they are taken to some village other than the one in which he has his residence. When such children are considered old enough to take up residence in the village of the nkumu it is an occasion for revelry, a big dance, etoko, is held, and there is a feast. The child, Ijomi, is brought to the village of the nkumu with rejoicing, and this is a signal for everybody desiring to do so to help himself to anything belonging to the nkumu. Goats and fowls may be killed and eaten, sugar-cane rooted up, bananas, plantains, and other crops growing near by seized for food. Because of this custom the nkumu will take precautions and send his livestock, at least, off to some other village in order not to lose more than he can help.[7] 152 624 [559]

The eyembe, the singer or singers, and the nsoti, the jesters already mentioned, remain with the nkumu during his period of seclusion. Added to these is atando lokombi, the bearer of the lokombi, a stringed instrument played with the fingers, similar to a bass viol in its general appearance. 624 533 539

Inside the ilomo during the seclusion of the nkumu, few people have the right of entrance, but as one enters the ekongo where the daylight hours are spent, one finds the couch of the nkumu on the left and towards the rear. On the same side and towards the front are seated the atando lokombi and the eyembe. Nkasa's couch is to the right of, and parallel to, that of the nkumu, but still to the left of the centre posts. To the right of her couch is the fire in the centre, and beyond the fire on the right side is a couch for the nsomi, likewise somewhat to the rear, with a space in front for the nsoti. 624 342 352

The month's seclusion being completed, the nkumu prepares to buy the homage of the village. Nkasa gets rid of her decorative colours, and assumes ordinary attire, becoming like any other of the wives, and is ready to take up all the usual duties of a wife, whether in the garden or at the house. The people are called to come and render to the nkumu their homage and praise. The men come to the ilomo, are admitted to the presence of their nkumu and seat themselves on the bare earth with their legs wide apart and facing him. They then, without uttering a word, greet him in the 624 576

[5] The lombe is a belt which used to be worn by Tumba women encircling the buttocks, and this was used to attach their only garment, the alone among the Bongandu, this being a short bast cloth, or an apron among other groups, this being a narrow cloth strip worn between the legs.

[6] When a new nkumu assumes office, one already in office will take this opportunity of getting more of his own named Ijomi. He takes them to the enclosure of the new nkumu, and having placed a bracelet of cowrie shells on the right wrist, and sometimes one on the right ankle, asks the member of the enclosure whose right it is to give away the mantele to name these new Ikomi (pl. of "Ijomi"). This man will then take such a one, and presenting him to the people introduce him by giving him a name, and following with praise as, "The Ijomi Lokoma, Botela!" and the crowd replies with the customary "Boo!" [591]

[7] It is well to remember that not every individual bearing names associated with the institution of the nkumu is directly connected with it. With the practice of "resurrecting" dead relatives by naming new-born children after them, such names as these become widespread. [559]

624 customary manner, with a double clap. They are told by the nkumu to repeat the salutation, and having done so may be asked to do it a third time. They are then 576 given a few rods in payment. If the nkumu sees some member of his own elojo coming to greet him, he gives him special honour by ordering him to lie flat on his back instead of merely sitting, and at the end he gives him a larger gift of rods than the others receive. In this way the nkumu may pay out a great many rods to those who thus render him homage. Ordinarily a man will receive five or six, but one
624 specially honoured may be given as many as twenty. From the beginning the nkumu has to pay heavily for his honours, and only a wealthy man can hope to attain them.
[554] For this reason a lawful successor, if not wealthy, may be glad to give up his rights to another more fortunate member of the elojo. Homage having been paid, word is sent out that the nkumu is about to come forth, and crowds begin to gather. A coat
[303] of red camwood powder mixed with oil is smeared over the nkumu, the brass plates are attached to his [illegible], and he is attired in all his finery. The crowd outside cheers, and when tired sits on the ground to await the rest of the ceremony. Inside, [533] the lokombi begins to play, the [illegible] to sing, and the Batwa start to praise the nkumu by uttering an ululating sound. Accompanied by [illegible], [illegible], and the [illegible], the nkumu himself begins to dance. The temporary protecting screen around the [illegible] is pulled down, and he is seen by all. After his dance he retires again and the crowd disperses.

When [illegible] becomes nkumu he changes everything possible so as to [98] become different from other men. Thus he assumes a different gait, a sort of bow-legged waddle, a different tone of voice, and it seems that under this influence even his facial features undergo a change. Accompanied by his retinue, he visits the various villages where he has friends and relatives in order to greet them. This over, the musicians wish to take their departure and are paid for their services by the nkumu.

626 At the conclusion of these ceremonies the nkumu with his elojo and the [illegible] negotiate concerning their obligations to one another. If the nkumu is the first of his 591 line, he and his elojo are given land to cultivate, while succeeding nkumu simply take over the land originally [illegible]. The [illegible] call their nkumu their wife, and they 631 designate themselves husband. They thus reckon the relationship between [illegible] and elojo to be that of husband and wife, and, as in an actual marriage, there must be an interchange of obligations performed in a spirit of harmony. Also, as in marriage a wife may be divorced, so an nkumu with his elojo could be sent off to their home and the arrangement terminated. It not infrequently happened that as strangers the elojo fell out with their hosts and if such a disagreement could not be righted they might be refunded the payments with which they had purchased their rights, and sent off home.

224 Among the reciprocal obligations of [illegible] and elojo are included the sharing of certain animals and birds killed in the hunt, among which are the leopard and 626 elephant. All killed, whether male or female, must be divided. Of certain other
631 animals, including the wild pig, antelope, and buffalo, if a female, no portion is given; if a male, the required portion is presented. These reciprocal obligations are limited
596 entirely to the elojo and [illegible]; if others outside of these groups wish to present the nkumu with [illegible] to honour him or to curry favour, they may do so, but they are under no compulsion. If one of the contracting parties fails to fulfil its pledges in this matter of giving part of the kill, or in anything else, the aggrieved party may call the council together. This consists not only of members of the mokonda and elopo, but of all elders of the village or villages connected with this particular one. The party judged in the wrong, whether elopo or mokonda, will be fined, the injured party receiving its share, and both parties will be charged to live together harmoniously and observe their contracts. 224 624 596 621

The power of the nkumu was apparently limited, and did not supersede that of the mosuse nsikindo. When trials came up, the aggrieved party might go either to the mosuse nsikindo or to the nkumu. If it was necessary to call the village elders together about it, both these authorities were present at the hearing. First the young men of the group were allowed to give their verdict, then the old men, after that mosuse nsikindo (or the mokuni o ele), and finally the nkumu was given the privilege of the last word. He would comment on the opinions of each of the judges, criticizing one young man, commending another, and then giving his own verdict, at which the group would assent by saying, 'Even so, grandfather'. The whole group of judges would then fix the fine, a double portion of which went to the nkumu. 624 695

The actual manual labour which an nkumu may do excludes anything endangering life or limb, or requiring agility and speed. He may clear the bush for his gardens: this is a man's work. He may take part in the building of his houses, but may do no high work, and, among the inland groups, it is the work of the Batwa to put the roof on for him. The nkumu may also prepare pitfalls for catching game, but cannot engage in any other type of hunting or do any fishing. Digging a grave is prohibited, for, as we shall see, everything pertaining to death must be ignored by the nkumu. 624 [563]

Other rules affecting the daily life of the nkumu may be roughly divided into three: those affecting his person, those having to do with his food, and social regulations.

One of the great points of observance in the first class of regulations is the importance of the nsamba. The nkumu must on no account be seen during daylight hours with an uncovered head. If he wishes relief from the cumbersome nsamba he may take it off in the darkness of his house and put on an ordinary hat made of skins, and when night falls he may walk where he will bareheaded if he so desires. The skin hat, known as loolo, may be made from two animals only, in the case of an nkumu, one being the mbuluku, a species of antelope with light-coloured hair, and the other the jsolo, an animal resembling a beaver. The skin of the mbuluku may be used by anyone, but the jsolo is reserved for the nkumu only with one exception. The skin of the jsolo may also be used for the carrying strap for infants known as mpambo, which is worn over one shoulder in bandolier fashion. For the nkumu the skin of the jsolo is limited to the informal hat, loolo, and for making into the loboto, a pouch used for carrying small objects and worn like a sporran. As a corollary to the importance of the nsamba may be noted the importance attached to the head of the nkumu, which must never be seen uncovered in daylight. 624 292 [524] [859]

The Bongindo nkumu never wash in the daytime, but may wash at night with hot water. The inland nkumu never wash. Even the Bongindo nkumu never wash their heads, and no nkumu ever cuts his hair. If the nkumu becomes too greatly incommoded, one of his wives may delouse his head, but only within the privacy of the house, by the light that enters the rear opening. 624 515 [181]

614 He represents the A-group in the council of elders of the village and of the other large units. Since no members of the group [672] are considered capable of conducting affairs, all the legal transactions which they undertake are treated as though they had been sanctioned by the patriarch. To a large extent the members of the group may represent one another. In the absence of the elder, a younger member may act as the representative of the [623] group at council meetings. When the senior member dies, his function will be taken over by the next oldest member of the group.

614 602 An A-group will split up only through internal conflicts which cannot be bridged or through a large population increase. The newly-formed A-groups continue to maintain a close relationship which, at first, is much closer than among the B-groups whose A-groups have split much earlier. In the higher ranks cohesion after the split diminishes only gradually; thus many gradations develop in the feeling of cohesion. These gradations could not be even approximately reproduced in a diagram with any degree of exactitude. There is no formula by which the split takes place, as there is, for example, among the Tallensi (13) where it is determined by a certain number of generations. 614 Theoretically the A-groups are "eternal." The A-groups are ● 596 subdivided into small families. Within the polygynous families 592 nuclear families [Familienkerne] (14) have a semi-independent position economically. Each wife has her own house. A husband's wives and the wives of his sons have their houses within the same homestead. As the master of the homestead, the father has an open shelter where the men spend their time and [768] hold their meetings. Upon the death of the master of the

614 To sum up the characteristic features of the A-groups: Membership determined by male descent; unity of legal power, especially insofar as landed property and inheritance law is concerned the senior has full power; succession by simple seniority; theoretically unlimited existence of the group. The A-groups consist of small families who live together in homesteads under one father in each case.

Groups of Rank B

614 593 There is usually a friendly, neighborly relationship between the A-groups which form part of a B-group. People assist each other to a large extent, and there is joint consultation on most matters. Group B has only one Nkúmú iloki, "master of the hidden power," the priest of the kinship group, who is consulted by all the members of the group. He functions during the magical preparations for the hunt; he is consulted before any important undertaking. During the leave-taking ceremony after a burial, he converses with the deceased, and people turn to him when the ancestors have appeared to them in their dreams to transmit their desires, orders, or other information to the living. He protects the people of his group from the ill will, ndoki, of the dead and the living. The priest of the kinship group is used as the criterion [194] to determine which group of homogeneous A-groups represents a B-group. The priest of the kinship group is descended from a certain one of the related A-groups.

614 554 There is a difference in rank among the A-groups of a B-group -- one group will be regarded as older -- but this is 618 621 In general one may assume that local groups will postulate only that kind of kinship relationship which does not necessitate a substantial functional reintegration. For this reason, units above the exogamy limit will easily tend to construe a genealogy which "proves" a kinship relationship. Groups of that type are functionally weak. One can observe processes of this kind both among the group of the Bakonda and among the neighboring E-group, Lonyanyanga. The institution of the nkúmú (see above, p. 14) also appears to have a leveling influence. The privileges of the oldest (and free) group diminish in importance and fall behind the office of nkúmú. The new office is also open to younger and dependent groups.

Sociological Terminology for Kinship Groups

128 Before dealing with the units which are to be regarded as settlement groups, we shall compare the kinship groups of the Ekonda with the sociological ideal types. Keeping in mind the authors mentioned at the beginning, I shall now discuss the various terms used for groups which are applicable to conditions found among the Ekonda. [196]

Family

121 596 The small family is of no importance in the organizational system of the Ekonda. Nevertheless it is very important as the smallest unit of economic life. Each small family is potentially polygynous, but monogynous marriages are more numerous at the present time, especially among the younger generation. In view of this difference between potential and practiced polygyny, it seems advisable to follow Thurnwald in classing the polygamous forms together with the small family and to differentiate its nuclear families (18). In my opinion this approach

18. Vol. 4, p. 12 f.

seems to correspond more closely to its functional importance than Murdock's view, according to which the polygamous family

121 596 together with the large family [Grossfamilie] is put into the category of "composite forms of family" (19). In Thurnwald's "Technical Terms" there are two passages dealing with the large family, one under the heading "Family," p. 12 f., the other under "Large Family," p. 14. Under "Family" Thurnwald writes:

> "...The 'large family' differs from the family in that in the former several generations with a common grandfather live together in the same homestead or even under the same roof. The nuclear families, and the men forming part of them, remain relatively independent. Naturally, even in this unit relatives lacking any protection may be taken into the group. The large family differs from the kinship group (q. v.) in that in the former all its members live in the same dwelling site, and the degree of kinship between the members is mainly seen in a line descending from the head; in addition, it forms an economic unit. A further characteristic feature of the large family lies in the fact that it resembles any family in being tied to the life of the persons who constitute it and that it becomes extinct with them, while a kinship group renews itself automatically. It is, in a manner of speaking, 'eternal'."

Under the heading "Large Family," he writes only: "... The phenomenon of at least three generations descended from one another living together under a common head (grandfather with children and children's children) is defined as 'large family' (see Family, Kinship Group)." There is a discrepancy between these two definitions. If, according to the first definition, a group dissolves upon the death of the persons constituting it, i.e., the oldest generation, the phrase "at least" may be valid for the norm, but not for the specific case. Thurnwald defines the family in the same manner in Lehrbuch der Völkerkunde [Textbook of Ethnology] (20). If we accept Thurnwald's definition -- familia would serve as good examples -- a patrilateral large family could be described as a kinship group, living, working, and maintaining a household together, consisting of a husband, his wives, and all his offspring, and splitting into the large families of his sons upon the death of the father.

Kirchhoff defines the large family in the same fashion, yet he takes care to point out that here, in contrast to a kinship group, persons who have married into the group are part of it (22).

22. Kirchhoff, Zeitschrift für Ethnologie, Vol. 63, p. 90.

Murdock's conception of the "extended family" is identical with this interpretation (23).

23. Murdock, Social Structure, p. 24.

On the other hand, in Vol. 2 (p. 22) Thurnwald regards the large family as a unilateral kinship group with persons who have married into it. This group lives in the same place and is governed by a common chief from whom all the members are supposedly descended. The kinship group, in contrast to the large family, may be scattered. [197] Thus, Thurnwald at this point puts other characteristics in the foreground, but the text allows the conclusion that for Thurnwald the dependence on the life of the head of the families and its temporary nature are the essential characteristics of a large family.

In this sense none of the units described under A-E[1/A] is a large family. The wives who have married into the group belong to the group of the husband, but they always remain part of their father's group; in case of divorce they return to the

[1/A] [pages 9-15, category 116.-Analyst]

596 latter group. Another factor which reminds us of the wife's con-
614 tinuing membership in her original group is the connection, never completely severed, between the groups related by marriage, illustrated by the practice of gifts and counter-gifts which are all part of the bride price and the dowry. When she dies, the
[611] Matrilineal descent is important in relation to marriage restrictions, certain avoidance practices which are passed on through the wives, and also certain privileges. Quite a large number of persons has settled permanently in the group of their mother or that of their grandmothers.

The decisive factor that makes the term "large family" unsuitable is the "eternal" character of the A-E groups of the Ekonda. However, the subdivisions of the A-groups which live together in a common homestead (see p. 10) may be regarded as large families in the sense used by Thurnwald, Kirchhoff, and Murdock.

Kinship Group

614 In the definitions of the term "family" quoted above,
[2] we already learned something about Thurnwald's concept of a kinship group, but there is an additional reference to the technical term "kinship group" ["Sippe"]" (p. 17 f.) (24):

24. Menschliche Gesellschaft, Vol. 4.

"...A kinship group is defined as a clan (q. v.) which is not politically independent. Usually the loss of independence is caused by the distribution of the people of the clan among the various settlements. A kinship group is held together by the consciousness of being descended from the same ancestors and by their common cult of the ancestors. The kinship group is of special importance for the regulation of marriage (q. v.). -- A kinship group may be divided into kinship subgroups (large

> 1. Among the Nkundó no shame is attached to not knowing the family of one's father. But not to be able to name the mother's clan is a great dishonor for it proves that she was a slave.

There is less opposition to the first generation born of a couple who were both slaves than for their parents, and it progressively decreases with each succeeding generation. There is practically no opposition now to the grandsons. The reason seems to be that although receiving a wife from one's master in a regular marriage does not constitute emancipation (wikó, mikola) for the slave, it is a kind of adoption (wémya, -émya). [246] [571]

855 Marriage between members of the same kin group (isangano, bosangema, from the verb -sangema, "to be related") is forbidden. But how far does such a kin group extend? It is impossible to give a general rule. On the one hand, it is certain that if two groups are not descended from a common ancestor there is no bond of kinship between them, even if they live side by side. But on the other hand, it is not possible to say that all those who are descended from the same ancestor are relatives and that marriage is forbidden between the various branches of the grouping they comprise. The question therefore amounts to knowing by which ancestor the exogamous grouping is defined. A decision on this point may only be made through the examination of each case individually.

614 It is impossible to deduce anything from the meaning of the term clan, for it is usually defined as "a grouping of families united to one another by kinship." This leaves us back where we started. The characteristics usually given for a clan are: generic name,

Imana of Elaka (Bongili), one of the Lobengo clan, married Ilolo of Imama (Bongili). With valuables received from his mother's family their son, Bolifo, married three women: Wángi, Bonsi, his favorite, and a slave from Bolaká (Wángatá). When he died, his widows went to the Elaka clan which was the source of his wealth. Two claimants appeared: Eongé (first cousin of the deceased but in [40] Nkundó terminology his son) and Bakutu of Bokenda (Bosomba) also a first cousin, and considered one by the Nkundó. They were to divide the widows. But both of them chose the deceased's favorite and quarreled over her. In the end she was assigned to Bakutu who was the "father" of his rival and the "elder brother" of the deceased. The slave also went to Bakutu, (2) while Eongé had to be satisfied with the first wife. But he and his clan retained a right over these women and their [190] progeny. This is rather an old case; in fact two grandsons of Bakutu and Ilifoló respectively, whom I know very well personally, are now between fifty and sixty years old.

587 Two sisters, Onfika and Bosikaninkele of Ilenge, Ntomba (w'Ingende), were married respectively to Ekombe of Likoala (Besombo, Bombwanja) and Bokongo of Bombisuge wa Ikolo (Besombo). Ngaoja married Bolomba of Ikoka (Bokone). When Bolomba became a widow she was inherited by Likfodi, the first cousin of the deceased on his mother's side, so that the patrimony would not be scattered. She gave Likfodi a daughter, Bosikaninkele, whose bride price he used to get himself a wife, Bomifila (Teresa), daughter of Ilito of Bolingo (Bongili). At Likfodi's death the rights returned to Ntomba (Joseph) in the person of the widow Bombola, the nkita of his uterine sister.

587 If the legitimate heir, or some other close relative of the deceased, wants to marry a widow, he consults the head of the family and then goes to the woman's parents and gives them bekooli (1), which consists of 1 to 3 copper rings, added to the amount of the bride price. This gift shows the suitor's respect for the woman's family. (2) If after a time the woman no longer wants to stay with him, but loves another close relative, the latter also brings his bekooli. This is expected of him even if the woman has not gone home in between, but has gone directly from one man to the other. [191] [191] The bekooli of the first man are then returned.

572 and those who owe submission and respect. The "superior" relatives
602 are the ascendants, uncles, aunts, etc., in short, all those bearing [576] the title of "father" or "mother," as well as elder brothers (older sisters, elder cousins, etc.), who are [illegible] (sing. [illegible]).
● [602] The "inferiors" are the descendants, those who are called "children" (bána): sons and daughters, grandsons, nephews, nieces, younger brothers or sisters, and those who are classed with them and called [illegible] (sing. [illegible]).

[596] [597] 4) Polygamy and the inheritance of widows introduce another element. We will see that although persons of certain degrees of affinity may not marry, the prohibition is lifted to permit the inheritance of widows.

5) Our term "relatives by marriage" the Nkundó term and bakiló are not synonymous, even with respect to direct affinity. When we use the term "relatives by marriage" here, we are speaking in Nkundó terms. They do not consider certain persons whom we would include in that category as "relations by marriage." Such persons
[601] are included in the group which as a whole is designated as likiló or bakiló, but when properly and accurately referred to they are called bóme, "husband," or wáli, "wife," because they may marry each other and therefore affinity, strictly speaking, cannot be applied to them. In other words, for the Nkundó, affinity is the relationship of a person with (only) those of his spouse's relatives whom he is forbidden to marry. It is well to bear in mind the double meaning of this term.

2. The rules

1. Direct Affinity

582 A. Marriages are prohibited in the direct line. Nevertheless, 603 in accordance with consideration number 4, a son or grandson may 606 inherit or marry the widows of his father or grandfather, but not the reverse. [254]

The same rule applies to cousins:

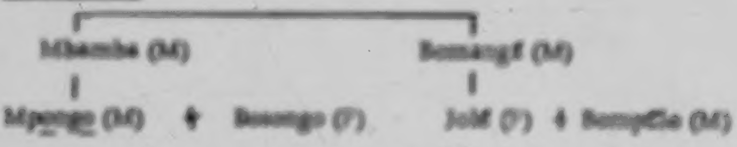
Example 25



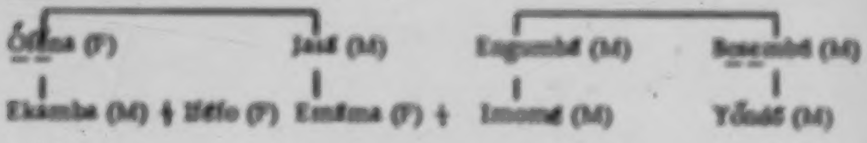
Mbamba (M)
Bomangɛ (M)
Mpongo (M) ǂ Bosongo (F)
Jolɛ (F) ǂ Bompɛlo (M)

Marriage between Bompɛlo and Bosongo is forbidden.

As the degrees of relationship grow more distant, the obstacles increasingly lose their force, so that exceptions are more readily accepted.

One point remains to be noted, although it has already been mentioned several times. Cousins (male or female) who are bɔ̃nankána are "fathers" to their cousins according to Nkundɔ law; they are therefore treated as aunts or uncles. For them the prohibition is very severe, especially if they are nyangɔ̀bikilɔ, "mother" of a relative by marriage. [60]

Example 26



Ɔ́tɛma (F)
Jasɛ (M)
Engombɛ (M)
Bosombɛ (M)
Ekámba (M) ǂ Ifɛlo (F)
Emɛ́ma (F) ǂ
Imomɛ (M)
Yɔ́ndɔ (M)

Ekamba is Jasɛ's bɔ̃nankána and therefore Emɛ́ma's "father." Ifɛlo, his wife, is therefore Emɛ́ma's mother. Emɛ́ma is Yɔ́ndɔ's bokilɔ. Consequently, Ifɛlo is the mother of Yondɔ's bokilɔ and therefore Yondɔ's nyangɔ̀bikilɔ. Marriage between Ifɛlo and Yɔ́ndɔ is strictly prohibited, though it is not prohibited between Emɛ́ma and Yɔ́ndɔ (see Example 15).

Adulterous relations among these various persons will be discussed in Chapter VI, Article VI, 2. [260]

602 brings forth reprimands on the part of the husband and his parents which obviously can easily degenerate into quarrels. If the omissions are so frequent and of such a nature that they can no longer be explained as simply forgetting, a whim, or a fit of peevishness, but [299] are taken to indicate spitefulness or vulgarity, the matter is [657] brought before the nkonga (who is often assisted by the family tribunal) or brought before the authority constituted by the woman's kin. If in spite of everything the expected improvement does not take place, the break-up is inevitable.

606 The husband's father and mother extend the same affection to their son's wife as they feel toward him. They consider her their own child, and it is not unusual to find that their love for the wife equals their feeling for their own son. She is only a relative by marriage, but out of affection for her they call her their child. She, for [609] her part, does not use toward them the term bokango (or bokilo) but out of filial respect calls them "father" and "mother." Exceptions to this practice may be found, however.

606 224 If the father (and those who fall in the same category such as uncles, elder brothers, etc.) kills a large game animal, he is expected to give his son's (or brother's, etc.) wife a piece of meat, whose size depends on the number of daughters-in-law he has and which consists of one or several chops (bokaloko) (1) and the piece at the nape of the neck (botombyá).

606 835 Illicit relations between the husband's father and his daughter-in-law would be an unheard of crime. The same would be true with respect to any of the "superior" relatives. (2) The laws regulating

[178] [184] 2. Only the Boangi -- like the Elángá of the Losanganya -- allow relations between a brother and the wife of his junior; and they are already beginning to find imitators among their neighbors to the southeast, the Injolo.

606 115 the relations between a wife and her husband's parents are closely connected with the rules pertaining to the prohibition related to affinity and seems to spring from the same source. Therefore it will be useful to have in mind what we have said in the preceding chapter, Article IV.

607 The husband's elder brothers treat his wife as their sister. The wife calls her husband's sisters [300] bokilo, but out of respect she often gives them the title of "mother." (1)

[609] 1. Among the Elinga the wife also calls her husband's sisters bongili (pl. bangili); they call her bonangili (pl. banangili). A wife often calls her husband's mother nyangobangili. Bonangili l'ibangili means "the brother's wives and their sisters-in-law."

587 After the husband's death, as has been said see here, his father or his brother may marry his widow. But this practice is not well regarded and is permitted only rarely, chiefly when the scattering of the family patrimony is feared or if the two interested parties have an unusual love for each other.

837 602 With respect to children or younger brothers and all those who fall into that category, the situation is altogether different. Illicit relations with wives of their father, grandfather, uncle, elder brother, or elder cousin, are judged much less severely. Generally, misconduct does not give rise to claims for payment, or the payment is demanded "for form's sake" and consists of a hen and a bunch of bananas. By means of this payment the guilty one recognizes his error and renders homage to the right of his elder.

[626] In general public opinion condemns these relations and often with great severity. The question of degree of kinship as well as other considerations result in a great diversity among the cases, so we will examine each situation separately and distinguish each time between the husband's reaction and that of public opinion.

613 they always refer to their descent from the ancestor-founder: "We are baseka Ngoi (descendants of Ngoi; we belong to the clan of Ngoi)."

Naturally the Nkundo-Mongo know very well that all the Mongo clans are descended from a common ancestor. They even believe in the common descent of all people. However, in clan unity they only go back to that ancestor who made their group legally autonomous, who made himself independent.

To that group belong, thus, all the children of that founder, all of the children of his sons, all of the children of his grandsons and great-grandsons; thus, all those who keep the same family name in our society.

The Nkundo-Mongo call the clan from the father's side their wise, from ise (father). The children of the lawfully married daughters belong to another wise, since they go back on their father's side to another ancestor. However, children of an unmarried daughter of the [848] clan continue to bear their mother's name, and thus belong to the wise of the mother, just as, in our society, they take on the family name of the mother.

Married women, however, continue ethnically to belong to their own paternal clan and do not form part of the wise of their husband.

2. Kinship Terms in the Paternal Clan

601 613 All of the living members of the paternal clan constitute one extended family. In the bosom of that one family, all members of the same /151/ generation also bear the same title. All of the members of the grandfather's generation are grandfathers. All the members of the father's generation are fathers, also including the female members. Thus, the sisters and female cousins of the father who belong to the wise are all called "female fathers": isomoto or faomoto (from ise or fafa, father, and bomoto, woman). All of the older brothers and male cousins of the wise are batomolo; all younger brothers or male cousins of the wise are bakune; all sisters or female cousins of the wise are nkana. All of the children of brothers and male cousins, and also all of the children of sisters and female cousins who remain in the wise, are bana (children).

601 561 613 Such terms are to us, of course, a never ending source of mistakes complications, and ridicule. The native cannot possible understand this and underneath takes it very much amiss. Socially, legally, and

601 politically, his whole society is, in fact, based on those relationships
561 which are incomprehensible to us. Indeed, the order of duty and re-613 sponsibility, of authority and honor, are socially, legally, and politically determined by the order of birth. That order is determined by generation, and within the generation, by age: from the oldest father down the whole line of fathers to the oldest "child" in the whole row of children. The children of your older brother, even if they are younger in years, go before your own children. As we shall see later, the female members of the family, who practically fall outside this order, recover their place of honor through their sons.

613 From this short description of the paternal clan, it is immediately apparent that the clan is not a geographical concept among the K Nkundo. Wherever the daughter may marry, wherever the son may wander in service to the Whites, that person always and everywhere continues by law to belong to his wise, and he remains bound to all the rights and duties of his place in that community.

602 It also appears that clan and blood relationship do not come any-613 where near to blanketing each other. Each "blood relationship" of the Nkundo extends itself over various paternal clans, since the blood relations of the mother, as well as the descendants of all the other women of my wise who are lawfully married out of the clan, belong to another wise.

/152/ 3. Inheritance in the Clan

613 Each clan has possessions that constitute the inheritance or patrimony 421 of the members, the domain of the family. These goods are of two kinds: economic and dotal. The former are subdivided into real property, or inalienable property, and personal property.

The real property of the clan consists of land and waters. The land 613 is divided into: arable land, land for gardens, and hunting areas.
423 These constitute common property, whose cultivation or usufruct is divided among the members of the clan: each one receives his garden land and hunting ground to clear; as soon as the user leaves it, that ground is free again for the community. Palm groves, of course, also remain common property of the members. A similar arrangement applies to water rights. Larger fishing areas remain common property and are, under the leadership of the clan head, communally exploited.
Smaller fishing grounds, creeks, ponds, etc., are allotted to each

613 authority (mpifo). Each clan can, however, also take in other persons 614 who fall outside the order of authority, but who legally belong to the 608 clan. Along with the real descendants, they make up the legal clan.

These are, in the first place, the wives who have married into the clan, the children brought with them (mbusola), and the lawful housekeepers. In addition, there are the clients who have been taken in; then the war prisoners and slaves; and finally the Pygmies. The women married into the clan are naturally separate, as are also the Pygmies who form a completely separate community. The others are gradually treated as children, receive their part in the general responsibility and protection, their place in the court session, etc. Depending on the degree to which they develop in the bosom of the clan which has taken them in, they can constitute a separate group in it, which becomes more and more independent.

7. The Maternal Clan

602 Each Nkundo has a double "fatherland": his wise and his bonyango.
613 The bonyango is the paternal clan of his mother. His mother gave birth to him there; her blood relations live there and receive him with motherly love and will protect him against all difficulties; he has often passed a large part of his happiest childhood years there; and there he can always find a safe shelter when, for one reason or another, he might lose the paternal clan.

The structure of the maternal clan naturally resembles that of the paternal clan in every way. If we treat it specially here, it is not in order to speak of the form, but only to point out the specific rights that each person has in his maternal clan.

602 so all of the brothers and sisters of my mother are my "mothers."
613 Mother's brother, that is, my maternal uncle, I call ngompame, nyangompame. All the nephews and nieces on the mother's side are my "children." A special tie binds me to the children of the nkita of my mother, that is, to the children of the women who was acquired by the maternal clan with the bride price /158/ that had been paid for my mother by my wise. Mother is, thus, the nkolo, the woman or mistress, of those children who call me their father.

602 As long as I continue to live in my own paternal clan, I have the 613 right to special care and love from the maternal clan. If I cannot find 602 613 sufficient dowry at home, then I can always go and appeal to my maternal uncles who are obliged to help me insofar as they are able. I even have the right to the free dowry of one of the children of my mother's nkita. I may always lay out gardens and hunt in the territory of my bonyango, and take part in the court sessions of the maternal clan when they consider the allotment of the free dowries or the division of the inheritance. If, however, I wish to leave my father's clan and establish myself for good in the maternal clan, then I receive priority in everything over my male and female cousins and become heir and clan leader directly after my maternal uncles. This is, thus, a truly princely compensation for the so-called inferiority of the woman in native society: the child of the sister (bonankana) restores her gloriously to the honor and rank which are due her.

8. Related Clan: Likilo

602 601 Outside my paternal clan and outside my maternal clan, I still have blood relations: namely, the children of my paternal aunt and of my sisters or female cousins, each of whom belongs to the clan of his own father. Just as the children of my mother's brothers are my children, so the children of my father's sister are also my fathers. I am, thus, in the same relationship to the children of my mother's brother as the children of my father's sister are to me.

The other members of the related clans (who are thus not blood relations) all share, according to generation, in the classification of immediate relatives: all the "fathers" of the husband are "fathers-in-law"; all the mothers, "mothers-in-law"; etc. There is this single big difference, that the "superiors" of the husband are also your "superiors." According to the opinions of the Nkundo, they are the only real relatives. Those on the husband's side are called bokilo; those on the wife's side, bokanga.

/159/ The "subordinates" of the husband are not real relatives and rightly call each other "husband" and "wife." In various legally [582] defined circumstances, marriage relations and marriages are permitted between the latter.

It is unnecessary to repeat that all of the members of the reciprocal clans share in these relationships: the whole generation of a clan

602 601 member is, as it were, identified with that member, so that, for instance, all younger sisters and female cousins of one spouse become "wives" of all the younger brothers and male cousins of the other spouse. One must really have the legal sense and the patience and the capacity for palaver and unravelling of an old Nkundo to make sense out all of these relationships. They themselves compare them, in fact, with the inextricable clew of the intestines of a sort of dwarf crocodile: besofo bya lokekele.

9. Exogamy

613 582 The term, "exogamic clan," often heard or encountered in writings, is also, at least in the Nkundo-Mongo society, very misleading. The group of persons with whom marriage is forbidden does not constitute any common entity; it differs from person to person. Two half brothers can have the same paternal clan but differ in maternal clan; they can have the same maternal clan and different paternal clans. Marriages are forbidden for older brothers and sisters that are permitted for the younger ones. The rules differ from one blood relation to another, from blood relation with relative-by-marriage to blood relation with relative-by-marriage, from relative-by-marriage with relative-by-marriage to relative-by-marriage with relative-by-marriage.

If one still wishes to put the law of exogamy into European terms, then one might say: 1) blood relationship forbids marriage insofar as the blood relationship is recognized. This recognition varies from clan group to clan group. Sometimes in the same legal but extended clan, an exception is made to this recognition; mostly, however, the different autonomous clans which descend from the same distant ancestor are still bound by the law of exogamy. Generally, groups which have the same father but a different mother /160/ separate most quickly. 2) Relationship (other than blood) forbids marriage—insofar as the relationship is recognized between the parents of spouses; it sometimes permits marriage between children of spouses.

613 582 184 Here it should be observed once again, however, that the customs differ from region to region as regards this recognition; that, for instance, the stepson in many regions may marry his stepmother in a regular marriage; and that the violations are less severely judged and punished in proportion to the degree to which the forbidden relationships diverge.

583 428 426 young man can pay for his wife, or rather pay her bride price with his own earned money, then that wife becomes his property. At his death, no creditors or mortgage holders can come to demand the wife since she will then actually be free. There will also be no difficulty in making her heir to the property of her husband, for herself and her children. The bride price or payment for wives among the civilized Blacks could be very much simplified. To abolish it would not be so easy. Indeed, it seems to be in the customs and the habits of the whole Black race. Then too, with respect to bride price, usually still in entanglements with their heathen relatives.

000 When the price is lowered, the large number of wives of polygynists will be seen to disperse and go to the men who have no wife. Thus, single marriages will be increased, and the district, whose population is greatly decreased, will become populated again. Lowering the price will also prevent women being paid for with women; and thus the trading of women will be hindered, since then the whole bride price can be paid in currency. It is also anticipated that the woman will become less a material object; and by changing the wife from an object of inheritance to an heiress, her moral value will be raised in her own eyes and in the eyes of the men.

In order to civilize the land, Christian marriages must be established. In order to establish Christian marriages, the impediments that stand in the way must be removed, and everything be put to work to benefit what the good outcome of that can assure.

602 another group. According to their relationship to others, groups may be designated as:

- brother, younger or older;
- brother or half brother (descended from various wives of the polygynous ancestor);
- [848] Illegitimate child of the sister which, legally, as the child of the oldest brother or of the father of his mother, belongs to the group of the mother's relatives;
- child of a boy who together with his sister has moved to the unit of his brothers-in-law and has settled there permanently;
- son of a sister, who for some reason has separated from his paternal relatives and has moved in with the group of his mother or of one of his grandmothers.

621 In this paper we shall describe the Isangi group (12) as an

12. Müller, Fürstentum [Kingdom], pp. 68 ff., 125, 128 ff.

[101] example of hierarchical kinship structure. Isangi is a local group of the type described above (p. 1). Following the custom of the region, I shall refer to it as a "village." Until we have decided which terms are applicable to the various groups, I shall use the letters A to E for the individual ranks of the hierarchical structure. Within this system A shall stand for the smallest and E for the largest units (see Diagram 2).[1]

In addition to the three ranks of Group D in Isangi, there are others in the daughter villages (see Diagram 1). These may also include foreign groups, as, for example, the "Nkundó" group, Liimbu, in Wengá.

● 601 621 614 Bonsonga and etúká are terms used for kinship groups of ranks B, C, and D, but occasionally they may also refer to [192] the groups listed under A and, in addition, to the local groups which in size approximately correspond to the kinship units mentioned above. Etúká is the term used for the oil palm grove and for a certain kind of termite hill; apparently it is used for local groups more frequently than the term bonsonga.

[571] [535] Another term whose meaning varies is ekíndá. This word designates, first of all, a dance group, a corps de ballet, and also the social unit which sends such a joint dance troupe to dance festivals.

Esé also has strong local connotations. It is usually identical with what we call a village, but frequently units which are larger or smaller than a village are designated as esé. Very large groups, tribes and even larger units, are called bonanga.

614 As a criterion for placing the individual groups within a certain rank, one or several functions have been chosen in each case. The groups of the individual ranks are described below relative to their functions. On the subject of groups it should be added that in general they do not differ from each other in certain traits. All groups of all ranks are kinship units of patrilineal descent. They consider themselves descendants of one ancestor. No continuous and complete genealogy which can be traced back to the original ancestor is known. The genealogy of the entire group of the Bakonda is shown in Diagram 1.

In Isangi two of the ancestors of the groups of rank D are brothers, the third is the brother of their father. A D-group (Ngelé) includes, in addition, the descendants of an illegitimate child of the paternal sister of the ancestor. These offspring form the C-group, Nsambásálá.

There is a gap between this ancient genealogy and the known ancestors from the recent past. In contrast with that of the neighboring Bokóté [Bokete] (see, for example, Boelaert, [173] "Les Bongili"), the genealogical memory of the Ekonda is weak. It does not reach back to the ancestor of the group of rank A. In this connection we must take into account the fact that a group

101 114 [218] The Nkundo [Nkundu], or Mongo, are an important ethnic group of the central basin of the Belgian Congo. They are patriarchal (1). I lived among their west-central tribes for 20 years.

614 We call a clan, in the ethnic sense, the group of paternal blood relatives who have an autonomous territory in common. This resembles closely what Anglo-Saxon researchers like to call a "lineage" (2).

I. Wise

601 614 A Nkundo calls his own clan his wise, from the word ise which means "father." My wise thus includes:

1. My paternal grandfather and his brothers and sisters who are called nkoko (pl., bankoko), "grandfather, grandmother."

2. The sons of my male bankoko, including my own father, all of whom are my "fathers" (ise; pl., baise).

The sisters of my "fathers" are my "female fathers" (isomoto, composed of isé and bomoto, "woman").

3. The sons of my "fathers" are my older brothers (botomolo; pl., batomolo) and younger brothers (bokune; pl., bakune). The daughters of my "fathers" are my sisters (nkâna; pl., bankâna).

1. The rules and many details of the classificatory system of the Nkundo have already been set forth in Le Mariage des Nkundo by Father G. Hulstaert (Belgian Royal Colonial Institute, 1938).

2. The quotations in this article are from The Pattern of Hera Kinship, by J. F. Holleman (Capetown University Press, for Rhodes-Livingstone Institute, 1949).

614 The children of my "female fathers" do not belong to my clan.

4. Like my children, the children of my older and younger brothers are my "children" (bona; pl., bana). The Nkundo does not have any special terms for "son" and "daughter." He simply says "male child" and "female child."

5. The children of my "sons" are my grandchildren (bonkana; pl., bankana).

6. The children of these male grandchildren are my great grandchildren (bonkanola; pl., bankanola).

II. Bonyango

The mother's clan is called bonyango, from the word nyango, "mother," and includes:

1. The mother's father and his brothers, who are also nkoko.
2. Their daughters, including my own mother, who are "mothers" (nyango; pl., banyango). The brothers of my "mothers" are my "male mothers" (nyangompame; pl., ba-).
3. The sons and daughters of my "male mothers," who are thus of my generation in our sense but who, to the Nkundo, are my "children," since to them I am legally identified with my mother and therefore I am their "male mother." This explains [602] the unusual and privileged position which I hold in my mother's clan.
4. The children of my "children" are my "grandchildren."

[219] [Table 1 appears here.] [220]

602 A Nkundo has other blood relatives scattered among the clans who have married a woman of his own clan, be it a "female father," a sister, or a daughter. A Nkundo calls all the unrelated members of these clans bokanga. The related members, including children born to the women of his clan, he calls impersonally sisters' children, "children of a sister of the clan" (bonankana; pl.,

In addition, he has maternal blood relatives, children of my mother's sisters, who are thus his "brothers and sisters," or children of the daughters of his "male mothers." Since these last daughters are his "children," their children would be his "grandchildren." Again, all the members of these clans who are unrelated by blood are his bokanga.

IV. Likilo

601 602 582 There are affinal clans which have given wives (wali; pl., baali) to my clan. This does not, of course, concern my mother's clan, which is a clan related by blood, but rather clans which have given wives, be it to a classificatory "father," to one of their sons, or to one of the sons of the latter. The Nkundo calls all the members of these clans -- with the exception of the woman -- bokilo (pl., bakilo). The Nkundo, merely by marrying a woman, at the same time marries all her legal younger sisters, that is to say, all the bakune [Ed., bankana?] and bana of this woman. Similarly, the woman marries not only a man, but at the same time all his legal younger brothers, that is, all the bakune and bana of this man (except the children of their own union).

601 602 Just as the clans which have received a wife from my clan thus include bokanga and sisters' sons, so also clans that have given us a wife include bakilo and "wives." Clans which have given a wife to my bonyango follow the same rules.

Comments

121 614 602 In several recent studies, especially in South Africa, four rules have been defined which govern classificatory terminology.

The first rule is that of the "unity of the lineage": The lineage as a whole is classified as belonging to a particular 'generation'

121 614 602 601 Just as we speak of a mother society or a sister society, so the Nkundo can also consider an affinal clan as a moral person and speak of his mother's clan as of his mother, of a bokanga clan, of a bokilo clan. I do not think that the term bokanga or bokilo implies an idea of generation when it is applied to an individual, any more than does the French term "parent-in-law," or member of my family-in-law. The Nkundo would certainly not admit what the author cited here writes [221] [Table 2 appears here.] [222] about the Hera: "in inter-lineage relations, . . . once the relationship between Ego and any cognatic relative is determined, all the cognates of the same lineage as that relative will bear the same degree of kinship as himself to Ego, regardless of the differences in generation . . . between themselves or as compared with Ego" (p. 5.).

The second rule would be that the clan which provides us a wife (bokilo clan of the Nkundo) is considered our "father," and thus the clan which receives a wife from our clan would be considered a "son." Moreover, among the Nkundo is understood: "We have given you our daughter as a wife, so you are our son." But also implied is: "We have enriched you by our marriage payment, and our children are your "fathers." These ideas, however, are not reflected in the terminology between affinals. Moreover, the fact that the Nkundo readily uses the term bokilo for his bokanga is significant.

Third rule: In lineages directly related to Ego's lineage, "the female line seems to be potentially one 'generation' lower than the agnatic male line" (p. 11). The author tells us that: "This duality is even revealed in agnatic relations . . . Ego calls his . . . father's sister either vatete (father's sister) or hanzwadzi (sister)." Thus, the women of directly related clans would be considered to belong to a lower generation than the men.

Bakanga Clans
All those undesignated = bakanga
[*frère = brother in French]

Bakilo Clans
All those undesignated = bakilô
w = wali (wife)

121 602 614 601 It must be stated that the tables of the bakanga clans presented by the author do not reflect this rule, since all members of these clans not related by blood, males as well as females, are designated as vakwasha = children-in-law. In the bakilo clans the rule seems to be founded on the Hera idea (according to the interpretation of the author) that all the women of my wife's clan are my "wives," no matter what their generation or age. This rule is not applicable to the Nkundo either in ideas or terminology.

There is still the fourth rule which the author quoted here uses often but does not interpret in his tables where it is completely opposed to the second rule: the child is legally identified with its mother. According to the second rule, the child of my father's sister would be my grandchild, and at the same time, according to the fourth rule, it would be my "father."

For the Nkundo, the fourth rule explains how this child is my "father," while the child of my mother's brother is my "child."

One may thus conclude that two rules explain the details of the classificatory system of the Nkundo:

1. In clans which have given a wife to our clan, all the women who are legally younger sisters of this wife, exclusively, are "wives" of all the men, exclusively, who are legally younger brothers of the husband.

2. In clans which have received a wife from our clan, the children born of this wife are identified with their mother by the children of this wife's brothers.

581 Moral qualities are often involved in the choice of a wife. But strictly speaking, the marriage is not one of reason; the cause of it is more likely to be affection.

The affective and sexual aspects of the question require longer discussion.

Therefore this chapter is divided into two parts:

I. The emotional life
II. The sexual life of the Nkundó [24]

Part 1

The Emotional Life of the Nkundó

000

[Editor's Note: The Nkundó are capable of real affection. That affection takes varying forms and attains different degrees according to the nature of the persons in question. In successive articles, we will treat:

I. Affection among relatives
II. A special form of the latter: the creation of a Bolúmbú
III. Friendship
IV. Love between husband and wife]

Article I. Affection among Relatives

152
602 The Nkundó feel a deep affection toward members of their kin group. I am of the opinion that they love them as much, if not more, than most Europeans, but are not capable of as great a devotion. To understand this condition, one need only consider that affection is instinctive. Our people say: botéma nd'iko̱ma, "the heart is like a package," that is to say, it does not choose the object of its love, but rather the object presents itself spontaneously. (1) Devotion on the other hand almost always involves reasoning and is founded on a high morality based on religion. Furthermore, the questions (of property, inheritance, etc.) which so often divide relatives from each other do not exist among the Nkundô, whose patrimony is held in common. [25] Among them the members of a family need each other absolutely and constantly; they cannot sustain the struggle for existence unless they remain well united. A man isolated from his kin is a pariah, for in all matters of importance he must count on them for help, protection, and defense. Therefore he is, so to speak, forced to make common cause with the rest of the family and to keep his proper place within it.

This may help us to understand that among these people there are fewer reasons for a cooling of family affections and more reasons for maintaining good relations. But it would be wrong to attribute their love to some kind of egoistic calculation. Their affection is sincere and spontaneous. But the above facts explain why the dis-[578] unity and quarrels which are so frequent in Europe are unknown among the Nkundô; they are settled at once and do not have time to become bitter or deeply rooted. A very rare exception does not invalidate this generalization.

1. Parents and children

593ˣ Parents sincerely love their children. Their affection is not lessened with age; there is only a somewhat greater tenderness toward the very young, whom they readily carry and fondle. The indulgence which they show for the faults of their offspring is tempered by anger when they are exasperated by misbehaviour, more often than by a rational concern for the child's training. The spouse who has not suffered from the child's error does not react against him but on the contrary is led by his affection to protect him. Parents insistently try to excuse and defend their children when they have misbehaved. (1)

1. It should be noted that the same thing may also frequently be done among many Europeans.

Nevertheless, the general good of the clan wins out over affection.

593 152 × With reference to signs of affection, grief at the time of death, etc., the observations made for parent-child relationships hold true here -- mutatis mutandis.

3. Various relatives

● 602 The Nkundo's affection extends toward all members of his family, that is, all those with whom he feels linked by blood and common origin. These relatives are much greater in number than in Europe, because Nkundó kinship includes many more generations. The intensity of affection decreases with the distance of the degree of kinship. But the Nkundó knows and feels that he belongs to a large family, and he remains attached to all its members. He can find a home with any of them. This accounts for the fact that in the centers, men from the same village will look for each other and consider [621] each other "brothers." Actually, that is what they are, since in general each village consists of only a single kin group.

Although here, as in the case of brothers and sisters, common interests play a part in maintaining bonds between family members, the feelings of affection are not based on selfish considerations. The latter only reinforce these feelings, which are truly innate among the Nkundó. Among the various relatives the strongest attachments are developed between grandparents and grandchildren, uncles and aunts and nephews and nieces, male cousins and female cousins, etc.

603 Among the Nkundó as among Europeans there is a very strong affection between grandparents and grandsons, even greater, one might say, than between parents and children (the expression is: bŏna [30] l'onkánâ, ndekí nd'ônkánâ). But the relationship degenerates into compliance and weakness on one side, and into disrespectful carelessness on the other.

604 A Nkundó loves his paternal uncles and aunts and treats them like "fathers," and his maternal uncles and aunts like "mothers." Naturally, his feelings toward them are not as affectionate as for his parents, but they are an extension of these in an attenuated form.

605 The same situation holds true for the bonds which link him to his cousins, whom he calls "brothers" and "sisters." The children of his paternal aunt are his "fathers," however.

Article II. The Bolɔ́mbɔ́

562 556 178 In the old days, if an extremely rich man wanted to show his affection for one of his daughters and show off his wealth, he made that daughter bolɔ́mbɔ́. Today this custom has almost completely disappeared. (1) It has been almost impossible to maintain the practice because of a greater distribution of wealth and the reduction of leisure due to the work imposed by the white man. This work has been imposed directly in the form of forced labor, labor on roads, economic projects, etc., or indirectly because a sum had to be raised for the payment of taxes. All this has made it more difficult to bring large numbers of people together for ceremonies lasting days and weeks. (2) Nevertheless, the custom must be described here.

> 2. One might suppose that the new uses of wealth made possible by economic development would have contributed to the disappearance of this custom. Theoretically such might have been the case, but in fact these developments were not involved in the change that has been noted.

562 556 [602] When a native wanted his favorite daughter to become bolɔ́mbɔ́, he had first to obtain the consent and financial support of all his kin. Then enormous preparations were made, for everything had to be special -- beverages, various foods, dances. On the date which had been set and made known through messengers to the entire region, an enormous crowd gathered at his house. Public festivities went on day after day. In an address suited to the occasion, he announced to those assembled his intention to set his daughter up as a bolɔ́mbɔ́. Two relatives or two of the father's wives then stripped off the girl's

584 The ndonga is the guardian-keeper of the marriage; he is chosen by the parties involved and his participation as intermediary, witness, conciliator, or arbiter is required at every stage of the union. He is an official in the sense that his authority is derived from the very law which governs marriage in Nkundó society.

First of all, the ndonga is the indispensible intermediary for the payment of the bride price. Without him there is no legitimate marriage: Nkó ndonga óbóka baúmba ô lontubú, bǒna ale ô bonto, "Without a ndonga you are throwing your valuables away at a total loss, and your daughter is but a slave," that is, she is not a wife. Legally, only the ndonga is qualified to act as witness.

The importance attached by the natives to the ndonga's participation is apparent in every moment of daily life. Thus if a woman has been beaten by her husband, her family can be heard to say: "Our daughter (sister) is no slave; she was paid for through the agency of a ndonga," bǒn'ǒkisó áfa bokwála, bowéngákí é la ndonga. Or she herself will retort in this manner, mutatis mutandis, to her husband or his family when in her opinion she is not being treated properly.

602 In order to serve as ndonga for a particular marriage, a person must be related at the same time to both the future husband and wife or, as they say in Lonkundo, to be mbótswá. Nowadays, because of the migrations of the natives, the ndonga who meet this qualification are rare in the centers and often cannot be found at all. Therefore, it has been necessary to adapt the traditional law to the situation. Hence a practice has developed [108] under such critical circumstances which consists in taking as one's ndonga a man whose integrity is generally recognized and who has every reason to be impartial and interested in the stability of the marriage. Thus it often happens that chief catechists assume the functions and responsibilities of this role.

583ˣ received as bride price for a sister, aunt, niece, cousin, etc.

If he has no female relatives (eánanyɛ́, bomena), or if no bride price to which he is entitled remains, he may receive a part or all of the needed capital from his father. The various members of his family each obtain either 2, 5, or from 10 to 20 rings for him [454] that they have been able to save from bride prices they have received or which they have acquired as belonga (see Chapter VI, Article V, 1), as any kind of remuneration (for work, for judging in a palaver, for mediation as ndonga, etc.), the sale price for animals, streams, or ponds, or as damages or settlement of some debt.

583ˣ ●602 Indeed the worst mischance that may befall a man in love is not to have a bride price readily available and to have to set out in search of the necessary valuables anywhere he can find them. These trips take a good deal of time. For these things are not done with the great speed of nervous Europeans. He cannot simply send a message [133] to uncle X or to the husband of aunt Y, or even go to them and explain the purpose of the visit, and expect to be able to leave at once with a present. His hosts keep him for days and weeks. "Wait a bit, I will find some for you; stay a while longer, then we'll see; it's been so long since we've seen you, you can't leave so fast," etc. Quite often in fact it is entirely in the young man's interest not to leave in a hurry; he must sometimes perform a great many small services for them to win their good will, and it is even expected that he will perform larger tasks such as helping with clearing, building a hut, hunting, etc. A European would need the patience of an angel. But even the young natives, who are sometimes relatively nervous and excited, especially because they want to conclude the matter of the bride price, and who in any case do not as yet possess the calm of the older people to whom they go, must be capable of resignation and perseverance. Hence the proverbs: lokámo ntákundóláká bakonga ndá [539] lifaya, "haste will not dig up rings in foreign territory" (bakonga are often buried in the ground for better safekeeping -- a useful precaution particularly in the past, when there were brawls between villages, and raids), and bomwa w'inkíné ntásingóláká bakonga ndá lokendo, "a child's mouth does not unroll rings in the course of travels" ("unroll" -- that is, from the feet of the wife of the relative being visited).

583x ● 602 Thus there is no special family treasure upon which the various members can draw to obtain wives. But since bride prices paid out generally come from bride prices received, and all the wealth which comes to the family as such (that is, which is not the result of purely individual and personal work by one member) is to some extent owned by the members in common, it may be said in a sense that all the members of a family share rights in the wealth of the group. However, their rights exist only to the [134] extent of their kinship and as regulated by the family council.

Even members of the family who are not legally required to do so are not unwilling to give to a relative whatever portion they can save for him. Nevertheless, I know of isolated instances where assistance was refused, either out of avarice or of opposition to the proposed marriage. But such a refusal is a neglect of the duties of kinship, and its gravity depends on the relationship between the individuals involved. (1) A refusal on the part of the mother's family almost never occurs. For they have been enriched by the bride price received for the young man's mother, and consequently he is always entitled to the bride price paid for one of the daughters of his mother's nkita (a nkita is a woman obtained by means of the bride price that has been paid).

583x 604 Therefore he goes to his maternal uncle (nyangó-mpámé (2) or nya-ngóbika among the Wăngatá, Bakáala, and Lifumba). This uncle always helps him, whether his means are great or small. Under certain conditions the nephew may even claim rights over his uncle's harem. But here we must distinguish between different cases. (Let us

1. Remember what has already been said, namely that we must always clearly distinguish among duties imposed by law and those imposed by kinship, friendship, decorum, courtesy, and social proprieties.

2. Literally, "male mother."

583^ 607 [595] of the bongíji." (1)

1. This term also designates the wife of a polygamist who has brought along one of her relatives as co-wife; she is the nyangôngili [sic] of the latter. (See Chapter VII, Article IV.)

For "to obtain a nkita" the Nkundó say -umba nkita, literally, "to fell a nkita," as one fells a tree or an adversary. Or they may say -bâta nkita, "to possess a nkita" (umba or bâta so-and-so, la nkita). "To become a nkita" would be rendered as -kwɛ́ nkita, "to fall into being a nkita."

583× 596 The hierarchy of those entitled to the bride price is based on the general hierarchy of family members, which gives precedence to the older generations and, within each generation, to the older members. Consequently, as long as a member of the family having the title of isɛ́ (father) is unmarried (unless he is physically or mentally incompetent), no bɔ̌na (son) is entitled to a bride price, even if it is that of his own sister. Within the same generation, the older members have precedence over the [165] younger ones, but boys have priority rights to the bride price of their uterine sisters. (1)

1. For limitations and exceptions to this right, see Chapter IV, Article II.

It occurs quite often, and was even more frequent in the past, that the person entitled to the bride price is still too young to get married, either in reality or in the opinion of his "fathers." (2) The bride price is consequently used for the benefit of another member of the family. The creditor reaps the benefits later in the form of inheritance.

2. See ibid.

●[602] Even if the woman or women meant for him should die or be taken in slavery, he can obtain the bride price of a cousin to which

●602 In these instances there is a temporary suspension of rights or rather a change in the individual entitled to them. These adjustments are made very frequently and can affect several people. Bride prices may even fall to fairly distant relatives, even in the maternal line. The transactions are performed by the patriarchs for the greatest good of the family as a whole. New rights benefiting the person originally entitled to the bride price are being created, and 583x 607 the woman married by its means has become the equivalent of a nkita in relation to him -- as is the following instance:

Bakutu b'Ŏfóngé (Boniface) of Bombénga w'ŏkenda (Besombó, Bombwanja) has a sister Wétsi, whose bride price serves to provide his paternal uncle, Elongama éy'ituta, with a wife, Ikókó of Ndongó-Bongílí. Bakutu's rights over his niece, Bakutu, daughter of Bolófo, are transferred to Boféndá d'Ekákola, son of his paternal great-aunt Etáka and therefore, in Nkundó terminology, to his father. As a result he obtains the rights over the bride price of Wăngi, the daughter of his uncle [166] and Ikókó. At the same time he acquires a certain authority over Boféndá, the beneficiary of the bride price that was originally intended for him, and over the latter's children.

When the bride price is meant to procure a nkita, there is nothing to prevent the remainder, should there be any, from being used to pay a debt, a fine, etc., or, more especially, from being given to a relative so that he can procure a wife for himself.

If, in an exceptional case, the bride price is not used for its [684] original purpose, this deviation constitutes an infraction of the law, because it is a violation of the rights of the girl for whom the bride price was paid, for she is thus deprived of her nkita and consequently of certain advantages. It may happen, however, that there is a conflict between this law and some other. In such cases of circumstances beyond one's control, it is up to the legal authorities to determine which of the two has priority.

Such was the case of Boléi, daughter of Ĭfolí y'Ŏngámá, of the Baséká Longwâne of Bonjoku (Bonkoso). She was married to Bombélenga 583x 607 of Likolí. The bride price went to her uncle Botóló, because her father had been taken prisoner of war by the Bongale. The family council decided to free Ǐfolí before contemplating the acquisition of a wife. Botóló therefore paid his brother's ransom. Naturally, Boléi was greatly annoyed to have to submit to this decision but, taking everything into consideration, she too thought that the liberation of her father had priority over her right to a nkita, of whom she was now deprived. For although the Bongale were able to obtain a wife thanks to the ransom, the wife was not Boléi's nkita, since each family takes only its own members into consideration.

583x ● 602 607 As we have already implied, the nkóló derives certain advantages from "possessing" a nkita. Her superior position, from the Nkundó point of view, entitles her to respect and to some assistance. An even greater advantage is her right to the dowry. As we have [167] seen, a husband keeps a small part of the dowry for household necessities; the greater part of it goes to the nkóló. Finally, the son of the nkóló has the right to his say in his mother's clan, because it has been enriched by means of valuables paid by his father's clan. He also has the right to cultivate land belonging to his mother's clan and to settle on it. Furthermore, when a member of his mother's clan is enabled to obtain a wife by means of these valuables, he has certain rights over the children of his mother's nkita, and even over the nkita herself. (1)

In relation to the children of his mother's nkita -- whom he calls his bekwá (2) or his mother's benkita (benkita bĕkámí bĕkí ngóya) -- the nkóló's son has the following rights: ✓

1) The right to respect and assistance.

2) The right to sit on the family council which decides on the division of the inheritance (so that the deceased's own son cannot have

1. See above, Article IV, 3, and Chapter III, Article II.

2. Singular bokwá. The term is derived from the verb -kwá or -kwé, "to fall" (see above).

583 a share of his father's goods without the consent of his nkóló) or the 602 use of the bride prices received for the daughters.

607 3) If he cannot obtain a wife through his own clan, he is entitled to the bride price of one of his bekwá if it is not first needed by one of her own uncles or brothers. The rights of the latter have priority over that of the nkóló, unless he settles in his mother's clan. For in that case his rights have precedence over those of the brothers (though never those of an uncle), and he is next in line, after his uncles, to become head of the family. Since he is sister's son, the uncle's children call him "father" just as they call his mother, their paternal aunt, by the name of isómoto ("female father"). He himself calls his first cousins bǎna, "children," and thus has precedence over them. [168]

Thus the rights to authority over the daughters of the nkita on the part of the nkóló's son are limited by the rights of the uncles and, to a certain degree, of the brothers. (1) But in the inheritance of widows the rights of the nkóló's son operate fully, and he may claim the one acquired by means of his bokwá's bride price, who in a way is his nkita (when she is assigned to him they say balá ékě nkita, "here is your nkita").

These rules can result in multiple transactions and in a repeated transferring of rights from one of the two clans to the other as well as within the same clan.

The nkóló's grandsons call the nkita's grandsons nkwá y'ǎǔmbá, "the excrements of valuables" (an expression which is not at all disrespectful or shocking) because the rights derived from the relationship of nkóló and nkita are almost without force. In favorable circumstances they are limited to a little respect and assistance. And if the nkóló's grandsons have no other kinship tie with the paternal clan of their second cousins, they cannot even call them by that name.

1. In his study "Het Familiehoofd bij de Nkundo-Negers" [The Family Head among the Nkundó Negroes], Congo, 1930, Vol. 2, p. 332, Father Brepoels somewhat exaggerates the rights of the nkóló's son.

583x 602 607 Thus the person who is herself the object of a bride price is the nkita. The first generation born of the nkóló calls her bonkita. In the third generation the term nkwá y áũmbá is applied to the relationship.

For example:

mother	Lokónjó	nkita of Bekombe
son	Imana	bonkita of Ifangá
mother	Lokónjó	nkita of Bekombe
son	Imana	. . . . bonkita of Ifangá
grandson . .	Etsíha
mother	Lokónjó	nkita of Bekombe
son	Imana	bonkita of Ifangá
grandson . . .	Etsíha	nkwá y'áũmbá of Litáola

[603] [169] The bonds between the nkóló's grandsons and the nkita's grandsons are loosened because respect and authority between grandparents and grandsons are more or less nominal; in practice they no longer exist. (1)

1. See Chapter VI, Article VI.

If the nkóló leaves no descendants, the nkita's sons are freed from any obligation. Just as the Nkundó like to be able to call someone their nkita or their bokwá so, too, they take pride in not belonging to a nkóló.

583x 607 Men who bear the title of nkóló may, under given circumstances, have duties towards their benkita, especially the obligation of taking active part in getting together the amount of a bride price. If the nkóló has provided his bonkita with a wife, the latter must treat him like his father (giving him assistance, the father's portion of the meat of a game animal, etc.).

M
614 untangle all the threads. Thus it happens that young people form 582 relationships with the intention of marrying without knowing that they are related; they are warned only by the opposition and ensuing explanations of the elders.

We may conclude that marriage among descendants of a common ancestor is generally prohibited if they live in the same village. It is frequently permitted on the other hand, if they belong to different villages, provided that they are not, at the same time, related to one of the ancestresses.

M
Clearly, it is difficult to say what precise degree of kinship
582 formed the basis for the prohibition of or permission for a marriage 835 between descendants of a common ancestor, or what are the boundaries of an exogamous grouping.

It is also apparent from the preceding observations -- as
M
[611] from the examination of affinity as an obstacle to marriage -- that the descent from a common mother is a more important factor than descent from the father. This does not give proof of a form of matriarchy, though it could be the remains or the beginning of one, or could provide a partial explanation for one. It stems quite simply
M [842] from the Nkundó notions concerning procreation, in which they
M attribute the major role to the mother. There is also the fact that
● [602] greater shame is attached to being united with a person descended
M
from the same woman, and finally the fact that they feel a stronger [593] affection for the mother than for the father (a sentiment [250] which is accentuated by polygamy). The three causes are closely related.

M
Finally, it should be noted that there is a group among the 184 Nkundó we are discussing which is less strict than the others in this 582 matter. The relatives among whom marriage is prohibited is definitely more limited; that is, their exogamous groupings are more limited. The people in question are the Bongale (see Introduction), and the same phenomenon may be observed among the Elíngá. (1)

P
[582] 1. The Batswá are still more liberal, and in this respect their practices differ very little from ancient European laws and customs.

582 614 their intervention is greatly reduced by the fact that much of their authority has been shifted to the chiefs named by the colonial administration, and also by all the contingencies of modern life. Since on the other hand, the young people are gradually breaking the ancient limits in order to acquire greater freedom, the elders will one day have to yield to them.

Article IV. Affinity

582 602 Affinity among the Nkundó should not be understood to have the meaning given in European civil or ecclesiastic law. Marriage is forbidden with all persons who are bakiló (Sing. bokiló). (2)

2. Contrary to the statement by Father Kaptein (Congo, 1922, Vol. 1, p. 541).

Therefore one must know what persons are called bakiló, a fairly complicated problem for us Europeans.

To make the matter more understandable, certain considerations must be developed before giving the general rules.

1. General considerations

1) Affinity is not as great an obstacle to marriage as kinship. It is possible to obtain a sort of "dispensation," and for many degrees of affinity, divorce or death removes the barrier. But there are transgressions [252], and, except for the few indicated above, these do not occur in cases of kinship.

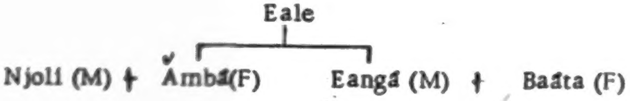
The following legitimate reasons for a "dispensation" are given: a danger that the patrimony will be scattered because of the infidelity of a wife who absolutely refuses to remain with her husband, added to the difficulties of a divorce palaver and the subsequent reimbursements, and -- a reason closely linked to the one just given -- a passionate love between the two people who are relatives by marriage.

582 602 The dispensation is given by the ndonga acting with the family council, which often yields before the fact, particularly if the second reason is involved. (1)

> 1. "To give a dispensation" is translated as kilola. A marriage contracted with a legitimate dispensation or one accorded because of the pressure of the accomplished fact is called kilókilólá, or "an affinity which is not maintained according to the regulations."

[671] 2. Contrary to European law, which recognizes only a direct affinity between husband and his wife's family, Nkundó law also recognizes an indirect affinity, so that a person is affinally related even to the spouses of his wife's relatives. That is, each person is affinally related, not only to his spouse's kin, but also to their relatives by marriage. Thus, in the example below, Njoli and Baáta are true relatives by marriage, though indirect ones. (2)

> 2. The Nkundó do not make a terminological distinction between the two types of affinity. We are using the terms "direct" and "indirect" for the sake of convenience and clarity.



There is an important difference between the two types of affinity: direct affinity is a much greater obstacle to marriage than indirect affinity, and exceptions are made only rarely and only for certain degrees of relationship.

582 602 576 3) A distinction must be made between "superior" and "inferior" relatives, that is, between those who have [253] precedence

582 602 [576] and those who owe submission and respect. The "superior" relatives are the ascendants, uncles, aunts, etc., in short, all those bearing the title of "father" or "mother," as well as elder brothers (elder sisters, elder cousins, etc.), who are batɔ́mɔ́lɔ́ (sing. botɔ́mɔ́lɔ́). [601] The "inferiors" are the descendants, those who are called "children" (bǎna): sons and daughters, grandsons, nephews, nieces, younger brothers or sisters, and those who are classed with them and called bakúnɛ́ (sing. bokúnɛ́).

[595] [587] 4) Polygamy and the inheritance of widows introduce another element. We will see that although persons of certain degrees of affinity may not marry, the prohibition is lifted to permit the inheritance of widows.

5) Our term "relatives by marriage" the Nkundɔ́ term and bakilɔ́ are not synonymous, even with respect to direct affinity. When we use the term "relatives by marriage" here, we are speaking in Nkundɔ́ terms. They do not consider certain persons whom we would include in that category as "relations by marriage." Such persons [601] are included in the group which as a whole is designated as likilɔ́ or bakilɔ́, but when properly and accurately referred to they are called bǒme, "husband," or wǎli, "wife," because they may marry each other and therefore affinity, strictly speaking, cannot be applied to them. In other words, for the Nkundɔ́, affinity is the relationship of a person with (only) those of his spouse's relatives whom he is forbidden to marry. It is well to bear in mind the double meaning of this term.

2. The rules

1. Direct Affinity

582 603 606 A. Marriages are prohibited in the direct line. Nevertheless, in accordance with consideration number 4, a son or grandson may inherit or marry the widows of his father or grandfather, but not the reverse. [254]

582

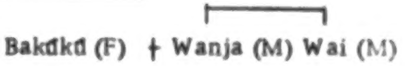
Example 12



Bakɔ́kɔ́ (F)
Wanja (M)
Wai (M)

Wai may always marry Bakɔ́kɔ́ [256].

Example 13

Lompolé (M)
Mbangó (M)
Njoli (F)

Lompole may not marry Njoli. Very rarely an exception is permitted.

582

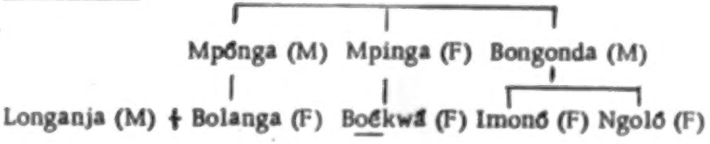
Example 14

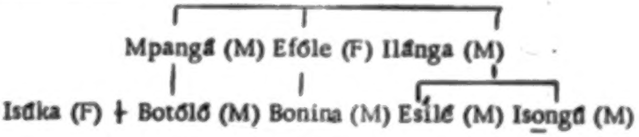


Mpónga (M)
Mpinga (F)
Bongonda (M)
Longanja (M)
Bolanga (F)
Boékwá (F)
Imonó (F)
Ngoló (F)

Longanja may not marry his elder cousins, but he may marry the younger ones with the exception of Boékwá who is bǒnankáná and has a "father's" rank (see above).

Similarly:

Example 15



Mpangá (M)
Efóle (F)
Ilánga (M)
Isɔ́ka (F)
Botóló (M)
Bonina (M)
Esílé (M)
Isongɔ́ (M)

Only Botóló's younger cousins may marry Isɔ́ka. Bonina is bǒnankáná, therefore "father," and consequently included among the uncles (see B, above).

[602] Note, finally, that the more distant the relationship, the less strict the prohibition, that is, dispensations and exceptions are more easily accepted.

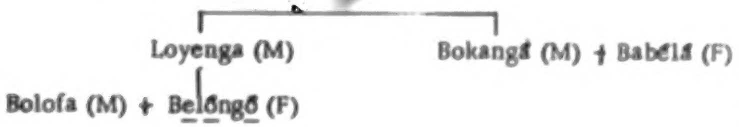
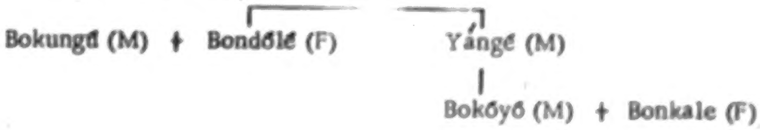
604 The same rules are applicable to aunts and uncles, but they are less strict:

Example 18 (comparable to Example 16):



Loyenga (M)
Bokangá (M) + Babélá (F)
Bolofa (M) + Belóngó (F)

Example 19 (comparable to Example 17):



Bokungá (M) + Bondólé (F)
Yángé (M)
Bokóyó (M) + Bonkale (F)

582
595 605
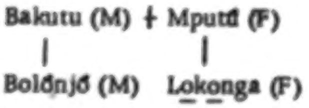
[602] B. Marriage between affines who are collaterally related through their lineal relatives:

a) Marriage between descendants [of the lineal relatives through whom the affinity is established] is strictly forbidden. Thus, the children of two spouses may not marry each other; they are considered brothers and [258] sisters. The same rule applies to two half-cousins (Example 21).

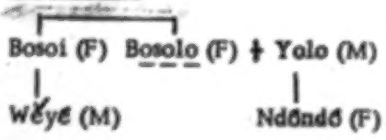
Example 20:



Bakutu (M) + Mputá (F)
Bolónjó (M)
Lokonga (F)

Marriage between Bolónjó and Lokonga is strictly prohibited.

Example 21

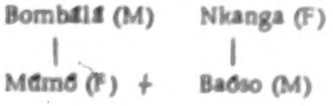


Bosoi (F)
Bosolo (F) + Yolo (M)
Wěyé (M)
Ndóndó (F)

Marriage between Wěyé and Ndóndó is prohibited.

572
602 b) Marriage between ascendants [of the lineal relatives through whom affinity is established] is forbidden, but an exception is made when the affinity is broken by death.

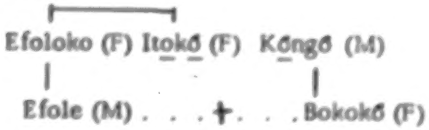
Example 22:



Bombɛ́lɛ́ (M)
Nkanga (F)
Mɔ́mɔ́ (F)
+
Baɔ́so (M)

Marriage between Bombɛ́lɛ́ and Nkanga is forbidden.

Example 23



Efoloko (F)
Itokɔ́ (F)
Kɔ́ngɔ́ (M)
Efole (M)
+
Bokokɔ́ (F)

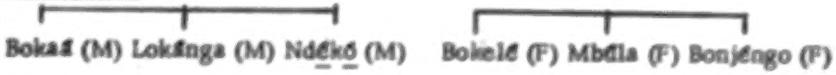
Marriage between Itokɔ́ and Kɔ́ngɔ́ is forbidden, but permitted upon the death of either Efole or Bokokɔ́.

Dispensations and violations of this rule do occur.

C. Affinity in collateral line arising from a marriage between relatives in collateral line: The rules are the same as for direct affinity in collateral line (see above, no. 1), C.)

Example 24

[607]



Bokaɛ́ (M)
Lokɛ́nga (M)
Ndɛ́kɔ́ (M)
Bokelɛ́ (F)
Mbɔ́la (F)
Bonjɛ́ngo (F)

Bokaɛ́ is married to Bonjɛ́ngo. Neither he nor Lokɛ́nga may marry Bokelɛ́, and Ndɛ́kɔ́ may not marry Mbɔ́la [Translator's note: the table shows Ndɛ́kɔ́ to be female, but I have corrected the error]. If he had married Bokelɛ́, Ndɛ́kɔ́ could marry Mbɔ́la. Furthermore, if Bonjɛ́ngo were Mbɔ́la's senior, then Lokɛ́nga could also marry Mbɔ́la. [259]

593ˣ 574 ótswɛ́kɛ́ liɛ́la otswɛ̂k'olɛ́, bɛ́fɔ́kolaka mbɔ́k'ɛ́y'olɛ́ la ngom'a nkolɛ́, "If you are married go back to your parents, or you will be taught the way with drums and gongs," that is, "when you are dead." (2)

[764] [604] [534] 2. A woman is buried in her own native clan. Her corpse is transported there to the accompaniment of drums and horns. The lokolɛ́ gong announces her death.

593ˣ ● 602 A married woman may not evade the duty of helping her relatives under special circumstances (pregnancy, illness, serious accidents, death). This obligation [285] is not limited to her mother and father, but extends to all her relatives; the closer the degree of kinship, the stricter the obligation.

593ˣ 574 342 556 It was said above that a husband builds a hut for his wife. His relatives often assist him in this task. But it also happened -- in the past, for colonization has removed the possibility of it -- that the woman's father wanted to build his daughter's house himself or at least to make the pavement out of clay brought from her native land. This act was a demonstration of wealth and politico-social importance as well as proof of fatherly affection. The husband, for his part, was honored to have married the daughter of such an important man and loved her all the more. Thus a number of women say that "they only cooked on ancestral soil." This soil was brought in baskets across distances up to 50 kilometers by Batswa and by men of the woman's clan or village. Her father could do it because of his great influence and regal rewards (bokɔ́ndo, verb kɔ́nda) were distributed during a feast (ntɛkɛ) given for the workers and their relatives after the task was completed. This was done for Bompeli, daughter of Bokombe of Litóli (Bombwanja) married to Bony[illegible] w'enyuka of the Basɛ́kɛ́ Mbangó (Bonkoso); for Beluka, daughter of

602 Treachery and treason between relatives by marriage were not unusual. The proverb says bomóng'ósulu nd'ókiló, "treason exists [294] chiefly on the part of relative by marriage." Not that this happened through any fundamental maliciousness apart from perhaps some rare exception. But in case of a war or particularly of a vendetta, relative by marriage did not hesitate to betray his in-law and thus send him to his death.

We shall limit ourselves to giving two case histories which are well known to the current generation. (1)

> 1. I do not know exactly when these events occurred. In any case they date back to the time of the Independent State and to the beginning of the occupation.

At the time when the Ingende post was occupied by the white "Itumbambile" and that of Ikɛ́ngɛ́ by "Bosɛ́njɛ́," some men from [266] Boɛ́lɛ́ (Ikɛ́kema y'ɔ̂selo, Bombwanja) surprised an inhabitant of Bokukɔ́ (Wɛ̌ngatɛ́), killed him, and ate him. Shortly thereafter Lokwa jw'ɔ̌yelɛ́, a man from Boɛ́lɛ́, went to visit his sister Eámɛ́, who was married to Imbilɛ́ is'ɛ̂y'osola of Ikonjɛ́. It happened that the latter was a maternal uncle of the victim of the Boɛ́lɛ́ men. Was Lokwa unaware of this relationship? Or did he trust his brother-in-law? Whatever the case he was well received. Nevertheless, Imbilɛ́ had not forgotten his nephew's assassination and went to inform his close kin of this good opportunity to avenge the murder. One evening they broke into the hut that had been placed at the visitor's disposal and found him there with his sister Eámɛ́ and his wife Lompoko. The [266] two women managed to escape, but Lokwa was taken, killed, and eaten. Naturally, his sister Eámɛ́ did not return to her husband, and there was no question of a restitution of the bride price.

The second case dates from the same period. Two Batswa of [266] Mbɛ́langa (Etɔ́ontɛ́le, Bongili), Bokɔ́ngo and Bolɛ́yengɛ́, surprised Mboko Ilombɛ́ of Boɛ́lɛ́ in the forest, killed him, and ate him.

628 602 Some time thereafter, a man named Bengóngó from the Ndongó village of the Bongíli went to Boálá to visit his sister Boáka, who was married to Eale éâ Bofeké. The latter told him that the village was enraged because of the assassination of one of their people by the Batswa of the Bongíli. He advised him to go [295] and hide in the fallow ground lest excited men come upon him and revenge themselves on him. He led his brother-in-law there himself. Therefore he knew the exact location of his hiding place and ran to betray him to the others. [266] They encircled the fallow ground and easily found poor Bengóngó, who was pitilessly massacred and eaten. His sister Boáka never knew of her husband's treachery; she thought that despite all his precautions, the other inhabitants had discovered her brother's hiding place. (1)

[649] 1. We should not be too astonished that during that period the Europeans did not intervene in these wars, vendettas, massacres, and acts of cannibalism. They let the natives do as they pleased among themselves and demanded only that they leave them alone and render them services and tribute. They had other things to do in those times. The white men Ǎmbá and Baisǎnkoi, of whom the natives still speak with respectful fear, were the first to begin punishing acts of barbarism in this region.

602 This hypocrisy on the part of the husband toward his wife and brother-in-law is due to the presence of two opposing feelings within him -- on the one hand, the love of his family and the feeling of solidarity which engenders hate and the desire for vengeance; on the other, love for his spouse. As these feelings are in complete contradiction with each other, he cannot reconcile them. But at least he can preserve appearances.

[539] This situation is referred to in the following proverb: bokiló ákwǐsáká, wěngoyak'eyalo, "if your bokiló has hidden you, change

602 539 shelters." There is another, which is cruder: bokiló tőtswe nkélé: bafumba báleke mbá, emí ńkoléké wě, "relative by marriage, let us go to the palm grove; the bafumba ants (Dorylus wilverthii) eat palm nuts; I will eat you." The following saying, applied to someone who is always trying to clear himself, is a more or less involuntary accusation: mpǫ́l'ǒkiló, ńtúfa é mpǫ́ngo; mpǫ́ngo y'ǒkiló nsako ngá mbwá, "I do not eat my relative by marriage; on the contrary, I dip (food) in his fat; an in-law's fat is as tasty as a dog's." [296]

Nevertheless, a man never goes so far as to cause the death 602 628 of his sister's daughter's or other relative's husband. Or, as the Nkumdó say, one does not kill a person by whom one has been enriched. What is the reason for this distinction? According to our people it is the affection they feel toward their sister, daughter, etc.; they love them too much to pain them by taking away their husbands.

This treacherous and barbarous conduct is therefore directed by the bokiló toward the bokanga, that is, by those who have paid the bride price to those who have received it, but never the reverse.

Appendix

000 This appendix pertains to each of the three preceding articles. Therefore it may reasonably be placed here. It does not deal with any special law nor with a custom that is legal, universal, or common. It is concerned with isolated cases. But it seems to me that the few lines to follow are not without interest, since they give a good indication of the mentality that may be found among these people.

602 578 It may happen that a woman has a complaint or feels she has cause to be dissatisfied with one of her relatives, for example her brother. In her opinion he may not be sufficiently kind and generous toward her, or he may treat her in a manner she considers unfair. In a moment of anger she reveals her feelings to her husband and incites him to avenge her by injuring or even killing the one who has offended her.

That is what happened several decades ago to Bosela w'ǒmpwengé of Bolénge (Bongíli) (who died in 1932, a very old man). His wife Ilumbé was very dissatisfied in that her brother did not give 602 578 her enough gifts. She addressed her husband as follows: bejwɔ́ bɛ́kɛ̌ ɔ́momɛ́lɛ́ nkâna, alekɛ́ ompímaka tɔ̌ma, "Your corpses (deceased parents), kill my brother for me, he always refuses to give me [297] presents. (1) Whereupon Bosela took his weapons and went off.

> 1. This is one of the most serious insults. But a person to whom it is addressed considers it a duty to take up the order or invitation made in those terms. It is a sort of forced oath, and it is called tɛ́na ndaɛ́, afeya (tɛ́nela) X ndaɛ́. These terms may apply to many other situations: a call for help during a war, assistance in inflicting an ordeal, assistance in the iloɛ (society of those who do not observe funerary abstinence), etc. A person may address himself in this manner, and in that case the expression corresponds to our word "oath," "to take an oath."

Being a good psychologist, he made no mistake about his wife's personal feelings. He knew that he was involved in a dangerous impasse: if he disappointed his wife's expectations, she would be furious; on the other hand, if he took his brother-in-law's life, she would be even angrier. The thing to do was to resort to a trick. When he entered the forest he had the good fortune to come upon a boende antelope, which he slaughtered. He removed the liver and went home carrying this organ, still fresh and warm, in his hand. He presented it to his wife, saying, "Here is the liver of your brother whom you asked me to kill." There followed a violent scene. The woman, beside herself, began to weep for her dead brother, and in her anger she ran off, shouting at her husband: "Oh! You no longer love me, since you have assassinated my brother; you will not see me again." When she arrived at the home of her family, she found everyone going about their usual occupations; there was no sign of death or, more especially, of murder. Her astonishment increased 602 578 when she found her brother in good health and full of life. She could not believe her eyes. In an instant the whole family was alerted and gathered together. She explained what had happened. They quieted and consoled her; they praised her husband for having behaved so intelligently. She was congratulated. For he could have done what she had told him, so she had reason to rejoice that he loved her so well and wisely. Thus, a few days later, she quietly returned to her husband.

An entirely different course of events, and a fatal one, occurred in the case of [298] Bukɛ́fea of Bompela (Bokɔ́tola) who was married to Elɔ́ngɛ́ of Boɔ́lɔ́ (both are still alive). The woman continuously went back to her family. Her husband, exasperated, threatened one day to kill her brother Eale; when he was gone she would be more inclined to stay home. He actually fulfilled his threat. His wife went into a terrible rage, but she nevertheless remained faithful to her husband. The bow used to shoot the murderous arrow has been preserved by its owner as a souvenir.

Article VI

Relations Between the Wife and Her Husband's Family

602 Naturally, a wife must be on the best of terms with her husband's family, with whom she is in continual contact. She owes respect to his parents and elders. If she does not manage to live in peace with them as well as with her husband's sisters, etc., the marriage will not last. Misunderstandings, disputes, squabbles, and, above all, insults and spiteful comments will force her to leave. Therefore, such contingencies can be put into the category of motives which lead the man's family to interfere in his marriage. There is a constant concern among the Nkundó to avoid the dissolution of the union due to extreme incompatibilities, because any break-up causes enormous difficulties, as we will see suo loco.

It is very hard to discern whether the small services the wife is expected to render her husband's family are legal obligations or simply requirements of social decorum. A momentary omission

602 brings forth reprimands on the part of the husband and his parents which obviously can easily degenerate into quarrels. If the omissions are so frequent and of such a nature that they can no longer be explained as simply forgetting, a whim, or a fit of peevishness, but [299] are taken to indicate spitefulness or vulgarity, the matter is [621] brought before the ndonga (who is often assisted by the family tribunal) or brought before the authority constituted by the woman's kin. If in spite of everything the expected improvement does not take place, the break-up is inevitable.

606 The husband's father and mother extend the same affection to their son's wife as they feel toward him. They consider her their own child, and it is not unusual to find that their love for the wife equals their feeling for their own son. She is only a relative by marriage, but out of affection for her they call her their child. She, for [601] her part, does not use toward them the term bakanga (or bakilő) but out of filial respect calls them "father" and "mother." Exceptions to this practice may be found, however.

224 If the father (and those who fall in the same category such as uncles, elder brothers, etc.) kills a large game animal, he is expected to give his son's (or brother's, etc.) wife a piece of meat, whose size depends on the number of daughters-in-law he has and which consists of one or several chops (bokálako) (1) and the piece at the nape of the neck (botómbyá).

606
835 Illicit relations between the husband's father and his daughter-in-law would be an unheard of crime. The same would be true with respect to any of the "superior" relatives. (2) The laws regulating [184] 2. Only the Boángi -- like the Elángá of the Losanganya - allow relations between a brother and the wife of his junior; and they are already beginning to find imitators among their neighbors to the southeast, the Injóló.

835 the relations between a wife and her husband's parents are closely connected with the rules pertaining to the prohibition related to affinity and seems to spring from the same source. Therefore it will be useful to have in mind what we have said in the preceding chapter, Article IV.

607 The husband's elder brothers treat his wife as their sister. The wife calls her husband's sisters [300] bakilǒ, but out of respect she often gives them the title of "mother." (1)

[601] 1. Among the Elǎngǎ the wife also calls her husband's sisters bongíli (pl. bangíli); they call her bǒnongíli (pl. bǎnangíli). A wife often calls her husband's mother nyangôngíli. Bǎnangíli l'ǎnangíli means "the brother's wives and their sisters-in-law."

587 After the husband's death, as has been said suo loco, his father or his brother may marry his widow. But this practice is not well regarded and is permitted only rarely, chiefly when the scattering of the family patrimony is feared or if the two interested parties have an unusual love for each other.

● 602 With respect to children or younger brothers and all those who fall into that category, the situation is altogether different. Illicit relations with wives of their father, grandfather, uncle, elder brother, or elder cousin, are judged much less severely. Generally, misconduct does not give rise to claims for payment, or the payment is demanded "for form's sake" and consists of a hen and a bunch of bananas. By means of this payment the guilty one recognizes his error and renders homage to the right of his elder.

[626] In general public opinion condemns these relations and often with great severity. The question of degree of kinship as well as other considerations result in a great diversity among the cases, so we will examine each situation separately and distinguish each time between the husband's reaction and that of public opinion.

837 626 Chapter II, Article XI, 2. But such a situation is far from ideal in Nkundó eyes and is permitted only if, on the one hand, the son ardently loves the woman and, on the other, if the father is too slow in obtaining a wife for him.

837 602 Here then we observe a conflict between two feelings: a husband's jealousy and the affection of a father and various relatives. That is why it is difficult -- as in many situations -- to draw the line between what is permitted and what is forbidden. From what has preceded and from the general explanations given by natives, we can conclude, however, that: [303] 1) relations between a woman and her husband's son are forbidden and severely judged, but with much more leniency than in the case of "superior" relatives; 2) the [593x] father may not go to extremes in repressing misconduct nor ask his own son to pay an indemnity, since to do so would be to enrich himself through his child's misbehaviour, and the latter would have no means of paying him except through him or his mother's clan -- and it would be very unjust and inappropriate to force him to have recourse to the latter.

593x 837 607 B. A younger brother calls his elder brother's wife wǎlí, or wife, and she calls him bǒme, or husband, because they may marry one another. Therefore adulterous relations may also be found among them. But in practice some distinctions must be made.

If the younger brother is not married and the elder one has a harem, -- a state of affairs which was very common in the past but today is very rare -- the situation is analogous to the one described above in relation to a father's wife except that there is greater indulgence toward the culprit.

If the elder brother is monogamous and the younger brother a bachelor, relations of the latter with the former's wife when the husband is present are forbidden. If the younger brother nevertheless yields to the temptation, he is condemnable. The husband may not claim an indemnity. But in revenge he may procure for himself a "make-believe indemnity" (nyongo éâ bolâlambo) by felling one of the culprit's banana trees, taking away his chickens, moving his hut, taking some other similar action. The purpose of these acts, according > higher morality -- in our terms. Among them the question of relations between a woman and her husband's son, younger brother, etc., does not even arise. Have they been influenced by some neighboring tribe? Or must we attribute the inferior morality of some of the tribes in this respect to decadence.

837 602

The following conclusions emerge from this long description:

1) Relations between a man and the wife of his son, younger brother, etc., in short of anyone inferior to him in the family hierarchy, are always strictly prohibited and never occur.

2) They do occur on the other hand between an inferior and the wife of his senior and superior. The degree of kinship between the husband and the culprit plays a considerable role in determining the seriousness or triviality of an infraction, the sanctions applied, and the various consequences. Some relations are accepted, others are censured with varying degrees of leniency, still others are pitilessly criticized.

3) In these matters a distinction may be made between two aspects:

a) the husband's reaction and the repression of the illicit relations;
b) the judgment of public opinion;

or:

a) the financial aspect;
b) the moral aspect -- to use that term for want of a better one.

Sometimes a third element comes into play, namely the intervention of the family on the side of the culprit against the injured husband who, for one reason or another, is in the wrong himself.

602 837 684

a) The usual sanction for adultery is, for the man, an indemnity to pay. But such a payment cannot be made since no financial transaction -- strictly speaking at least -- may be made

602 within a group of close kin, seeing that, from a certain standpoint, 837 property belongs to all the members, each sooner or later receiving 684 or inheriting from the other. But in cases where other sanctions can be imposed, they are considered legitimate. [309]

b) Except in the case of relations between brother and sister-626 in-law -- within the limits described above -- public opinion is 837 severe in its judgment, even more severe than for ordinary cases of 602 adultery, although because of the more tangible nature of the sanctions imposed against the latter, these seem on the surface to be considered more serious; many natives even have that impression. Or at least that is the first impression that spontaneously comes from their explanations; currently, they stress the indemnity, and in their accounts of ancient proceedings and violent sanctions, they forget the other aspect. Others do not distinguish between the two sides of the problem, or distinguish between them only very poorly. Only in going to the bottom of things do they -- like ourselves -- become aware of the two aspects and the importance of not confusing them.

The leniency we observe in certain cases on the part of the interested parties who have been wronged, and sometimes on the part of public opinion, does not seem to us to have been explained as a leniency based on principle nor as a legitimation of these relations (except in the case of brothers within the limits indicated). They seem rather to spring from the affection they have for the culprit, their sympathy for his condition as a bachelor, a certain community of interests, and finally from an evaluation of certain other elements that may be involved (such as a fundamental jealousy in the case of brothers).

181 in others between inferior and superior relatives is based on their conception of authority, which is patriarchal, therefore paternal. What is involved is not so much a fear of power as a reverent awe -- although the first should not be excluded. In their eyes an inferior does not exist for the benefit and advantage of the superior, but the reverse; authority exists for the good of the inferior, who to preserve hierarchy and order must submit to the [310] superior. The superior's duty to help his inferior (in his difficulties, his palavers, his poverty),

602 181 to be liberal and generous toward him and therefore to make goods available to him, to be lenient in matters concerning justice and property and obliging in conjugal matters -- as long as the principle of authority remains secure is based on the same idea. The exploitation of an inferior by his superior is entirely contrary to the basic nature of Nkundó authority, while the reverse is entirely in conformity with it. (1)

> 1. This attitude may account -- at least to some extent -- for the liberties that the natives readily take with the European, their superior or master, such as domestic thefts, inappropriate requests, the kind of begging and lack of respect for authority that we are accustomed to seeing, etc.

Article VII. Adultery

837 For the Nkundó, adultery is an illicit union between a man and a married woman. From the moment the ikulá is paid for a woman, any relations with her by a man other than the husband-to-be are considered adulterous.

1. Terminology

There is no exclusive or specific term in Lonkundo by which our word "adultery" may be translated. There are a number of words in the language which are only partially equivalent to it.

1) First of all, the Nkundó speak of bongombe, a term denoting steady and continuous relations with a woman who is a complete stranger, that is, who is not related in any way. The word designates the relationship as well as the persons involved. This type of adultery is also called a wǐsamaka or linsámba jǎ njísámá (from the verb ísama) -- that is, a secret, as against a true linsámbá (which will be 837 [196] 4) To indicate a tendency toward adultery (especially on the part of women) the Nkundó use the verb fâfoka which literally denotes clothing that is too big and that flies in the wind. The noun loyǒ or boyǒ is also used.

The verb used for discovering a case of adultery is tẹmbọla, the noun is ntẹmbọ́.

Occasional or permanent adultery has always been very common. This fact is undoubtedly due to the relative ease with which it is possible to escape discovery and consequent sanctions. A woman [574] going to visit her family cannot possibly be followed or watched by her husband; the distances make such surveillance difficult and, furthermore, it would have disastrous consequences for the stability of the marriage, since neither the woman nor her family would put up with it. Other partial causes are lasciviousness, polygamy, etc., as we will see later in the text.

2. Gifts

837 431 [602] An adulterous man and woman send each other presents; his consist of meat, arrows, etc., hers of food and various small objects. A woman's gifts to her lover are called botúmo (the noun used with the verb tumba, "to make burn" (1). Very young relatives generally serve as intermediaries. Note that a woman rarely sends her son, for she has reason to fear that the gift would not reach its destination; the boy would give himself a treat with it. She can have more confidence in a daughter.

A man's gift is called by the generic term mpató, "a gift that is sent, a dispatch." [313]

In isolated cases (yětsi) a man sends an arrow, some small object, beads, meat, etc. Nowadays money or cloth have been

1. Note that the noun and the verb are not etymologically related. Perhaps botúmo might be related to túma, "to show, to designate." The Ekonda call this gift elika. See Chapter II, Article I.

593x Women in particular are very intolerant of having anyone touch 861 their children, even the child's own father. This fact can be attributed in part to a lack of any unity of feeling between the spouses and partly to maternal love, which is purely natural, psycho-physiological, so to speak.

Measures taken against a child who has misbehaved often 578 result in serious domestic quarrels, sometimes followed by the 861 wife's flight to her family. Such was the case of Bakutu b'Ôfóngé (born around 1880). His father, Bolónjó, had forbidden him to peel a piece of sugar cane [513] in a clumsy and wasteful manner. The boy did not want to listen to reason. Next thing you know he had cut a deep wound in his finger. "What did I tell you?" shouted the father. "Now you are punished for your disobedience." Thereupon the mother, Mbélá, flew into a rage. "Oh! You are killing my child!" and so on. She rolled up her mats, took her baskets on her back, and took the path leading to her village.

Nkundó casuistry includes the case -- which seems hypothetical or at least belonging to the past, for I have never known or heard of a real instance -- of a man taking revenge on his wife for having insulted his child. His revenge took the form of ordering the child to go and kill a goat belonging to her mother's clan, thus obliging the child to pay an indemnity to the owner, so that the mother finds herself thus being punished by her family. The father's right to do this is recognized in Nkundó jurisprudence. But from the standpoint of education the solution is far from ideal.

5) The influence of the kin group also plays a great role.
● 602 The Nkundó are very much attached to their families. Their chil-861 dren are at home everywhere in the group. A wife has very close ties to her own family. The father's brothers and sisters are a child's "fathers"; his maternal aunts and uncles are his "mothers." A child's real father does not do much to defend his son against scolding or punishment from his own close kin but does not readily accept the intervention of his wife's family, and vice versa. And again the child can take advantage of such dissension. The situation occurs quite frequently although there are many exceptions.

561 which are incomprehensible to us. Indeed, the order of duty and re-
613 sponsibility, of authority and honor, are socially, legally, and politically determined by the order of birth. That order is determined by generation, and within the generation, by age: from the oldest father down the whole line of fathers to the oldest "child" in the whole row of children. The children of your older brother, even if they are younger in years, go before your own children. As we shall see later, the female members of the family, who practically fall outside this order, recover their place of honor through their sons.

613 From this short description of the paternal clan, it is immediately apparent that the clan is not a geographical concept among the K Nkundo. Wherever the daughter may marry, wherever the son may wander in service to the Whites, that person always and everywhere continues by law to belong to his wise, and he remains bound to all the rights and duties of his place in that community.

602 It also appears that clan and blood relationship do not come any-613 where near to blanketing each other. Each "blood relationship" of the Nkundo extends itself over various paternal clans, since the blood relations of the mother, as well as the descendants of all the other women of my wise who are lawfully married out of the clan, belong to another wise.

/152/ 3. Inheritance in the Clan

613 Each clan has possessions that constitute the inheritance or patrimony
421 of the members, the domain of the family. These goods are of two kinds: economic and dotal. The former are subdivided into real property, or inalienable property, and personal property.

613 is divided into: arable land, land for gardens, and hunting areas.
423 These constitute common property, whose cultivation or usufruct is divided among the members of the clan: each one receives his garden land and hunting ground to clear; as soon as the user leaves it, that ground is free again for the community. Palm groves, of course, also remain common property of the members. A similar arrangement applies to water rights. Larger fishing areas remain common property and are, under the leadership of the clan head, communally exploited. Smaller fishing grounds, creeks, ponds, etc., are allotted to each

177 Although even St. Thomas teaches that the only natural authority is that of the head of the family, European legislation has, through ignorance, completely abolished the rights of the native family head; the wife is freed from all ties and is thus abandoned to licentiousness. Through a legal fiction, clan law has gone over into the hands of the "recognized native courts of justice," which, however, have just as much to do with the clan court as a policeman with a father. The communization of trade, education, and the rearing of the young, as is demonstrated to us by Russia, would revolutionize our society far less than our installation of these so-called native courts of justice has done in the Congo. Education and correction have been replaced by punishment. Politics, which have begun to play such an all-important 602 role in our society, had /155/ almost no importance in Nkundo society.
613 The neighboring clans were all connected with each other through blood relationship, intermarriage, or friendship ties. Only when there was a struggle against a foreign and common enemy did politics have a role to fulfill. And then the same order of rank was observed among the clans as was already indicated for the members of a single clan.

622 Here also, biased or romantic products of our ideas about barbarism have adapted these so-called intertribal wars to the need that we felt, to civilize the natives at any cost. These wars were not to be compared with our European wars, in which a mass of people are slaughtered. In the Congo, no sooner had wounded or dead fallen on both sides than the chiefs were already congregated to conclude a peace treaty. Here again, we meant to respect the political organization of the natives by the creation of chieftainships and native chiefs, who were to form the political-administrative link between the native clans and the European higher administration. Such chiefs were totally unknown in native society. Together with the establishment of the native courts, the establishment of chieftainships gave the death blow to the actual social organization of the Nkundo-Mongo. The very fact that these institutions are territorial demonstrates clearly that here no ordinary shifting of power has taken place, but simply an elimination of the traditional power in favor of a new colonial power.

177
622 Indeed, where formerly the "customary rightful chief" was sought out, even though it was sometimes only a formality, the new formula of the "sectors" has relieved the higher administration from this care too. And it is only to be hoped that this new formula will at least do away with the legal fiction that the "chiefs" are actually "something native," so that they may be classified for once and for all in the

613 authority (mpifo). Each clan can, however, also take in other persons 614 who fall outside the order of authority, but who legally belong to the 608 clan. Along with the real descendants, they make up the legal clan.

These are, in the first place, the wives who have married into the clan, the children brought with them (mbusola), and the lawful house-keepers. In addition, there are the clients who have been taken in; then the war prisoners and slaves; and finally the Pygmies. The women married into the clan are naturally separate, as are also the Pygmies who form a completely separate community. The others are gradually treated as children, receive their part in the general responsibility and protection, their place in the court session, etc. Depending on the degree to which they develop in the bosom of the clan which has taken them in, they can constitute a separate group in it, which becomes more and more independent.

7. The Maternal Clan

602 Each Nkundo has a double "fatherland": his wise and his bonyango.
613 The bonyango is the paternal clan of his mother. His mother gave birth to him there; her blood relations live there and receive him with motherly love and will protect him against all difficulties; he has often passed a large part of his happiest childhood years there; and there he can always find a safe shelter when, for one reason or another, he might lose the paternal clan.

The structure of the maternal clan naturally resembles that of the paternal clan in every way. If we treat it specially here, it is not in order to speak of the form, but only to point out the specific rights that each person has in his maternal clan.

601 Just as all of the brothers and sisters of my father are my "fathers,"
602 so all of the brothers and sisters of my mother are my "mothers."
613 Mother's brother, that is, my maternal uncle, I call ngompame, nyangompame. All the nephews and nieces on the mother's side are my "children." A special tie binds me to the children of the nkita of my mother, that is, to the children of the women who was acquired by the maternal clan with the bride price /158/ that had been paid for my mother by my wise. Mother is, thus, the nkolo, the woman or mistress, of those children who call me their father.

602 As long as I continue to live in my own paternal clan, I have the 613 right to special care and love from the maternal clan. If I cannot find

602 sufficient dowry at home, then I can always go and appeal to my 613 maternal uncles who are obliged to help me insofar as they are able.
I even have the right to the free dowry of one of the children of my mother's nkita. I may always lay out gardens and hunt in the territory of my bonyango, and take part in the court sessions of the maternal clan when they consider the allotment of the free dowries or the division of the inheritance. If, however, I wish to leave my father's clan and establish myself for good in the maternal clan, then I receive priority in everything over my male and female cousins and become heir and clan leader directly after my maternal uncles. This is, thus, a truly princely compensation for the so-called inferiority of the woman in native society: the child of the sister (bonankana) restores her gloriously to the honor and rank which are due her.

8. Related Clan: Likilo

602 Outside my paternal clan and outside my maternal clan, I still 601 have blood relations: namely, the children of my paternal aunt and of my sisters or female cousins, each of whom belongs to the clan of his own father. Just as the children of my mother's brothers are my children, so the children of my father's sister are also my fathers. I am, thus, in the same relationship to the children of my mother's brother as the children of my father's sister are to me.

The other members of the related clans (who are thus not blood relations) all share, according to generation, in the classification of immediate relatives: all the "fathers" of the husband are "fathers-in-law"; all the mothers, "mothers-in-law"; etc. There is this single big difference, that the "superiors" of the husband are also your "superiors." According to the opinions of the Nkundo, they are the only real relatives. Those on the husband's side are called bokilo; those on the wife's side, bokanga.

/159/ The "subordinates" of the husband are not real relatives and rightly call each other "husband" and "wife." In various legally [582] defined circumstances, marriage relations and marriages are permitted between the latter.

It is unnecessary to repeat that all of the members of the reciprocal clans share in these relationships: the whole generation of a clan

602 601 member is, as it were, identified with that member, so that, for instance, all younger sisters and female cousins of one spouse become "wives" of all the younger brothers and male cousins of the other spouse. One must really have the legal sense and the patience and the capacity for palaver and unravelling of an old Nkundo to make sense out all of these relationships. They themselves compare them, in fact, with the inextricable clew of the intestines of a sort of dwarf crocodile: besofo bya lokekele.

9. Exogamy

613 582 The term, "exogamic clan," often heard or encountered in writings, is also, at least in the Nkundo-Mongo society, very misleading. The group of persons with whom marriage is forbidden does not constitute any common entity; it differs from person to person. Two half brothers can have the same paternal clan but differ in maternal clan; they can have the same maternal clan and different paternal clans. Marriages are forbidden for older brothers and sisters that are permitted for the younger ones. The rules differ from one blood relation to another, from blood relation with relative-by-marriage to blood relation with relative-by-marriage, from relative-by-marriage with relative-by-marriage to relative-by-marriage with relative-by-marriage.

If one still wishes to put the law of exogamy into European terms, then one might say: 1) blood relationship forbids marriage insofar as the blood relationship is recognized. This recognition varies from clan group to clan group. Sometimes in the same legal but extended clan, an exception is made to this recognition; mostly, however, the different autonomous clans which descend from the same distant ancestor are still bound by the law of exogamy. Generally, groups which have the same father but a different mother /160/ separate most quickly. 2) Relationship (other than blood) forbids marriage—insofar as the relationship is recognized between the parents of spouses; it sometimes permits marriage between children of spouses.

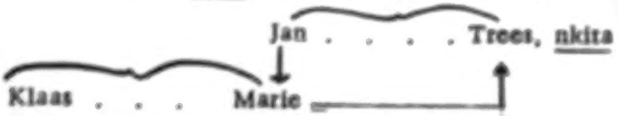
613 582 184 Here it should be observed once again, however, that the customs differ from region to region as regards this recognition; that, for instance, the stepson in many regions may marry his stepmother in a regular marriage; and that the violations are less severely judged and punished in proportion to the degree to which the forbidden relationships diverge.

596 583 567 necessary for her father or brother to have brought her to the man and to have received money for her; another member of the family was sufficient. She was sold by her family and accordingly, wherever the money had remained or whoever had received it, she had her rights in the family. Since the family maintained itself through the sale of the children of the female sex, the male children born of them were considered as the masters, the rightful claimants, the fathers. There was no exception to this rule; it was not to be altered, and no one had ever thought of disputing the place of the claimant or of laying claim to his rights. I have only heard of one single case of that sort, namely, at the succession of the Ruki, the younger brother was said to have killed his older brother in order to take over his place. He was said to have made a hole in his brother's proa, so that it sank when it reached the middle of the stream. The matter in itself seems an impossibility; also I consider it a legend, unless an accident might have happened that was interpreted in a mistaken or deliberately false manner.

596 576 The rightful claimant, bona wa nkana, sister's son, might still be a child; nevertheless he was called father and everyone vied with one another in showing him the honor due a father. That was the unbreakable law, not only for the father common to the hamlet, boloi, but also for the father of each individual family.

Nkita

583 602 Nkita is what the woman is called who is bought with the money that the father or brother has received for his daughter or sister on the occasion of her marriage. In reality, however, she is only the nkita, goods or property, of the sold woman. Nkita ekam, "my property," this woman calls her. For instance, Jan [335] sells his daughter, Marie, to Klaas and buys another wife, Trees, with the money received. The latter woman is now the nkita, the property, of Marie.



583

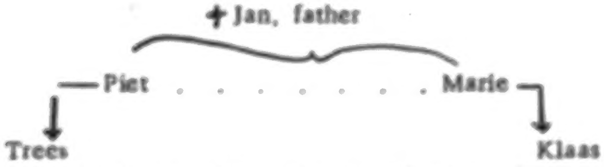
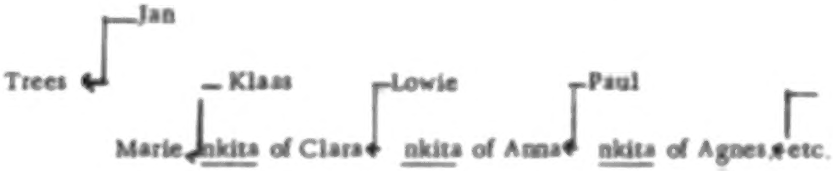
Or else, father Jan having died, Piet sold his sister, Marie, to Klaas and buys Trees with the money:



Practically speaking, Marie profited very little from her nkita. She had, it is true, certain rights over her nkita; thus, the latter considered her as her mistress, helped her in sickness and heavy work. Unfortunately for her, what she gained on the one side she lost again on the other side, in that she herself was also the nkita of another woman and consequently had the same obligations to fulfill towards the latter that her own nkita owed her. For example:



Jan, then, sold Marie to Klaas in order to buy Trees; Klaas, however, in order to be able to buy Marie, sold in turn his sister, Clara, to Lowie; Lowie acquired the necessary money to buy Clara by marrying off his sister, Anna. Thus, Trees then became the nkita of Marie, Marie the nkita of Clara, Clara of Anna, Anna of Agnes, etc. In short, every wife had her nkita and was, with few exceptions, the nkita of another wife. I say with few exceptions; for example, the wife was not the nkita of another woman if her husband had bought her with his own earned money. Practically speaking, this changed the matter very little. Also [336] there was no change if the nkita of a woman died; it was only a loss for the buyer or owner of that woman.

596 We have already seen that the right of succession and father-
583 hood passed to the male children of the sister, because she had been 605 sold and had brought money into the family, or rather because she had a nkita there, a sort of guarantee for the money that had been received for her. Nkita-ship brought another right to them, namely, the female children born of the mother's nkita belonged to them; they could sell them and get themselves other women with the money. They could [582] not, however, marry them, since they were their cousins, and custom was opposed to any marriage between relatives. The boys could, [602] nevertheless, take the nkita of their mother as a wife, since the Negroes have no notion of affinity or relationship by marriage. The male children were, then, the owners of the female children that the nkita
of their mother brought into the world:

These three girls, children of nkita Trees, belong to the three sons of Marie. If Marie had only one son, then Piet would have the right to trade the two other girls for money and to buy other wives with this money, either for himself or for his younger brother; but if she [Marie?] brought female children into the world, half of them belong to Marie's son.

583 If the nkita gave birth to no children of the female sex, the 604 boys of Marie could resort to the husband of the nkita of their mother, namely, their uncle, nyangobika. If, however, he had no fortune, no money, [337] no wives, no girls to sell ... or only wives to whom others could lay claim and had more right, then they were disinherited,

121 It was said before that kinship and local groups are to be discussed. This statement needs clarification. When speaking of local groups in the present study, we do not intend to refer to groups which consist of non-related subgroups. It is to be clearly understood that the residence pattern will be used as the decisive criterion for subdividing the groups. Thus, closely related groups may be excluded, more distantly related groups may be included. Occasionally such local units also include groups which are not related to each other. [189]

Also, among those groups which I have called kinship groups in this study, a biological or genealogical connection which can be proved and expressed in juridical terms is quite doubtful. We shall not concern ourselves, however, with this lack of precision; rather, we shall regard as related those persons or groups of persons whom the Ekonda themselves consider as related. In my opinion there is no justification for disregarding the attitude of the natives since it is their attitude which determines the character and function of the groups. Murdock (10) uses this approach to the kinship group, while using the term "lineage" for persons who can prove their relationship. We hasten to point out that also the local groups have a tendency toward "paternalization" (11), to construe a closer relationship.

10. Social Structure, p. 47.

11. Boelaert, "Clan équivoque," p. 17.

The Kinship Structure of the Ekonda

61 602 Among the Ekonda we find a system of groups which are ordered according to degrees of real or assumed kinship. This system is subdivided into a hierarchical structure of many ranks. Larger groups consist of between one to four groups of the next order. The relationships between the groups correspond to the relationships between their founding ancestors. In this fashion certain groups are described as the older or younger brother of 61 602 another group. According to their relationship to others, groups may be designated as:

- brother, younger or older;
- brother or half brother (descended from various wives of the polygynous ancestor);
- [848] Illegitimate child of the sister which, legally, as the child of the oldest brother or of the father of his mother, belongs to the group of the mother's relatives;
- child of a boy who together with his sister has moved to the unit of his brothers-in-law and has settled there permanently;
- son of a sister, who for some reason has separated from his paternal relatives and has moved in with the group of his mother or of one of his grandmothers.

601 Present-day social relationships are influenced by this variety of kinship relations. The kinship terms which refer to the relationships of the genuine or assumed ancestors to each other are occasionally transferred to the groups.

614 602 621 In this paper we shall describe the Isangi group (12) as an [101] example of hierarchical kinship structure. Isangi is a local group of the type described above (p. 1). Following the custom of the region, I shall refer to it as a "village." Until we have decided which terms are applicable to the various groups, I shall use the letters A to E for the individual ranks of the hierarchical structure. Within this system A shall stand for the smallest and E for the largest units (see Diagram 2).[1]

In addition to the three ranks of Group D in Isangi, there are others in the daughter villages (see Diagram 1). These may also include foreign groups, as, for example, the "Nkundó" group, Liimbu, in Wengé.

All the groups represented on the diagram (Diagram 2) are known by their names to the adults of Isangi. In addition to their regular name, all these groups also have a "drum" name and an "honorary" name. Only the three Boyeke groups of rank B have different drum names but no individual group names. The arrangement of groups as found on the diagram does not represent a genealogy. It is based simply on the characteristics and functions of the individual groups [190] which in each case are equal to each other on one rank. Thus, we have here an organizational diagram, not a genealogical table. [Diagrams 1 and 2 appear here.]

The people of Isangi are also well aware of the relationships between the individual groups, but they are not as clearly conscious of the system as it appears in our diagram. They are able to describe the kinship relations between the groups and they can point out which functions are assigned to the individual groups without, however, regarding the groups as equal to one another because they have like functions and without seeing them as part of a system as we do. Thus, our diagram represents a systematization which, by its very nature, does not wholly do justice to reality. Correspondingly, therefore, there is no satisfactory Ekonda social terminology.

[191] [Diagram 3 appears here.] Just as in nonscientific European usage, the terms lack sufficient precision. Furthermore, in principle the nature of the groups between rank A to E and of the still larger units is similar, and as a result all the terms are used almost indiscriminately for large and small units alike.

Usually, the word ikundɛ (literally, "lap") refers to small units, approximately those of ranks A and B, but it is also used for larger and large units if their relatively close degree of kinship is to be stressed. Thus it approximately corresponds to the meaning of the word "family" as used in nonscientific language. The word ilongo refers both to what in European usage is described as the small family [Kleinfamilie] and also to groups of ranks A and B.

614 He represents the A-group in the council of elders of the village and of the other large units. Since no members of the group [672] are considered capable of conducting affairs, all the legal transactions which they undertake are treated as though they had been sanctioned by the patriarch. To a large extent the members of the group may represent one another. In the absence of the elder, a younger member may act as the representative of the [623] group at council meetings. When the senior member dies, his function will be taken over by the next oldest member of the group.

An A-group will split up only through internal conflicts 614 which cannot be bridged or through a large population increase. 602 The newly-formed A-groups continue to maintain a close relationship which, at first, is much closer than among the B-groups whose A-groups have split much earlier. In the higher ranks cohesion after the split diminishes only gradually; thus many gradations develop in the feeling of cohesion. These gradations could not be even approximately reproduced in a diagram with any degree of exactitude. There is no formula by which the split takes place, as there is, for example, among the Tallensi (13) where it is determined by a certain number of generations. 614 Theoretically the A-groups are "eternal." The A-groups are 596 subdivided into small families. Within the polygynous families 592 nuclear families [Familienkerne] (14) have a semi-independent position economically. Each wife has her own house. A husband's wives and the wives of his sons have their houses within the same homestead. As the master of the homestead, the father has an open shelter where the men spend their time and [768] hold their meetings. Upon the death of the master of the

614 clan.

4. Like my children, the children of my older and younger brothers are my "children" (bona; pl., bana). The Nkundo does not have any special terms for "son" and "daughter." He simply says "male child" and "female child."

5. The children of my "sons" are my grandchildren (bonkana; pl., bankana).

6. The children of these male grandchildren are my great grandchildren (bonkanola; pl., bankanola).

II. Bonyango

The mother's clan is called bonyango, from the word nyango, "mother," and includes:

1. The mother's father and his brothers, who are also nkoko.

2. Their daughters, including my own mother, who are "mothers" (nyango; pl., banyango). The brothers of my "mothers" are my "male mothers" (nyangompame; pl., ba-).

3. The sons and daughters of my "male mothers," who are thus of my generation in our sense but who, to the Nkundo, are my "children," since to them I am legally identified with my mother and therefore I am their "male mother." This explains
[602] the unusual and privileged position which I hold in my mother's clan.

4. The children of my "children" are my "grandchildren." [219] [Table 1 appears here.] [220]

III. Bokanga and Banankana

601 A Nkundo has other blood relatives scattered among the clans 602 who have married a woman of his own clan, be it a "female father," a sister, or a daughter. A Nkundo calls all the unrelated members of these clans bokanga. The related members, including children born to the women of his clan, he calls impersonally sisters' children, "children of a sister of the clan" (bonankana; pl., 601 banankana). As a result, the children are legally identified 602 with their mothers. Thus, my sister's child is a child (bona) to me, or a sister's child (bonankana), but to my own child he would be father (ise).

In addition, he has maternal blood relatives, children of my mother's sisters, who are thus his "brothers and sisters," or children of the daughters of his "male mothers." Since these last daughters are his "children," their children would be his "grandchildren." Again, all the members of these clans who are unrelated by blood are his bokanga.

602
582 There are affinal clans which have given wives (wali; pl., baali) to my clan. This does not, of course, concern my mother's clan, which is a clan related by blood, but rather clans which have given wives, be it to a classificatory "father," to one of their sons, or to one of the sons of the latter. The Nkundo calls all the members of these clans -- with the exception of the woman -- bokilo (pl., bakilo). The Nkundo, merely by marrying a woman, at the same time marries all her legal younger sisters, that is to say, all the bakune [Ed., bankana?] and bana of this woman. Similarly, the woman marries not only a man, but at the same time all his legal younger brothers, that is, all the bakune and bana of this man (except the children of their own union).

602 Just as the clans which have received a wife from my clan thus include bokanga and sisters' sons, so also clans that have given us a wife include bakilo and "wives." Clans which have given a wife to my bonyango follow the same rules.

Comments

602 In several recent studies, especially in South Africa, four rules have been defined which govern classificatory terminology.

The first rule is that of the "unity of the lineage": The lineage as a whole is classified as belonging to a particular 'generation'

121 614 ●602 in its relations to another lineage as a whole" (Holleman, op. cit., p. 9). The author adds, "the unity of the lineage may be broken by a division into affines and cognatic, each with their distinctive terminology, in which the cognatic section is one 'generation' lower than the affinal section" (p. 5.).

121 614 602 601 Just as we speak of a mother society or a sister society, so the Nkundo can also consider an affinal clan as a moral person and speak of his mother's clan as of his mother, of a bokanga clan, of a bokilo clan. I do not think that the term bokanga or bokilo implies an idea of generation when it is applied to an individual, any more than does the French term "parent-in-law," or member of my family-in-law. The Nkundo would certainly not admit what the author cited here writes [221] [Table 2 appears here.] [222] about the Hera: "in inter-lineage relations, ... once the relationship between Ego and any cognatic relative is determined, all the cognates of the same lineage as that relative will bear the same degree of kinship as himself to Ego, regardless of the differences in generation . . . between themselves or as compared with Ego" (p. 5.).

The second rule would be that the clan which provides us a wife (bokilo clan of the Nkundo) is considered our "father," and thus the clan which receives a wife from our clan would be considered a "son." Moreover, among the Nkundo is understood: "We have given you our daughter as a wife, so you are our son." But also implied is: "We have enriched you by our marriage payment, and our children are your "fathers." These ideas, however, are not reflected in the terminology between affinals. Moreover, the fact that the Nkundo readily uses the term bokilo for his bokanga is significant.

Third rule: In lineages directly related to Ego's lineage, "the female line seems to be potentially one 'generation' lower than the agnatic male line" (p. 11). The author tells us that: "This duality is even revealed in agnatic relations . . . Ego calls his . . . father's sister either vatete (father's sister) or hanzwadzi (sister)." Thus, the women of directly related clans would be considered to belong to a lower generation than the men.

It must be stated that the tables of the bakanga clans presented by the author do not reflect this rule, since all members of these clans not related by blood, males as well as females, are designated as vakwasha= children-in-law. In the bakilo clans the rule seems to be founded on the Hera idea (according to the interpretation of the author) that all the women of my wife's clan are my "wives," no matter what their generation or age. This rule is not applicable to the Nkundo either in ideas or terminology.

There is still the fourth rule which the author quoted here uses often but does not interpret in his tables where it is completely opposed to the second rule: the child is legally identified with its mother. According to the second rule, the child of my father's sister would be my grandchild, and at the same time, according to the fourth rule, it would be my "father."

For the Nkundo, the fourth rule explains how this child is my "father," while the child of my mother's brother is my "child."

One may thus conclude that two rules explain the details of the classificatory system of the Nkundo:

1. In clans which have given a wife to our clan, all the women who are legally younger sisters of this wife, exclusively, are "wives" of all the men, exclusively, who are legally younger brothers of the husband.

2. In clans which have received a wife from our clan, the children born of this wife are identified with their mother by the children of this wife's brothers.

593ˣ 152 With reference to signs of affection, grief at the time of death, etc., the observations made for parent-child relationships hold true here -- mutatis mutandis.

3. Various relatives

602 The Nkundo's affection extends toward all members of his family, that is, all those with whom he feels linked by blood and common origin. These relatives are much greater in number than in Europe, because Nkundó kinship includes many more generations. The intensity of affection decreases with the distance of the degree of kinship. But the Nkundó knows and feels that he belongs to a large family, and he remains attached to all its members. He can find a home with any of them. This accounts for the fact that in the centers, men from the same village will look for each other and consider each other "brothers." Actually, that is what they are, since in general each village consists of only a single kin group. [621]

Although here, as in the case of brothers and sisters, common interests play a part in maintaining bonds between family members, the feelings of affection are not based on selfish considerations. The latter only reinforce these feelings, which are truly innate among the Nkundó. Among the various relatives the strongest attachments are developed between grandparents and grandchildren, uncles and aunts and nephews and nieces, male cousins and female cousins, etc.

603 Among the Nkundó as among Europeans there is a very strong affection between grandparents and grandsons, even greater, one might say, than between parents and children (the expression is: bǒna [30] l'onkánɛ́, ndekɛ́ nd'ȏnkánɛ́). But the relationship degenerates into compliance and weakness on one side, and into disrespectful carelessness on the other.

604 A Nkundó loves his paternal uncles and aunts and treats them like "fathers," and his maternal uncles and aunts like "mothers." Naturally, his feelings toward them are not as affectionate as for his parents, but they are an extension of these in an attenuated form.

605 The same situation holds true for the bonds which link him to his cousins, whom he calls "brothers" and "sisters." The children of his paternal aunt are his "fathers," however.

583x 602 607 Thus the person who is herself the object of a bride price is the nkita. The first generation born of the nkóló calls her bonkita. In the third generation the term nkwá y áómbá is applied to the relationship.

For example:

mother	Lokónjó	nkita of Bekombe
son	Imana	bonkita of Ifangá
mother	Lokónjó	nkita of Bekombe
son	Imana	benkita of Ifangá
grandson . .	Etsíha
mother	Lokónjó	nkita of Bekombe
son	Imana	bonkita of Ifangá
grandson . . .	Etsíha	nkwá y'áómbá of Litáola

● [603] [169] The bonds between the nkóló's grandsons and the nkita's grandsons are loosened because respect and authority between grandparents and grandsons are more or less nominal; in practice they no longer exist. (1)

1. See Chapter VI, Article VI.

If the nkóló leaves no descendants, the nkita's sons are freed from any obligation. Just as the Nkundó like to be able to call someone their nkita or their bokwá so, too, they take pride in not belonging to a nkóló.

582 and those who owe submission and respect. The "superior" relatives 602 [576] are the ascendants, uncles, aunts, etc., in short, all those bearing the title of "father" or "mother," as well as elder brothers (elder [601] sisters, elder cousins, etc.), who are batómóló (sing. botómóló). The "inferiors" are the descendants, those who are called "children" (bǎna): sons and daughters, grandsons, nephews, nieces, younger brothers or sisters, and those who are classed with them and called bakűné (sing. bokűné).

[599] [587] 4) Polygamy and the inheritance of widows introduce another element. We will see that although persons of certain degrees of affinity may not marry, the prohibition is lifted to permit the inheritance of widows.

5) Our term "relatives by marriage" the Nkundó term and bakiló are not synonymous, even with respect to direct affinity. When we use the term "relatives by marriage" here, we are speaking in Nkundó terms. They do not consider certain persons whom we would include in that category as "relations by marriage." Such persons [601] are included in the group which as a whole is designated as likiló or bakiló, but when properly and accurately referred to they are called bǒme, "husband," or wǎli, "wife," because they may marry each other and therefore affinity, strictly speaking, cannot be applied to them. In other words, for the Nkundó, affinity is the relationship of a person with (only) those of his spouse's relatives whom he is forbidden to marry. It is well to bear in mind the double meaning of this term.

2. The rules

1. Direct Affinity

582 603 606 A. Marriages are prohibited in the direct line. Nevertheless, in accordance with consideration number 4, a son or grandson may inherit or marry the widows of his father or grandfather, but not the reverse. [254]

Example 1

Bakando (F)
|
Mbɔ́yɔ́ (M) + Esalɛ́ (F)

Mbɔ́yɔ́ may never marry Bakando.

Example 2

Eale (M) + Boɔ́ná (F)
|
Mbɛ́lá (F)

Eale may never marry Mbɛ́lá.

Example 3

Bombembí (M)
|
Ikɛ́tɛ́ (M) + Basásɔ́ (F)

Bombembí may never marry Basásɛ́. (1)

[586]

1. If after the death of his son Ikɛ́tɛ́, Bombembí wanted to marry his widow, the mother of the deceased would be so angry and ashamed that she would irrevocably leave him. Such conduct on the part of a father during his son's lifetime would give the son full rights to vengeance (assassination, war with the help of the mother's clan, etc.), for it would be equivalent to a real disavowal of his son. But the case is purely hypothetical.

Example 4

Esalo (M) - Longá (F)
|
Lofɛ́tɛ́ (M)

Lofɛ́tɛ́ may marry Longá.

N. B. The same rules apply to grandparents and grandsons.

604 An uncle (see D above) is not entirely free to cure his nephew's 837 (F) passion unless he is the nkólố of his sister (E), that is, unless the 578 mother (C) of his sister (E) is the nkita of his aunt (B), [307] who is the 575 sister of his father (A). Indeed in that case his sister may not complain, for she owes him respect and submission; her subordination to her brother and master is greater than the gratitude he owes her for any riches he may have obtained through her or on her account.

D. In the case of the relationship of a grandson (bonkáná) to
● 603 his grandfather's wives, his freedom is, in practice, complete. Actu-
837 ally, among the Nkundó the affection of a grandfather (nkóko) for his own grandson often exceeds his love for his own son and completely degenerates into weakness. (1) The grandfather puts up with all his grandson's carryings-on, his whims, all his teasing, his insults, etc.

After illicit relations the grandson sometimes carries his insolence so far as to spontaneously send his grandfather a "mock" indemnity in the form of a basket filled with stones in the place of copper rings.

626 Although the grandfather treats his grandson with good humor,
603 public opinion does not favor the latter's conduct, though it is more
837 lenient than in the cases described above. The public reaction, as well as the sending of the "mock" fine, shows that in principle these relations are censurable and condemned. Because of present circum-
[illegible] stances, particularly marriage at an earlier age than in the past, the age difference between a grandson and his grandfather's wives has increased considerably in the constantly growing number of cases, and their relations have proportionately decreased. (2) [308]

1. As happens very often also in Europe.
See Chapter I, Part 1, Article I, 3.

[illegible] 2. We have seen above that other Nkundó tribes are even less strict in these matters. On the other hand, the Ekonda, a Nkundó group living on Lake Leopold II, have a > higher morality -- in our terms. Among them the question of relations between a woman and her husband's son, younger brother, etc., does not even arise. Have they been influenced by some neighboring tribe? Or must we attribute the inferior morality of some of the tribes in this respect to decadence.

626

837

The following conclusions emerge from this long description:

1) Relations between a man and the wife of his son, younger brother, etc., in short of anyone inferior to him in the family hierarchy, are always strictly prohibited and never occur.

2) They do occur on the other hand between an inferior and the wife of his senior and superior. The degree of kinship between the husband and the culprit plays a considerable role in determining the seriousness or triviality of an infraction, the sanctions applied, and the various consequences. Some relations are accepted, others are censured with varying degrees of leniency, still others are pitilessly criticized.

3) In these matters a distinction may be made between two aspects:

a) the husband's reaction and the repression of the illicit relations;

b) the judgment of public opinion;

or:

a) the financial aspect;

b) the moral aspect -- to use that term for want of a better one.

Sometimes a third element comes into play, namely the intervention of the family on the side of the culprit against the injured husband who, for one reason or another, is in the wrong himself.

a) The usual sanction for adultery is, for the man, an indemnity to pay. But such a payment cannot be made since no financial transaction -- strictly speaking at least -- may be made 583 searching for old disputes and old arguments about wives to get a wife.

604 And then they were still not always successful; their youth itself was against them here and robbed them constantly of the little that they 464 had saved for that purpose. The means for getting money, such as lances, knives, arm and foot bands, were extremely scarce. The Blacks do not know of workers or servants, and if one of those poor souls presented himself at the home of one who was better endowed by fortune and offered to chop wood for him, to lay out a manioc field, or to build a house for him, to gather straw and bamboo in the forest for that purpose, then the inborn laziness of the Negro would require long months to complete that work. As salary, the worker received only a few bakonga (copper arm of leg bands); these he already owed to the owner for having shown too much inclination for one or another of his wives. The result of this was that many young men remained with-589 out a wife and that those who were favored by chance, that is to say, 595 had many children of the female sex in their family, each had several 562 wives. I consider this a primary cause of polygyny. The woman had a relatively high monetary value and represented capital. Thus, it did not happen that anyone gave his daughter or sister to another for nothing, just as among us it does not happen that a farmer gives his cow or horse to a poor devil for nothing.

583 If the father or brother sold a daughter born of the nkita of his 604 daughter or sister -- a right that general custom gave him and which usually occurred, since the children of the female sex were sold very 683 young and the boys, the rightful claimants or owners, in that case were still very young -- this was done in order to buy another wife. The rights of the children shifted then as follows:

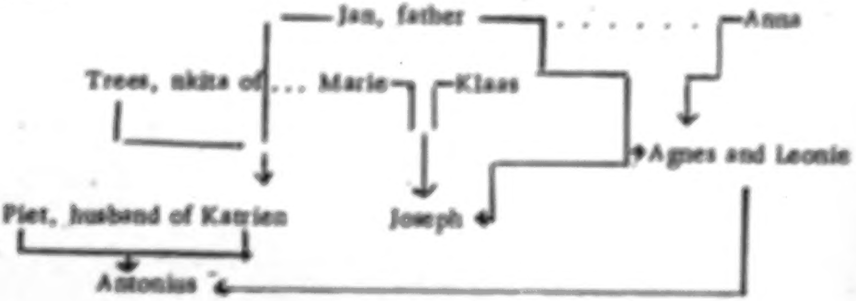
[338]



583 Jan, the father, by selling Katrien, the nkita of his daughter 604 Marie, becomes indebted to Joseph, the son of Marie and at the same 603 time his own grandson; and on the other side he becomes the debtor of Antonius, his other grandson, by selling his mother, Katrien.

Anna, whom he bought, was then the nkita of Katrien and the quasi-nkita of Marie. Both sons, Joseph and Antonius, were hard pressed because of Anna, the nkita of both of their mothers. If Anna bore two daughters, as I have indicated, the case was simple: the first daughter belonged to Joseph and the second to Antonius. If, however, she gave birth to only one daughter, then this child belonged to Joseph, and Antonius was left out in the cold. If father Jan had no children of the female sex by Anna, then the matter was extremely thorny for both of them, and if their grandfather or uncle possessed no money, had no more wives by whom he had daughters, there was nothing left for them to do but, at his death, to take the nkita of their mother as a wife. For this reason it happened many times that young men lived with old women, and even though there was then generally no more hope of children, those wives were then still good enough to cook the meals and do the little work that a Negro household requires.

000 I will not digress any further about the method of distribution of women, about the rights over the women which the nkita system brings with it. It would take us too far. Furthermore, not only the present, but also the past and the future are involved in it; so that one would have to be a Negro and raised in those matters to understand them clearly ... and even then they involve numerous palavers (disputes), which continually agitate the families and the villages.

The Origin of the Nkita?

576 The sale of the woman and the immediate loss of her freedom 583 must naturally have given her cause for revolt. It has perhaps cost the 562 man a severe struggle to make the woman content with her lot. A compensation or reimbursement had to be given to her, and most certainly the nkita system has its origin there. It was at least a partial compensation that the man gave to the woman. It gave her rights over her nkita 593 152 x With reference to signs of affection, grief at the time of death, etc., the observations made for parent-child relationships hold true here -- mutatis mutandis.

3. Various relatives

602 The Nkundo's affection extends toward all members of his family, that is, all those with whom he feels linked by blood and common origin. These relatives are much greater in number than in Europe, because Nkundô kinship includes many more generations. The intensity of affection decreases with the distance of the degree of kinship. But the Nkundô knows and feels that he belongs to a large family, and he remains attached to all its members. He can find a home with any of them. This accounts for the fact that in the centers, men from the same village will look for each other and consider [621] each other "brothers." Actually, that is what they are, since in general each village consists of only a single kin group.

Although here, as in the case of brothers and sisters, common interests play a part in maintaining bonds between family members, the feelings of affection are not based on selfish considerations. The latter only reinforce these feelings, which are truly innate among the Nkundô. Among the various relatives the strongest attachments are developed between grandparents and grandchildren, uncles and aunts and nephews and nieces, male cousins and female cousins, etc.

603 Among the Nkundô as among Europeans there is a very strong affection between grandparents and grandsons, even greater, one might say, than between parents and children (the expression is: bɔ̃na [30] l'onkɛ́nɛ́, ndekɛ́ nd'ɔ̂nkɛ́nɛ́). But the relationship degenerates into compliance and weakness on one side, and into disrespectful carelessness on the other.

604 A Nkundô loves his paternal uncles and aunts and treats them like "fathers," and his maternal uncles and aunts like "mothers." Naturally, his feelings toward them are not as affectionate as for his parents, but they are an extension of these in an attenuated form.

583^x 602 Thus there is no special family treasure upon which the various members can draw to obtain wives. But since bride prices paid out generally come from bride prices received, and all the wealth which comes to the family as such (that is, which is not the result of purely individual and personal work by one member) is to some extent owned by the members in common, it may be said in a sense that all the members of a family share rights in the wealth of the group. However, their rights exist only to the [134] extent of their kinship and as regulated by the family council.

Even members of the family who are not legally required to do so are not unwilling to give to a relative whatever portion they can save for him. Nevertheless, I know of isolated instances where assistance was refused, either out of avarice or of opposition to the proposed marriage. But such a refusal is a neglect of the duties of kinship, and its gravity depends on the relationship between the individuals involved. (1) A refusal on the part of the mother's family almost never occurs. For they have been enriched by the bride price received for the young man's mother, and consequently he is always entitled to the bride price paid for one of the daughters of his mother's nkita (a nkita is a woman obtained by means of the bride price that has been paid).

583^x 604 Therefore he goes to his maternal uncle (nyangɔ́-mpámɛ́ (2) or nya-ngɔ́bika among the Wángatɛ́, Bakɔ́ala, and Lifumba). This uncle always helps him, whether his means are great or small. Under certain conditions the nephew may even claim rights over his uncle's harem. But here we must distinguish between different cases. (Let us

1. Remember what has already been said, namely that we must always clearly distinguish among duties imposed by law and those imposed by kinship, friendship, decorum, courtesy, and social proprieties.

2. Literally, "male mother."

585x not forget that we are speaking of a young man who has not yet re-604 ceived a wife in his own clan.)

1) The uncle has priority rights if he has only one wife, even if she is the nkita of the nephew's mother. If that wife cannot live in peace with her husband, however, and if she is always trying to break up the marriage and go to another man, the husband's family can itself intervene and assign the wife to the nephew, if the couple love each other. By this means they try to prevent her from going elsewhere; it is preferable that she remain within the kin group. For if the marriage is broken and she leaves them, the family becomes involved in a long restitution process, [135] giving rise to numerous difficulties and to an end of revenue -- if that expression can be used -- from bride-price valuables.

2) If his uncle has two wives, the nephew can claim rights only over the one acquired by means of his own mother's bride price. The exception cited under item 1) holds even more true in this case.

In the two situations cited above, however, the family tries to appease the nephew by assigning to him the expected bride price of a female cousin. They do not yield to his demands unless no other solution is available.

3) If his uncle has several wives (four, five, or more), the nephew has the right to take one of them, if none of them were acquired by means of the bride price paid for the uncle's sister, that is, the nephew's mother.

585x If any of these eventualities materialize, the nephew is re-
604 quired to leave his father's clan (wisé) and to enter his mother's family
428 (bonyangó). Actually, he is not averse to doing so. For we may suppose that in his father's kin group he has neither wealth nor future, while in that of his uncle he finds all he needs. He is considered his uncle's own child, and even has seniority over his cousins. He is their father (isé) and consequently has precedence over them; and he can succeed his uncle as family patriarch. Moreover, upon his uncle's death he always inherits one of his widows and becomes the first -- and often the only -- successor after the brothers of the deceased. (1)

1. This inheritance right is valid even if he continues to live in his own clan, in which case, however, it is impossible for him to become the chief or only heir.

589x These rights prevail even if the nephew has wealth at home. ●604 In that case -- which is extremely rare since ordinarily he prefers to remain with his own clan -- he does not make use of them if his uncle has only two or three wives (whom, however, he can inherit), [596] or if other close relatives [136] are in need. For to do so would show a great lack of affection for the family (lifɛta), and he would be severely reprimanded.

Because of all that, the nephew (bɔ́nankáná, "sister's son") sometimes abuses his rights. That is the basis for the following proverbs: nkoi ɛ́kumb'omɔ́ngɔ́ lokombo, "the leopard takes the owner of the hunting enclosure" (that is to say, the hunter); bɔ́nankáná ɛ́fonola nyangómpámá walí nd'ɛ́ɛ́ko, "the nephew abducts the uncle's wife even in his own domain"; bɔ́nankáná ale inganja v'åliko, "a nephew is a stick overhead." This last proverb is the Nkundó version of the sword of Damocles.

In short, a nephew has a right to the assistance of his maternal uncle if he settles with him and is adopted by him. Upon the death of his uncles he becomes heir and head of the family. But his rights are second to those of his uncle's brothers, who are also his "mothers." If he remains in his own clan, he receives help and can even obtain the bride price of one of his female cousins born of his mother's nkita. He may even receive part of the inheritance, if it is large. His rights are based on the fact that his uncle was enriched by the valuables given him by the nephew's clan in payment for his sister's marriage.

Finally, if a young man does not even have any close relatives, 589x because all are deceased, and if for some reason he has no patrimony 556 (because of dissipation, debts, exploitation of the weak by the strong), he is forced to procure the bride price through his own labor: carving, hunting, fishing, setting elephant snares, making traps and hunting enclosures, clearing fields, or, nowadays, working in the service of the Whites. In former times there was also the possibility of war or raids by which he could obtain valuables or prisoners to sell as slaves. The wealth which someone acquires by his own work is called bafɛ́mbɛ́ (bakonga, etc.) lá mpambɔ̂kɛ (literally, "by the strength of his arms"). [137]

582 604 B. Members of different generations in the collateral line: Marriage with older, "superior" relatives of the spouse is forbidden. The Injôlô sometimes make an exception for an aunt of the spouse after the latter's death, but this practice is very much frowned upon.

Marriage with the spouse's inferior, younger relatives is permitted.

The same rules apply equally to great-uncles and great-aunts, and to cousins who are not equals (related as "father" and "son"; see the table of kinship relations and terminology in the appendix).

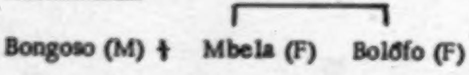
C. Equals in the collateral line: The degree of relationship is of no importance, for example, marriage with an older sister (or cousin) of the spouse is forbidden; marriage with a younger sister is permitted. The same rule applies to women, but after the husband's death an exception is sometimes made in the elder brother's favor in order to facilitate inheritance arrangements. [184] Only the Boángɛ́ -- like the Elángá of Losanganya -- make no distinction between elder and younger siblings and always permit the marriage. They are even beginning to be imitated by the Injɔ́lɔ́.

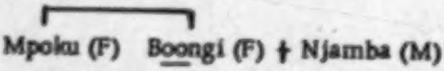
Example 10



Bongoso (M)
Mbela (F)
Bolɔ́fo (F)

Bongoso may marry Bolɔ́fo.

Example 11



Mpoku (F)
Boongi (F)
Njamba (M)

Njamba may not marry Mpoku.

2. Indirect Affinity

582
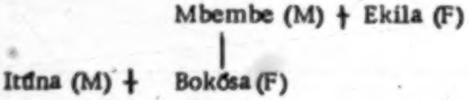
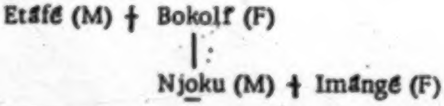
604
A. Marriage among those of lineal relationship is forbidden but certain exceptions are permitted. There are two possibilities: with the father's wife (Example 16) and with the son's wife (Example 17).

Example 16



If Bokɔ́sa dies or is divorced from Itɔ́na, the latter may marry Ekila, but this exception is not often made because they would be very open to unkind criticism. [257]

Example 17



After Bokolí's death Etáfɛ́ is permitted to marry Imángɛ́. Such a marriage is more leniently regarded if Etáfɛ́ himself paid the bride price for Imángɛ́, for in that case he is preserving his capital in marrying her. This consideration may also apply during Bokolí's lifetime, if Imángɛ́ does not want to remain with Njoku. Under such circumstances, however, Njoku's mother would oppose the marriage with all her power. If Etáfɛ́ does not listen to reason, he can expect [586] a divorce or even war with Bokolí's clan, to whom he is doing a great injury by taking away his stepson's wife. After divorce Bokolí's kin may refuse to give Etáfɛ́ her new bride price and may give it directly to Njoku so that he can obtain a wife to replace the one that was taken from him.

582 The same rules are applicable to aunts and uncles, but they 604 are less strict:

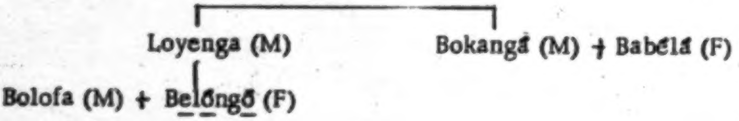
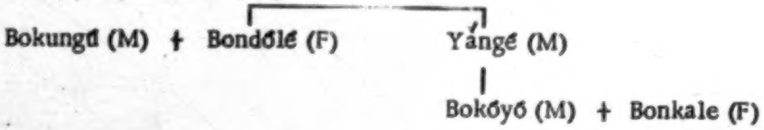
Example 18 (comparable to Example 16):



Loyenga (M)
Bokangá (M) + Babĕlá (F)
Bolofa (M) + Belóngó (F)

Example 19 (comparable to Example 17):



Bokungú (M) + Bondólé (F)
Yángé (M)
Bokóyó (M) + Bonkale (F)

582 B. Marriage between affines who are collaterally related through their 595x lineal relatives:
605 a) Marriage between descendants [of the lineal relatives through [602] whom the affinity is established] is strictly forbidden. Thus, the children of two spouses may not marry each other; they are considered brothers and [258] sisters. The same rule applies to two half-cousins (Example 21).

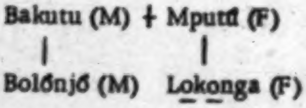
Example 20:



Bakutu (M) + Mputú (F)
Bolónjó (M)
Lokonga (F)

Marriage between Bolónjó and Lokonga is strictly prohibited.

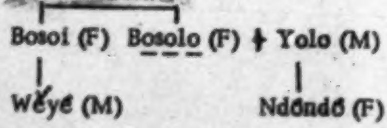
Example 21



Bosoi (F)
Bosolo (F) + Yolo (M)
Wĕyé (M)
Ndóndó (F)

Marriage between Wĕyé and Ndóndó is prohibited.

593x to have relations with her. If the woman refuses to have relations
607 with her brother-in-law, the latter often reports her ill will to her
837 husband, who will reprimand her or even strike her because she does not love his own brother, and will accuse her of having lovers: ótóna bǒn'ǒâ ngóya, ólangakě ńk'aend'ǎnkíná. Since there is more affection between brothers born of the same mother, the husband's anger would then be even greater. A lack of affection on the part of his wife arouses her husband's suspicions on the question of her fidelity because Nkundó women are extremely ready to yield to temptation. [305] Therefore if she refuses her own brother-in-law-husband, she must be obtaining satisfaction elsewhere. This reasoning may be false, but it is based on a frequency of cases. The husband's attitude does not show a lack of jealousy; on the contrary, it proves its existence.

If the younger brother meets his sister-in-law in the home of her family, they will intervene on his behalf. They will tell her to receive "her husband" well, to prepare food for him, to clean the hut set aside for him. They will even force her to cohabit with him for the entire duration of his stay in their village. By this means they seek to avoid palavers with their son-in-law. If the woman's antipathy toward her brother-in-law is so great that she cannot be made to submit to him, they sometimes give their visitor another of their daughters (or cousins, etc.), younger than his brother's wife, to perform wifely duties for him.

All those designated as bakíné in Nkundó terminology fall into the same category as a younger brother (thus younger male cousins are also included). The seriousness of the conflict that may arise on this question and of its consequences vary in proportion to the degree of kinship between the individuals involved.

604 C. The position of a nephew (bǒnankáná) in relation to his 437 maternal uncle's wives is to a great extent comparable to that of a
578 son in relation to his father's wives. The fact that marriage is effected 593x through the payment of a bride price gives the nephew greater freedom; for the uncle was enriched through the marriage of his

● 604 nephew's mother. There is no question of indemnity, except that of 837 "respects," to show the nephew's submission, and it consists of a hen and 578 a bunch of bananas. If the nephew refuses to make this gesture of 593x deference and submission, he is considered in the wrong and the entire family gangs up on him in order to save the authority and hierarchy of the family. "You are offending your uncle," they say, "no doubt you want him to die so that you can take his place and profit from the inheritance." And the offended uncle, after being patient for a few days, may demand a real indemnity. [306] But then other considerations become involved, and a new situation is created.

Actually, the young man's mother often -- though not always -- takes his side and turns on her brother. Two situations may arise:

1) The nephew's mother may not be born of the same mother as the uncle. In that case she seldom refrains from intervening on her son's behalf. She reproaches her brother for his hardness and his lack of affection for her, especially if the adulterous wife is her nkita, that is, if she were acquired by means of the bride price paid for her. She will say, "To whom do you owe this wife? And yet you demand riches from my son. Give me back my bride price, so that I may get him a wife." The uncle also gets angry, and sometimes accedes to his indignant sister's request and returns her bride price. If he does so all relationship between brother and sister is broken. But this is an unusual outcome; matters are almost always settled before this extremity is reached.

837 (F) passion unless he is the nkóló of his sister (E), that is, unless the 578 mother (C) of his sister (E) is the nkita of his aunt (B), [307] who is the 579 sister of his father (A). Indeed in that case his sister may not complain, for she owes him respect and submission; her subordination to her brother and master is greater than the gratitude he owes her for any riches he may have obtained through her or on her account.

D. In the case of the relationship of a grandson (bonkáná) to 603 837 his grandfather's wives, his freedom is, in practice, complete. Actually, among the Nkundó the affection of a grandfather (nkóko) for his own grandson often exceeds his love for his own son and completely degenerates into weakness. (1) The grandfather puts up with all his grandson's carryings-on, his whims, all his teasing, his insults, etc.

After illicit relations the grandson sometimes carries his insolence so far as to spontaneously send his grandfather a "mock" indemnity in the form of a basket filled with stones in the place of copper rings.

626 Although the grandfather treats his grandson with good humor,
603 public opinion does not favor the latter's conduct, though it is more
837 lenient than in the cases described above. The public reaction, as well as the sending of the "mock" fine, shows that in principle these relations are censurable and condemned. Because of present circum-
[178] stances, particularly marriage at an earlier age than in the past, the age difference between a grandson and his grandfather's wives has increased considerably in the constantly growing number of cases, and their relations have proportionately decreased. (2) [308]

1. As happens very often also in Europe. See Chapter I, Part 1, Article I, 3.

[184] 2. We have seen above that other Nkundó tribes are even less strict in these matters. On the other hand, the Ekonda, a Nkundó group living on Lake Leopold II, have a

Rights of the Male Children in Relation to the Nkita of Their Mother

596 We have already seen that the right of succession and father-
583 hood passed to the male children of the sister, because she had been 605 sold and had brought money into the family, or rather because she had a nkita there, a sort of guarantee for the money that had been received for her. Nkita-ship brought another right to them, namely, the female children born of the mother's nkita belonged to them; they could sell them and get themselves other women with the money. They could [582] not, however, marry them, since they were their cousins, and custom was opposed to any marriage between relatives. The boys could, [602] nevertheless, take the nkita of their mother as a wife, since the Negroes have no notion of affinity or relationship by marriage. The male children were, then, the owners of the female children that the nkita
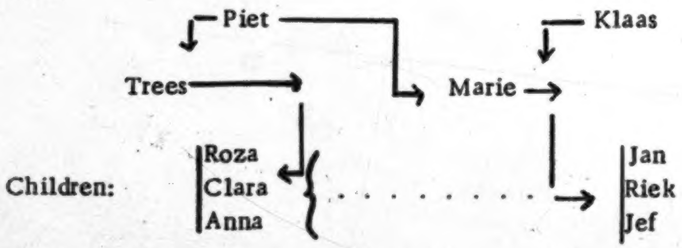
of their mother brought into the world:



These three girls, children of nkita Trees, belong to the three sons of Marie. If Marie had only one son, then Piet would have the right to trade the two other girls for money and to buy other wives with this money, either for himself or for his younger brother; but if she [Marie?] brought female children into the world, half of them belong to Marie's son.

583 If the nkita gave birth to no children of the female sex, the 604 boys of Marie could resort to the husband of the nkita of their mother, namely, their uncle, nyangobika. If, however, he had no fortune, no money, [337] no wives, no girls to sell ... or only wives to whom others could lay claim and had more right, then they were disinherited, poor devils in society, and it cost them long years of work and much 583 searching for old disputes and old arguments about wives to get a wife.

604 And then they were still not always successful; their youth itself was against them here and robbed them constantly of the little that they 464 had saved for that purpose. The means for getting money, such as lances, knives, arm and foot bands, were extremely scarce. The Blacks do not know of workers or servants, and if one of those poor souls presented himself at the home of one who was better endowed by fortune and offered to chop wood for him, to lay out a manioc field, or to build a house for him, to gather straw and bamboo in the forest for that purpose, then the inborn laziness of the Negro would require long months to complete that work. As salary, the worker received only a few bakonga (copper arm of leg bands); these he already owed to the owner for having shown too much inclination for one or another of 589 his wives. The result of this was that many young men remained without a wife and that those who were favored by chance, that is to say, 595 had many children of the female sex in their family, each had several 562 wives. I consider this a primary cause of polygyny. The woman had a relatively high monetary value and represented capital. Thus, it did not happen that anyone gave his daughter or sister to another for nothing, just as among us it does not happen that a farmer gives his cow or horse to a poor devil for nothing.

583 If the father or brother sold a daughter born of the nkita of his 604 daughter or sister -- a right that general custom gave him and which usually occurred, since the children of the female sex were sold very 603 young and the boys, the rightful claimants or owners, in that case were still very young -- this was done in order to buy another wife. The rights of the children shifted then as follows:
[338]

Anna, whom he bought, was then the nkita of Katrien and the quasi-nkita of Marie. Both sons, Joseph and Antonius, were hard pressed because of Anna, the nkita of both of their mothers. If Anna bore two daughters, as I have indicated, the case was simple: the first daughter belonged to Joseph and the second to Antonius. If, however, she gave birth to only one daughter, then this child belonged to Joseph, and Antonius was left out in the cold. If father Jan had no children of the female sex by Anna, then the matter was extremely thorny for both of them, and if their grandfather or uncle possessed no money, had no more wives by whom he had daughters, there was nothing left for them to do but, at his death, to take the nkita of their mother as a wife. For this reason it happened many times that young men lived with old women, and even though there was then generally no more hope of children, those wives were then still good enough to cook the meals and do the little work that a Negro household requires.

000 I will not digress any further about the method of distribution of women, about the rights over the women which the nkita system brings with it. It would take us too far. Furthermore, not only the present, but also the past and the future are involved in it; so that one would have to be a Negro and raised in those matters to understand them clearly . . . and even then they involve numerous palavers (disputes), which continually agitate the families and the villages.

562 The sale of the woman and the immediate loss of her freedom must naturally have given her cause for revolt. It has perhaps cost the man a severe struggle to make the woman content with her lot. A compensation or reimbursement had to be given to her, and most certainly the nkita system has its origin there. It was at least a partial compensation that the man gave to the woman. It gave her rights over her nkita

152 With reference to signs of affection, grief at the time of death, etc., the observations made for parent-child relationships hold true here -- mutatis mutandis.

3. Various relatives

602 The Nkundo's affection extends toward all members of his family, that is, all those with whom he feels linked by blood and common origin. These relatives are much greater in number than in Europe, because Nkundó kinship includes many more generations. The intensity of affection decreases with the distance of the degree of kinship. But the Nkundó knows and feels that he belongs to a large family, and he remains attached to all its members. He can find a home with any of them. This accounts for the fact that in the centers, men from the same village will look for each other and consider [621] each other "brothers." Actually, that is what they are, since in general each village consists of only a single kin group.

Although here, as in the case of brothers and sisters, common interests play a part in maintaining bonds between family members, the feelings of affection are not based on selfish considerations. The latter only reinforce these feelings, which are truly innate among the Nkundó. Among the various relatives the strongest attachments are developed between grandparents and grandchildren, uncles and aunts and nephews and nieces, male cousins and female cousins, etc.

603 Among the Nkundó as among Europeans there is a very strong affection between grandparents and grandsons, even greater, one might say, than between parents and children (the expression is: bőna [30] l'onkáná, ndekɛ́ nd'ônkáná). But the relationship degenerates into compliance and weakness on one side, and into disrespectful carelessness on the other.

604 A Nkundó loves his paternal uncles and aunts and treats them like "fathers," and his maternal uncles and aunts like "mothers." Naturally, his feelings toward them are not as affectionate as for his parents, but they are an extension of these in an attenuated form.

● 605 The same situation holds true for the bonds which link him to his cousins, whom he calls "brothers" and "sisters." The children of his paternal aunt are his "fathers," however.

[602] Note, finally, that the more distant the relationship, the less strict the prohibition, that is, dispensations and exceptions are more easily accepted.

The same rule applies to cousins:

Bompɛ́lo (M)

Marriage between Bompɛ́lo and Bosongo is forbidden.

As the degrees of relationship grow more distant, the obstacles increasingly lose their force, so that exceptions are more readily accepted.

One point remains to be noted, although it has already been mentioned several times. Cousins (male or female) who are [601] bɔ̌nankɛ́nɛ́ are "fathers" to their cousins according to Nkundɔ́ law; they are therefore treated as aunts or uncles. For them the prohibition is very severe, especially if they are nyangɔ̂kilɔ́, "mother" of a relative by marriage.

Ekamba is Jasɛ́'s bɔ̌nankɛ́nɛ́ and therefore Emɛ́ma's "father." Ilɛ́fo, his wife, is therefore Emɛ́ma's mother. Emɛ́ma is Yɔ̌ndɔ́'s bokilɔ́. Consequently, Ilɛ́fo is the mother of Yondɔ́'s bokilɔ́ and therefore Yondɔ́'s nyangɔ̂kilɔ́. Marriage between Ilɛ́fo and Yɔ̌ndɔ́ is strictly prohibited, though it is not prohibited between Emɛ́ma and Yɔ̌ndɔ́ (see Example 15).

Adulterous relations among these various persons will be discussed in Chapter VI, Article VI, 2. [260]

Rights of the Male Children in Relation to the Nkita of Their Mother

596 We have already seen that the right of succession and father-
583 hood passed to the male children of the sister, because she had been 605 sold and had brought money into the family, or rather because she had a nkita there, a sort of guarantee for the money that had been received for her. Nkita-ship brought another right to them, namely, the female children born of the mother's nkita belonged to them; they could sell them and get themselves other women with the money. They could [582] not, however, marry them, since they were their cousins, and custom was opposed to any marriage between relatives. The boys could, [602] nevertheless, take the nkita of their mother as a wife, since the Negroes have no notion of affinity or relationship by marriage. The male children were, then, the owners of the female children that the nkita
of their mother brought into the world:

These three girls, children of nkita Trees, belong to the three sons of Marie. If Marie had only one son, then Piet would have the right to trade the two other girls for money and to buy other wives with this money, either for himself or for his younger brother; but if she (Marie?) brought female children into the world, half of them belong to Marie's son.

604 If the nkita gave birth to no children of the female sex, the boys of Marie could resort to the husband of the nkita of their mother, namely, their uncle, nyangobika. If, however, he had no fortune, no money, [337] no wives, no girls to sell ... or only wives to whom others could lay claim and had more right, then they were disinherited, poor devils in society, and it cost them long years of work and much

● [606] same question may be raised with respect to another strict rule of decorum which forbids a man to look his mother-in-law in the face. (2)

2. For details concerning this custom, see Chapter VI, Article V, 1.

It can readily be answered in the affirmative. (3)

3. Nevertheless, see Chapter X, Article II, 3.

784 516 The rule of decorum which forbids a man to sit down on a seat where a woman is seated who is not his wife seems to me also to be dictated by sexual modesty. On the other hand, stepping over the seat under such circumstances has nothing whatever to do with this feeling. The purpose of this practice is to enable the person seated (regardless of sex) to avoid the evil repercussions of a charm or magic spell in his or her possession. (4)

4. Contrary to the explanation given by Jadot in Blancs et Noirs au Congo Belge (Whites and Blacks in the Belgian Congo], p. [illegible].

291 894 Is the native ashamed to show his nakedness? Let us beware of answering this question in general terms. In order to have an idea of the situation which is sufficiently clear and precise, various cases and circumstances must be taken into account.

1) First of all it can be stated that in the normal course of daily living the Nkundó, men as well as women, do all they can to hide their genital organs. That is to say that basically they are

Article I. Girls

584 According to Nkundó custom it is acceptable for an expected child, not yet born or still very young, to be promised in marriage to X or Y. This practice was formerly very common and is still quite prevalent today. It is called banda bǒna or bǒmoto, literally, "to count a child" or "to count a woman." The ikulě is paid at the time of the promise. Later the matter is carried out in the usual fashion; the other parts of the bride price are paid either while the fiancée is young or, preferably, at the time when she goes to her husband.

584
855 Until that time, if one of the girl's relatives is already a wife of a polygamist husband-to-be or of one of his relatives, the child is brought up in her husband's family from a fairly early age, depending on the circumstances. She lives with her relative. She may be barely seven or eight years old, for example. If no one in her husband's clan can take care of her, [232] she spends only one or two weeks there to become acquainted, little by little, with people and places; she repeats the visit from time to time. Her mother accompanies her, for being so young she could not get used to being there alone, without support, without her parents. Therefore it is necessary to wait till she is old enough to be somewhat independent and able to manage by herself. That time usually comes around the [145] beginning of puberty, thus sometime between the ages of twelve and fifteen.

593 Like an adult woman, she is already called bompěka or wělf, depending on the portion of the bride price that has been paid. She has all the duties and privileges of a wife: sexual relations, food preparation, care of the household, etc. There is no set date or age for the beginning of cohabitation. This matter is settled between the husband and his parents-in-law. The latter do not have the right to [illegible] delay the time, even if their daughter is still too young, but they can make use of their great influence over their son-in-law. The modern [illegible] [577] generation is not shocked by sexual relations between an adulterer (sic) and a girl who has not reached puberty. Besides, all is in order from the legal standpoint; since the man has paid the bride price, he is the

592 602 [576] and those who owe submission and respect. The "superior" relatives are the ascendants, uncles, aunts, etc., in short, all those bearing the title of "father" or "mother," as well as elder brothers (elder [601] sisters, elder cousins, etc.), who are batómóló (sing. botómóló). The "inferiors" are the descendants, those who are called "children" (bána): sons and daughters, grandsons, nephews, nieces, younger brothers or sisters, and those who are classed with them and called bakéné (sing. bokéné).

[595] [587] 4) Polygamy and the inheritance of widows introduce another element. We will see that although persons of certain degrees of affinity may not marry, the prohibition is lifted to permit the inheritance of widows.

5) Our term "relatives by marriage" the Nkundó term and bakiló are not synonymous, even with respect to direct affinity. When we use the term "relatives by marriage" here, we are speaking in Nkundó terms. They do not consider certain persons whom we would include in that category as "relations by marriage." Such persons [601] are included in the group which as a whole is designated as likiló or bakiló, but when properly and accurately referred to they are called bóme, "husband," or wáli, "wife," because they may marry each other and therefore affinity, strictly speaking, cannot be applied to them. In other words, for the Nkundó, affinity is the relationship of a person with (only) those of his spouse's relatives whom he is forbidden to marry. It is well to bear in mind the double meaning of this term.

Such a marriage is more leniently regarded if Etɛ́lɛ́ himself paid the bride price for Imɛ́ngɛ́, for in that case he is preserving his capital in marrying her. This consideration may also apply during Bokolí's lifetime, if Imɛ́ngɛ́ does not want to remain with Njoku. Under such circumstances, however, Njoku's mother would oppose the marriage with all her power. If Etɛ́lɛ́ does not listen to reason, he can expect a divorce or even war with Bokolí's clan, to whom he is doing a great injury by taking away his stepson's wife. After divorce Bokolí's kin may refuse to give Etɛ́lɛ́ her new bride price and may give it directly to Njoku so that he can obtain a wife to replace the one that was taken from him. [586]

593x We should add that in some households, difficulties arise
● 606 rather easily during the visits of parents or parents-in-law, because 578 of the sensibilities, incompatibility of character, or discontent of one party who may consider the other guilty of discourtesy, lack of delicacy, disrespect, or stinginess toward the visiting parents. The same is true for the rearing of children. [273]

4. Punishments

593x Nkundô law permits a husband to inflict corporeal punish-578 ment (bikɔ́njwɛ̂, sing. ekɔ́njwɛ̂) on his wife, its nature varying with the seriousness of the case. Obviously these sanctions, expressly [576] permitted by law, cannot give rise to claims on the woman's part or result in the obligation to pay a boɓndo. [Editor's note: Unless, of course, the husband -- acting in excess of his rights -- is more violent than the occasion warrants for under such conditions, the [684] wife, supported by her family, attacks the husband, who is then forced to acknowledge the harm he has done and make reparation by means of a boɓndo.] If she is hurt she may claim a supplementary payment called liombo (from the verb bomba) or "bandage" (for the wound); it consists of 5 rings or more, depending on the situation.
[826] The loss or breaking of a tooth is considered a serious injury. For this is a real injury to the woman and, in the case of front teeth, to her beauty. (1) Of course, as explained above, the wife will first have run home, and it is there that the dispute is examined.

593x For the sake of a clearer understanding, let us go into a few 578 details concerning the penal stipulations of Nkundô law in relation 684 to the life of a married couple.

Usually, in a simple domestic quarrel, the couple does no more than tell each other some home truths, seasoning their speeches

She bore the name of Mbɛ́laka (meaning indemnity), because her father had solemnly proclaimed (-bɛ́kya) and publicly promised that he intended, one day, to place himself in the position of having to pay an indemnity because of his daughter, as proof of his love. Indeed [782] when Mbɛ́laka was married, he killed one of his wives, cut her into pieces, and sent the "meat" to his son-in-law as "the first hen" that his wife would prepare for him. But he did not have to pay [602] [604] the indemnity because the victim's clan was too weak to attempt a war; they did not dare to make a claim and, in order to avoid even greater misfortunes, they resigned themselves to this revolting ignominy.

Article V

Relations Between the Husband and His Wife's Family

606 607 As has already been said, kinship by marriage is called likiló, and relatives by marriage are called bokiló, bakiló. Mbótsoló is a term of respect for very close relatives by marriage (father-in-law, mother-in-law, sometimes brother-in-law or sister-in-law). When there is a considerable age difference between two affinal relatives, the elder one sometimes calls the younger bokilówalɛ́. This happens most frequently when the son-in-law is so young that he can still be considered a child. This term can even be used by an elder brother

607 with reference to the young wife of his junior. (1)

> 1. The second component of this term is used by some Elinga as a synonym of bokiló. It should be related to walé, a term which among the Mbole and the Bakutu denotes a girl who is bolómbɛ or a woman who has just given birth (the same is true among the Ekonda).

The present practice is to exclude from among the bakiló these persons with whom marriage is permitted. They are more frequently called "husband" or "wife."

The opposite of bokiló is bokanga. The bakanga are members of the family that has received the bride price, while the bakiló are those who have paid it. In common practice the word bokiló is often used in place of bokanga, but never the reverse. Bokiló l'okanga is the expression denoting the whole group.

606 1. Father-in-law and mother-in-law

A husband owes respect, love, and assistance to his parents-in-law. This point is vital to harmony in the home. In this sphere a wife is very intolerant [287] of forgetfulness and even more of ill will. Offensive comments, insults pointed at parents-in-law even in their absence result in serious difficulties. Sometimes a husband expresses his bad humor or anger against his spouse in that way. This kind of behavior never wins approval, unless his in-laws first insulted him. The law of retaliation applies fully in this situation. The Nkundó say: ótswá mbóngó l'ǒndamba olóngaka ńk'ǒndamba, "He who replies to evil comments is in the right, not the one who began." For a fuller discussion of this topic, see above (Article III).

431 To remain on good terms with his parents-in-law, the husband must visit them from time to time. By the very nature of things, his visits are less frequent than those of his wife. One reason why they cannot be too frequent is that the husband must bring gifts at each visit (belonga). One does not go to one's parents-in-law empty handed.

431 The extent of the riches brought depends on circumstances. Some greedy persons hope for large gifts if their daughter's marriage proves stable. Others prefer not to receive too much, lest they be required to give back an equal amount and -- if they are not especially wealthy -- thus find themselves one day in great financial difficulties. For the [585] belonga are added to the sum total of the bride price and must therefore be restored, should the occasion arise.

The parents-in-law do not allow their son-in-law to depart without giving him countergifts as a farewell (belingako). These take the form of hens and ducks, and their value is added to the total amount of nkomí.

Neither son-in-law nor parents-in-law like to see the generosity of the other party exceed their own, except in a few unusual cases. As a matter of fact, this is a very intelligent policy; equality is maintained on both sides, so that there can be no reproaches on the grounds of greed or stinginess [288], and if the marriage should be dissolved, it would be easy to re-establish equilibrium.

A son-in-law is expected to help his father-in-law to an extent which varies with the situation and with his means. He may fell the trees of the forest for him or set up a field, he may build him a house or make a hunting enclosure (lokombo), etc. A good son-in-law never fails to fulfill these obligations, and the father-in-law does not let him leave without having given him some present.

It is very important to a wife that her husband acquit himself conscientiously of these duties of visiting and assisting her parents. His failure to do so would lead to serious palavers and their usual consequences.

The father-in-law, for his part, does not fail to help his son-in-law in his various tasks. When the work is completed, the latter gives him a bolingako of a few copper rings, which are included in belonga.

The visits of a woman's parents to their son-in-law are more frequent. It is their way of showing their love for him and their daughter and their interest in the household. The visits can last weeks and months, whether only one or both of the parents come. If they stay too long, they are accepted with less enthusiasm. Gifts (bolingako) must always be brought out when the farewells are said.

606 Even if the parents' union has been dissolved and the mother 574x has remarried, she does not cease to visit her daughter and son-in-law.
586 If her new husband seems not to agree to her going, difficulties result.
593x And if he does not change his attitude, his behavior may cause his wife to leave him in order to return to her first husband, the girl's father.

Thus, visits are accompanied by an exchange of gifts which 606 are belonga if given by the son-in-law, and part of the nkɛmɛ val-574 uables if given by the father-in-law. Farewell gifts are belonga [289] 431 and part of the bride price if given by the son-in-law, part of the 585x nkɛmɛ if given by the father-in-law.

These same rules apply, mutatis mutandis, to various relatives on each side with respect to visits made, services rendered, and presents given on these occasions.

606 One very strict law regarding relations between son-in-law and parents-in-law should be noted: a man is forbidden to see the face of his wife's mother. This prohibition is scrupulously observed by all. He is allowed to see her face only once, at the beginning of the marriage, "to learn to know her so that they can avoid each other." If, for example, they meet while traveling in the forest, they must turn their backs to each other. Usually the woman turns her face toward the edge of the path to let her son-in-law pass. They greet each other by word of mouth, ask for each other's news, but do not shake hands or look at each other. It is funny for us to see a woman visiting her son-in-law. The two place themselves on each side of a partition or in two corners, and they talk in that way, asking for news, carrying on a discussion, etc., without seeing each other. Sometimes mother-in-law and son-in-law find themselves in each other's presence unexpectedly, in the forest or in the fields, without having seen each other approach or having been warned by anyone. They immediately turn their backs on each other; the man excuses himself and quickly disappears, even if to do so he has to plunge into a dense forest full of prickly and tangled creepers.

This law extends also to the husband's very close relatives, such as his younger brothers (who are also "husbands"), and to all 606 women called "mother," such as the mother's sisters and the father's wives. The law does not seem strictly applicable to these persons, but seems to cover them by extension. On the other hand, there is no comparable law with regard to a woman and her father-in-law.

A violation of this prohibition results in a great palaver, for it is considered a serious lack of respect. It may produce a serious domestic quarrel. [290] A wife will refuse to perform the conjugal act with her husband because he has looked at his mother-in-law. That is why people help each other by warning each other of the "danger" when their respective mothers-in-law arrive.

Compensation for the offense may be made by the payment of a boɔ́ndo of several bakonga to the mother-in-law. As long as the payment has not been made, the wife will not fulfill her conjugal duties. After it has been made, everything goes back in order. If it is proved that the situation came about involuntarily, there is no palaver and no payment is required. Nowadays the best Christians tend to give a boɔ́ndo once and for all to definitively settle any palaver that may occur in the future and to avoid the obligation of having to submit to this prohibition, since they are beginning to vaguely perceive its uselessness.

[551] A man is even forbidden to pronounce the name of his mother-in-law in her presence, even to address or call another person of the same name. In such a situation he must resort to a surname or paraphrase. Usually he addresses her as mbɔ́tsolɔ́. An infraction of this rule results in the same punishment as if a man were to look at his mother-in-law.

606 If we ask the Nkundɔ́ to give us the reason for this custom, as it is so strange to our point of view, they reply that they are ashamed or embarrassed to see the women who begot their wives, and that to do so would be a grave offense to her. The custom is a means of expressing the respect a son-in-law owes his mother-in-law, and of avoiding unceremonious behavior or too great a familiarity toward her. That is all the explanation they give. For our philosophical turn of mind, it does not exhaust the subject. We are tempted to look for a connection between the intimate relations of the married couple and

606 the act of procreation on the part of one of them. Perhaps this idea is latent in the native mind, or at least is at the basis of this rule. The fact that this hypothesis applies only to the wife's mother-in-law [mother?] does not weaken it; for in native eyes [291] the other instances are entirely without importance. (1)

1. See, for example, Chapter II, Article X, and Chapter V, Articles II and III.

606 292 Another regulation pertaining to the mother-in-law requires that she -- and all the women who are given the same title in current usage -- may appear in her son-in-law's village only when dressed in a boleleke. A boleleke is a banana leaf, either green or dried, which has been torn in several places perpendicularly to the large [765] central rib, and constitutes the first and principal sign of mourning. Moreover, Batswa women must also dress in this manner before entering a Baotó settlement. The following reason is given for the rule in the second instance: a Botswá woman's dress consists of a lolímba, a belt of small braided ropes about 10 centimeters long. Although in ordinary positions the lolímba provides fairly good protection, it is not considered adequate to really stop all indiscreet looks. And it is popularly believed that if a Bootó sees a Botswá woman's genital organs, she will die. Might we conclude from this last explanation that there is a fundamental connection between the reasons that necessitate the wearing of a boleleke in these three instances? Or is the mother-in-law to imitate a Botswá woman and thus show a certain subordination to her son-in-law?

2. Female relatives

607 837 As long as they are free, that is, as long as no bride-price payment has been made for them, a woman's sisters or cousins are considered by her husband as his wives, and he calls them so (baálí). This term is applied only to relatives of a generation below that of the true wife or to members of the same generation who are younger than she and with whom marriage [292] is permitted. It is therefore never

607 extended to relatives with whom marriage prohibited, such as nieces
837 who are banankáná, who are his wife's "mothers." (1)

1. See Chapter V, Article IV and the examples cited there (for instance, examples 25, 26, 17).

When such relatives of the wife marry, the situation changes. They belong to another man, and a continuation of the same practice as when they are single produces very serious cases of adultery. There are differences depending on the degree of affinity, however. In addition to the usual sanctions against adultery, other measures may be taken, especially the dissolution of the marriage. An especially serious case, but one which is more or less hypothetical, would be adultery between a man and his father-in-law's wife; a special feeling of shame is connected with it, and our Nkundó say that the two persons are like a Botswá and his master. Misconduct with the wife of a brother-in-law (or cousin-in-law) is also a very serious matter. The latter may take his sister (or cousin) away from the guilty husband and thus break the marriage. The same applies to adultery with a nyangôkiló.(1)

1. See Chapter V, Article IV and the examples given there (for instance, examples 25, 26, 17).

3. Legal matters

606
685 Here we must examine the manner in which breaches of the law are settled between parents-in-law and son-in-law. It is known that among these peoples justice, in the strict sense of the word, is one of the most prominent aspects of social legislation. Theft is one of the principal causes for shame and was formerly severely punished. The thief, especially if he continued to repeat his offence, could be sold as a slave.

685 If one of the wife's relatives were found guilty of stealing from his (or her) relative by marriage, or even from one of the latter's relatives, the family tribunal was assembled. Out of consideration for the ties of kinship between the thief and the wife and in order not to sadden her and her family, the guilty person was not sold as a slave. He was simply turned over to the woman [293] and her family, and they were told: "Here he is; he has been found guilty of theft and should have been reduced to slavery. Out of respect for you, however, we are not selling him; we are rolling (-kilimola) him toward you. Take him as bride price and add him to the sum of the bọsóngọ." Thus the matter was settled in a friendly fashion. If subsequently there was a divorce, the wife's family had to restore not only the bride price that had been paid but also an additional slave for the member of their group that the husband had yielded in this fashion. Thus, the transaction was not at all a fictional one.

Conversely, the same procedure was adopted in relation to a relative of the husband who had violated the rules of justice to the detriment of a member of the family related by marriage. But in that case the extradition of the guilty party was considered as the addition of a slave to the amount of the nkọmɛ.

[539] Hence the saying: bokiló ntɛ́wɛ́kɛ́ ndɛ́ ngond'ɛ̌y'okanga, "a parent-in-law cannot die in the forest of his relatives by marriage."

The situation is no different nowadays. The only change is that, instead of giving back a slave if a dissolution of the marriage occurs, the equivalent value is paid in copper rings, etc.

606 The same customs governed conduct toward prisoners of war. For instance, in the course of a war Eale became the master of Bombolo, whose cousin is married to Iloko, a close relative of Eale. Iloko interceded with Eale in order to obtain Bombolo's freedom, and Bombolo was sent home but was to be considered as bọsóngọ. The liberated prisoner thus was classed as a slave given as part of the bride price, as in the preceding case, and all the appropriate rules were followed.

602 brings forth reprimands on the part of the husband and his parents which obviously can easily degenerate into quarrels. If the omissions are so frequent and of such a nature that they can no longer be explained as simply forgetting, a whim, or a fit of peevishness, but [299] are taken to indicate spitefulness or vulgarity, the matter is [621] brought before the ndonga (who is often assisted by the family tribunal) or brought before the authority constituted by the woman's kin. If in spite of everything the expected improvement does not take place, the break-up is inevitable.

606 The husband's father and mother extend the same affection to their son's wife as they feel toward him. They consider her their own child, and it is not unusual to find that their love for the wife equals their feeling for their own son. She is only a relative by marriage, but out of affection for her they call her their child. She, for [601] her part, does not use toward them the term bakanga (or bakilò) but out of filial respect calls them "father" and "mother." Exceptions to this practice may be found, however.

606 If the father (and those who fall in the same category such as 224 uncles, elder brothers, etc.) kills a large game animal, he is expected to give his son's (or brother's, etc.) wife a piece of meat, whose size depends on the number of daughters-in-law he has and which consists of one or several chops (bokalako) (1) and the piece at the nape of the neck (botombyá).

606 Illicit relations between the husband's father and his daughter-835 in-law would be an unheard of crime. The same would be true with respect to any of the "superior" relatives. (2) The laws regulating

1. Called lieto among the Bolenge and the tribes of the Losanganya.

[178] [194] 2. Only the Boangi -- like the Elangá of the Losanganya -- allow relations between a brother and the wife of his junior; and they are already beginning to find imitators among their neighbors to the southeast, the Injolo.

606 the relations between a wife and her husband's parents are closely
856 connected with the rules pertaining to the prohibition related to affinity and seems to spring from the same source. Therefore it will be useful to have in mind what we have said in the preceding chapter, Article IV.

607 The husband's elder brothers treat his wife as their sister. The wife calls her husband's sisters [300] bakilő, but out of respect she often gives them the title of "mother." (1)

[601] 1. Among the Elángă the wife also calls her husband's sisters bongíli (pl. bangílí); they call her bǒnongíli (pl. bǎnangílí). A wife often calls her husband's mother nyangôngíli. Bǎnangíli l'ǎnangíli means "the brother's wives and their sisters-in-law."

587 After the husband's death, as has been said suo loco, his father or his brother may marry his widow. But this practice is not well regarded and is permitted only rarely, chiefly when the scattering of the family patrimony is feared or if the two interested parties have an unusual love for each other.

602 With respect to children or younger brothers and all those who fall into that category, the situation is altogether different. Illicit relations with wives of their father, grandfather, uncle, elder brother, or elder cousin, are judged much less severely. Generally, misconduct does not give rise to claims for payment, or the payment is demanded "for form's sake" and consists of a hen and a bunch of bananas. By means of this payment the guilty one recognizes his error and renders homage to the right of his elder.

[628] In general public opinion condemns these relations and often with great severity. The question of degree of kinship as well as other considerations result in a great diversity among the cases, so we will examine each situation separately and distinguish each time between the husband's reaction and that of public opinion.

837 431 substituted for all these items. As a rule the woman demands some remuneration although there are exceptions, which may be frequent or rare, depending on the region and on the nature of the persons involved. They are due to extraordinary passion or to the woman's love for her lover. (1)

1. See Chapter I, Part 1, Article IV.

3. Evidence of adultery

837 684 The strength of the evidence may vary.

1) The strongest evidence is finding the couple in flagrante delicto. No objection will hold up against it, and it constitutes for the application of the severest sanctions. The act must be observed by the husband. The testimony of a third party is never introduced. If another person discovers the adultery and favors the husband, that person will inform the latter so that he can take precautions in order to catch the culprits personally. If it is discovered by the woman's father or other close relative who favors the husband, [606] he informs the latter and, if possible, calls him to witness the infraction himself. If he does so, the husband must give the indemnity to his father-in-law. This is not a legal obligation but one imposed by good relations and decorum, since the father-in-law has shown good will and affection toward his son-in-law.

2) A wife's admission is almost as important and always decisive. Such a confession mitigates her husband's anger toward her and directs it chiefly toward her accomplice. Therefore most women do not hesitate to denounce their paramours if they feel somewhat cornered. (On the other hand, women never denounce each other.) [314]

3) A third form of evidence can be obtained by surprising the lovers while they are planning a meeting. The husband can accuse them on the spot and try to extract a complete confession from his wife on the subject of the past or the future. If possible he assures himself of the co-operation of witnesses. If he foresees a denial on his wife's part, he lets the occasion pass and looks for a good opportunity to surprise the culprits in the act. Regardless of the

764 bombémbé and the botsá w'ilaká are always claimed. The latter payments can never be omitted. The belt is a payment made exclusively to the mother and by rights it goes to the mother's clan.

607 not only will the wife's family reciprocate his fine feelings by adding a few more dogs, but in addition the son-in-law will be well received and successful in his application when, after the period of mourning, he brings the sum of the ibóleóko in order to obtain a substitute for the deceased. (2) In addition, if the relations with his in-laws have been excellent, he will easily obtain the substitute in advance, so that she can care for him during the entire mourning period.

764
609 There are severe sanctions against the omission of the funeral payments. [439] Neglecting to send the notification gift alone is enough to set these in motion. They are: the breaking off of the affinal relationship; the loss of the children, since the father's offense is equal to a repudiation; and finally molestation of the culprit by the spirit of the deceased. Thus at Bokátola (Bompela) one can find two boys, Botúsí and Ikembá, the children of Bonyongela of Ilángá and Etáka of Bokátola. They have now been incorporated into their mother's clan, because their father did not send a nsango. On stronger grounds the same is true for the whole nkunjí.

Article V. The Social Position of a Widow

768
587 In Chapter III, Articles II and IV, we have already noted that in the eyes of the Nkundó, the death of the husband does not dissolve a marriage. The union continues, and even after mourning it is not broken ipso facto. Even to have the woman taken and treated as a wife by another man is not enough to end it. As

000 the same rights as the other children of the polygynist.

595 The polygynist always sought to increase the number of his wives, for his prestige rose and his fortune increased in that manner.
556 If anyone in civilized lands seeks to enlarge his fortune, this is 593 done, people say, in order to insure the future of his children. The native thinks little about that; his primary idea is to enjoy himself and to surpass others in prestige and esteem. As far as the future of his children is concerned, there are polygynists who possess twenty or thirty wives or even more, and sometimes they have only one or two children. Also it is little in keeping with their notions to care for the future; he who is still alive tomorrow must take care of 595 tomorrow then, so they reason. On the contrary, instead of caring for his children, the polygynist often took great trouble to obtain a 593 wife for his son. The son, however, was not yet the owner of his 584 wife; it was, so to speak, only a loan. Not until after the death of 606 his father did he become owner. In some districts, when the father had obtained a wife for his son, he first kept this wife for some time for himself. Only after a few months did he give her to his son. In 595 other districts, when the wife was pregnant by the son, he was obliged
593 to send her for a few days to his father. He was not allowed to bear
606 the honor of fatherhood alone; his father must share that with him.
842 The father reserved for himself the honor of naming all of the chil-
551 dren of his children. In some areas of the Congo, morals were so 835 low and common that the father even kept his own daughters in his harem. This did not occur in Equatorial Africa, but there was a custom that was not much better. The magician was sometimes 583 consulted about the bride price which the father tried to get for his 791 daughter, or the brother for his sister.

The magician then gave them the advice that they themselves should first have relations with their own daughter or sister.
This custom existed almost everywhere in Equatorial Africa.

[538] Bride Price. In general, the daughter was given in 583 marriage upon payment of a bride price. The father had little choice of the future husband of his daughter. The one who guaranteed the most goods in payment was certain to get her. Since, in most cases, the little daughter had not yet arrived at the years of maturity, there was naturally no question of her consent. The bride price was not paid all at once, but gradually during the years while the daughter grew up. Since the daughter was given without her consent

583 payment of the bride price with the bosɔngɔ as he was committed to do through the payment of the ikulɛ and the ndanga. If he does not, the bond between him and his father-in-law is automatically broken, and consequently he is unable to obtain another wife to replace the deceased, and he loses the rights over one of his own daughters. Actually, we will have to come back to this question in Chapter IX, Article IX, 2.

These rules show how great a difference exists between the walo and the bosɔngɔ; in the one case, upon the death of the woman prior to the payment, an indemnity is imposed for a transgression in the eyes of the law; in the other, there is a transaction to stabilize the financial rights of the clans involved.

From all the above considerations we may conclude that because of the special nature of the payment, the bosɔngɔ is very important for the stability of the marriage and the social position of the woman's clan. But from a legal point of view it is far less important than the walo, through which a woman becomes truly [164] a wife; for the payment creates no new social relationship either between the spouses or between the husband and his in-laws.

The woman who is married thanks to the bride price paid for another is called the latter's nkita. It seems to me that this word is etymologically related to nkitɔ, "profit, benefit" (the verb is -kitola). In the final analysis, both words may be derived from the root -kit, "to become."

[186] A synonym of nkita is bongíli (bongíji): it is used primarily by the Injɔlɔ but it is also known, though seldom employed, by the other tribes.

[602] [575] The woman whose bride price has served to procure the nkita is the latter's nkɔlɔ (literally, "mistress"). The Injɔlɔ as well as the Bɔngɛ also call her by the more tactful name, nyangɔngíji, "mother

585 of the bongíli." (1)
[595]

1. This term also designates the wife of a polygamist who has brought along one of her relatives as co-wife; she is the nyangôngili [sic] of the latter. (See Chapter VII, Article IV.)

For "to obtain a nkita" the Nkundó say -umba nkita, literally, "to fell a nkita," as one fells a tree or an adversary. Or they may say -bɔ́ta nkita, "to possess a nkita" (umba or bɔ́ta so-and-so, la nkita). "To become a nkita" would be rendered as -kwɛ́ nkita, "to fall into being a nkita."

585 596 The hierarchy of those entitled to the bride price is based on the general hierarchy of family members, which gives precedence to the older generations and, within each generation, to the older members. Consequently, as long as a member of the family having the title of isɛ́ (father) is unmarried (unless he is physically or mentally incompetent), no bɔ́na (son) is entitled to a bride price, even if it is that of his own sister. Within the same generation, the older members have precedence over the [165] younger ones, but boys have priority rights to the bride price of their uterine sisters. (1)

1. For limitations and exceptions to this right, see Chapter IV, Article II.

It occurs quite often, and was even more frequent in the past, that the person entitled to the bride price is still too young to get married, either in reality or in the opinion of his "fathers." (2) The bride price is consequently used for the benefit of another member of the family. The creditor reaps the benefits later in the form of inheritance.

[602] Even if the woman or women meant for him should die or be taken in slavery, he can obtain the bride price of a cousin to which

583 592 602 no one has direct rights (for instance, if she is an only child) or that of his mother's nkita's daughter, as we will see below.

In these instances there is a temporary suspension of rights or rather a change in the individual entitled to them. These adjustments are made very frequently and can affect several people. Bride prices may even fall to fairly distant relatives, even in the maternal line. The transactions are performed by the patriarchs for the greatest good of the family as a whole. New rights benefiting the person originally entitled to the bride price are being created, and 583 the woman married by its means has become the equivalent of a nkita 601 in relation to him -- as is the following instance:

Bakutu b'Ôlóngɛ́ (Boniface) of Bombɛ́nga w'Ôhenda (Besomb́ɔ́, Bombwanja) has a sister Wɛ́mi, whose bride price serves to provide his paternal uncle, Elongama ɛ́y'imta, with a wife, Ikɔ́kɔ́ of Ndongɔ́-Bongîli. Bakutu's rights over his niece, Bakutu, daughter of Bolɔ́fio, are transferred to Bofɛ́nda d'Ekɔ́kola, son of his paternal great-aunt Etɛ́ka and therefore, in Nkundó terminology, to his father. As a result he obtains the rights over the bride price of Wângi, the daughter of his uncle [166] and Ikɔ́kɔ́. At the same time he acquires a certain authority over Bofɛ́nda, the beneficiary of the bride price that was originally intended for him, and over the latter's children.

When the bride price is meant to procure a nkita, there is nothing to prevent the remainder, should there be any, from being used to pay a debt, a fine, etc., or, more especially, from being given to a relative so that he can procure a wife for himself.

If, in an exceptional case, the bride price is not used for its [684] original purpose, this deviation constitutes an infraction of the law, because it is a violation of the rights of the girl for whom the bride price was paid, for she is thus deprived of her nkita and consequently of certain advantages. It may happen, however, that there is a conflict between this law and some other. In such cases of circumstances beyond one's control, it is up to the legal authorities to determine which of the two has priority.

Such was the case of Bolɛ́i, daughter of Ilolɛ́ y'Ôngɛ́mɛ́, of the Baafɛ́kɛ́ Longwâne of Bonjoku (Bothono). She was married to Bombɛ́longa 583 601 of Likolɛ. The bride price went to her uncle Botɛ́lɔ, because her father had been taken prisoner of war by the Bongale. The family council decided to free Ifolí before contemplating the acquisition of a wife. Botɛ́lɔ therefore paid his brother's ransom. Naturally, Bolɛ́i was greatly annoyed to have to submit to this decision but, taking everything into consideration, she too thought that the liberation of her father had priority over her right to a nkita, of whom she was now deprived. For although the Bongale were able to obtain a wife thanks to the ransom, the wife was not Bolɛ́i's nkita, since each family takes only its own members into consideration.

583 602 607 As we have already implied, the nkɔ́lɔ derives certain advantages from "possessing" a nkita. Her superior position, from the Nkundó point of view, entitles her to respect and to some assistance. An even greater advantage is her right to the dowry. As we have [167] seen, a husband keeps a small part of the dowry for household necessities; the greater part of it goes to the nkɔ́lɔ. Finally, the son of the nkɔ́lɔ has the right to his say in his mother's clan, because it has been enriched by means of valuables paid by his father's clan. He also has the right to cultivate land belonging to his mother's clan and to settle on it. Furthermore, when a member of his mother's clan is enabled to obtain a wife by means of these valuables, he has certain rights over the children of his mother's nkita, and even over the nkita herself. (1)

1. See above, Article IV, 3, and Chapter III, Article II.

In relation to the children of his mother's nkita -- whom he calls his bakwɛ (2) or his mother's benkita (benkita bɛ́fafɛ bɛ́ɛ́ ngɔ́ya) --

2. Singular bɔkwɛ́. The term is derived from the verb -kwɛ or -kwɛ́, "to fall" (see above).

the nkɔ́lɔ's son has the following rights:

1) The right to respect and assistance.

2) The right to sit on the family council which decides on the division of the inheritance (so that the deceased's own son cannot have 593* a share of his father's goods without the consent of his nkɔ́lɔ́) or the 602 use of the bride prices received for the daughters.

607 2) If he cannot obtain a wife through his own clan, he is entitled to the bride price of one of his bokwɛ if it is not first needed by one of her own uncles or brothers. The rights of the latter have priority over that of the nkɔ́lɔ́, unless he settles in his mother's clan. For in that case his rights have precedence over those of the brothers (though never those of an uncle), and he is next in line, after his uncles, to become head of the family. Since he is sister's son, the uncle's children call him "father" just as they call his mother, their paternal aunt, by the name of isómoto ("female father"). He himself calls his first cousins bána, "children," and thus has precedence over them. [168]

Thus the rights to authority over the daughters of the nkita on the part of the nkɔ́lɔ́'s son are limited by the rights of the uncles and, to a certain degree, of the brothers. (1) But in the inheritance of widows the rights of the nkɔ́lɔ́'s son operate fully, and he may claim the one acquired by means of his bokwɛ's bride price, who in a way is his nkita (when she is assigned to him they say baló ɛ́nɔ́ nkita, "here is your nkita").

These rules can result in multiple transactions and in a repeated transferring of rights from one of the two clans to the other as well as within the same clan.

The nkɔ́lɔ́'s grandsons call the nkita's grandsons nkɛ́ y'ɛ́mbɔ́lɔ́, "the excrements of valuables" (an expression which is not at all disrespectful or shocking) because the rights derived from the relationship of nkɔ́lɔ́ and nkita are almost without force. In favorable circumstances they are limited to a little respect and assistance. And if the nkɔ́lɔ́'s grandsons have no other kinship tie with the paternal clan of their second cousins, they cannot even call them by that name.

[169] 1. In his study "Het Familiehoofd bij de Nkundo-Negers" [The Family Head among the Nkundó Negroes], Congo, 1930, Vol. 2, p. 332, Father Brepoels somewhat exaggerates the rights of the nkɔ́lɔ́'s son.

583a 602 607 Thus the person who is herself the object of a bride price is the nkita. The first generation born of the nkfilɔ calls her bonkita. In the third generation the term nkwɛ y ɛ̂mbɛlɛ is applied to the relationship.

For example:

mother	Lokónjɔ	nkita of Bokombe
son	Imana	bonkita of Ilangɔ
mother	Lokónjɔ	nkita of Bokombe
son	Imana
grandson . .	Efofa	. . . . bonkita of Ilangɔ
mother	Lokónjɔ	nkita of Bokombe
son	Imana	bonkita of Ilangɔ
grandson . . .	Efofa	nkwɛ y'ɛ̂mbɛlɛ of Lifɔla

[608] [188] The bonds between the nkfilɔ's grandsons and the nkita's grandsons are loosened because respect and authority between grandparents and grandsons are more or less nominal; in practice they no longer exist. (1)

1. See Chapter VI, Article VI.

If the nkfilɔ leaves no descendants, the nkita's sons are freed from any obligation. Just as the Nkundɔ like to be able to call someone their nkita or their bokwɛ so, too, they take pride in not belonging to a nkfilɔ.

583a 607 Men who bear the title of nkfilɔ may, under given circumstances, have duties towards their bonkita, especially the obligation of taking active part in getting together the amount of a bride price. If the nkfilɔ has provided his bonkita with a wife, the latter must treat him like his father (giving him assistance, the father's portion of the meat of a game animal, etc.).

583^x 607 The mutuality of the rights of nkóló and nkita is well expressed in the saying, ómbété ékóété wě, "possess me so that I may possess you." It is like do ut des.

583^x 607 182 [611] It is possible to judge from the preceding descriptions that the bride price has a considerable influence on family relations. Although the Nkundó system is clearly and manifestly patriarchal, the custom of the bride price and its logical consequences give it certain features which make one think of a matriarchy. This situation comes about quite naturally. Since the bride price is wealth it represents power in society. Through marriage this power is transferred from the husband's clan to the wife's, which is enriched in goods and persons by the bride price that has been received. In a sense, the husband is the provider of his wife's clan. And the child can truthfully maintain that his clan was enriched thanks to his father. As a matter of fact, for the Nkundó, this consideration above all others is the basis for their demands of whatever rights they possess in the mother's clan. [170] The relationship between a woman and her nkita and between their respective children is founded solely on the bride-price system of marriage and has nothing to do with matriarchy. (1)

1. But the above considerations may furnish one source of explanation for the origin of that family system.

Consequently, it is unnecessary to erect complicated theories or engage in tortuous speculations in order to explain the creation of this system or to justify it. It is quite simply the outcome of the payment of a bride price in valuables that are of no use except in connection with a similar purpose.

Nevertheless, although the system of the nkita is a natural and logical consequence of marriage by means of a bride price, it is not a necessary consequence. The bride price exists in all the tribes of the Congo, but it does not seem to have resulted everywhere in the institution of the nkita. 583^x

174 114 607 What has given rise to this institution among the Nkundó? Father Brepoels (loc. cit., p. 330) gives the following explanation:

174 583^a 184 607 "The sale (sic) of the woman and her loss of liberty must naturally have aroused her indignation. The man probably had a great deal of difficulty in persuading her to resign herself to it. It was necessary to arrange for some compensation and that is how the system of the nkita originated. That is how the woman acquired rights over her nkita and how nonexistent prerogatives were attributed to her children: they became the superiors, the "fathers" of the mothers' family . . . . The elders, the wealthy, profited from this system, which released them from any concern for their daughters: the girls could be sold while they were still very young and then if, later, they complained of the injustice that had been done them, the elders consoled them by reminding them of their rights and those of their sons over the nkita and her offspring . . . moreover, this system released the elders from their duty of obtaining wives for their sons and removed any reason for the latter to claim their father's wives."

This explanation for the origin of the nkita system is unthinkable, for it is entirely contrary to everything [171] we know about the nature of Nkundó marriage. But it seems plausible that the fact that the old father benefited from this institution helped it to flower and spread. Native greed also may have played a role.

583^a 174 607a Nevertheless, we must seek beyond the operation of causes which have contributed to the spread and retention of the system in Nkundó society for those that led to its origin.

Need we invent complicated hypotheses for this purpose? It seems to me that we need not; we can be satisfied with the native explanation: the nkíló's rights over the nkita spring naturally from her dominance over the latter, for the nkita's marriage was made possible by the valuables paid for the nkíló; whereas the rights of the nkíló's sons over the nkita's children are derived from the fact that in the Nkundó hierarchy the relationship of the latter to the former is that of "son" to "father."

The secondary causes mentioned above, together with the necessity of reconciling the interests of the various members of the family, subsequently amplified the system.

583^a 607 Exceptionally it may happen that a mother becomes her daughter's nkita. Such was the historic case of Bekombe of Belondó (Bonjolu) and her daughter, Mbíla. The daughter's bride price was

585a used by her father, Nkamba ɛy'ontole of Bolɛtola (Bonjolu), to pay a 607 supplement for his wife Bekombe. On this account the latter became her daughter's nkita. The double bride price served to obtain the wife Lintamba for Ifoli y'onguma, Bekombe's brother and Mbɛlɛ's uncle, and Lintamba thus belonged to both mother and daughter, but the two did not fight about the matter.

One person can have two or more nkita, especially if her bride price is so large that it can be used to obtain several wives. Such is the case of Mputɛ (Sofia) of the Bosfikɛ Mbɛngɔ of Bongandu (Boshoso). Her first husband, Mpɛnda of Lofolɛ, paid 40 rings and a slave. With this sum Mputɛ's uncle, [172] Mbɛngɔ ɛy'akoso (who had settled with the Elɛngɛ l'Imomo, his mother's clan), paid the bride price for Bonjɛlɔ of Nkɛlengo. (1) In the meantime, Mpɛnda was killed in a fight with his brother, Iloko. Mputɛ married Elɛngola, Mpɛnda's nephew, but then he died after two or three years of marriage. She was then married to Lokonga of Lɔngɛ (Nkɛle), whose life was not much longer, and finally to Bakutu (Boniface) of Bombɛnga w'Ekonda (Besombɛ, Bombwanja), who paid a considerable bride price. A part of this bride price was a compensation to the family of the last husband, and another portion was used by Mbɛngɔ to acquire as wife, Bangolɛ of Ekɛkola. By means of the bride price paid by Lokonga, Mbɛngɔ (Joseph), a first cousin of Mputɛ, obtained the wife Bolɛjɛ (who came from the Ionda). Lastly, Bakutu gave Bonjɛhyɛ (Christophe) of Loɛlinga, a distant cousin of Mputɛ, the necessary bride price to marry Embongɛmbembe of Lɔngɛ, who on this account also became the nkita of Mputɛ, though not in the strict sense of the term. Mputɛ thus has four nkita, although not all of them are living.

1. During a war against the Nkɛlengo, this woman had been captured by the Elɛngɛ, who wanted to sacrifice her to the ilengɛ at a feast which terminated the mourning. But Mbɛngɔ begged the notables to let her live because he loved her very much and wanted to marry her.

593x 607 On the other hand, as we have seen, two women may have one nkita in common, especially if their combined bride prices have been used to obtain a single wife. In such a case the two bankɔ́lɔ́ and their descendants share their duties and prerogatives. In practice this situation arises only if the two bankɔ́lɔ́ are uterine sisters, but seldom in the case of other relatives. It does occur occasionally, however, as for instance in the case of Bolɔ́fo w'ímeka and Bolɛ́mbɛ́ w'ikofo. Both were daughters of Bakutu b'is'ɛ́y'olɔ́njɔ́ of Bokenda (Besombo), but they had different mothers (Mbɛ́lɛ́ and Wĩngi, respectively). Their joint bride prices were used for the marriage of Bolɔ́fo wĩ Ekɛ́kɛ́lɛ́ Bonkɔ́lo w'Ĩmɛ́ (son of Bakutu and Wĩngi) to Bokungɔ́ of Engɔ́njɔ́ (Bonkoso). [173]

Article XI
General Remarks on the Payment of the Bride Price

585 843 A few general comments should be added to all the foregoing ideas and rules concerning bride price.

1) During a woman's pregnancy no payment of any kind may be made. This principle is stated by the Nkundɔ́, and they strictly adhere to it. Pregnancy, however, must be understood as a pregnancy which is clearly visible to everyone, that is, the period of bolɛka, and not that of the beginning, bofɔ́wa, (1) during which payments may still be made.

If one inquires into the reason for this prohibition, one receives the reply that if payments were made during the bolɛka the woman would have great difficulties in delivery and would stand very little chance of escaping death. (Pregnancy is considered a dangerous condition. Of a pregnant woman, the Nkundɔ́ say: ekɛ́kĩ la lɔ́fa, "she is blocked by the sun," or "the sun stands across her path," that is, she is between life and death.) That is the only explanation given for the prohibition. Is it perhaps connected in some way with the belief in the elímɔ́? (See Chapter X, Article II, 1).

Only the Bofingɛ -- like the Elingá of Losanganya -- make no distinction between older and younger siblings and always permit the marriage. They are even beginning to be imitated by the Injɔlɔ.

578, 595, 577 If a woman injures her husband during a quarrel he may not retaliate, for she is recognized as inferior and weaker than he. The husband's weapon is abstention from any food, drink, baths, etc., that she offers him. To re-establish peace she must pay a boŋóndo. Nevertheless, nowadays some impetuous men no longer like to observe these rules; they want to act with violence come what may. But they are strongly reprimanded by the old men, who maintain that it is unworthy of a man to retaliate against a weaker being. This traditional attitude of the Nkundó seems to me to indicate a sort of chivalrous nobility based on two feelings, justice and pride. It becomes more understandable when we know that similar conduct is [563] expected with regard to Batswa, inferiors, and subjugated clans (bauló, sing. juló) in their respective spheres. (1) Thus a Booto may not apply the law of retaliation to a Botswa. Under certain circumstances, a juló clan may, with impunity, take what they please from the banana groves of the master's clan, etc.

Note also that it is very much out of place for a man [282] to strike his wife or punish her in any way in the presence of her parents, ● [607] brothers, etc. In fact, this is a very grave offense. And, according to the code of honor, the brother (cousin, etc.) must pick up the glove and fight his brother-in-law to avenge the insult. In many cases the matter ends in a divorce. For such conduct takes away the combined feeling of modesty and embarrassment (nsɔ́nyi) that the two parties normally feel toward one another.

Finally, we must note that the various payments made as boŋóndo are included in the total amount of jíngi or nkomí, respectively.

593, 599 In order to more clearly illustrate the Nkundó attitude concerning the relationship of husband and wife, it might be of interest to cite a few proverbs pertaining to the subjects discussed above:

1) Baningó bakôndaka wǎj'ǎmaka; Lombômbó afôtoda Ntolɛ́ la nganja, "All the others slap their wives (but) Lombômbó beats Ntolɛ́ with a stick." (This is a reference to a historical fact.)

[782] when Mbɛ́laka was married, he killed one of his wives, cut her into pieces, and sent the "meat" to his son-in-law as "the first hen" that his wife would prepare for him. But he did not have to pay [682] [684] the indemnity because the victim's clan was too weak to attempt a war; they did not dare to make a claim and, in order to avoid even greater misfortunes, they resigned themselves to this revolting ignominy.

Article V

Relations Between the Husband and His Wife's Family

606 As has already been said, kinship by marriage is called likilɔ́, 607 and relatives by marriage are called bokilɔ́, bakilɔ́. Mbɔ́molɔ́ is a term of respect for very close relatives by marriage (father-in-law, mother-in-law, sometimes brother-in-law or sister-in-law). When there is a considerable age difference between two affinal relatives, the elder one sometimes calls the younger bokilɔ́walɔ́. This happens most frequently when the son-in-law is so young that he can still be considered a child. This term can even be used by an elder brother

with reference to the young wife of his junior. (1)

> 1. The second component of this term is used by some Elinga as a synonym of bokiló. It should be related to walé, a term which among the Mbole and the Bakutu denotes a girl who is beldfmic or a woman who has just given birth (the same is true among the Ekonda).

The present practice is to exclude from among the bakiló those persons with whom marriage is permitted. They are more frequently called "husband" or "wife."

The opposite of bokiló is bokanga. The bakanga are members of the family that has received the bride price, while the bakiló are those who have paid it. In common practice the word bokiló is often used in place of bokanga, but never the reverse. Bokiló l'okanga is the expression denoting the whole group.

1. Father-in-law and mother-in-law

A husband owes respect, love, and assistance to his parents-in-law. This point is vital to harmony in the home. In this sphere a wife is very intolerant [287] of forgetfulness and even more of ill will. Offensive comments, insults pointed at parents-in-law even in their absence result in serious difficulties. Sometimes a husband expresses his bad humor or anger against his spouse in that way. This kind of behavior never wins approval, unless his in-laws first insulted him. The law of retaliation applies fully in this situation. The Nkundó say: ǒowá mbéngé l'ǒolamba ófengaka ńk'ǒolamba, "He who replies to evil comments is in the right, not the one who began." For a fuller discussion of this topic, see above (Article III).

431
To remain on good terms with his parents-in-law, the husband must visit them from time to time. By the very nature of things, his visits are less frequent than those of his wife. One reason why they cannot be too frequent is that the husband must bring gifts at each visit (belonga). One does not go to one's parents-in-law empty handed.

606 the act of procreation on the part of one of them. Perhaps this idea is latent in the native mind, or at least is at the basis of this rule. The fact that this hypothesis applies only to the wife's mother-in-law [mother?] does not weaken it; for in native eyes [291] the other instances are entirely without importance. (1)

1. See, for example, Chapter II, Article X, and Chapter V, Articles II and III.

292 Another regulation pertaining to the mother-in-law requires that she -- and all the women who are given the same title in current usage -- may appear in her son-in-law's village only when dressed in a bolelekę. A bolelekę is a banana leaf, either green or dried, which has been torn in several places perpendicularly to the large [765] central rib, and constitutes the first and principal sign of mourning. Moreover, Batswa women must also dress in this manner before entering a Booto settlement. The following reason is given for the rule in the second instance: a Botswá woman's dress consists of a lolímbe, a belt of small braided ropes about 10 centimeters long. Although in ordinary positions the lolímbe provides fairly good protection, it is not considered adequate to really stop all indiscreet looks. And it is popularly believed that if a Booto sees a Botswá woman's genital organs, she will die. Might we conclude from this last explanation that there is a fundamental connection between the reasons that necessitate the wearing of a bolelekę in these three instances? Or is the mother-in-law to imitate a Botswá woman and thus show a certain subordination to her son-in-law?

2. Female relatives

587 As long as they are free, that is, as long as no bride-price payment has been made for them, a woman's sisters or cousins are considered by her husband as his wives, and he calls them so (baali). This term is applied only to relatives of a generation below that of the true wife or to members of the same generation who are younger than she and with whom marriage [292] is permitted. It is therefore never

607 extended to relatives with whom marriage prohibited, such as nieces
837 who are banankfnd, who are his wife's "mothers." (1)

1. See Chapter V, Article IV and the examples cited there (for instance, examples 25, 26, 17).

When such relatives of the wife marry, the situation changes. They belong to another man, and a continuation of the same practice as when they are single produces very serious cases of adultery. There are differences depending on the degree of affinity, however. In addition to the usual sanctions against adultery, other measures may be taken, especially the dissolution of the marriage. An especially serious case, but one which is more or less hypothetical, would be adultery between a man and his father-in-law's wife; a special feeling of shame is connected with it, and our Nkundó say that the two persons are like a botswá and his master. Misconduct with the wife of a brother-in-law (or cousin-in-law) is also a very serious matter. The latter may take his sister (or cousin) away from the guilty husband and thus break the marriage. The same applies to adultery with a nyangóalé.(1)

1. See Chapter V, Article IV and the examples given there (for instance, examples 25, 26, 17).

685 Here we must examine the manner in which breaches of the law are settled between parents-in-law and son-in-law. It is known that among these peoples justice, in the strict sense of the word, is one of the most prominent aspects of social legislation. Theft is one of the principal causes for shame and was formerly severely punished. The thief, especially if he continued to repeat his offence, could be sold as a slave.

606 the relations between a wife and her husband's parents are closely
125 connected with the rules pertaining to the prohibition related to affinity and seems to spring from the same source. Therefore it will be useful to have in mind what we have said in the preceding chapter, Article IV.

The husband's elder brothers treat his wife as their sister.
●607 The wife calls her husband's sisters [300] bakilɔ, but out of respect she often gives them the title of "mother." (1)

[601] 1. Among the Elinga the wife also calls her husband's sisters bongili (pl. bangili); they call her bɔnongili (pl. bɛnangili). A wife often calls her husband's mother nyangongili. Bɛnangili l'ɛnangili means "the brother's wives and their sisters-in-law."

After the husband's death, as has been said sup. loco, his father 587 or his brother may marry his widow. But this practice is not well regarded and is permitted only rarely, chiefly when the scattering of the family patrimony is feared or if the two interested parties have an unusual love for each other.

With respect to children or younger brothers and all those who 587 fall into that category, the situation is altogether different. Illicit 602 relations with wives of their father, grandfather, uncle, elder brother, or elder cousin, are judged much less severely. Generally, misconduct does not give rise to claims for payment, or the payment is demanded "for form's sake" and consists of a hen and a bunch of bananas. By means of this payment the guilty one recognizes his error and renders homage to the right of his elder.

In general public opinion condemns these relations and often [602] with great severity. The question of degree of kinship as well as other considerations result in a great diversity among the cases, so we will examine each situation separately and distinguish each time between the husband's reaction and that of public opinion.

587 Chapter II, Article XI, 2. But such a situation is far from ideal in 626 Nkundó eyes and is permitted only if, on the one hand, the son ardently loves the woman and, on the other, if the father is too slow in obtaining a wife for him.

587 Here then we observe a conflict between two feelings: a hus-602 band's jealousy and the affection of a father and various relatives. That is why it is difficult -- as in many situations -- to draw the line between what is permitted and what is forbidden. From what has preceded and from the general explanations given by natives, we can conclude, however, that: [302] 1) relations between a woman and her husband's son are forbidden and severely judged, but with much more leniency than in the case of "superior" relatives; 2) the [illegible] father may not go to extremes in repressing misconduct nor ask his own son to pay an indemnity, since to do so would be to enrich himself through his child's misbehaviour, and the latter would have no means of paying him except through him or his mother's clan -- and it would be very unjust and inappropriate to force him to have recourse to the latter.

3. A younger brother calls his elder brother's wife wālí, or 593 wife, and she calls him bóme, or husband, because they may marry 587 one another. Therefore adulterous relations may also be found 607 among them. But in practice some distinctions must be made.

If the younger brother is not married and the elder one has a harem, -- a state of affairs which was very common in the past but today is very rare -- the situation is analogous to the one described above in relation to a father's wife except that there is greater indulgence toward the culprit.

If the elder brother is monogamous and the younger brother a bachelor, relations of the latter with the former's wife when the husband is present are forbidden. If the younger brother nevertheless yields to the temptation, he is condemnable. The husband may not claim an indemnity. But in revenge he may procure for himself a "make-believe indemnity" (byongo ă bolĭlanda) by felling one of the culprit's banana trees, taking away his chickens, moving his hut, taking some other similar action. The purpose of these acts, according to our people, is to inspire the young man with a little more respect for his elder. The latter may not go to extremes, however, (as for example by fighting his younger brother), for fear of being censured for a lack of brotherly love. (1) Besides, the valuables with which he obtained his wife [304] belong in one sense to both brothers. If the two brothers have different mothers, the elder has many more trumps in his hand. And if in addition his mother's clan has provided the entire bride price or a major part of it, he would win his case entirely as regards the indemnity, although the duty of brotherly love, and therefore of leniency, would still remain. In the case of isolated misdeeds there must always be this leniency. But if the misconduct is frequently repeated, the culprit's excuses no longer carry much weight.

[illegible]
587

If the younger brother, too, is married, the matter takes on a totally different aspect. Since he has a wife of his own, he no longer has any excuse for satisfying his passions by adulterous means. It is true that the injured husband is still obliged to modulate his anger and its manifestations, but he can obtain more financial satisfaction. The indemnity he claims, however, must be added to the guilty wife's bride price; for it is inconceivable that he enrich himself at his brother's expense. If he himself obtained his brother's wife for him, he may take her away and give her to another brother, cousin, etc., or even take her for himself, in spite of the impediment of affinity. However this is an exceptional case and only applied if the misconduct has been serious and repeated and the culprit has taken an insolent attitude.

If the husband is not present, because he is on a trip or the younger brother has met his sister-in-law while she is staying with her family or traveling elsewhere, the younger brother is entirely free

595 to have relations with her. If the woman refuses to have relations
● 607 with her brother-in-law, the latter often reports her ill will to her
837 husband, who will reprimand her or even strike her because she does not love his own brother, and will accuse her of having lovers: ötöna böŋɔ'öä ngöya, ölangaké ök'aend'ônkinɛ. Since there is more affection between brothers born of the same mother, the husband's anger would then be even greater. A lack of affection on the part of his wife arouses her husband's suspicions on the question of her fidelity because Nkundó women are extremely ready to yield to temptation. [205] Therefore if she refuses her own brother-in-law-husband, she must be obtaining satisfaction elsewhere. This reasoning may be false, but it is based on a frequency of cases. The husband's attitude does not show a lack of jealousy; on the contrary, it proves its existence.

If the younger brother meets his sister-in-law in the home of her family, they will intervene on his behalf. They will tell her to receive "her husband" well, to prepare food for him, to clean the hut set aside for him. They will even force her to cohabit with him for the entire duration of his stay in their village. By this means they seek to avoid palavers with their son-in-law. If the woman's antipathy toward her brother-in-law is so great that she cannot be made to submit to him, they sometimes give their visitor another of their daughters (or cousins, etc.), younger than his brother's wife, to perform wifely duties for him.

All those designated as bakínɛ in Nkundó terminology fall into the same category as a younger brother (thus younger male cousins are also included). The seriousness of the conflict that may arise on this question and of its consequences vary in proportion to the degree of kinship between the individuals involved.

604 C. The position of a nephew (bɔ́nankínɛ) in relation to his 597 maternal uncle's wives is to a great extent comparable to that of a
583 son in relation to his father's wives. The fact that marriage is effected
595 through the payment of a bride price gives the nephew greater freedom; for the uncle was enriched through the marriage of his 586x on his own authority, for the offense was considered very serious. 584 We can assume that the reason for this rule was to allow time for [567] the woman's family to intervene and keep their daughter from becoming a slave by refunding the bride price paid for her.

c) In exceptional instances an exasperated husband resorted to the immolation of his wife when someone died. People cite the case of Bengóngó of Bongilá (Besombó, Bombwanja), who had his wife, Litíli of Bontole, decapitated at the ikweí at the death of his father, Bengóngó byá Yese.

If the woman had children old enough to intervene on her behalf, her husband could be prevented from carrying out his violent intentions. The proverb says, Mbóni ntáwáká, "a mother [599] does not perish." The husband also abstained if the woman had [595] a co-wife (ebíia) who was her sister or other close relative -- either out of a feeling of shame, [385] or out of fear of undesirable repercussions. Sometimes, when a husband was caught between his wish to use the etíka and his shame or his fear of the ebíia, he hid the wife who was confined by this fork. Preferably, he asked a brother- ●[601] in-law to give her hospitality. In that way he got around the difficulty to a great extent, because through the law of exogamy such an arrangement placed the wife in another village, sometimes a considerable distance away. This practice was called isángyá; tómba walí isángyá.

Instead of resorting to the procedures listed, a husband could 586x also place his wife in the hands of the ndonga. However, it was a 584 very unusual thing to do. The natives maintain that such action was due to a lack of affection for the wife, together with the husband's certainty that he could recover his valuables -- either because he was assured that his father-in-law was well disposed toward him (and would reimburse him or provide a replacement), or because he knew he could use the ikíkelo.

As we have said, direct repudiation was extremely rare. Here we are not speaking of repudiation caused by a wife's incorrigible misconduct -- which we have just discussed -- but of repudiation against the wife's wishes. If it did occur the husband was expected to hand her over to the ndonga, and the latter, seeing 764 In every case at least a few befngo in addition to the bombɛ́mbɛ́ and the bɔsɛ́ w'ilakɛ́ are always claimed. The latter payments can never be omitted. The belt is a payment made exclusively to the mother and by rights it goes to the mother's clan.

767 606 607 The higher the amount of these funeral payments, the more the son-in-law is welcome. The alliance is perfect. Therefore, not only will the wife's family reciprocate his fine feelings by adding a few more dogs, but in addition the son-in-law will be well received and successful in his application when, after the period of mourning, he brings the sum of the ihɔ́lɛ́ko in order to obtain a substitute for the deceased. (2) In addition, if the relations with his in-laws have been excellent, he will easily obtain the substitute in advance, so that she can care for him during the entire mourning period.

764 689 There are severe sanctions against the omission of the funeral payments. [438] Neglecting to send the notification gift alone is enough to set these in motion. They are: the breaking off of the affinal relationship; the loss of the children, since the father's offense is equal to a repudiation; and finally molestation of the culprit by the spirit of the deceased. Thus at Bokɛ́tola (Bompela) one can find two boys, Botɛ́tsí and Ikembɛ́, the children of Bonyongela of Ilɔ́ngɛ́ and Etɛ́ka of Bokɛ́tola. They have now been incorporated into their mother's clan, because their father did not send a nsango. On stronger grounds the same is true for the whole nkumjɛ́.

Article V. The Social Position of a Widow

768 587 In Chapter III, Articles II and IV, we have already noted that in the eyes of the Nkundó, the death of the husband does not dissolve a marriage. The union continues, and even after mourning it is not broken ipso facto. Even to have the woman taken and treated as a wife by another man is not enough to end it. As

177 category of civil servants. In this manner they would fall under the 623 written law and could be obliged to practice monogamy, whereas now nearly all of the "native chiefs" are precisely the maintainers and promoters of polygamy. If this had /156/ been enforced from the start, then polygamy, instead of spreading, would have virtually disappeared from the native society.

5. Splitting of the Clan

613 After all that has been said before, it must be rather apparent how an autonomous clan can split up and, thereby, form two autonomous clans.

When a clan has expanded too far, its leaders cross over the boundaries of blood relationship, and offenses against the law of exogamy occur. When such offenses are multiplied, further separation is gradually aimed at to make marriages possible. Such a situation between two parts of the same clan, who are striving for "legal autonomy," is called lonkana, a term that signifies that unlawful relations exist between the two. It generally occurs between member groups that have the same male ancestor, but not the same female ancestor—that is, they are issue from different wives of the same founder.

Another cause of splitting is the voluntary or obligatory withdrawal of one of the members. When he establishes himself outside, begets a sizeable progeny, and acquires a patrimony of his own, the relations with his own clan become less frequent; and the separated fraction gradually begins to settle smaller lawsuits, to maintain its own graveyard, to bury the umbilical cords of its children in its own territory, to take on its own name, and to refer to its own founder.

Often also at the source of this estrangement lies the refusal of a certain fraction of the clan to submit to the authority of the clan members.

6. Legal Dependents

614 Until now we have spoken only of the ethnic clan: of the members 608 who belong to it through descent. They /157/ are the sole bearers of 613 authority (mpifo). Each clan can, however, also take in other persons 614 who fall outside the order of authority, but who legally belong to the 608 clan. Along with the real descendants, they make up the legal clan.

These are, in the first place, the wives who have married into the clan, the children brought with them (mbuncia), and the lawful housekeepers. In addition, there are the clients who have been taken in; then the war prisoners and slaves; and finally the Pygmies. The women married into the clan are naturally separate, as are also the Pygmies who form a completely separate community. The others are gradually treated as children, receive their part in the general responsibility and protection, their place in the court session, etc. Depending on the degree to which they develop in the bosom of the clan which has taken them in, they can constitute a separate group in it, which becomes more and more independent.

7. The Maternal Clan

602 Each Nkundo has a double "fatherland": his wise and his bonyango.
613 The bonyango is the paternal clan of his mother. His mother gave birth to him there; her blood relations live there and receive him with motherly love and will protect him against all difficulties; he has often passed a large part of his happiest childhood years there; and there he can always find a safe shelter when, for one reason or another, he might lose the paternal clan.

The structure of the maternal clan naturally resembles that of the paternal clan in every way. If we treat it specially here, it is not in order to speak of the form, but only to point out the specific rights that each person has in his maternal clan.

601 Just as all of the brothers and sisters of my father are my "fathers,"
602 so all of the brothers and sisters of my mother are my "mothers."
613 Mother's brother, that is, my maternal uncle, I call ngompame, nyangompame. All the nephews and nieces on the mother's side are my "children." A special tie binds me to the children of the nkita of my mother, that is, to the children of the woman who was acquired by the maternal clan with the bride price /158/ that had been paid for my mother by my wise. Mother is, thus, the nkolo, the woman or mistress, of those children who call me their father.

602 As long as I continue to live in my own paternal clan, I have the 613 right to special care and love from the maternal clan. If I cannot find

The Land and Its Inhabitants

The appearance of the land. -- Location of the tribes. -- General characteristics of the natives. -- Maternal feelings. -- The fetisher. -- Religious beliefs. -- Cult of the dead. -- The Mfumu. -- Medicine.

[3] The area between the Congo, the Kasai, and the Kwango is covered with tall grass interspersed with stunted trees and a few small forests whose verdant canopy rises majestically over a boundless plain. A curtain of trees stretches along the rivers and gradually thins out as one penetrates into the interior. The path [illegible] beaten by the regular passage of endless columns of natives, walking Indian file, winds sadly and monotonously across these lightly rolling plains. During the rainy season the grass, whose stems grow as high as two or two and a half meters, obstructs the view. During the dry season, destroyed by brush fires, it has given way to a blackish-yellow plain from which all life seems to have been [361] banished. From time to [6] time, at distances of 20 and sometimes 40 kilometers apart, we find groupings of huts, surrounded by a few manioc fields, [Fig. 1 appears here] banana groves, and sometimes small plots of maize and peanuts. Upon our arrival, [illegible] the men look at us without concern, the mistrustful women hide [Fig. 2 appears here] in their huts or take refuge in the forest and fields, and the less timid children stare at us with the insouciance characteristic of their age. [7]

Beyond the Kasai, in the region of the Fimi, around Lake Leopold II, and along the Lukenie, the bush gives way to the forest, damp, swampy, dark, and mysterious.

[3] 361 At the confluence of the Fimi and the Kasai, a vast swampy area stretches as far as the eye can see, bare of all arborescent vegetation, crossed by innumerable channels which are narrow and shallow during the dry season and wide to the point of covering practically the whole region during the rainy season.

The Bongangɔ are divided as follows:

1) Bongangɔ, in the narrow sense of the term (Bosɛkɛ Izandɔ, B. Bolakɔ, B. Bongɛngɛ, B. Bendɛwɛ, B. Lokɔlɔnyɔ)

2) Bongangɔ of Bakoyɔ, or Bolima

3) Bongangɔ of Mbɔmbɔ or Bosɛkɛ Bofina

Thus Lotɔlɔ, Bakoyɔ, and Mbɔmbɔ each have an Etɔo group and a Bongangɔ group. The Bongangɔ, in the narrow sense of the term, have in addition a "slave" group named Batsina, a part of which is located with the Bosɛnjo. A foreign clan is settled with the Etɔo of Lotɔlɔ; they are the Bofalambɔka, descendant of a man named Ekonda (Imbolo) and his sister who was married to Mbete, a slave from Bompɔngɔ (Wɔngatɔ) who was freed by his master.

Many villages have foreign groups living with them such as descendants of slaves (nkwɛla), or others (Ekonda, Bombwanja, groups related by marriage called likilo, mpɔmɔ or bowɛlɔ, and mbɔsolɔ, (1) etc.). [249]

[609] 1. Mpɔmɔ or bowɛlɔ are any foreigners who were formerly invited by the group patriarch to remain with him in order to carry out certain tasks, especially metal-working. Mbɔsolɔ is the term applied to a child born to a woman out of wedlock (Chapter I, Part 2, Article IV, 3). Such children are also called nkio y'ɔ̃ome, "the husband's flying dogs," because they are not his own children but are attached to their mother's husband in the fashion of these animals, who attach themselves to trees when they sleep. [598] [825]

If we add the descendants of relatives who have married into other more or less remote groupings, the prohibition against marriage on account of kinship applies to a good many people. In accordance with the law of exogamy, such a kin group may be widely dispersed geographically, and it is understandable that it is not always easy to [illegible] The risk of being wounded, reduced to slavery, or killed, often cools the adulterer's passion. Therefore, the more the husband showed that he was fearless, violent, physically powerful, or of a high social position, the more his wives and their lovers were on their guard. Certain men were so jealous of one of their wives and so determined to take vengeance with extreme severity that the tempters did not even dare to think of approaching her.

2) The payment of an indemnity seems to be the standard sanction. It is the only one that remains legal at the present time; consequently it is coming more and more to the fore.

Any of the types of evidence examined above justify the claim for an indemnity.

The indemnity may be minimal, consisting of 2 to 5 copper rings, or heavy, going up to 20 to 30 rings or a slave. The maximum is always demanded for adultery with a favorite. The size of the payment depends on the persons involved, the relationships that bind them, the frequency of misconduct, and the nature of the action observed. For instance, if the husband catches the couple when arranging a meeting or exchanging gifts, the indemnity will be small; if, on the other hand, he has caught them in flagrante delicto, it will be high.

[illegible] A man who demands a high indemnity must expect to be treated the same way should the occasion arise. The application of the law of retaliation in that case is fully approved by Nkundó opinion.

[illegible] In addition to the situations examined in the preceding article, there exists another which does not result in an indemnity claim. It arises if the culprit belongs to a clan of slaves or is in some other way subject or inferior (mpámá or bowélé). (1) Even

1. Strangers who are settled with a tribe or group but are in no way related to them.

If the husband catches the culprit in the act, he politely asks him to go away and leave his house [321] and his wife: ôntsíkélé ilombe, njóyé é! Here is true Nkundó courtesy in practice. It might

595* On the day set aside for establishing the position of the [illegible] bolɛ́mbɛ́, there is a great feast. All the clans and neighboring villages that have been invited gather at the home of the polygamist in question. He presents the woman to them and addresses the gathering. "Here is the woman whom I want to make my bolɛ́mbɛ́, as I have already announced to you. Today I am making public the decision I already made a long time ago. Be it known to all that no man may touch her, or he will be severely punished." Then two women (in rare instances, two men) hold the woman, and the husband unfastens her belt and rips off all her clothing. Then the assistants tie a rope or a belt of mpangɛ́ (striped antelope) skin around her, and to it they attach various furs. From that day [579] until her death she may no longer wear the clothing (bitoko) of other women; she must always [260] be dressed in furs. Hence her name, bolɛ́mbɛ́ wa bikófo, "bolɛ́mbɛ́ with furs." Then her husband gives her pots of palm oil with which she will have to cover herself. Two men approach her; they are chosen among the handsomest in the village (1) (married or single) and are

● [illegible] 1. They are then (sic) relatives of the husband. Nkundó law dictates that no stranger shall perform a function of the slightest importance -- not even that of silencing a gathering. According to their saying, bofaya afɔtɛla lokɔ́nga, "a stranger does not cut up a guinea hen."

[301] richly adorned with furs, belts of mpangɛ́, beads, raffia fabrics with jagged edges, copper rings on their ankles, etc. Stepping [illegible] in rhythm, they lead her to the house intended for her which is [illegible] surrounded by a fence of bofeko posts (Ricinodendron africanum) held together with palms. This hut with its fence is called liko.

There the bolɛ́mbɛ́ will reside for months and years (up to three or more, they say). She is secluded there, so to speak, [579] and may not go out. If she needs to go to the banana groves for her personal needs, she covers and surrounds herself with a mat so that no one will see her.

591 [591] fact, women who do not wish to become Catholic take the paths described in 2) and 3).

5) There are even women who prevent their husbands from becoming polygamous. If he loves them a great deal, he will yield in the end, even if personally he would very much like to build a harem for himself. This was done by Mputɔ̃ (recently deceased, February 3, 1932), wife of Bofɛ́nda, chief of Ekɔ́kola. Bofɛ́nda was rich and tried more than once to acquire other wives. He even took them home and paid the bride prices -- for example, for Iloa of Bongíli. But Mputɔ̃ made life unbearable for them and thus forced them to leave. She absolutely wanted to keep her husband, [366] to whom she had given two boys and three girls, for herself alone.

We can therefore conclude that among a minority of Nkundó women there exists a real preference for monogamy, even if we leave out of consideration all those who may be impelled by religious reasons. But most of them are in no way opposed to polygamy.

2. A preference for polygamy

Most Nkundó women like polygamy and prefer it to monogamy. They make fun of a impɔ́mbonjemba and are proud of the large number of wives in their husbands' harems.

Their indifference or aversion to monogamy can be explained on the basis of habit or atavism. But what is the basis for their marked preference for polygamy despite all its disadvantages? I asked this question of a number of polygamists' wives. Naturally, they first invoked the custom, (1) except for those who had known me for a long time. But the serious reason they gave was the greater comfort of life in a harem.

[601] 1. This is the standard explanation a native hands out to a foreigner or to someone he does not know or by whom he thinks he is unknown.

6) The parent's opposition to reprimands by strangers is 861 even greater as a general rule. They try to cover up and justify 609 the faults of their progeny, whom they will fiercely defend. The children naturally know all this and take advantage of it.

7) The polygamous household, with all its rivalries among 595 co-wives, cannot but accentuate all such [514] adverse effects
578 on the children's education. The conflicts, spiteful comments, 861 palavers, etc., are easily extended to the children. And each wife defends her own.

8) Everything is public; there are no secrets; everything
578 is known, seen, and heard. People do not restrain themselves 861 and the presence of children does not stop the flow of insults and obscenities which anger provokes. The young people see many things it would be better for them not to know. They are present at domestic quarrels and are witnesses to dissensions. All this is increased by life outdoors, in the street, and by the thinness of partitions.

9) Another factor is added nowadays: the facility of com-
177 munications and the presence of European stations. Boys can al-
578 ways run away and find shelter with the Whites or their native em-861 ployees. The girls seek out kinswomen who live at such stations, even though they must help a little with the housework, in the hope of later enjoying a greater freedom and living in luxury.
Parental influence and authority are naturally weakened as a result.

10) Finally, Nkundó education lacks any solid basis, any 861 religion or religious morality. Everything is based on natural, physical fear: the fear of punishments (physical or based on superstition), harmful consequences of bad actions (palavers, difficulties, fines, indemnities, sometimes the shame of being caught -- as in theft). It is especially this lack of religious motivation that makes their moral education bear so little fruit. As the Nkundó are accustomed to this imperfect state, they do not feel the need for 000 such a foundation. That is why it is so difficult to instill any moral conscience into them. The patient and perservering action of the great Christian truths with their institutions for moral formation (uninterrupted preaching, confession, prayer) are needed to endow

614
582 The exogamy rules of the Ekonda do not only refer to their own, agnatic group, but also to all cognate groups to whom kinship relations can still be traced back, i.e., a span of about five generations.

621 It may be assumed that these groups always extend beyond the confines of a village. Those parts of a group who have settled next to each other have their communal meeting place, but even the dispersed fractions of the group may come there to consult. In former times probably only one such group had a nkúmú, a sacred prince who lived in the main village (e.g., Isangi), while the other villages were ruled by the senior. Once the title of nkúmú was also bestowed on persons from other villages, the importance of the E-groups almost completely disappeared. Also, in this category the local group plays a much greater role. Occasionally it even includes dependent ● [609] villages which have not yet been "paternalized," i.e., which are still regarded as alien. In this connection it should be mentioned that probably all larger local groups tend to reconstitute themselves into kinship groups by reinterpreting the genealogy to suit their purposes. It is certain that the "kinship relation" of many "kinship groups" has been created in this manner. We may dismiss the possibility that groups which are divided from one another by the rule of exogamy will invent a kinship relation so close that a previously possible marriage would be outlawed. Also, the combination of other important functions of the lower ranks resulting from the invention of a closer relationship would run counter to the tendency of progressive differentiation (17).

12| It was said before that kinship and local groups are to be opposed. This statement needs clarification. When speaking of local groups in the present study, we do not intend to refer to groups which consist of non-related subgroups. It is to be clearly understood that the residence pattern will be used as the decisive criterion for subdividing the groups. Thus, closely related groups may be excluded, more distantly related groups may be included. Occasionally such local units also include groups which are not related to each other. [188]

Also, among those groups which I have called kinship groups in this study, a biological or genealogical connection which can be proved and expressed in juridical terms is quite doubtful. We shall not concern ourselves, however, with this lack of precision; rather, we shall regard as related those persons or groups of persons whom the Ekonda themselves consider as related. In my opinion there is no justification for disregarding the attitude of the natives since it is their attitude which determines the character and function of the groups. Murdock (10)

10. Social Structure, p. 47.

uses this approach to the kinship group, while using the term "lineage" for persons who can prove their relationship. We hasten to point out that also the local groups have a tendency toward "paternalization" (11), to construct a closer relationship.

11. Boelaert, "Clan équivoque," p. 17.

602 Among the Ekonda we find a system of groups which are ordered according to degrees of real or assumed kinship. This system is subdivided into a hierarchical structure of many ranks. Larger groups consist of between one to four groups of the next order. The relationships between the groups correspond to the relationships between their founding ancestors. In this fashion certain groups are described as the older or younger brother of

61 602 another group. According to their relationship to others, groups may be designated as:

brothers, younger or older;

brother or half brother (descended from various wives of the polygynous ancestor);

[591] illegitimate child of the sister which, legally, as the child of the oldest brother or of the father of his mother, belongs to the group of the mother's relatives;

child of a boy who together with his sister has moved to the unit of his brothers-in-law and has settled there permanently;

son of a sister, who for some reason has separated from his paternal relatives and has moved in with the group of his mother or of one of his grandmothers.

601 Present-day social relationships are influenced by this variety of kinship relations. The kinship terms which refer to the relationships of the genuine or assumed ancestors to each other are occasionally transferred to the groups.

619 602 621 In this paper we shall describe the Isangi group (12) as an [101] example of hierarchical kinship structure. Isangi is a local group of the type described above (p. 1). Following the custom of the region, I shall refer to it as a "village." Until we have decided which terms are applicable to the various groups, I shall use the letters A to E for the individual ranks of the hierarchical structure. Within this system A shall stand for the smallest and E for the largest units (see Diagram 2).[1]

In addition to the three ranks of Group D in Isangi, there are others in the daughter villages (see Diagram 1). These may also include foreign groups, as, for example, the "Nkundó" group, Liimbu, in Wengé.

[1] [See page 6, category 116.—Analyst]

29| 59 The nkɔ́tɔ́ is unknown beyond the Jwafɛ and the Loilaka. In that region the women tie a string (or a belt of beads) around themselves and attach a second piece of cloth to it.

29| Thus the male garment is a rudimentary sort of shorts, open on the sides, while female dress is much more open. In general the efofo is an appropriate protection of one's modesty, but it is inadequate in certain positions. (2)

(611) (196) 2. It may be interesting to note that efofo mamfoyɛ, or just plain efofo, which is the term for a man's garment, also indicates the male line of descent, while the female line is often designated by the term nkɔ́tɔ́ (sometimes by the word jwɛ́mato derived from bɔ́mato, "woman"). Let us add that lonkundó jwâ nkɔ́tɔ́ means "pure, flawless Lonkundo, not corrupted by foreign influences." This expression should be compared with the following phrases: langue maternel, moedertaal, "mother tongue," etc.

29| (77) At present the nkɔ́tɔ́ is no longer worn except by a few elderly inhabitants of villages far from the main communication lines. Everywhere else the ancient mode of dress has been replaced by materials imported from Europe. The women wear at least a sangɛfimbo, a kind of short skirt which falls from their loins at least to the middle of their thighs if not further. Middle-aged men in the interior have simply changed the material of their garment but not its form. The younger ones, on the contrary, have frankly adopted the European mode of dress.

29| 591 (124) (831) A married woman is not allowed to enter the village of her relatives by marriage (bakiló) or appear before them [54] without supplementing her usual attire with one or more belelake (banana leaves cut into fringes). The term bakiló must be understood as it is meant by the Nkundó; it excludes those with whom the wife may sometimes perform the sexual act and who are called "husbands" broadly speaking.

583x 607 The mutuality of the rights of nkólό and nkita is well expressed in the saying, ómbâté ñkoâté wě, "possess me so that I may possess you." It is like do ut des.

583x 607 182 ●[611] It is possible to judge from the preceding descriptions that the bride price has a considerable influence on family relations. Although the Nkundó system is clearly and manifestly patriarchal, the custom of the bride price and its logical consequences give it certain features which make one think of a matriarchy. This situation comes about quite naturally. Since the bride price is wealth it represents power in society. Through marriage this power is transferred from the husband's clan to the wife's, which is enriched in goods and persons by the bride price that has been received. In a sense, the husband is the provider of his wife's clan. And the child can truthfully maintain that his clan was enriched thanks to his father. As a matter of fact, for the Nkundó, this consideration above all others is the basis for their demands of whatever rights they possess in the mother's clan. [170] The relationship between a woman and her nkita and between their respective children is founded solely on the bride-price system of marriage and has nothing to do with matriarchy. (1)

1. But the above considerations may furnish one source of explanation for the origin of that family system.

Consequently, it is unnecessary to erect complicated theories or engage in tortuous speculations in order to explain the creation of this system or to justify it. It is quite simply the outcome of the payment of a bride price in valuables that are of no use except in connection with a similar purpose.

Nevertheless, although the system of the nkita is a natural and logical consequence of marriage by means of a bride price, it is not a necessary consequence. The bride price exists in all the tribes of the Congo, but it does not seem to have resulted everywhere in the institution of the nkita.

583x 174 114 607 What has given rise to this institution among the Nkundó? Father Brepoels (loc. cit., p. 339) gives the following explanation:

M 614 582 untangle all the threads. Thus it happens that young people form relationships with the intention of marrying without knowing that they are related; they are warned only by the opposition and ensuing explanations of the elders.

We may conclude that marriage among descendants of a common ancestor is generally prohibited if they live in the same village. It is frequently permitted on the other hand, if they belong to different villages, provided that they are not, at the same time, related to one of the ancestresses.

M 582 835 Clearly, it is difficult to say what precise degree of kinship formed the basis for the prohibition of or permission for a marriage between descendants of a common ancestor, or what are the boundaries of an exogamous grouping.

It is also apparent from the preceding observations -- as M [611] from the examination of affinity as an obstacle to marriage -- that the descent from a common mother is a more important factor than descent from the father. This does not give proof of a form of matriarchy, though it could be the remains or the beginning of one, or could provide a partial explanation for one. It stems quite simply M [842] from the Nkundó notions concerning procreation, in which they attribute the major role to the mother. There is also the fact that M [602] greater shame is attached to being united with a person descended from the same woman, and finally the fact that they feel a stronger M [593] affection for the mother than for the father (a sentiment [250] which is accentuated by polygamy). The three causes are closely related.

M 184 582 Finally, it should be noted that there is a group among the Nkundó we are discussing which is less strict than the others in this matter. The relatives among whom marriage is prohibited is definitely more limited; that is, their exogamous groupings are more limited. The people in question are the Bongale (see Introduction), and the same phenomenon may be observed among the Elingá. (1)

P [582] 1. The Batswá are still more liberal, and in this respect their practices differ very little from ancient European laws and customs.

614 latter group. Another factor which reminds us of the wife's continuing membership in her original group is the connection, never completely severed, between the groups related by marriage, illustrated by the practice of gifts and counter-gifts which are all part of the bride price and the dowry. [764] When she dies, the wife is buried in the soil of her group. In addition, the group membership of the wife is transferred to the children, although this does not have the same effects in economic and political terms. [611] Matrilineal descent is important in relation to marriage restrictions, certain avoidance practices which are passed on through the wives, and also certain privileges. Quite a large number of persons has settled permanently in the group of their mother or that of their grandmothers.

The decisive factor that makes the term "large family" unsuitable is the "eternal" character of the A-E groups of the Ekonda. However, the subdivisions of the A-groups which live together in a common homestead (see p. 10) may be regarded as large families in the sense used by Thurnwald, Kirchhoff, and Murdock.

121 In the definitions of the term "family" quoted above, we already learned something about Thurnwald's concept of a kinship group, but there is an additional reference to the technical term "kinship group" ["Sippe"]" (p. 17 f.) (24):

24. Menschliche Gesellschaft, Vol. 4.

"...A kinship group is defined as a clan (q. v.) which is not politically independent. Usually the loss of independence is caused by the distribution of the people of the clan among the various settlements. A kinship group is held together by the consciousness of being descended from the same ancestors and by their common cult of the ancestors. The kinship group is of special importance for the regulation of marriage (q. v.). -- A kinship group may be divided into kinship subgroups (large

Nkundu

121 The question about the real structure of the native society begins to be asked only now that it has been brought completely to the tottering point. The question as to whether that society is, in its foundations or basic elements, really in conflict with natural law, the general welfare of mankind, and faith -- the question, thus, of the right of that society to exist -- is still shoved aside in favor of the supposed duty of the moment: to make that society like ours.

In this article, I have tried to outline the social order of the Nkundo [Nkundu] -Mongo as clearly as possible, in order to find an answer to the last question.

1. The Ethnic Clan

When we keep saying that the family is the nucleus of the community, we are ultimately merely clutching a legal fiction, or rather, we say what it ought to be. In fact, the family is, among us, only the producer of individuals who play their role in the community. The family, as such, is neither socially nor legally nor politically an intermediary, a mediator, between the individuals and the higher organs of the society.

613 Second, the nuclear family has, in our society, developed into a completely separate conception, compared to the extended family. The patriarchal household, the model of which Le Play portrayed, or the extended family, has completely disappeared. Among the Nkundo-Mongo, on the contrary, it is precisely the patriarchal family which, in the most absolute sense, is still the nucleus of the community and the foremost independent organ of that community.

Most often, this extended family is designated by the term "clan," to which vaguely different characteristics are attached: [150] blood relationship, totemism, exogamy, community of property, and others. One speaks of ethnic (patriarchal or matriarchal), legal, exogamic, and political clans, without further giving a clear description of these concepts.

The ethnic clan includes all of the persons who are descended in the male line from a particular ancestor. It is his descent in the male line from that particular ancestor which ties each Nkundo to that clan. Each ethnic clan has its own name, which is indicated in our society by the family name. When the Nkundo wish, however, to indicate that name,

613 they always refer to their descent from the ancestor-founder: "We are baseka Ngoi (descendants of Ngoi; we belong to the clan of Ngoi)."

Naturally the Nkundo-Mongo know very well that all the Mongo clans are descended from a common ancestor. They even believe in the common descent of all people. However, in clan unity they only go back to that ancestor who made their group legally autonomous, who made himself independent.

To that group belong, thus, all the children of that founder, all of the children of his sons, all of the children of his grandsons and great-grandsons; thus, all those who keep the same family name in our society.

The Nkundo-Mongo call the clan from the father's side their wise, from ise (father). The children of the lawfully married daughters belong to another wise, since they go back on their father's side to another ancestor. However, children of an unmarried daughter of the clan continue to bear their mother's name, and thus belong to the wise of the mother, just as, in our society, they take on the family name of the mother. 848

Married women, however, continue ethnically to belong to their own paternal clan and do not form part of the wise of their husband.

2. Kinship Terms in the Paternal Clan

601 613 All of the living members of the paternal clan constitute one extended family. In the bosom of that one family, all members of the same /151/ generation also bear the same title. All of the members of the grandfather's generation are grandfathers. All the members of the father's generation are fathers, also including the female members. Thus, the sisters and female cousins of the father who belong to the wise are all called "female fathers": isomoto or faomoto (from ise or fafa, father, and bomoto, woman). All of the older brothers and male cousins of the wise are batomolo; all younger brothers or male cousins of the wise are bakune; all sisters or female cousins of the wise are nkana. All of the children of brothers and male cousins, and also all of the children of sisters and female cousins who remain in the wise, are bana (children).

601 561 613 Such terms are to us, of course, a never ending source of mistakes, complications, and ridicule. The native cannot possible understand this and underneath takes it very much amiss. Socially, legally, and

Nkundu

601 561 613 politically, his whole society is, in fact, based on those relationships which are incomprehensible to us. Indeed, the order of duty and responsibility, of authority and honor, are socially, legally, and politically determined by the order of birth. That order is determined by generation, and within the generation, by age: from the oldest father down the whole line of fathers to the oldest "child" in the whole row of children. The children of your older brother, even if they are younger in years, go before your own children. As we shall see later, the female members of the family, who practically fall outside this order, recover their place of honor through their sons.

613 From this short description of the paternal clan, it is immediately apparent that the clan is not a geographical concept among the Nkundo. Wherever the daughter may marry, wherever the son may wander in service to the Whites, that person always and everywhere continues by law to belong to his wise, and he remains bound to all the rights and duties of his place in that community.

602 613 It also appears that clan and blood relationship do not come anywhere near to blanketing each other. Each "blood relationship" of the Nkundo extends itself over various paternal clans, since the blood relations of the mother, as well as the descendants of all the other women of my wise who are lawfully married out of the clan, belong to another wise.

613 421 Each clan has possessions that constitute the inheritance or patrimony of the members, the domain of the family. These goods are of two kinds: economic and dotal. The former are subdivided into real property, or inalienable property, and personal property.

613 423 The real property of the clan consists of land and waters. The land is divided into: arable land, land for gardens, and hunting areas. These constitute common property, whose cultivation or usufruct is divided among the members of the clan: each one receives his garden land and hunting ground to clear; as soon as the user leaves it, that ground is free again for the community. Palm groves, of course, also remain common property of the members. A similar arrangement applies to water rights. Larger fishing areas remain common property and are, under the leadership of the clan head, communally exploited. Smaller fishing grounds, creeks, ponds, etc., are allotted to each

613 member. In the case of common use or of an exceptionally good 423 yield (large game, a rich haul of fish, large yield from a particular cultivation of common property, such as palm beer), these are divided by the clan leader and their respective shares allotted to all members.

613 Personal property consists of the hut and the tools of the man, the 422 furniture of the woman, and the domestic animals. These are movable and can also go out of the clan through inheritance. Should they leave their husbands, married women may taken with them whatever they have received or inherited personally from their wise.

421 In contrast to the economic property of the clan, there is the dotal or capital property, the marriage settlements, which do not have 613 economic, but only legal value. They represent the rights over people.
583 In the first place we find those persons who themselves are the source of rights: the marriageable girls (bibunanyi) of the clan /A/ and the substitutes for women married into the clan /A/—that is, the women who are married into the allied clan /B/ with the acquired bride price (nkita). /Ed. Clan A pays bride price for a woman from clan B, the allied clan. Then clan B uses this acquired bride price to obtain another woman in marriage, a "substitute." This substitute is nkita to [567] the original woman./ In addition, there are the slaves who can replace a caput. In the second place, there are the titles which represent 421 a caput: the /153/ so-called dotal securities (baumba). These dotal
613 securities or titles are kept by the clan leader and, with the knowledge of his immediate successor, hidden somewhere in the ground. With the approval of the clan council, he may also lend them out. These dotal possessions or rights are also common property of the clan and are used to procure a wife for the clan members, each in his turn.

The common ownership of the economic property makes possible the difficult sharing of woods and river, prevents the cutting up of the property, hinders the impoverishment and the proletarization of the poor, and insures the livelihood of all of the clan members. This common ownership has nothing more to do with communism than the common ownership of property in our nuclear families.

The dotal or capital property, the bride price titles, which have perhaps aroused the most indignant and lofty compassion of our civilized world, have less to do with buying and selling the wife then our own dowry and class system. They are permanent legal titles of the contract which is made between the clans of the couple on the occasion of the marriage. Our individualistic liberalism and mercantilism have regarded these legal securities only through economic spectacles and

421 613 have seen them as money transactions. We have obtruded our point of view and destroyed the whole legal system of the natives. It is through our materialization of those securities that we have lowered the native woman to a plaything of money and a piece of merchandise.

586 595 As for the two outgrowths of the native system, divorce and polygamy, neither is inherent in the legal system as such. They are only abuses which have taken root and which clash with the principles of the native law itself. By its nature, native marriage is also indissoluble, and polygamy has only been able to exist through a popular confusion between paternal and marital law.

4. Legal Power in the Clan

613 627 In Nkundo society all individuals do not have equal rights or powers, as in the Napoleonic law books, /154/ but the natural rights concerning people are still completely recognized. All value and power comes from God, through the ancestors. Those who are nearest to God are thus the highest in position, his first representatives. There is no question of absolutism or despotism. Just as the blood is divided among all clan members in a descending line, so also are authority and legal power. They are one as a legal entity in relation to the outside world; nevertheless, each member takes part and has a vote in the internal administration of justice, so that, when clan interests are discussed and dealt with, each member may sit in the place accorded to him and take part in decisions. In a legal sense there is, therefore, no question of a separate family council, which would assist the clan leader, but all decisions are made communally.

594 627 A single exception to this does exist, namely, that which gives the head of the nuclear family legal power over his wife and children, and then only with the acknowledgment and approval of the clan. Differences between autonomous clans are settled by the clans involved, a sort of international court of law where friendly clans may also be brought in as arbiters.

627 Such an arrangement made the court absolutely "paternal." The whole procedure was one of a reconciliatory character, which resorted to coercive measures only when necessary, and did its utmost to save the honor and the welfare of the involved clans, and to compensate for, to restore, and to prevent further offenses.

177 Although even St. Thomas teaches that the only natural authority is that of the head of the family, European legislation has, through ignorance, completely abolished the rights of the native family head;
the wife is freed from all ties and is thus abandoned to licentiousness.
Through a legal fiction, clan law has gone over into the hands of the "recognized native courts of justice, " which, however, have just as much to do with the clan court as a policeman with a father. The communization of trade, education, and the rearing of the young, as is demonstrated to us by Russia, would revolutionize our society far less than our installation of these so-called native courts of justice has done in the Congo. Education and correction have been replaced by punishment. Politics, which have begun to play such an all-important 602 role in our society, had /155/ almost no importance in Nkundo society.
613 The neighboring clans were all connected with each other through blood relationship, intermarriage, or friendship ties. Only when there was a struggle against a foreign and common enemy did politics have a role to fulfill. And then the same order of rank was observed among the clans as was already indicated for the members of a single clan.

177 Here also, biased or romantic products of our ideas about barbarism have adapted these so-called intertribal wars to the need that we felt, 728 to civilize the natives at any cost. These wars were not to be compared 622 with our European wars, in which a mass of people are slaughtered.
In the Congo, no sooner had wounded or dead fallen on both sides than the chiefs were already congregated to conclude a peace treaty.
Here again, we meant to respect the political organization of the natives by the creation of chieftainships and native chiefs, who were to form the political-administrative link between the native clans and the European higher administration. Such chiefs were totally unknown in native society. Together with the establishment of the native courts, the establishment of chieftainships gave the death blow to the actual social organization of the Nkundo-Mongo. The very fact that these institutions are territorial demonstrates clearly that here no ordinary shifting of power has taken place, but simply an elimination of the traditional power in favor of a new colonial power.

177 Indeed, where formerly the "customary rightful chief" was sought out, even though it was sometimes only a formality, the new formula 622 of the "sectors" has relieved the higher administration from this care too. And it is only to be hoped that this new formula will at least do away with the legal fiction that the "chiefs" are actually "something native, " so that they may be classified for once and for all in the

Nkundu

177 622 category of civil servants. In this manner they would fall under the written law and could be obliged to practice monogamy, whereas now nearly all of the "native chiefs" are precisely the maintainers and promoters of polygamy. If this had /156/ been enforced from the start, then polygamy, instead of spreading, would have virtually disappeared from the native society.

5. Splitting of the Clan

613 After all that has been said before, it must be rather apparent how an autonomous clan can split up and, thereby, form two autonomous clans.

When a clan has expanded too far, its leaders cross over the boundaries of blood relationship, and offenses against the law of exogamy occur. When such offenses are multiplied, further separation is gradually aimed at to make marriages possible. Such a situation between two parts of the same clan, who are striving for "legal autonomy," is called lonkana, a term that signifies that unlawful relations exist between the two. It generally occurs between member groups that have the same male ancestor, but not the same female ancestor—that is, they are issue from different wives of the same founder.

Another cause of splitting is the voluntary or obligatory withdrawal of one of the members. When he establishes himself outside, begets a sizeable progeny, and acquires a patrimony of his own, the relations with his own clan become less frequent; and the separated fraction gradually begins to settle smaller lawsuits, to maintain its own graveyard, to bury the umbilical cords of its children in its own territory, to take on its own name, and to refer to its own founder.

Often also at the source of this estrangement lies the refusal of a certain fraction of the clan to submit to the authority of the clan members.

6. Legal Dependents

613 614 608 Until now we have spoken only of the ethnic clan: of the members who belong to it through descent. They /157/ are the sole bearers of

613 authority (mpifo). Each clan can, however, also take in other persons 614 who fall outside the order of authority, but who legally belong to the 608 clan. Along with the real descendants, they make up the legal clan.

These are, in the first place, the wives who have married into the clan, the children brought with them (mbusola), and the lawful housekeepers. In addition, there are the clients who have been taken in; then the war prisoners and slaves; and finally the Pygmies. The women married into the clan are naturally separate, as are also the Pygmies who form a completely separate community. The others are gradually treated as children, receive their part in the general responsibility and protection, their place in the court session, etc. Depending on the degree to which they develop in the bosom of the clan which has taken them in, they can constitute a separate group in it, which becomes more and more independent.

7. The Maternal Clan

602 Each Nkundo has a double "fatherland": his wise and his bonyango.
613 The bonyango is the paternal clan of his mother. His mother gave birth to him there; her blood relations live there and receive him with motherly love and will protect him against all difficulties; he has often passed a large part of his happiest childhood years there; and there he can always find a safe shelter when, for one reason or another, he might lose the paternal clan.

The structure of the maternal clan naturally resembles that of the paternal clan in every way. If we treat it specially here, it is not in order to speak of the form, but only to point out the specific rights that each person has in his maternal clan.

601 Just as all of the brothers and sisters of my father are my "fathers,"
602 so all of the brothers and sisters of my mother are my "mothers."
613 Mother's brother, that is, my maternal uncle, I call ngompame, nyangompame. All the nephews and nieces on the mother's side are my "children." A special tie binds me to the children of the nkita of my mother, that is, to the children of the women who was acquired by the maternal clan with the bride price /158/ that had been paid for my mother by my wise. Mother is, thus, the nkolo, the woman or mistress, of those children who call me their father.

602 As long as I continue to live in my own paternal clan, I have the 613 right to special care and love from the maternal clan. If I cannot find 602 613 sufficient dowry at home, then I can always go and appeal to my maternal uncles who are obliged to help me insofar as they are able. I even have the right to the free dowry of one of the children of my mother's nkita. I may always lay out gardens and hunt in the territory of my bonyango, and take part in the court sessions of the maternal clan when they consider the allotment of the free dowries or the division of the inheritance. If, however, I wish to leave my father's clan and establish myself for good in the maternal clan, then I receive priority in everything over my male and female cousins and become heir and clan leader directly after my maternal uncles. This is, thus, a truly princely compensation for the so-called inferiority of the woman in native society: the child of the sister (bonankana) restores her gloriously to the honor and rank which are due her.

8. Related Clan: Likilo

602 601 Outside my paternal clan and outside my maternal clan, I still have blood relations: namely, the children of my paternal aunt and of my sisters or female cousins, each of whom belongs to the clan of his own father. Just as the children of my mother's brothers are my children, so the children of my father's sister are also my fathers. I am, thus, in the same relationship to the children of my mother's brother as the children of my father's sister are to me.

The other members of the related clans (who are thus not blood relations) all share, according to generation, in the classification of immediate relatives: all the "fathers" of the husband are "fathers-in-law"; all the mothers, "mothers-in-law"; etc. There is this single big difference, that the "superiors" of the husband are also your "superiors." According to the opinions of the Nkundo, they are the only real relatives. Those on the husband's side are called bokilo; those on the wife's side, bokanga.

/159/ The "subordinates" of the husband are not real relatives and rightly call each other "husband" and "wife." In various legally [582] defined circumstances, marriage relations and marriages are permitted between the latter.

It is unnecessary to repeat that all of the members of the reciprocal clans share in these relationships: the whole generation of a clan

602 601 member is, as it were, identified with that member, so that, for instance, all younger sisters and female cousins of one spouse become "wives" of all the younger brothers and male cousins of the other spouse. One must really have the legal sense and the patience and the capacity for palaver and unravelling of an old Nkundo to make sense out all of these relationships. They themselves compare them, in fact, with the inextricable clew of the intestines of a sort of dwarf crocodile: besofo bya lokekele.

9. Exogamy

● 613 582 The term, "exogamic clan," often heard or encountered in writings, is also, at least in the Nkundo-Mongo society, very misleading. The group of persons with whom marriage is forbidden does not constitute any common entity; it differs from person to person. Two half brothers can have the same paternal clan but differ in maternal clan; they can have the same maternal clan and different paternal clans. Marriages are forbidden for older brothers and sisters that are permitted for the younger ones. The rules differ from one blood relation to another, from blood relation with relative-by-marriage to blood relation with relative-by-marriage, from relative-by-marriage with relative-by-marriage to relative-by-marriage with relative-by-marriage.

If one still wishes to put the law of exogamy into European terms, then one might say: 1) blood relationship forbids marriage insofar as the blood relationship is recognized. This recognition varies from clan group to clan group. Sometimes in the same legal but extended clan, an exception is made to this recognition; mostly, however, the different autonomous clans which descend from the same distant ancestor are still bound by the law of exogamy. Generally, groups which have the same father but a different mother /160/ separate most quickly. 2) Relationship (other than blood) forbids marriage—insofar as the relationship is recognized between the parents of spouses; it sometimes permits marriage between children of spouses.

613 582 184 Here it should be observed once again, however, that the customs differ from region to region as regards this recognition; that, for instance, the stepson in many regions may marry his stepmother in a regular marriage; and that the violations are less severely judged and punished in proportion to the degree to which the forbidden relationships diverge.

121 to present anything we have not thoroughly investigated. We have not stepped outside the geographic limits set forth except for a few incidental remarks. Although the cultural uniformity of the Nkundó-Móngo is remarkable it is not, of course, absolute. And if we have used the title Mariage des Nkundó (Marriage among the Nkundu), we have done so because it was difficult to find one which would be more appropriate for the geographic and ethnic limits of [14] this study. It is very likely that in most cases our data are valid beyond the limits we have laid out, but to generalize upon it before making a thorough study of each group would be contrary to all scientific method. The reader is therefore earnestly requested to take these remarks into account and to abstain from giving our conclusions too broad a scope.

Familial institutions in themselves and in their totality are outside the scope of this book. But since they are based on marriage, they have an important place within our framework. We must necessarily touch upon them, but we will limit our excursions into that realm to what is required to make the general description intelligible. On the other hand, the study of marriage throws a good deal of light on familial institutions.

614
The words "family," "clan," "group," etc. recur frequently. The family is an entity smaller than the clan, and the latter is subordinate to the group. Since it is very difficult to give a precise definition, however, we have taken the trouble to make a clear distinction only when necessary. (1) [Editor's Note: Elsewhere we use them more as generic terms or even as synonyms. In order to make family relationships and the expressions used by the Nkundó to designate them more comprehensible, we are attaching an example of a genealogical table.]

113 I know of the following previous studies on the same subject:

Engels, "Les Wangata," Revue Congolaise, 1910, which also deals with marriage.

G. Kaptein, "Familieleven en -zeden bij de Inboorlingen van den Evenaar," Congo, 1922, Vol. 1, p. 531. [15] This study covers

1. See Chapter V, Article III.

174 836 on the other hand, is extremely repugnant by nature, especially for the Nkundó. It is a vice which comes about only as a result of special beliefs or through a fundamental degeneration of sexuality.

The breaking up of the framework of traditional organization may furnish a partial explanation in this realm as in many others. In the case of sexual relations between single adults, it might even be deemed sufficient. As much may be said about greed, vanity, the desire for ostentation and display. These are very natural sentiments in a woman, and they were greatly stimulated by the dazzling riches imported from Europe. But these facts are not sufficient in themselves to account for everything. They are especially and entirely inadequate in explaining the considerable changes in the relations between immature children, and we are thus forced to accept the explanation given by serious natives.

3. Children born out of wedlock

848 Among the Nkundó, giving birth to a child outside of wedlock has never from time immemorial been considered a grave misdemeanor. It is not considered criminal, as ethnographers say it is among many other African peoples.

Furthermore, this attitude logically follows from the liberty permitted to adolescents, as described above. Neither the woman nor her lover are harassed or punished as a result. On the contrary, the grandparents joyfully receive the child, who adds to the size, power, and wealth of the clan. [88] For an illegitimate child (entombó) (1) does not belong to its natural father. It is incorporated into the mother's family. It is said that he is born without a father. His

1. Such a child is also known as bona ɓa wanɛ́, "child of the sunlight," or bona ɓa bombamboka, "child of the highway" or "of a girl of the streets." Among the Bombomba the term bokelankólo is also heard.

848 posterity constitute a separate family in the clan of his maternal 614 ancestors; it is called jwǒmoto or etɔ́o ɛ́y'ǒnankáná (that is, the patrilineal posterity of the sister's son). Families and clans that have originated in this manner are not particularly rare in this region. One may even find an entire village born in this manner. Thus, Mbelɛ́ of the Bombwanja-Boɛndɛ́ is the etɔ́o ɛ́y'ǒnankáná of Lileko. A more striking example is that of the Injɔ́lɔ́ tribe, descended from the sister of Nsimba and Eanga, who are respectively the ancestors of the Ntɔ́mbá and the Bolɛ́ngɛ́. Since the male ancestor is unknown, it is assumed that their origin is due to an extramarital conception by the mother, and that her son, Nkɔ́lɔ́bisɛ́, had no father. The same is true of the Wesɛ́ subtribe, bǒnankáná of the eldest subtribe Engɔ́njɔ́, as well as of the Ngombe subtribe, which is bǒnankáná of the Wesɛ́.

It would be incorrect, however, to attribute the origin of all the "jwǒmoto" clans to illegitimate children, for they may have come into existence for other reasons. Thus it is known that the ancestors of certain clans were born of a legitimate union, but the bride price payment had not yet been completed. Then, as some sort of obstacle intervened, the relationship by marriage was broken, and the child was incorporated into the mother's clan. The obstacle which interrupts the bride price payment may be a disharmony between the engaged couple or their families, as in the case of the Basɛ́ká Etáfɛ́ngela of the Bakáala; but it is more likely to be war or the migrations of the tribes at certain periods of their history. The latter reason may have separated more than one husband from a wife for whom he had only made an initial payment at the time her child was born.

848 The fact then that many "female" clans exist in a [89] region does not prove that illicit relationships between single people were common in the past -- especially if one also takes into account that pregnancies were formerly much more frequent than they are nowadays. It merely shows that such relationships did occur.

An illegitimate child is considered and treated by the maternal grandfather as if it were his own. No distinction is made between him and the legitimate children. He is in no way despised. He has a voice in family councils and deliberations. And since according to Nkundɔ́ notions his relationship to his first cousins is that of father to son, he 848 has precedence over them and can become head of the family after his grandfather and uncles. In his natural father's clan, on the other hand, he has nothing to say.

848 596 If a man pays the bride price for a girl who has had a child by him, he asks his father-in-law to let him have his illegitimate child. This wish is almost always granted. The father-in-law well understands his son-in-law's fatherly sentiment of love and considers it quite legitimate and proper that a father should himself possess the [583]x fruit of his own flesh. The only condition laid down is that because of the child the son-in-law must increase the amount of the bride price valuables by an extra slave or his equivalent. (1)

1. This transaction may even take place after the mother's death.

The father is not in a position to invoke any rights strictly speaking. The child is not considered as his because of his physical paternity, but only because of his father-in-law's kindness. If the latter were to refuse the father's request, he would not be acting in violation of justice. But his behavior would be considered as inhumane toward his daughter's husband and his grandson, and it would be criticized.

When a child is adopted by his natural father in this fashion, no one despises him for his illegitimate birth [90]. This procedure may therefore be considered to establish his legitimacy.

848 178 Nowadays, among the Beloko and their Elinga, the practice of "buying" the child has sprung up. That is, if a man does not marry a woman who has had a child by him, he pays her parents a certain amount in order to obtain the child. There does not seem to be much opposition to the introduction of this custom, which springs from an honorable feeling for paternity and its duties. Its only disadvantage is that in such a case the child may never claim any rights in his mother's clan. (1)

1. See Chapter VIII, Article IV.

848 614 583x If a stranger marries an unwed mother, he is never given the child, which remains in the mother's family. This situation is clearly distinguished from those mentioned above.

593 What happens is that when such a woman goes to live with her husband and her child is too young to remain with his grandparents, she takes him along. Later when the boy reaches adulthood, he sometimes settles with the clan of his mother's husband and produces a posterity. But he is more or less discredited by the adopting clan (and by the others). He has no political rights there, no mpifo. His posterity is called mbɔ́solɛ́ (from mbɔ́sa, "behind" and bolɛ́, "clan of origin"). (2) Its members may marry members of the adopting clan, excepting of course the descendants of their common mother. They also have their own cemetery. They thus form a separate clan within the village.

The practice of "bringing a child in the sling" seems to be disappearing at the present time, because everyone wants to remain in his own clan. Government policy deprives natives who do not live with their own families of almost all their rights. Moreover, [91] today it is much easier than in the past to procure the means for establishing a home. This last problem was certainly an important reason why a man would settle with the clan of his mother's husband.

684 The preceding clearly shows that a lover by whom an unmarried girl has a child incurs no blame, penalty, or fine. He has no obligation to care either for the mother or the child. Neither justice nor propriety requires him to marry the unwed mother. No indemnity is exacted.

There is only one exception: that is, if the mother dies as a result of the pregnancy or the delivery, or if the child is stillborn or born sickly, deformed, or crippled. In such cases the lover has to pay a heavy indemnity (mbɛ́laka) (1) That is why an unmarried woman who is pregnant is pressed into giving the name of her accomplice as

2. They also say "he was brought in the sling," bôyɛ́lɛ́kɛ ndɛ́ lɔmbɛ́.

1. For the child, the indemnity goes up to 50 rings; for the mother, 50 rings and a slave (or his equivalent in currency), or 75 to 100 rings.

4. Onanism [coitus interruptus]

893 Onanism also seems to be unknown. No doubt many women have learned this vice through their concubinage with Europeans, but they have not spread it. The same may be said of involuntary onanism. For the native does not look for sensual refinements; rather he follows his natural impulse. (1)

1. The practice described in Chapter X, Article III, 3, may be slightly tainted with onanism; it could certainly lead to such a practice, but it is not caused by perversion.

Article VII. Incest

644 We here must distinguish between 1) sexual relations between distantly related kin and 2) between close kin.

1. Among distant relatives

Incest among distant relatives (in the Nkundó sense of the word) has existed since time immemorial. It is called lonkâna (bombakɛ among the Bombwanja). Lonkâna is derived from nkâna, "brother, sister." The expression liála j'ōlóló, "sexual union in the village," is also used. The term lonkâna is applied to relations between members of families which are only very distantly related (not at all related, according to our notions) but between whom marriage is not permitted. Thus one hears that such and such kin groups do not marry each other (bāfóyakumbólé) but they commit lonkâna. Two kin groups of this sort may be considered closely related clans. The groups between whom lonkâna is practiced each has its own cemetery, while those between whom it is absolutely forbidden share a common cemetery. Thus, to cite an example, the "village" [98] of Elángá l'Imomo l'Ontole (Bongíli) is composed of three kin groups, as the name indicates. The Imomo settlement is partially located in the 835 allied district of the Bombomba). The same is true of the Bontole. 614 Elángá and Imomo, together with Eleke (Lokongo), comprise the posterity of the son of Ambá, who was the sister of Iloko, Eángá, and Bokungó, the latter being the ancestor of the Bontole. The three groups do not intermarry. Between the Elángá and the Imomo, lonkâna relations are also not permitted, but they are practiced with the Bontole. Note that the term lonkâna is never applied to relations between truly separate clans, that is, between exogamous entities.

To define the precise limits of this practice we would have to examine each kin group separately, and this would lead us too far afield.

It should also be noted that lonkâna may be limited to an isolated act, or it can become an intermittent concubinage. The name of the practice does not change when it involves a married woman who is visiting her family. Sanctions against adultery are applicable to such a case, however, as to all others. (1) Although the relatives of the woman are more lenient than if the adulterous relations had occurred with a different lover, the husband whose rights have been infringed on makes no such distinction.

835 614 174 The custom of lonkâna seems rather strange. After all, if sexual relations between these clans are not reprehensible, why is marriage between them forbidden? This is an apparent contradiction which merits attention. Should not this practice be viewed as a relaxation of the law of exogamy? In past times all sexual relations between members of the clans under discussion would have been forbidden, a very natural phenomenon when the families originated. [99] Later the young people would have succumbed to the temptation, and little by little infractions would even have multiplied. For as the clans became increasingly extended, the temptations became more and more numerous and the rule, now detached from its natural significance because very distant kinship was involved, came to seem more or less arbitrary to the interested parties. It was supported by no sanction or 835 614 174 fear. (1) Thus the very number of violations would have gradually made the practice customary. Powerless to stop it, the persons in authority, guardians of traditional morality, would have contented themselves with channeling the development and restricting it to a minimum by being lenient on the subject of extramarital relations in order to save the principle of exogamy. This explanatory hypothesis can find a little confirmation in the fact that at the very beginning of colonization when European influence was not felt as yet, there were isolated and very rare cases of marriage in opposition to the law of exogamy between members of groups which were only very distantly related but already practiced lonkâna. The exception then became the rule; and from then on the two groupings in question intermarried regularly and without hindrance, while other families remained under the ancient law. Thus there is the known case of Boyela village (Bakɛ́ala), which includes the Bokambɛ́, Bembakɔ́, Besɔ́lɔ́, and Bekɔ́lama (extinct), all descendants of Ngonde and one wife; his union with another spouse gave rise to the Lilekɛ́ and the Likongo, to whom Bongilɛ́, a group related through marriage (likilo), is attached. These two groups of families could not intermarry, but they did engage in lonkâna. Around the time of the first arrival of the Whites, a member of the Bembakɔ́ [100] family a certain Bonjɔ́mbɔ́ was impelled by an excessive love to violate the law of exogamy by taking Bolondɔ́ of Lilekɛ́ for his wife. As his love did not cool and the marriage proved stable, it was recognized and accepted as legitimate. Since then the two groups in question have each become exogamous.

835 754 2. Between close relatives

Incest between close relatives has no special name of its own. As a matter of fact, it never occurs as an outgrowth of passion. We

1. Actually, no sanction is provided against marriages within an exogamous entity; everything lies in the opposition of parents and elders and in a habit which is almost innate.

582
567 matters are more important than the father's ancestry. (1)

[554] 1. Among the Nkundó no shame is attached to not knowing the family of one's father. But not to be able to name the mother's clan is a great dishonor for it proves that she was a slave.

There is less opposition to the first generation born of a couple who were both slaves than for their parents, and it progressively decreases with each succeeding generation. There is practically no opposition now to the grandsons. The reason seems to be [597] that although receiving a wife from one's master in a regular marriage does not constitute emancipation (nsikó, nsikola) for the slave, it is a kind of adoption (wɛ̌mya, -ɛ́mya). [246]

Article III. Kinship

835 Marriage between members of the same kin group (isangano, bosangema, from the verb -sangema, "to be related") is forbidden. But how far does such a kin group extend? It is impossible to give a general rule. On the one hand, it is certain that if two groups are not descended from a common ancestor there is no bond of kinship between them, even if they live side by side. But on the other hand, it is not possible to say that all those who are descended from the same ancestor are relatives and that marriage is forbidden between the various branches of the grouping they comprise. The question therefore amounts to knowing by which ancestor the exogamous grouping is defined. A decision on this point may only be made through the examination of each case individually.

● 614 It is impossible to deduce anything from the meaning of the term clan, for it is usually defined as "a grouping of families united to one another by kinship." This leaves us back where we started. The characteristics usually given for a clan are: generic name, totemic bond (1), collective responsibility, and exogamy, and do not provide a solution either. For the elements of this definition must be complementary to one another to provide an adequate intension, and it is impossible to determine the limits within which they operate among the Nkundɔ́.

Thus we would have to make a list of all the groupings of these people and examine them in order to find out which ones correspond to the idea of an exogamous clan. And this is not feasible. Nevertheless, for the sake of illustration, here is the genealogy of the Bongíli:

Their ancestor Tɔ́lenjou had two sons, Iloko and Bokungɔ́, and a daughter, Ǎmbɛ́, by one wife. By two other wives he had Eɛ́ngɛ́, father of the Ikengya, and Efoloko, father of the [247] Bolɛ́ngɛ́. Iloko's progeny gave rise to the villages of Ifutɔ́, Mbɛ́ngɛ́, and Lofelí; Bokungɔ́'s progeny to Boambɛ́ (and Ifoku), Ndɔngɔ́, Bolongwankoi, Etoɔ́ntɛ́lɛ́, Bontɛ́lɛ́, Lokɔ́nola (part of Imomo), and Betolɔ́ l'Ibela (whose people live with the Boambɛ́). Through Ǎmbɛ́ there originated the villages of Elɛ́ngɛ́, Imomo, and Eleke (the latter together with Bolongwankoi from the village of Lonkongo).

1. Totemism does not seem to exist among the Nkundɔ́. In any case it is not apparent here as it is elsewhere.

●614 Thus we have five groups which are exogamous; marriage is forbidden within each group, but not with members of the other groups. The little genealogy above gives some idea of the antiquity of the line and of the distance which separates its present members from the founding ancestor of the tribe. It should be noted that each exogamous group is subdivided into several villages, clans, and families. The same limits appear to be set with respect to the maternal line; marriage with the descendants of brothers and sisters of the ancestress, wife of the ancestor of the exogamous grouping, is forbidden. (1)

> 1. Note that lonkâna relations are practiced within each of the five exogamous groups, but not between the descendants of the same ancestress, wife of one of the ancestors, and of her bibísa. See Chapter I, Article VII, 1.

In investigating this subject the family of the ancestress must be taken into account as well as the paternal line.

In order to be able to define an exogamous group precisely, it is therefore necessary to study not only several villages, but also various tribes. For a single group may be composed of several families who live far from each [248] other and have sometimes become attached to groupings of people who are only very distantly related or even complete strangers. In such a case therefore a single village may include several exogamous groups.

614
621 Such is the case of the Bɔ́endɛ́, descended from the ancestor Ilumbɛ́ yǎ Mpumo. From his first wife, Eámɛ́, arose the Etɔ́o groups, from his other wives, the Bongangá groups. They do not marry among themselves but are a good example of a complex composition.

The Etɔ́o are dispersed in four villages:

1) Etɔ́o of Lotɔ́lá
2) Etɔ́o of Bako̱vɔ̱́ or Mbálanɛ̱́ne̱, both Basɛ́ká Bombɔ́ngo
3) Etɔ́o of Mbɛ́mbɛ́ or Basɛ́ká Bofiíyolo
4) Etɔ́o of Bosánjo or Basɛ́ká Eɔ́ngo

614 621 The Bongangá are divided as follows:

1) Bongangá, in the narrow sense of the term (Basɛ́ká Inanó, B. Bolaká, B. Bongɛ́ngɛ́, B. Bandúwá, B. Lokókómyá)

2) Bongangá of Bakoyó, or Bolíma

3) Bongangá of Mbómbɛ́ or Basɛ́ká Botúna

Thus Lotólá, Bakoyó, and Mbómbɛ́ each have an Etóo group and a Bongangá group. The Bongangá, in the narrow sense of the term, have in addition a "slave" group named Batsína, a part of which is located with the Bosánjo. A foreign clan is settled with the Etóo of Lotólá; they are the Bofalambóka, descendant of a man named Ekonda (Imbolo) and his sister who was married to Mbete, a slave from Bompángá (Wǎngatá) who was freed by his master.

Many villages have foreign groups living with them such as descendants of slaves (ekwála), or others (Ekonda, Bombwanja, groups related by marriage called likilo, mpámá or bowɛ́lɛ́, and mbúsolá, (1) etc.). [249]

[609] 1. Mpámá or bowɛ́lɛ́ are any foreigners who were formerly invited by the group patriarch to remain with him in order to carry out certain tasks, especially metal-working. Mbúsolá is the term applied to a child born to a woman out of wedlock

[848] [825] (Chapter I, Part 2, Article IV, 3). Such children are also called nkio y'ǎóme, "the husband's flying dogs," because they are not his own children but are attached to their mother's husband in the fashion of these animals, who attach themselves to trees when they sleep.

614 582 If we add the descendants of relatives who have married into other more or less remote groupings, the prohibition against marriage on account of kinship applies to a good many people. In accordance with the law of exogamy, such a kin group may be widely dispersed geographically, and it is understandable that it is not always easy to

M 614 582 untangle all the threads. Thus it happens that young people form relationships with the intention of marrying without knowing that they are related; they are warned only by the opposition and ensuing explanations of the elders.

We may conclude that marriage among descendants of a common ancestor is generally prohibited if they live in the same village. It is frequently permitted on the other hand, if they belong to different villages, provided that they are not, at the same time, related to one of the ancestresses.

M 582 835 Clearly, it is difficult to say what precise degree of kinship formed the basis for the prohibition of or permission for a marriage between descendants of a common ancestor, or what are the boundaries of an exogamous grouping.

It is also apparent from the preceding observations -- as M [611] from the examination of affinity as an obstacle to marriage -- that the descent from a common mother is a more important factor than descent from the father. This does not give proof of a form of matriarchy, though it could be the remains or the beginning of one, or could provide a partial explanation for one. It stems quite simply M [842] from the Nkundó notions concerning procreation, in which they attribute the major role to the mother. There is also the fact that M [602] greater shame is attached to being united with a person descended from the same woman, and finally the fact that they feel a stronger M [593] affection for the mother than for the father (a sentiment [250] which is accentuated by polygamy). The three causes are closely related.

M 184 582 Finally, it should be noted that there is a group among the Nkundó we are discussing which is less strict than the others in this matter. The relatives among whom marriage is prohibited is definitely more limited; that is, their exogamous groupings are more limited. The people in question are the Bongale (see Introduction), and the same phenomenon may be observed among the Elingá. (1)

P [582] 1. The Batswá are still more liberal, and in this respect their practices differ very little from ancient European laws and customs.

684 582 There is no sanction against the infraction of the law of exogamy. There is only the opposition of the parents and patriarchs, and a quasi-innate habit.

582 614 Note also that members of certain clans frequently marry members of certain others, among whom they prefer to choose their wives. Therefore a good proportion of the women married into any given family will belong to one particular clan. The Wafé (Bakáala), for instance take a great many of their wives from among the Bongale w'ôtóló.

[174] 582 614 We may reasonably assume that the ancestors of related groups, who now marry among themselves, formerly practiced exogamy. If this assumption is correct, it must be admitted that with the progressive growth of families, this rule has been relaxed in certain respects so that the present situation has resulted. Consequently, it would not be surprising if these legal provisions became even less rigorous in the future. Actually, some young people have begun to [178] violate the rules of exogamy and their example has freed the whole family. (2) Thus the Bokátola maintain that their two groupings, Bompela and Iló̲ngé̲, who now intermarry, formerly comprised a [251] single exogamous entity. Contemporary instances appear here and there, but they remain very rare, even between persons who are very distantly related, and much rarer between close kin. (1) For the Nkundó still feel very strongly about this law. The bulk of the people are entirely opposed to any laxity or violations and the patriarchs and notables act against them with all their power. But the strength of

2. See Chapter I, Article VII, 1.

1. A recent case was that of Elímá and Bolúfe̲, who both belonged to the exogamous group of Bokenyola of the Bo̲njo̲ku, but one belonged to the Baséká Bo̲kó̲yó̲ family and the other to the Baséká Njoli.

582 614 their intervention is greatly reduced by the fact that much of their authority has been shifted to the chiefs named by the colonial administration, and also by all the contingencies of modern life. Since on the other hand, the young people are gradually breaking the ancient limits in order to acquire greater freedom, the elders will one day have to yield to them.

Article IV. Affinity

582 602 Affinity among the Nkundó should not be understood to have the meaning given in European civil or ecclesiastic law. Marriage is forbidden with all persons who are bakiló (Sing. bokiló). (2)

2. Contrary to the statement by Father Kaptein (Congo, 1922, Vol. 1, p. 541).

Therefore one must know what persons are called bakiló, a fairly complicated problem for us Europeans.

To make the matter more understandable, certain considerations must be developed before giving the general rules.

1. General considerations

1) Affinity is not as great an obstacle to marriage as kinship. It is possible to obtain a sort of "dispensation," and for many degrees of affinity, divorce or death removes the barrier. But there are transgressions [252], and, except for the few indicated above, these do not occur in cases of kinship.

The following legitimate reasons for a "dispensation" are given: a danger that the patrimony will be scattered because of the infidelity of a wife who absolutely refuses to remain with her husband, added to the difficulties of a divorce palaver and the subsequent reimbursements, and -- a reason closely linked to the one just given -- a passionate love between the two people who are relatives by marriage.

Article II. Property

593x Through marriage, a woman does not become a member of
● 614 her husband's clan. If for example she is born into the Bofétola clan, she remains all her life bosí Bofétola, "member of the Bofétola [764] clan," and her corpse has to be buried in her native soil. In case of divorce and remarriage, the new husband does not refund the bride price to the former one; he pays the woman's parents, and they reimburse the forsaken husband.

593x All the wife's activity, however, is directed toward the good 421 of her husband and his family, and this is so from the time of the ikulá payment. Her parents have no further rights over their daughter.
All the fruits of her labor are her husband's property.

If she finds objects that have no owner, such as, for example, elephant tusks or buried copper rings of which no one claims ownership, they do not belong to her nor to her family, but exclusively to her husband. If he shares with his parents-in-law, he does so out of affection and respect for them. He has no legal obligation to do so, but propriety and cordial relations impose a certain duty on him.

Profits from the sale of the products of her industry (such as foods for market, mats, salt, pots, baskets) belong not to her but to her husband.

Even whatever she acquires during a visit to her parents, everything she finds while she is with her family, the fish she catches, the caterpillars she gathers in the forest there, all that belong exclusively to her husband.

It sometimes happens that a woman infringes on the husband's rights in this respect. If he is kind he will generally let her do as she [577] pleases. Severity on his part would be attributed to a lack of affection toward his wife or a lack of delicacy toward his parents-in-law, and he would even be criticized for being stingy (never unjust!), a more serious criticism than the others from the Nkundó point of view.
[263] Dishonest conduct on the part of a wife, however, may give rise to incidents, and even to serious ones. That is what happened in the historic case of Efoloko of Ikengya (Bongíli), who was married to [578] Mpokú of Imomo. She had gone fishing at home and had given all her fish

Article IV

Relations Between the Wife and Her Family

593x 614 Through marriage, a woman does not enter into her husband's family. She continues to belong to her own clan of origin and continues to submit to the special regulations [284] of her family (bokumo) (1) The bokumo pertaining to parturition is excepted, for because of the child she must observe the bokumo of her husband's clan in this realm.

1. The bokumo are special regulations governing a given clan, particularly prohibitions against partaking of certain foods (animal or vegetable) always or only at certain times. The punishment for a transgression is a kind of itching which covers the whole body. One might think this is totemism, but the idea of kinship to the forbidden being is entirely absent.

593x 574 Although the wife is completely dependent on her husband for everything else -- work, property, etc. -- she remains bound to her own parents by obligations of respect, love, and assistance. She has to visit them from time to time, but too great a frequency in these visits meets with disapproval. It is impossible to give a rule defining the proper number. The answer must be provided by good sense. Sensible people prefer that the wife not make too many of these trips. Even her own parents want this to be so. For repeated attentions of this sort are considered evidence of a lack of love and attachment for her husband.

Women who very faithfully stay in their homes and only rarely visit their parents, sometimes yield in face of the teasing of [626] their companions. For the Nkundɔ́ is very sensitive to spiteful comments of that kind. Among current expressions there is one that has become a popular saying and is sometimes sung during dances:

593x 574 óttswákā liála otswâk'olá, bāfókolaka mbók'ěy'olá la ngom'a nkolé, "If you are married go back to your parents, or you will be taught the way with drums and gongs," that is, "when you are dead." (2)

[764] [644] [534] 2. A woman is buried in her own native clan. Her corpse is transported there to the accompaniment of drums and horns. The lokolé gong announces her death.

593x 602 A married woman may not evade the duty of helping her relatives under special circumstances (pregnancy, illness, serious accidents, death). This obligation [285] is not limited to her mother and father, but extends to all her relatives; the closer the degree of kinship, the stricter the obligation.

Besides, love of family is sufficiently developed so that there is no danger of the woman forgetting herself too much in this realm. [626] And a husband who would like to prevent her from fulfilling these elementary duties would be much criticized by all and should expect a dissolution of the marriage.

593x 574 342 536 It was said above that a husband builds a hut for his wife. His relatives often assist him in this task. But it also happened -- in the past, for colonization has removed the possibility of it -- that the woman's father wanted to build his daughter's house himself or at least to make the pavement out of clay brought from her native land. This act was a demonstration of wealth and politico-social importance as well as proof of fatherly affection. The husband, for his part, was honored to have married the daughter of such an important man and loved her all the more. Thus a number of women say that "they only cooked on ancestral soil." This soil was brought in baskets across distances up to 50 kilometers by Batswa and by men of the woman's clan or village. Her father could do it because of his great influence and regal rewards (bokóndo, verb kónda) were distributed during a feast (nteke) given for the workers and their relatives after the task was completed. This was done for Bompeli, daughter of Bokombe of Litúli (Bombwanja) married to Bonyeme w'enyuka of the Basékā Mbangó (Bonkoso); for Beluka, daughter of

593* Iongo of Bokákyá (Boselo, Bombwanja), married to Bokaa is 'Ifonda 574 of Bowélé; for Mbalaka, daughter of Bolekela wa Imangaiso of the 342 Basékâ Lokuli (Bongílí), married to Mbuli is'ea Wela of Bombóngo
556 w Etefa (Bongale) (1) [286]

[551] 1. She bore the name of Mbálaka (meaning indemnity), because her father had solemnly proclaimed (-békya) and publicly promised that he intended, one day, to place himself in the position of having to pay an indemnity because of his daughter, as proof of his love. Indeed [782] when Mbálaka was married, he killed one of his wives, cut her into pieces, and sent the "meat" to his son-in-law as "the first hen" that his wife would prepare for him. But he did not have to pay [682] the indemnity because the victim's clan ● [614] was too weak to attempt a war; they did not dare to make a claim and, in order to avoid even greater misfortunes, they resigned themselves to this revolting ignominy.

Article V

Relations Between the Husband and His Wife's Family

606 As has already been said, kinship by marriage is called likiló, 607 and relatives by marriage are called bokiló, bakiló. Mbótsoló is a term of respect for very close relatives by marriage (father-in-law, mother-in-law, sometimes brother-in-law or sister-in-law). When there is a considerable age difference between two affinal relatives, the elder one sometimes calls the younger bokilówalé. This happens most frequently when the son-in-law is so young that he can still be considered a child. This term can even be used by an elder brother

192 Qualifying expressions are sometimes added to the name nkónde: éâ boánga, referring to the boánga on which the favorite is seated during the ceremony in which her position is established, and eâ konjo, "true." The two terms are used as opposed to a nkóndé éâ weólí, whose position is established without any special ceremony, in imitation of a true, officially recognized favorite.

The expression for "making a nkóndé" is ója nkóndé, "to make a nkóndé come out," because she is proclaimed as such before the public gathering. Nowadays one often hears the expression ténа nkóndé, a term which is very probably transferred from the bolúmbú. (See the next article.) [348]

Article III. The Bolúmbú

595x
554 The polygamist who by birth or influence is recognized as the primus inter pares of a group of clans and who, to use the Nkundó term, is joko j'ésé (1) has the exclusive right to make one of his wives a bolúmbú. Therefore, doing so was not, as with a favorite, a matter of wealth and preference, but rather a mark of influence and authority.

In relation to this subject, here is a historical incident showing how an attack on this law resulted in a mysterious punishment, interpreted by the natives as an intervention from beyond the grave for the protection of the ancestral order. The events occurred at Besombó (Bombwanja), in the Bongilá family. Bonkoso w'Ílumwa had married Eyeke of Bokúma and by her had his eldest son

● [614] 1. Nowadays one would call him the chief. But actually he was not a chief; he was simply the most respected and influential member of the oligarchy of clan patriarchs. This oligarchy constituted the political administration of the Nkundó, and from time to time an eminent personality gained recognition within it.

595ˣ that no one will see her. She lives in this house in the company 554 of her ebísa, her daughters, some female relatives, or even another of her husband's wives, who must wait on her, prepare food for her, etc., and who go out and enter freely. Her husband also enters at will and spends the usual number of nights with her.
No other man is permitted to enter the enclosure.

During her period of seclusion, the bolɔ́mbɔ́ may not do the slightest work. She does not wash with water, but only with palm oil. She walks only on mats. She is also exempt from mourning for her parents. (Compare with Chapter I, Part 1, Article II.)

When the period of seclusion comes to an end, the husband announces the coming-out feast. There is merrymaking, dancing, and drinking. Mats are spread from the door of [351] the hut of seclusion all the way to the middle of the street. The two men who brought the woman to the hut come again and, taking her by the arms at the entrance to the enclosure, lead her over the mats. The ceremony thus ends without further ado.

The bolɔ́mbɔ́ is henceforth free and acts like any other woman except for the wearing of furs. She may work, draw water, cook, travel, visit her parents, etc. But her husband's [563] honor and his reputation as a rich man require that he give his [567] bolɔ́mbɔ́ one or several slaves, or Batswa, or -- as is more frequently done -- one or two bibísa, who are supposed to take [357] care of her housework and thus free the princess.

595ˣ Adultery with her -- after her seclusion -- is more 554 severely punished than misconduct with an ordinary woman as 837 regards the indemnity to be paid. But as a flagrant insult, it is
● 614 considered very serious indeed, not so much as an infringement or marital rights as an attack on the honor of the whole clan or group of clans involved. Thus, while adultery with a nkɔ́ndɛ́, for instance, is a private matter, arousing the husband's jealousy and anger, misconduct with a bolɔ́mbɔ́ is a public offense. The whole clan is enraged -- for they believe that their honor has been attacked, and all the members together press for vengeance for 595x 554 this outrage (nkɛlɛ eleki ɛ́y'olɔ́mbɔ́). It is a kind of national dis-

837 honor. This observation also clearly pinpoints the great differ-
● 614 ence between the favorite and the bolɔ́mbɔ́.

The following custom should be mentioned in this con-595x nection: if any man, even a stranger or one who comes from a
721 great distance, comes and -- over the fence -- strikes the roof
554 of a bolɔ́mbɔ́'s ilɛkɛ of seclusion with his elefɔ́ (1) as a call to war, the whole village is obliged to take up arms to defend him. All the men [352] accompany him and unite with his family against the enemy clan, whatever the distance may be. The Nkundɔ́ say that the act of touching the bolɔ́mbɔ́'s hut infuriates the entire clan and makes them take up arms without hesitation. (1)

595x 554 One last indication of the social nature of this institution is the fact that the bolɔ́mbɔ́ has the right to sit beside her husband at public gatherings and feasts, a prerogative which she alone of all women possesses. With her is a boy or girl who serves as her "boy" and carries the seat (boánga) on which she sits.

When a bolɔ́mbɔ́ dies her husband may put another in her place. To do so he repeats the ceremony described above. It is called sangoja bolɔ́mbɔ́, "to make succeed to the title of bolɔ́mbɔ́."

As we saw in Chapter I, Part 1, Article II, a man may even make his daughter a bolɔ́mbɔ́.

846 to be able to nurse the child together." This does not mean that 833 from then on they may have regular sexual relations, for these are not permitted until after the end of seclusion. But if they were to omit the act at this time, they would have to abstain from it until the child is weaned. The Nkundó say that the act is performed "only a little." For many it becomes masturbation; others withdraw before obtaining the effect of the act. In no case may the act reach its natural climax. The reason for this practice is unknown to me. Perhaps it is done in order not to molest the woman while she is in a painful condition.

The next day the ashes in the hearth of the seclusion hut
846 are swept out, and the fire becomes "ordinary"; anyone may use it and eat food prepared on it.

4) The umbilical cord is dried on the bolíkó (a tray or shelf) and then buried at the foot of a young banana tree planted for that purpose, preferably under a bọnkọḿ tree if possible. The ashes and sweepings from the seclusion hut are thrown there. The banana tree is called nkíndá. (1) Its fruit may be eaten only by the child's

[824] 1. This is a generic term used for any banana tree planted for a special purpose (a magical practice, a game, etc.).

[153] grandfather and grandmother. If another person eats it, he will be punished with a headache of a nervous type.

The umbilical cord is always buried in the father's native
846 soil. People who are far from home (laborers for the Whites, etc.)
● 614 preserve the umbilical cords of their children with great care in order to take them back [489] when they return to their village, or send them back when a favorable opportunity arises. The Nkundó hold to this usage tenaciously, because a person whose umbilical cord is not buried in the lands of his paternal clan has no authority in the group. The person involved would meet with the following objection: ntákokúndela lokolɛ́, ntákokundela lọkọkí, óyakúmya ngámo? ɔlɛ̌ nk'eyâya, "The lokolɛ́ was not beaten for you, your

846 umbilical cord was not buried; how dare you boast? You are but a 614 stranger." Therefore this custom constitutes a sort of matriculation into the family. If anyone wants to be entirely certain of a Nkundó's clan, he has only to look for the place where his umbilical cord was buried.

5) The end of seclusion is marked by a few ceremonies.

846 A. A meal. Early in the morning of the day set, the hus-302 band goes and cuts a bunch of fruit of the palm tree, and the helper goes and picks manioc leaves (nowadays leaves and fruit collected the day before are sometimes used). The helper crushes all of this to make a dish of food. While she cooks it over the fire, she shaves a little hair off the mother, plucks out one eyebrow, and cuts one of her nails. Then she does the same to the child. The helper moves away, and the father comes in. His wife subjects him to the same treatment, and he reciprocates, doing the same to the child. The rubbish is simply thrown away without any ceremony.
This practice has no special name; the Nkundó say: báyatɛ́na bekengo, báyakenga, "They shave each other's heads."

When the vegetables are ready, all the women of the vil-846 lage are gathered together. A little pit is dug in front of the hut.
A large leaf is placed in it to serve as a dish, and the vegetables are poured into it. The mother, the helper, and all those assembled eat. Except for a few small boys no representatives of the stronger sex are present. When the meal is completed, [490] the leaf that served as a plate and those that served as spoons are buried in the pit. Today the more advanced of the population use a European plate and spoons. The meal and the vegetables eaten are called losanganya, "reunion," because the entire village is united in partaking of them, or lofanjola, "dispersion," because it is the prelude to the end of the bokeka.

B. Then follows the ceremony of separation (-téna bofofó, or, among the Injóló, bokɛ́kɛ́lɛ́kɛ́. (1) The bofofó is the mid-rib

177 622 category of civil servants. In this manner they would fall under the written law and could be obliged to practice monogamy, whereas now nearly all of the "native chiefs" are precisely the maintainers and promoters of polygamy. If this had /156/ been enforced from the start, then polygamy, instead of spreading, would have virtually disappeared from the native society.

5. Splitting of the Clan

613 After all that has been said before, it must be rather apparent how an autonomous clan can split up and, thereby, form two autonomous clans.

When a clan has expanded too far, its leaders cross over the boundaries of blood relationship, and offenses against the law of exogamy occur. When such offenses are multiplied, further separation is gradually aimed at to make marriages possible. Such a situation between two parts of the same clan, who are striving for "legal autonomy," is called lonkana, a term that signifies that unlawful relations exist between the two. It generally occurs between member groups that have the same male ancestor, but not the same female ancestor—that is, they are issue from different wives of the same founder.

Another cause of splitting is the voluntary or obligatory withdrawal of one of the members. When he establishes himself outside, begets a sizeable progeny, and acquires a patrimony of his own, the relations with his own clan become less frequent; and the separated fraction gradually begins to settle smaller lawsuits, to maintain its own graveyard, to bury the umbilical cords of its children in its own territory, to take on its own name, and to refer to its own founder.

Often also at the source of this estrangement lies the refusal of a certain fraction of the clan to submit to the authority of the clan members.

6. Legal Dependents

613 614 608 Until now we have spoken only of the ethnic clan: of the members who belong to it through descent. They /157/ are the sole bearers of

613 authority (mpifo). Each clan can, however, also take in other persons
614 who fall outside the order of authority, but who legally belong to the 608 clan. Along with the real descendants, they make up the legal clan.

These are, in the first place, the wives who have married into the clan, the children brought with them (mbusola), and the lawful housekeepers. In addition, there are the clients who have been taken in; then the war prisoners and slaves; and finally the Pygmies. The women married into the clan are naturally separate, as are also the Pygmies who form a completely separate community. The others are gradually treated as children, receive their part in the general responsibility and protection, their place in the court session, etc. Depending on the degree to which they develop in the bosom of the clan which has taken them in, they can constitute a separate group in it, which becomes more and more independent.

7. The Maternal Clan

602 Each Nkundo has a double "fatherland": his wise and his bonyango.
613 The bonyango is the paternal clan of his mother. His mother gave birth to him there; her blood relations live there and receive him with motherly love and will protect him against all difficulties; he has often passed a large part of his happiest childhood years there; and there he can always find a safe shelter when, for one reason or another, he might lose the paternal clan.

The structure of the maternal clan naturally resembles that of the paternal clan in every way. If we treat it specially here, it is not in order to speak of the form, but only to point out the specific rights that each person has in his maternal clan.

601 Just as all of the brothers and sisters of my father are my "fathers,"
602 so all of the brothers and sisters of my mother are my "mothers."
613 Mother's brother, that is, my maternal uncle, I call ngompame, nyangompame. All the nephews and nieces on the mother's side are my "children." A special tie binds me to the children of the nkita of my mother, that is, to the children of the women who was acquired by the maternal clan with the bride price /158/ that had been paid for my mother by my wise. Mother is, thus, the nkolo, the woman or mistress, of those children who call me their father.

602 As long as I continue to live in my own paternal clan, I have the 613 right to special care and love from the maternal clan. If I cannot find

61 602 another group. According to their relationship to others, groups may be designated as:

- brother, younger or older;
- brother or half brother (descended from various wives of the polygynous ancestor);
- [848] Illegitimate child of the sister which, legally, as the child of the oldest brother or of the father of his mother, belongs to the group of the mother's relatives;
- child of a boy who together with his sister has moved to the unit of his brothers-in-law and has settled there permanently;
- son of a sister, who for some reason has separated from his paternal relatives and has moved in with the group of his mother or of one of his grandmothers.

601 Present-day social relationships are influenced by this variety of kinship relations. The kinship terms which refer to the relationships of the genuine or assumed ancestors to each other are occasionally transferred to the groups.

614 602 621 In this paper we shall describe the Isangi group (12) as an [101] example of hierarchical kinship structure. Isangi is a local group of the type described above (p. 1). Following the custom of the region, I shall refer to it as a "village." Until we have decided which terms are applicable to the various groups, I shall use the letters A to E for the individual ranks of the hierarchical structure. Within this system A shall stand for the smallest and E for the largest units (see Diagram 2).[1]

In addition to the three ranks of Group D in Isangi, there are others in the daughter villages (see Diagram 1). These may also include foreign groups, as, for example, the "Nkundó" group, Liimbu, in Wengá.

12. Müller, Fürstentum [Kingdom], pp. 68 ff., 125, 128 ff.

[1] [See page 6, category 116.—Analyst]

602 All the groups represented on the diagram (Diagram 2)
614 are known by their names to the adults of Isangi. In addition to 621 their regular name, all these groups also have a "drum" name
[552] and an "honorary" name. Only the three Boyeke groups of rank
B have different drum names but no individual group names. The arrangement of groups as found on the diagram does not represent a genealogy. It is based simply on the characteristics and functions of the individual groups [190] which in each case are equal to each other on one rank. Thus, we have here an organizational diagram, not a genealogical table. [Diagrams 1 and 2 appear here.]

The people of Isangi are also well aware of the relationships between the individual groups, but they are not as clearly conscious of the system as it appears in our diagram. They are able to describe the kinship relations between the groups and they can point out which functions are assigned to the individual groups without, however, regarding the groups as equal to one another because they have like functions and without seeing them as part of a system as we do. Thus, our diagram represents a systematization which, by its very nature, does not wholly do justice to reality. Correspondingly, therefore, there is no satisfactory Ekonda social terminology.

[191] [Diagram 3 appears here.] Just as in nonscientific European usage, the terms lack sufficient precision. Furthermore, in principle the nature of the groups between rank A to E and of the still larger units is similar, and as a result all the terms are used almost indiscriminately for large and small units alike.

Usually, the word ikundf (literally, "lap") refers to small 601 units, approximately those of ranks A and B, but it is also used 621 for larger and large units if their relatively close degree of
614 kinship is to be stressed. Thus it approximately corresponds to the meaning of the word "family" as used in nonscientific language. The word ilongo refers both to what in European usage is described as the small family [Kleinfamilie] and also to groups of ranks A and B.

601 621 614 Bonsonga and etúká are terms used for kinship groups of ranks B, C, and D, but occasionally they may also refer to [192] the groups listed under A and, in addition, to the local groups which in size approximately correspond to the kinship units mentioned above. Etúká is the term used for the oil palm grove and for a certain kind of termite hill; apparently it is used for local groups more frequently than the term bonsonga.

[571] [535] Another term whose meaning varies is ekíndá. This word designates, first of all, a dance group, a corps de ballet, and also the social unit which sends such a joint dance troupe to dance festivals.

Esɛ́ also has strong local connotations. It is usually identical with what we call a village, but frequently units which are larger or smaller than a village are designated as esɛ́. Very large groups, tribes and even larger units, are called bonanga.

614 As a criterion for placing the individual groups within a certain rank, one or several functions have been chosen in each case. The groups of the individual ranks are described below relative to their functions. On the subject of groups it should be added that in general they do not differ from each other in certain traits. All groups of all ranks are kinship units of patrilineal descent. They consider themselves descendants of one ancestor. No continuous and complete genealogy which can be traced back to the original ancestor is known. The genealogy of the entire group of the Bakonda is shown in Diagram 1.

In Isangi two of the ancestors of the groups of rank D are brothers, the third is the brother of their father. A D-group (Ngelɛ́) includes, in addition, the descendants of an illegitimate child of the paternal sister of the ancestor. These offspring form the C-group, Nsambáálɛ́.

There is a gap between this ancient genealogy and the known ancestors from the recent past. In contrast with that of the neighboring Bokótɛ́ [Bokete] (see, for example, Boelaert, "Les Bongili"), the genealogical memory of the Ekonda is weak. [173] It does not reach back to the ancestor of the group of rank A. In this connection we must take into account the fact that a group

614 splits up only after the death of the ancestor to whom the new groups can be traced back. The descendants of a patriarch split up into the groups of his sons only when these groups have reached the necessary size. Considering the size of even the smallest Ekonda groups this can occur only after several generations. By this time, however, the common patriarch and his sons, the ancestors of the new subgroups, are dead. Thus, at the present time we find a tendency to split in the Ndong'i-mpinga group; the ancestors of the two groups which are now in the process of forming died about 1920. Most probably these two groups, so far as their age relationship to one another is concerned, will not grade themselves according to the relationship of these "tribal ancestors," but according to the relationship of the "patriarchs" under whom the separation takes place. The exact process of such a split of A-groups cannot be established afterwards through questions; it can only be observed on the spot while it is taking place.

In the following chapters we shall describe the groups of the various ranks and their characteristics.

Groups of Rank A

These groups consist of as many as forty persons. In most 563 cases, a group of Batwá-Pygmoids is part of such a group. Having the function of helots, they belong to the A-group of their masters, and this membership is passed on through the male line in the same manner as among their masters. Excepting Pygmoids, the oldest member of the A group is the bomélé bokonda, the "owner of the land"; he is the personification of all authority within the group and its representative in the group's dealings with outsiders. He is the only person who is completely in charge. All members of the group are in a father-son relationship to him [193] even if the younger members -- as counted by generations -- have the rank of father in relation to him. He administers and issues the group's treasury of objects used for buying a bride. He also disposes of the landed property of the group.

614 He represents the A-group in the council of elders of the village and of the other large units. Since no members of the group [672] are considered capable of conducting affairs, all the legal transactions which they undertake are treated as though they had been sanctioned by the patriarch. To a large extent the members of the group may represent one another. In the absence of the elder, a younger member may act as the representative of the [623] group at council meetings. When the senior member dies, his function will be taken over by the next oldest member of the group.

An A-group will split up only through internal conflicts
614 which cannot be bridged or through a large population increase.
602 The newly-formed A-groups continue to maintain a close relationship which, at first, is much closer than among the B-groups whose A-groups have split much earlier. In the higher ranks cohesion after the split diminishes only gradually; thus many gradations develop in the feeling of cohesion. These gradations could not be even approximately reproduced in a diagram with any degree of exactitude. There is no formula by which the split takes place, as there is, for example, among the Tallensi (13)
where it is determined by a certain number of generations.
614 Theoretically the A-groups are "eternal." The A-groups are 596 subdivided into small families. Within the polygynous families
592 nuclear families [Familienkerne] (14) have a semi-independent position economically. Each wife has her own house. A husband's wives and the wives of his sons have their houses within the same homestead. As the master of the homestead, the father has an open shelter where the men spend their time and [768] hold their meetings. Upon the death of the master of the

614 596 592 [768] homestead, it is deserted by the inhabitants. On the new dwelling site the sons each build their own shelter. In contrast to the groups of the type A-E, the group living within a homestead is finite: its existence ends with the father's death. Only a man whose father (in the European meaning of the term) has died may have a shelter. Thus the homestead community is interposed between the A-group and the small family.

614 To sum up the characteristic features of the A-groups:

Membership determined by male descent; unity of legal power, especially insofar as landed property and inheritance law is concerned the senior has full power; succession by simple seniority; theoretically unlimited existence of the group. The A-groups consist of small families who live together in homesteads under one father in each case.

Groups of Rank B

614 793 There is usually a friendly, neighborly relationship between the A-groups which form part of a B-group. People assist each other to a large extent, and there is joint consultation on most matters. Group B has only one Nkúmú iloki, "master of the hidden power," the priest of the kinship group, who is consulted by all the members of the group. He functions during the magical preparations for the hunt; he is consulted before any important undertaking. During the leave-taking ceremony after a burial, he converses with the deceased, and people turn to him when the ancestors have appeared to them in their dreams to transmit their desires, orders, or other information to the living. He protects the people of his group from the ill will, ndoki, of the dead and the living. The priest of the kinship group is used as the criterion [194] to determine which group of homogeneous A-groups represents a B-group. The priest of the kinship group is descended from a certain one of the related A-groups.

614 554 There is a difference in rank among the A-groups of a B-group -- one group will be regarded as older -- but this is

614 554 only of lesser importance (see below, under local groups). The headman of the B-group is the oldest of the seniors of the related A-groups, that is, the senior of the B-group. He is not, however, fully in charge of affairs like the elder of the A-group; he should rather be seen as princeps inter pares. This, of course, does not affect his position as senior of his own A-group.

614 423 Within a B-group landed property is often still regarded as belonging together, even though fixed boundaries between the territories of the constituent groups may already exist. In general, however, it may be assumed that the other elders will not object if a hunting expedition is extended to their territory, if, under certain circumstances, the soil of their district is used for planting, or if certain wild plants are taken from there for building a house or as raw material for a craftsman. Membership in a B-group is determined by membership in an A-group.

614 885 At this point we shall not enter into a discussion of the genealogical peculiarities which result from the significance of the bride price. We learned of one case of incest which occurred between members of two A-groups which formed a B-group, but we have not heard of anything like that occurring within an A-group. In this connection, however, we do not refer to those acts of incest which are required to make a particularly powerful charm become effective.

Summing up all that is characteristic of B-groups:

614 There is only one priest of the kinship group; cohesion within a B-group is very close, people cooperate extensively, all important matters are decided by the group, even those which, strictly speaking, concern only the constituent A-groups; in this connection, the oldest of the seniors has a somewhat privileged position.

Groups of Rank C

The cohesion within a group of this category is considerably looser, although on this level particularly one can find great differences among the individual groups. For example, the groups Lovendo and Besilo consider themselves much closer

614 to each other than either of these groups with Nsambásɛ́lɛ́ (see Diagram 2). It was for this reason that in my dissertation I divided this rank into two different ranks (kinship subgroups I^o and II^o). (15) Since there are no obvious criteria for the two ranks and since such a division is not possible in the other villages, I no longer make such distinctions.

15. Müller, Fürstentum, p. 125.

[582] [835] The groups of rank C are the exogamous units of the future. Although marriage is not permitted between the members of different C-groups, sexual relations between them are permitted. This permission corresponds to the lonkana of the Bokótɛ́ (16).

16. Hulstaert, "Mariage," p. 97. f.

Groups of Rank D

614 582 The groups of this category constitute the truly exogamous units. It is true that marriages between "advanced persons" ["evolués"] take place even within rank D, but this practice is still frowned upon by the old people. In Isangi we also find the special stipulation that members of two D-groups, Ngelé and Nkoto, may intermarry, [195] but they may not enter into marriage with members of the D-group, Bolíma. Since in present-day Isangi, Bolíma is extinct, this stipulation only works to the disadvantage of the emigrants in Bolíma w'ási and of the children of sisters in other villages. The Bolíma group is regarded as the father group of Isangi (see Diagram 1); Ngelé is the group of the older brother, Nkoto that of the younger brother. This serves as an explanation for the special position of Bolíma in the exogamous system. It is said that it would not be right for a "father" to marry one of his "children" even if these children are the offspring of such distant generations that they intermarry.

614 582 The exogamy rules of the Ekonda do not only refer to their own, agnatic group, but also to all cognate groups to whom kinship relations can still be traced back, i.e., a span of about five generations.

Groups of Rank E

614 621 It may be assumed that these groups always extend beyond the confines of a village. Those parts of a group who have settled next to each other have their communal meeting place, but even the dispersed fractions of the group may come there to consult. In former times probably only one such group had a nkúmú, a sacred prince who lived in the main village (e.g., Isangi), while the other villages were ruled by the senior. Once the title of nkúmú was also bestowed on persons from other villages, the importance of the E-groups almost completely disappeared. Also, in this category the local group plays a much greater role. Occasionally it even includes dependent [609] villages which have not yet been "paternalized," i.e., which are still regarded as alien. In this connection it should be mentioned that probably all larger local groups tend to reconstitute themselves into kinship groups by reinterpreting the genealogy to suit their purposes. It is certain that the "kinship relation" of many "kinship groups" has been created in this manner. We may dismiss the possibility that groups which are divided from one another by the rule of exogamy will invent a kinship relation so close that a previously possible marriage would be outlawed. Also, the combination of other important functions of the lower ranks resulting from the invention of a closer relationship would run counter to the tendency of progressive differentiation (17).

621 In general one may assume that local groups will postulate only that kind of kinship relationship which does not necessitate a substantial functional reintegration. For this reason, units above the exogamy limit will easily tend to construe a genealogy which "proves" a kinship relationship. Groups of that type are functionally weak. One can observe processes of this kind both among the group of the Bakonda and among the neighboring E-group, Lonyanyanga. The institution of the nkúmú (see above, p. 14) also appears to have a leveling influence. The privileges of the oldest (and free) group diminish in importance and fall behind the office of nkúmú. The new office is also open to younger and dependent groups.

Sociological Terminology for Kinship Groups

128 Before dealing with the units which are to be regarded as settlement groups, we shall compare the kinship groups of the Ekonda with the sociological ideal types. Keeping in mind the authors mentioned at the beginning, I shall now discuss the various terms used for groups which are applicable to conditions found among the Ekonda. [196]

596 The small family is of no importance in the organizational system of the Ekonda. Nevertheless it is very important as the smallest unit of economic life. Each small family is potentially polygynous, but monogynous marriages are more numerous at the present time, especially among the younger generation. In view of this difference between potential and practiced polygyny, it seems advisable to follow Thurnwald in classing the polygamous forms together with the small family and to differentiate its nuclear families (18). In my opinion this approach

18. Vol. 4, p. 12 f.

seems to correspond more closely to its functional importance than Murdock's view, according to which the polygamous family

121
596 the material collected by Kirchhoff (21) and the ancient Roman familia would serve as good examples -- a patrilineal large family could be described as a kinship group, living, working, and maintaining a household together, consisting of a husband, his wives, and all his offspring, and splitting into the large families of his sons upon the death of the father.

21. Kirchhoff, Zeitschrift für Ethnologie, Vol. 63, p. 88 ff., p. 96 ff.

Kirchhoff defines the large family in the same fashion, yet he takes care to point out that here, in constrast to a kinship group, persons who have married into the group are part of it (22).

22. Kirchhoff, Zeitschrift für Ethnologie, Vol. 63, p. 90.

Murdock's conception of the "extended family" is identical with this interpretation (23).

23. Murdock, Social Structure, p. 24.

On the other hand, in Vol. 2 (p. 22) Thurnwald regards the large family as a unilateral kinship group with persons who have married into it. This group lives in the same place and is governed by a common chief from whom all the members are supposedly descended. The kinship group, in contrast to the large family, may be scattered. [197] Thus, Thurnwald at this point puts other characteristics in the foreground, but the text allows the conclusion that for Thurnwald the dependence on the life of the head of the families and its temporary nature are the essential characteristics of a large family.

In this sense none of the units described under A-E[1] is a large family. The wives who have married into the group belong to the group of the husband, but they always remain part of their father's group; in case of divorce they return to the

[1] [pages 9-15, category 116.-Analyst]

596 latter group. Another factor which reminds us of the wife's con-
614 tinuing membership in her original group is the connection, never completely severed, between the groups related by marriage, illustrated by the practice of gifts and counter-gifts which are all part of the bride price and the dowry. When she dies, the
[764] wife is buried in the soil of her group. In addition, the group membership of the wife is transferred to the children, although this does not have the same effects in economic and political terms. Matrilineal descent is important in relation to marriage
[611] restrictions, certain avoidance practices which are passed on through the wives, and also certain privileges. Quite a large number of persons has settled permanently in the group of their mother or that of their grandmothers.

The decisive factor that makes the term "large family" unsuitable is the "eternal" character of the A-E groups of the Ekonda. However, the subdivisions of the A-groups which live together in a common homestead (see p. 10) may be regarded as large families in the sense used by Thurnwald, Kirchhoff, and Murdock.

Kinship Group

614 In the definitions of the term "family" quoted above,
121 we already learned something about Thurnwald's concept of a kinship group, but there is an additional reference to the technical term "kinship group" ["Sippe"]" (p. 17 f.) (24):

24. Menschliche Gesellschaft, Vol. 4.

"...A kinship group is defined as a clan (q. v.) which is not politically independent. Usually the loss of independence is caused by the distribution of the people of the clan among the various settlements. A kinship group is held together by the consciousness of being descended from the same ancestors and by their common cult of the ancestors. The kinship group is of special importance for the regulation of marriage (q. v.). -- A kinship group may be divided into kinship subgroups (large 121 kinship group [Grosssippe], small kinship group [Kleinsippe]), 614 or it may have a tendency to split in half. A kinship group or a kinship subgroup may at times have a chief, at times not."

On the term "clan" Thurnwald writes (p. 16) (24):

24. Menschliche Gesellschaft, Vol. 4.

"The word is of Old Irish origin, where it refers to children of common descent, approximately in the sense of a 'large family' (q. v.). We now use it for family agglomerations (see Horde) who have become stabilized, who have a religious substructure through their belief in common ancestors, and who support each other economically and politically. It is advisable to make a distinction between the 'clan' which settles exclusively within one region and which claims this region for itself, thus forming a politically sovereign community, and the splinters of a clan scattered among communities which are independent in their own right, which we designate as 'kinship groups' (q. v.) and which usually are not tied to each other by any organizational framework; their cohesion is simply the result of the ceremonial-religious cult of the ancestors and a certain degree of solidarity. The origin of the clan and kinship group is closely related to the cult of the ancestors which symbolizes descent lines. Membership in a clan or in a kinship group may be reckoned in the male or female lines. Frequently one of the living family heads represents this family agglomeration which is, so to speak, [198] 'crystallized.' In this respect it differs from familial structures which become extinct upon the death of the persons by whom they were founded. In a clan or a kinship group the families succeeding each other are permanently represented (see Family, Caste, State)."

We may state that a common feature of both forms is that we are dealing here with purely unilateral units which are tied to each other by ancestor worship (this ancestor worship may be -- in many cases, it will be -- absent in the large family as described above). If we disregard the attempt inherent in both

121 definitions to present a theory of development, the differentia-
114 tion between the two terms appeas to me to be very useful, and this seems particularly true if we accept the first definition of clan given by Thurnwald and regard the second as completely irrelevant for our present purposes.

It is true that our A-group lives in a certain district
● 614 which it claims for itself as its own "province," but it is never-
621 theless difficult to describe this district as a politically sovereign community. A political nature could rather be attributed to those groups which, up to now, we have not described at all, i.e., the settlement communities. Proceeding further, the A-group is integrated into the B-group, the B-group into the C-group, thus forming an endless chain; among those tribes who have a greater degree of genealogical consciousness than the Ekonda -- for example, the neighboring Bongili (25) -- the hierarchy of groups ends with mankind, the hierarchy of ancestors with God.

Thurnwald emphasizes this ranked structure, especially 121 in discussing the kinship group. Kirchhoff, however, fails to 614 deal with the problem of the kinship group in a manner which would be of value to us in differentiating between kinship group and clan. Dealing with the organizational structure of the peoples he discussed, he naturally was more interested in defining the border between large family and kinship group. Lowie (26) only discusses the kinship group, "sib," calling it the "'clan' of British anthropologists", (p. 105) or "clans," if patrilineal, and "gentes," if matrilineal, "of most American anthropologists." The "ad infinitum" (p. 106) is also stressed by him in relation to the kinship group. Lowie also admits the possibility of subdivision with respect to his "sib," and consequently he even includes in the kinship group such forms as the "moieties," which according to Thurnwald's definition are still part of it, but which in his view

26. Primitive Society.

614 121 and in general ethnological usage are units of a special type. Thus Lowie's and Thurnwald's views correspond to a large extent.

Murdock (27) clearly differentiates between a kinship group and a "lineage." In his view a lineage consists of a group of individuals who are able to trace their descent to a common ancestor, which for him in the majority of cases is only the unilateral "stem" [Stamm] of a large family, excluding those who have married into the group, but including the members who have married out.

Murdock's and Thurnwald's concepts of the kinship group are identical. On the other hand, Murdock differs in his definition of the clan (28).

Clan

618 614 121 Murdock regards the patrilineal clan as a local group which consists of the stem of a kinship group and which incorporates the wives of its members but excludes daughters who marry. As an example he mentioned the "groups" which in our society are connected by the same family name. If the group of persons bearing the birth-name "Wolf" in common functioned as a group of relatives, it would [199] be a Wolf kinship group, but those persons who actually call themselves "Wolf," i.e., the Messrs. Wolf with their wives, sons, unmarried sisters, and daughters, would constitute a Wolf clan (assuming, of course, that this group really functions). This concept of a clan is new. Even Murdock does not consider this definition very satisfactory and invites better suggestions. According to Murdock, the clan is a unit of eminent importance; terminologically it has not been possible so far to differentiate it from the kinship group. It is irrelevant in this connection whether the term clan is applicable to this

27. Social Structure, p. 45 ff.

614 618 121 social group. It is true that the "Murdock clan" also exists among the Ekonda on all the lower ranks, but only as a functional unit which, like the large family and small family, is not really regarded as a group by the Ekonda. Among the Ekonda the feeling of cohesion between the indigenous group and those who have married into it has its basis not so much in the groups of relatives as described above, but rather in the local group of the type discussed further below.

614 The units which we described in the first part of this study correspond neither to the definition of Thurnwald nor to that of Murdock as regards the term clan. Our groups differ from the clan as described by Thurnwald by their hierarchical structure over which functions of authority are distributed. An added factor is that Thurnwald in the Lehrbuch (29) wants to define the difference between clan and kinship group by size and by ascribing to the former the element of political power. The only kinship group of the Ekonda which possesses strong authority, however, is the smallest, the one of rank A. If we let ourselves be guided by the criterion of authority, we would have to regard the smallest group (rank A) as a clan. Using the criterion of size, however, we would have to regard one of the groups of ranks D or E as a clan. Hence this term is unsuitable.

For the above reasons I have used the term "kinship group" [Sippe] for the groups of all ranks. With respect to the E-groups one might even speak of a subtribe [Unterstamm], but it should be pointed out that as far as the Ekonda are concerned all the groups mentioned above, including the tribes [Stämme] are groups or relatives of the same type, i.e., are "kinship groups."

For the purpose of differentiating between the kinship groups of the various ranks I have used the terms:

nuclear kinship group [Kernsippe] for groups of rank A; small kinship group [Kleinsippe] for groups of rank B;

---

29. Thurnwald: in Preuss, Lehrbuch, p. 259 f.

614 kinship subgroup [Untersippe] for groups of rank C; kinship group [Sippe] for groups of rank D (the exogamous units);
large kinship group [Grossippe] for groups of rank E.

Local Organization

361 621 178 The second diagram[1] shows the settlement pattern of the Isangi group in its old settlement area up to 1949. At this time Isangi was relocated near the highway. Only two of the nuclear kinship groups of Isangi can lay claim to territory reaching far enough toward the east as to extend beyond the new highway. Thus, the resettlement process has led to a complete change of the settlement pattern. However, the functions of the settlement communities have not yet been adapted to the new settlement. At present the inhabitants are still so engaged in speculation about the possibility of a return to their own old territory that they have not yet reformed their village organization.

621 614 We observe that the village is divided into six settlement communities (30), each of which consists only of the members of one of the two kinship groups of Isangi. [200] We find that only the group of the father, which formerly was a kinship group in its own right, is attached to one settlement community of the kinship group Ngelé. Incidentally, we might point out that the names of the two kinship groups, Ngelé and Nkoto, mean "down the river" and "up the river." The older group is called "down the river" since in ngelé the river is large and wide. We come across this honorary term for the older group in some other villages although there is not always an "up-river" group. No corresponding settlement pattern can be found.

614 621 202 624 The degree of cohesion among the constituent kinship groups in settlement community I is so strong that the entire community has a communal bokendi, a communal messenger.

30. See Diagram 3.

[1] [page 7, category 116.—Analyst]

614
621 It is the task of the messengers to transmit all important mes-
202 sages to the other groups in accordance with a precise plan;
624 this is particularly true regarding the invitations to the meetings of the village council with the nkúmú. At the same time they inform the other groups as to the program of the meeting. The first messenger calls on the messenger of the other community;
the old men are gathered at the latter's house in order to receive and to discuss the message. The messenger of this community, in turn, departs for the next in line. As a result of this practice the messenger and his home became one of the centers of social life.

621 The same uniformity is found in community II. Here
614 we can also see the engangala, the meeting place of the village
361 Isangi and of its branch villages. The meeting place is an open 623 space in which stands a short tree with a broad crown. The representatives of the several villages gather in the shade of this tree since one of the open men's houses could not accommodate all of them. The senior of the nuclear kinship groups Mpia
(No. 14), Nsambi (No. 15), and Liengo (No. 16) has his house on this spot which is situated on the border of the territory belonging to these three groups. The elder of Mpia, however, is the messenger for the hamlet of Boyeke; he may of course be identical with the "elder on the engangala."

614 Cohesion within the third settlement community was also 621 so strong that it employs only one messenger. The kinship sub-group Nsambɔ́sɔ́lɔ́ which is concentrated in this hamlet is said to consist of the descendants of an illegitimate child of the daughter of the village founder (see Diagram 1). As is the case in many [782] other villages, it is therefore entrusted with the office of the [624] botɛ́ni, who carries out the sacrifice of human beings and animals on the proper occasions.

The three communities just described are relatively 614 homogeneous groups; the three following ones are quite hetero-
621 geneous. The two groups of hamlet IV belong to the kinship sub-
624 groups Iyolo and Mbo. In contrast to the kinship subgroups Lovendo
202 and Besilo, they regard themselves as sufficiently different from 614 621 624 202 each other to employ their own messengers. When the messenger of settlement II arrives here, he first calls on the messenger of the nuclear kinship group Bosɔ́bɛ́ (No. 19) and then to Impínga (No. 26). The messenger from Bosɔ́bɛ́ calls on his relatives in settlement VI, who are the nuclear kinship group Mbelo-Mmuna (No. 22), while the messenger from Impínga-Ndongɔ̃ formerly had to call on the group Bommambo which is now extinct.

Settlement V consisted of three different groups. Bolíma, the group of the father, had its own messenger; however, he only received the messages without having to pass them on, which is also the case with all these last groups of the village. Both neighbors had their own messenger. The messenger from settlement I called on the nuclear kinship group Bolesangi, his relatives; the messenger from settlement III went to his relatives of the nuclear kinship group Ituli.

There were also two messengers in the last hamlet, but reports on this subject are insufficient since the nuclear kinship group Bommambo has been extinct for a long time.

178 614 621 535 [161] All the settlements just mentioned have a common characteristic: formerly, at important dance festivals, their young men performed together in one joint corps de ballet. The population was decimated as a result of the rigors of [201] the occupation period and also as a result of the population movement into the cities. Consequently, there are not enough young people any more, and I with II, III with IV, and V with VI act together. Thus, in each case we find Ngelɛ́ and Nkoto united in one ballet. Although these groups have also been scattered [361] as a result of the new settlement pattern (next to the highway), the old organizational structure has been preserved, and the young people do not hesitate to walk the long distance to the practice field every day so they can dance in the old groupings.

621 624 622 All of Isangi, all three kinship groups, have one common village chief, the Nkúmũ, with an iyolo nsíka who gets the meetings started, and a village court with its judges. There are other groups which correspond to Isangi (31), but have more than one

---

31. See Müller, Fürstentum, pp. 73 ff., 76 ff., 133 f.

621 nkúmú. They, too, however, have only one man who opens a 624 meeting and one investigating judge. Only one of the nkúmú 622 has the function of judge. Consequently, we may say that even if the office is divided, the group still forms a unit as far as jurisdiction and political organization are concerned.

● 614 Among these groups we usually can observe a balanced system of distribution as far as titles and offices are concerned.
621 It may either be predominantly democratic, as in Isangi, so 622 that all groups may lay claim to titles and offices, or it may be 624 oligarchic, as in Mbanga, where all power is vested in the oldest group of sons. In most cases, oligarchical groups tend to disintegrate; the younger groups attempt to free themselves from the rule. Democratic villages usually have a greater degree of cohesion.

In Isangi the small kinship groups of Ndongó (Nos. 2-4), Ngonga (No. 5), and Boyeke (Nos. 14-18) formerly had the privilege of furnishing the nkúmú. This practice has been discarded, and the honor is now rotated among the six local groups of the village. Only the small kinship groups of the Bolíma, Besilo, and Njálóokuli are excluded.

The six settlement communities of Isangi and similar 621 groupings found in other villages are parts of a village which 614 in my opinion are best described by the term hamlet [Weiler].

These are units which are predominantly intentional in nature. In spite of their functional weakness, they have survived even in the new settlement although they may not dwell together in a block. As a result of reintegration, they have lost their function as conscription district for the dancing groups in Isangi (see p. 29), but even at the present time they still represent the most important grouping in Isangi; we were aware of it before identifying any of the kinship groups. It is expected that they will lose their importance if Isangi does not return to its original site. By nature less closely connected with the or-
[562] ganization of the village of their husbands, the women have become the point of departure for the new order of things (e.g., for dance groups) which fulfills the requirements of the new settlement conditions.

614 Each hamlet includes one or several message districts.
621 Even at the time of the old settlement pattern the messenger
624 system was determined by the hierarchical structure and not [202] at all by considerations of what was most practical (for example, the shortest route). Consequently this conservative institution of the conservative old men has not been affected at all by the relocation.

The villages are the communities of jurisdiction and of political life. Usually a nkúmú, presides over the meetings. If a village has several nkúmú, one of whom may be the judge or all may preside together, I have used the term "part of a village" [Dorfteil] for the district from which each nkúmú originates.

Those areas which have a special meeting place are here
361 referred to as a "province" [Gau]. The meeting place lies 621 within the territory of the oldest or second-oldest kinship group.
178 The practical importance of this institution for the entire province is minimal, but the two meeting places [202] which we discovered still constituted, until a short time ago, important social centers for the duplicate villages forming the administrative centers of the respective provinces. As a result of the relocation, the meeting places have now lost their function completely.

000 I hope that this paper has added new material to the discussion on the subject of ethno-sociological terminology, and that it will stimulate criticism and a new discussion of this important subject.

114
[218] The Nkundo [Nkundu], or Mongo, are an important ethnic group of the central basin of the Belgian Congo. They are patriarchal (1). I lived among their west-central tribes for 20 years.

614
● We call a clan, in the ethnic sense, the group of paternal blood relatives who have an autonomous territory in common. This resembles closely what Anglo-Saxon researchers like to call a "lineage" (2).

614
A Nkundo calls his own clan his wise, from the word ise which means "father." My wise thus includes:

1. My paternal grandfather and his brothers and sisters who are called nkoko (pl., bankoko), "grandfather, grandmother."
2. The sons of my male bankoko, including my own father, all of whom are my "fathers" (ise; pl., baise).

The sisters of my "fathers" are my "female fathers" (isomoto, composed of isé and bomoto, "woman").

3. The sons of my "fathers" are my older brothers (botomolo; pl., batomolo) and younger brothers (bokune; pl., bakune). The daughters of my "fathers" are my sisters (nkâna; pl., bankâna).

1. The rules and many details of the classificatory system of the Nkundo have already been set forth in Le Mariage des Nkundo by Father G. Hulstaert (Belgian Royal Colonial Institute, 1938).

2. The quotations in this article are from The Pattern of Hera Kinship, by J. F. Holleman (Capetown University Press, for Rhodes-Livingstone Institute, 1949).

601 614 The children of my "female fathers" do not belong to my clan.

4. Like my children, the children of my older and younger brothers are my "children" (bona; pl., bana). The Nkundo does not have any special terms for "son" and "daughter." He simply says "male child" and "female child."

5. The children of my "sons" are my grandchildren (bonkana; pl., bankana).

6. The children of these male grandchildren are my great grandchildren (bonkanola; pl., bankanola).

II. Bonyango

The mother's clan is called bonyango, from the word nyango, "mother," and includes:

1. The mother's father and his brothers, who are also nkoko.

2. Their daughters, including my own mother, who are "mothers" (nyango; pl., banyango). The brothers of my "mothers" are my "male mothers" (nyangompame; pl., ba-).

3. The sons and daughters of my "male mothers," who are thus of my generation in our sense but who, to the Nkundo, are my "children," since to them I am legally identified with my mother and therefore I am their "male mother." This explains [602] the unusual and privileged position which I hold in my mother's clan.

4. The children of my "children" are my "grandchildren." [219] [Table 1 appears here.] [220]

III. Bokanga and Banankana

601 602 A Nkundo has other blood relatives scattered among the clans who have married a woman of his own clan, be it a "female father," a sister, or a daughter. A Nkundo calls all the unrelated members of these clans bokanga. The related members, including children born to the women of his clan, he calls impersonally sisters' children, "children of a sister of the clan" (bonankana; pl.,

121 614 602 in its relations to another lineage as a whole" (Holleman, op. cit., p. 9). The author adds, "the unity of the lineage may be broken by a division into affines and cognatic, each with their distinctive terminology, in which the cognatic section is one 'generation' lower than the affinal section" (p. 5.).

121 614 602 601 Just as we speak of a mother society or a sister society, so the Nkundo can also consider an affinal clan as a moral person and speak of his mother's clan as of his mother, of a bokanga clan, of a bokilo clan. I do not think that the term bokanga or bokilo implies an idea of generation when it is applied to an individual, any more than does the French term "parent-in-law," or member of my family-in-law. The Nkundo would certainly not admit what the author cited here writes [221] [Table 2 appears here.] [222] about the Hera: "in inter-lineage relations, ... once the relationship between Ego and any cognatic relative is determined, all the cognates of the same lineage as that relative will bear the same degree of kinship as himself to Ego, regardless of the differences in generation . . . between themselves or as compared with Ego" (p. 5.).

The second rule would be that the clan which provides us a wife (bokilo clan of the Nkundo) is considered our "father," and thus the clan which receives a wife from our clan would be considered a "son." Moreover, among the Nkundo is understood: "We have given you our daughter as a wife, so you are our son." But also implied is: "We have enriched you by our marriage payment, and our children are your "fathers." These ideas, however, are not reflected in the terminology between affinals. Moreover, the fact that the Nkundo readily uses the term bokilo for his bokanga is significant.

Third rule: In lineages directly related to Ego's lineage, "the female line seems to be potentially one 'generation' lower than the agnatic male line" (p. 11). The author tells us that: "This duality is even revealed in agnatic relations . . . Ego calls his . . . father's sister either vatete (father's sister) or hanzwadzi (sister)." Thus, the women of directly related clans would be considered to belong to a lower generation than the men.

Bakanga Clans
All those undesignated = bakanga

[*frère = brother in French]

Bakilo Clans
All those undesignated = bakiló

w = wali (wife)

121 It must be stated that the tables of the bakanga clans pre-602 sented by the author do not reflect this rule, since all members 614 of these clans not related by blood, males as well as females, 601 are designated as vakwasha = children-in-law. In the bakilo clans the rule seems to be founded on the Hera idea (according to the interpretation of the author) that all the women of my wife's clan are my "wives," no matter what their generation or age. This rule is not applicable to the Nkundo either in ideas or terminology.

There is still the fourth rule which the author quoted here uses often but does not interpret in his tables where it is completely opposed to the second rule: the child is legally identified with its mother. According to the second rule, the child of my father's sister would be my grandchild, and at the same time, according to the fourth rule, it would be my "father."

For the Nkundo, the fourth rule explains how this child is my "father," while the child of my mother's brother is my "child."

One may thus conclude that two rules explain the details of the classificatory system of the Nkundo:

1. In clans which have given a wife to our clan, all the women who are legally younger sisters of this wife, exclusively, are "wives" of all the men, exclusively, who are legally younger brothers of the husband.

2. In clans which have received a wife from our clan, the children born of this wife are identified with their mother by the children of this wife's brothers.

614 121 and in general ethnological usage are units of a special type. Thus Lowie's and Thurnwald's views correspond to a large extent.

Murdock (27) clearly differentiates between a kinship group and a "lineage." In his view a lineage consists of a group of individuals who are able to trace their descent to a common ancestor, which for him in the majority of cases is only the unilateral "stem" [Stamm] of a large family, excluding those who have married into the group, but including the members who have married out.

Murdock's and Thurnwald's concepts of the kinship group are identical. On the other hand, Murdock differs in his definition of the clan (28).

Clan

● 618 614 121 Murdock regards the patrilineal clan as a local group which consists of the stem of a kinship group and which incorporates the wives of its members but excludes daughters who marry. As an example he mentioned the "groups" which in our society are connected by the same family name. If the group of persons bearing the birth-name "Wolf" in common functioned as a group of relatives, it would [199] be a Wolf kinship group, but those persons who actually call themselves "Wolf," i.e., the Messrs. Wolf with their wives, sons, unmarried sisters, and daughters, would constitute a Wolf clan (assuming, of course, that this group really functions). This concept of a clan is new. Even Murdock does not consider this definition very satisfactory and invites better suggestions. According to Murdock, the clan is a unit of eminent importance; terminologically it has not been possible so far to differentiate it from the kinship group. It is irrelevant in this connection whether the term clan is applicable to this

614 The units which we described in the first part of this study correspond neither to the definition of Thurnwald nor to that of Murdock as regards the term clan. Our groups differ from the clan as described by Thurnwald by their hierarchical structure over which functions of authority are distributed. An added factor is that Thurnwald in the Lehrbuch (29) wants to define the difference between clan and kinship group by size and by ascribing to the former the element of political power. The only kinship group of the Ekonda which possesses strong authority, however, is the smallest, the one of rank A. If we let ourselves be guided by the criterion of authority, we would have to regard the smallest group (rank A) as a clan. Using the criterion of size, however, we would have to regard one of the groups of ranks D or E as a clan. Hence this term is unsuitable.

For the above reasons I have used the term "kinship group" [Sippe] for the groups of all ranks. With respect to the E-groups one might even speak of a subtribe [Unterstamm], but it should be pointed out that as far as the Ekonda are concerned all the groups mentioned above, including the tribes [Stämme] are groups or relatives of the same type, i.e., are "kinship groups."

For the purpose of differentiating between the kinship groups of the various ranks I have used the terms:

among the Elángá beyond the Tshuapa. All of them are beyond the scope of this study. The Bombwanja are divided into Basuné and Bonkoso, and the Boeńdé are considered their bónankáná (sister's son).

Bombwanja were originally Mbólé, for certain words and idioms in their dialect are reminiscent of the Lombólé.

Let us briefly enumerate the other tribes -- "pure" Nkundó -- who form the subject of this study:

619
1. The Injóló, "sister's son" (bonankáná) of the Ntómbá and the Bolénge who live beyond the Boloko. They are divided into three groups [9] -- Engónjó, Wesé, and Ngombe, (1) each of which comprises a subdistrict [sous-chefferie] for administrative purposes. A small segment is to be found outside the area under discussion, between the Boloko and Coq. (2)

1. West of their territory are to be found the remains of a group of former inhabitants of the area, whom the present inhabitants call Tompoko (or Basékà Bofáka l'Eléké) but who are completely unknown to me.

2. The southern Injóló are often called Imoma.

2. The Boángí (and their subgroup, the Besombó), related to the Bokála of the Losanganya region. (3)

[114]
3. On the ethnographic map of the Belgian Congo prepared and published by Dr. J. Maes, the territory of the Boangi is marked with the name "Bokuala." There is no tribe or village by that name. Unless an insulting and humiliating nickname (bokwala, "slave") is involved, the name may result from an erroneous use of the name of the present chief of the Boangi, Bokwála.

101

3. The Ionda, related to the Bonyanga living north of the Tshuapa.

4. The Wǎngatá-Ntómbá, of whom one group is settled near Igende at the junction of the Tshuapa and the Momboyo, and another on the Jwalé. Other parts of this tribe may be found near Coquilhatville (district [chefferie] of the "Tumba"), near Bokote (Ike̱ngo̱ district), and at the middle section of the Luilaka, between Waka and Bonkoto (Nkundê̱ngo̱lo̱, or Wafanya and "Tumba"). (4)

> 4. At the present time it is impossible to determine the exact relationship between the Ntómbá and the Wǎngatá. In general the latter are treated as a subdivision of the Ntómbá, together with the Inganda and the Ike̱ngo̱. Moreover, we do not know yet whether these Ntómbá are related to other tribes bearing the same name which are frequently encountered (on the Lopori, in the vicinity of Lake Tumba, and Lake Leopold II, among the Bakutu, etc.), or whether these are no more than groups bearing the same name. It should be noted that on the map previously mentioned, the Wǎngatá are placed much too far north; actually they are all to be found south of the Ruki.

5. The Bakáala, who seem to be more or less related to the Wǎngatá.

6. The Bonkoso.

7. The three sister tribes of the Bongíli, the Bombomba, and the Lifumba (the Beloko are a subtribe of the latter). [10]

8. The village of Bomángola, wedged in among the Lifumda. This village contains no more than thirty taxpayers but since it belongs to the Nso̱ngó̱, the oldest of all Nkundó-Mó̱ngo̱ groups, it is considered as a separate district. (1)

> 1. Their primacy has always been recognized and respected by the Lifumba.

619 9. The Bongale. Three large villages belonging to this group are to be found in the territory under discussion. In order of their size they are: Bongale wǎ Botɔ́lɔ́ (among the Lifumba, between the Bonsɔ́mbɛ́, Lolɛ́ma and Saási rivers), Bongale wǎ Ilinga (among the Bakáalá, near Ikɛ́ngɛ́), and Bongale wǎ Bosongɔ́ (among the Bonkoso, [569] near Bempumba). The difference between their rules of exogamy and those of the other tribes confirms the view that the Bongale are not true Nkundɔ́. (2)

2. See Chapter V, Article III. There are several other small Bongale groups, but I do not know whether they are related to those mentioned above. Among them are those living near Bonyeka (Busira) among the Boángi (Bokála, Boɛ́njola). They may be descended from different ancestors who all bore the name Ngale. The same name may indicate an identical origin, but it may also be derived from different individuals whose names were the same. This statement is generally applicable.

The tribes living between the Jwalɛ́ and the Boloko, with whom the Bolɛ́ngɛ́ and the Ntɔ́mbá between the Congo and the Boloko are sometimes classified, are grouped under the general name of Ilángá by the Boángí, Injɔlɔ́, and Elángá. (3)

[114] 3. The Bokele tribe listed on the above-mentioned map does not exist. Could this error be due to an incorrect extension of the name of a Boloki village near Bokúma which is called Bokɛ́lɛ́?

The Nkundɔ́-Mɔngo came from the north or the northeast. (4)

[825] 4. The following note may be of interest: The stories and songs of the Nkundɔ́ indicate a

[825] recollection of an animal of the leopard family which they call bokonga. Their description of it corresponds to the lion. Some soldiers and other expatriates, who were also young people, shown representations of a lion immediately identified it with their bokonga.

The groups under discussion here lived for a time on the banks of the Luwo (Maringa) and the [11] upper Ikelemba, (1) then under pressure from other Móngo tribes, they crossed the Tshuapa-Ruki. They evicted the Ekonda and settled in their present location. This exodus must have taken place a fairly long time ago; it is impossible to determine the date and difficult to make any estimates. In any case it must have occurred 150 to 200 years ago.

241 These peoples are primarily farmers; they grow chiefly bananas, manioc, yams, colocasia [taro], sweet potatoes, sugar cane, and various vegetables and condiments. The food crops they grow, together with what they gather and the Elaeis palm trees provide them with a continuous and abundant food supply, as long as elephants do [231] not interfere. Their domestic animals include chickens, goats, and 224 dogs. (2) Hunting is a pleasant change of activity rather than an [173] 1. It appears that between the Ikelemba and its tributary the Losɛ́lifa, there is still a bonkom tree called w'āmenga (of bald heads) under which, according to tradition, the ancestors held their councils. Nearby there is a bosɛ́ɛ́ whose fruits never ripen.

[177] 2. Ducks have been introduced fairly recently, but they were known long before colonial times. They came from the south. Sheep have been introduced only in the last few decades, and they are found only in a few villages on the river banks in the lowlands.

582 wishing to commit myself on the reason for this custom, it is a fact that a Nkundó woman will refuse to marry a man who has not been circumcised. Consequently, all the natives want to undergo this operation. That is the reply given by the natives when we asked about the reason for circumcision. When we pushed the inquiry further, they added that the women abhor the deposits that form under the foreskin. I mention this explanation for what it's worth. Nevertheless, this may really be the reason that impels them.

In any case circumcision would seem to have no religious or initiatory significance.

3. Tattooing

Two kinds of tattoos exist among the Nkundó: purely ornamental tattoos and sexual tattoos. (2) The latter are to be found only on women. The [67] designs are located on portions of the body surrounding the sex organs and even on the outside of the latter.

● [619] 2. I will not discuss tribal tattoos because these do not seem to exist among the Nkundó. The reasons for tattooing vary from people to people and from group to group. It is for this reason that they are a distinctive mark. But that does not mean that such is their purpose. The distinctions apparent among the tattoos of various tribes are not an objective but a consequence, as are, for example, the variations among national costumes in Europe. Moreover, the contacts of our people in peace or war have extended by and large only to neighboring clans or tribes, who use the same type of ornamentation as they did. And in these encounters dialect differences serve as a much better means of identification.

Nkundu

593 × 152 With reference to signs of affection, grief at the time of death, etc., the observations made for parent-child relationships hold true here -- mutatis mutandis.

3. Various relatives

602 The Nkundo's affection extends toward all members of his family, that is, all those with whom he feels linked by blood and common origin. These relatives are much greater in number than in Europe, because Nkundǒ kinship includes many more generations. The intensity of affection decreases with the distance of the degree of kinship. But the Nkundǒ knows and feels that he belongs to a large family, and he remains attached to all its members. He can find a home with any of them. This accounts for the fact that in the centers, men from the same village will look for each other and consider each other "brothers." Actually, that is what they are, since in general each village consists of only a single kin group. ● [621]

Although here, as in the case of brothers and sisters, common interests play a part in maintaining bonds between family members, the feelings of affection are not based on selfish considerations. The latter only reinforce these feelings, which are truly innate among the Nkundǒ. Among the various relatives the strongest attachments are developed between grandparents and grandchildren, uncles and aunts and nephews and nieces, male cousins and female cousins, etc.

603 Among the Nkundǒ as among Europeans there is a very strong affection between grandparents and grandsons, even greater, one might say, than between parents and children (the expression is: bǒna [30] l'onkɛ́nɛ́, ndekɛ́ nd'ǒnkɛ́nɛ́). But the relationship degenerates into compliance and weakness on one side, and into disrespectful carelessness on the other.

604 A Nkundǒ loves his paternal uncles and aunts and treats them like "fathers," and his maternal uncles and aunts like "mothers." Naturally, his feelings toward them are not as affectionate as for his parents, but they are an extension of these in an attenuated form.

605 The same situation holds true for the bonds which link him to his cousins, whom he calls "brothers" and "sisters." The children of his paternal aunt are his "fathers," however.

583 431 end in his hand and offers the other to the husband, saying, "Take-it." The husband naturally refuses and extricates himself by means of a knife or a piece of copper. [149]

11) Boɛ́ngo w'ɛ̌yau, or "weeds." These are demanded by some clans because the husband's clan scoffs at them on account of the number of weeds and chaff they allow to grow in their village instead of keeping it clean. One or two rings are given.

12) Engumbá: known in some groups, such as the Bakáala, where it is the last one demanded. It is a boɛ́ngo of authority. (1) claimed by the patriarchs of the families belonging to the grouping from which the woman has come. Formerly, the amount went as high as 3 to 5 bakonga, depending on the number of families, groups of families, or clans related through marriage that were living in the [177] same village. Now the payment is made primarily in European currency, and the amount may be 50 francs, for example. This boɛ́ngo is later divided among the various kin groupings related to the wife's family.

Various male and female relatives of the woman ask for assorted small objects, such as a small knife (ifɛ́eka), a native razor (lotɛ́ɛ́), a pin for braiding hair (bosɔ́ngɔ́), a needle (nsongí), a necklace of blue beads (bisɛngɛ́la), etc.

Nowadays many other objects are also demanded: clothing, dishes, etc. Thus, one day on the occasion of a single bride-price payment, I heard demands for the following objects:

For the father, a pair of trousers and a jacket, because when the woman was a young child she soiled his clothing without troubling herself about the matter.

For the mother, a bed, because worries about her daughter often kept her from resting.

614 Thus we have five groups which are exogamous; marriage is forbidden within each group, but not with members of the other groups. The little genealogy above gives some idea of the antiquity of the line and of the distance which separates its present members from the founding ancestor of the tribe. It should be noted that each exogamous group is subdivided into several villages, clans, and families. The same limits appear to be set with respect to the maternal line; marriage with the descendants of brothers and sisters of the ancestress, wife of the ancestor of the exogamous grouping, is forbidden. (1)

> 1. Note that lonkâna relations are practiced within each of the five exogamous groups, but not between the descendants of the same ancestress, wife of one of the ancestors, and of her bibísa. See Chapter I, Article VII, 1.

In investigating this subject the family of the ancestress must be taken into account as well as the paternal line.

In order to be able to define an exogamous group precisely, it is therefore necessary to study not only several villages, but also various tribes. For a single group may be composed of several families who live far from each [248] other and have sometimes become attached to groupings of people who are only very distantly related or even complete strangers. In such a case therefore a single village may include several exogamous groups.

614 621 Such is the case of the Bóendé, descended from the ancestor Ilumbé yǎ Mpumo. From his first wife, Eámé, arose the Etóo groups, from his other wives, the Bongangá groups. They do not marry among themselves but are a good example of a complex composition.

The Etóo are dispersed in four villages:

1) Etóo of Lotólá
2) Etóo of Bakovó or Mbólanéne, both Basékâ Bombóngo
3) Etóo of Mbémbé or Basékâ Bofiíyolo
4) Etóo of Bosánjo or Basékâ Eóngo

614
621

The Bongangá are divided as follows:

1) Bongangá, in the narrow sense of the term (Baséká Inanó, B. Bolaká, B. Bongéngé, B. Bandúwá, B. Lokókómyá)

2) Bongangá of Bakoyó, or Bolíma

3) Bongangá of Mbómbé or Baséká Botúna

Thus Lotólá, Bakoyó, and Mbómbé each have an Etóo group and a Bongangá group. The Bongangá, in the narrow sense of the term, have in addition a "slave" group named Batsína, a part of which is located with the Bosánjo. A foreign clan is settled with the Etóo of Lotólá; they are the Bofalambóka, descendant of a man named Ekonda (Imbolo) and his sister who was married to Mbete, a slave from Bompángá (Wǎngatá) who was freed by his master.

Many villages have foreign groups living with them such as descendants of slaves (ekwála), or others (Ekonda, Bombwanja, groups related by marriage called likilo, mpámá or bowélé, and mbúsolá, (1) etc.). [249]

1. Mpámá or bowélé are any foreigners who were formerly invited by the group patriarch to remain with him in order to carry out certain tasks, especially metal-working. Mbúsolá is the term applied to a child born to a woman out of wedlock (Chapter I, Part 2, Article IV, 3). Such children are also called nkio y'ǎóme, "the husband's flying dogs," because they are not his own children but are attached to their mother's husband in the fashion of these animals, who attach themselves to trees when they sleep.

[848]

614
582

If we add the descendants of relatives who have married into other more or less remote groupings, the prohibition against marriage on account of kinship applies to a good many people. In accordance with the law of exogamy, such a kin group may be widely dispersed geographically, and it is understandable that it is not always easy to 624 customary manner, with a double clap. They are told by the nkumu to repeat the salutation, and having done so may be asked to do it a third time. They are then 576 given a few rods in payment. If the nkumu sees some member of his own ekopo coming to greet him, he gives him special honour by ordering him to lie flat on his back instead of merely sitting, and at the end he gives him a larger gift of rods than the others receive. In this way the nkumu may pay out a great many rods to those who thus render him homage. Ordinarily a man will receive five or six, but one 624 specially honoured may be given as many as twenty. From the beginning the nkumu has to pay heavily for his honours, and only a wealthy man can hope to attain them.

[556] For this reason a lawful successor, if not wealthy, may be glad to give up his rights to another more fortunate member of the ekopo. Homage having been paid, word is sent out that the nkumu is about to come forth, and crowds begin to gather. A coat [302] of red camwood powder mixed with oil is smeared over the nkumu, the brass plates are attached to his montolo, and he is attired in all his finery. The crowd outside dances, and when tired sits on the ground to await the rest of the ceremony. Inside, [533] the lokombi begins to play, the nyemba to sing, and the Batwa ntotii to praise the nkumu by uttering an ululating sound. Accompanied by Nsono, Bilepo, and the maomi, the nkumu himself begins to dance. The temporary protecting screen round the ipana is pulled down, and he is seen by all. After his dance he retires again and the crowd disperses.

When Nkema Akuke becomes nkumu he changes everything possible so as to [481] become different from other men. Thus he assumes a different gait, a sort of bow-legged waddle, a different tone of voice, and it seems that under this influence even his facial features undergo a change. Accompanied by his retinue, he visits the various villages where he has friends and relatives in order to greet them. This over, the musicians wish to take their departure and are paid for their services by the nkumu.

624 At the conclusion of these ceremonies the nkumu with his ekopo and the molembe negotiate concerning their obligations to one another. If the nkumu is the first of his 596 line, he and his ekopo are given land to cultivate, while succeeding nkumu simply take over the land originally accorded. The molembe call their nkumu their wife, and they 621 designate themselves husband. They thus reckon the relationship between molembe and ekopo to be that of husband and wife, and, as in an actual marriage, there must be an interchange of obligations performed in a spirit of harmony. Also, as in marriage a wife may be divorced, so an nkumu with his ekopo could be sent off to their home and the arrangement terminated. It not infrequently happened that as strangers the ekopo fell out with their hosts and if such a disagreement could not be righted they might be refunded the payments with which they had purchased their rights, and sent off home.

224 Among the reciprocal obligations of molembe and ekopo are included the sharing of certain animals and birds killed in the hunt, among which are the leopard and 624 elephant. All killed, whether male or female, must be divided. Of certain other animals, including the wild pig, antelope, and buffalo, if a female, no portion is given, 621 if a male, the required portion is presented. These reciprocal obligations are limited 596 strictly to the ekopo and molembe; if others outside of these groups wish to present the nkumu with meat to honour him or to curry favour, they may do so, but they are under no compulsion. If one of the contracting parties fails to fulfil its pledges in this matter 224 of giving part of the kill, or in anything else, the aggrieved party may call the council together. This consists not only of members of the molembe and ekopo, but of all 624 elders of the village or villages connected with this particular one. The party judged 596 in the wrong, whether ekopo or molembe, will be fined, the injured party receiving its 621 share, and both parties will be charged to live together harmoniously and observe their contracts.

The power of the nkumu was apparently limited, and did not supersede that of 624 the momene mokonda. When trials came up, the aggrieved party might go either to the momene mokonda or to the nkumu. If it was necessary to call the village elders together 695 about it, both these authorities were present at the hearing. First the young men of the group were allowed to give their verdict, then the old men, after that momene mokonda (or the molomi o ehe), and finally the nkumu was given the privilege of the last word. He would comment on the opinions of each of the judges, criticizing one young man, commending another, and then giving his own verdict, at which the group would assent by saying, ' Even so, grandfather '. The whole group of judges would then fix the fines, a double portion of which went to the nkumu.

The actual manual labour which an nkumu may do excludes anything endangering 624 life or limb, or requiring agility and speed. He may clear the bush for his gardens:
this is a man's work. He may take part in the building of his houses, but may do no high work, and, among the inland groups, it is the work of the Batwa to put the [563] roof on for him. The nkumu may also prepare pitfalls for catching game, but cannot engage in any other type of hunting or do any fishing. Digging a grave is prohibited, for, as we shall see, everything pertaining to death must be ignored by the nkumu.

Other rules affecting the daily life of the nkumu may be roughly divided into three: those affecting his person, those having to do with his food, and social regulations.

One of the great points of observance in the first class of regulations is the impor- 624
tance of the montolo. The nkumu must on no account be seen during daylight hours with an uncovered head. If he wishes relief from the cumbersome montolo he may 292 take it off in the darkness of his house and put on an ordinary hat made of skins, and when night falls he may walk where he will bareheaded if he so desires. The skin hat, known as louku, may be made from two animals only, in the case of an [824] nkumu, one being the nkulupa, a species of antelope with light-coloured hair, and the other the iyoko, an animal resembling a beaver. The skin of the nkulupa may be used by anyone, but the iyoko is reserved for the nkumu only with one exception. The skin of the iyoko may also be used for the carrying strap for infants known as nyamba, [854] which is worn over one shoulder in bandoleer fashion. For the nkumu the skin of the iyoko is limited to the informal hat, louku, and for making into the lokoto, a pouch used for carrying small objects and worn like a sporran. As a corollary to the importance of the montolo may be noted the importance attached to the head of the nkumu, which must never be seen uncovered in daylight.

The Bonginda nkumu never wash in the daytime, but may wash at night with hot 624 water. The inland nkumu never wash. Even the Bonginda nkumu never wash their heads, and no nkumu ever cuts his hair. If the nkumu becomes too greatly incon- 515 venienced, one of his wives may delouse his head, but only within the privacy of the [184] house, by the light that enters the rear opening.

61 another group. According to their relationship to others, groups 602 may be designated as:

brother, younger or older;
brother or half brother (descended from various wives of the polygynous ancestor);
[848] Illegitimate child of the sister which, legally, as the child of the oldest brother or of the father of his mother, belongs to the group of the mother's relatives;
child of a boy who together with his sister has moved to the unit of his brothers-in-law and has settled there permanently;
son of a sister, who for some reason has separated from his paternal relatives and has moved in with the group of his mother or of one of his grandmothers.

601 Present-day social relationships are influenced by this variety of kinship relations. The kinship terms which refer to the relationships of the genuine or assumed ancestors to each other are occasionally transferred to the groups.

●621 In this paper we shall describe the Isangi group (12) as an [101] example of hierarchical kinship structure. Isangi is a local group of the type described above (p. 1). Following the custom of the region, I shall refer to it as a "village." Until we have decided which terms are applicable to the various groups, I shall use the letters A to E for the individual ranks of the hierarchical structure. Within this system A shall stand for the smallest and E for the largest units (see Diagram 2).[1]

In addition to the three ranks of Group D in Isangi, there are others in the daughter villages (see Diagram 1). These may also include foreign groups, as, for example, the "Nkundó" group, Liimbu, in Wengí.

602 All the groups represented on the diagram (Diagram 2)
614 are known by their names to the adults of Isangi. In addition to ●621 their regular name, all these groups also have a "drum" name
[552] and an "honorary" name. Only the three Boyeke groups of rank
B have different drum names but no individual group names. The arrangement of groups as found on the diagram does not represent a genealogy. It is based simply on the characteristics and functions of the individual groups [190] which in each case are equal to each other on one rank. Thus, we have here an organizational diagram, not a genealogical table. [Diagrams 1 and 2 appear here.]

The people of Isangi are also well aware of the relationships between the individual groups, but they are not as clearly conscious of the system as it appears in our diagram. They are able to describe the kinship relations between the groups and they can point out which functions are assigned to the individual groups without, however, regarding the groups as equal to one another because they have like functions and without seeing them as part of a system as we do. Thus, our diagram represents a systematization which, by its very nature, does not wholly do justice to reality. Correspondingly, therefore, there is no satisfactory Ekonda social terminology.

[191] [Diagram 3 appears here.] Just as in nonscientific European usage, the terms lack sufficient precision. Furthermore, in principle the nature of the groups between rank A to E and of the still larger units is similar, and as a result all the terms are used almost indiscriminately for large and small units alike.

Usually, the word ikundɛ (literally, "lap") refers to small 601 units, approximately those of ranks A and B, but it is also used 621 for larger and large units if their relatively close degree of
614 kinship is to be stressed. Thus it approximately corresponds to the meaning of the word "family" as used in nonscientific language. The word ilongo refers both to what in European usage is described as the small family [Kleinfamilie] and also to groups of ranks A and B.

601 621 614 Bonsonga and etúká are terms used for kinship groups of ranks B, C, and D, but occasionally they may also refer to [192] the groups listed under A and, in addition, to the local groups which in size approximately correspond to the kinship units mentioned above. Etúká is the term used for the oil palm grove and for a certain kind of termite hill; apparently it is used for local groups more frequently than the term bonsonga.

[571] [595] Another term whose meaning varies is ekíndá. This word designates, first of all, a dance group, a corps de ballet, and also the social unit which sends such a joint dance troupe to dance festivals.

Eló also has strong local connotations. It is usually identical with what we call a village, but frequently units which are larger or smaller than a village are designated as eló. Very large groups, tribes and even larger units, are called bonanga.

614 As a criterion for placing the individual groups within a certain rank, one or several functions have been chosen in each case. The groups of the individual ranks are described below relative to their functions. On the subject of groups it should be added that in general they do not differ from each other in certain traits. All groups of all ranks are kinship units of patrilineal descent. They consider themselves descendants of one ancestor. No continuous and complete genealogy which can be traced back to the original ancestor is known. The genealogy of the entire group of the Bakonda is shown in Diagram 1.

In Isangi two of the ancestors of the groups of rank D are brothers, the third is the brother of their father. A D-group (Ngelé) includes, in addition, the descendants of an illegitimate child of the paternal sister of the ancestor. These offspring form the C-group, Nsambásálé.

There is a gap between this ancient genealogy and the known ancestors from the recent past. In contrast with that of the neighboring Bokété [Bokete] (see, for example, Boelaert, "Les Bongili"), the genealogical memory of the Ekonda is weak. [173] It does not reach back to the ancestor of the group of rank A. In this connection we must take into account the fact that a group

614 592 The exogamy rules of the Ekonda do not only refer to their own, agnatic group, but also to all cognate groups to whom kinship relations can still be traced back, i.e., a span of about five generations.

Groups of Rank E

614 621 It may be assumed that these groups always extend beyond the confines of a village. Those parts of a group who have settled next to each other have their communal meeting place, but even the dispersed fractions of the group may come there to consult. In former times probably only one such group had a nkúmú, a sacred prince who lived in the main village (e.g., Isangi), while the other villages were ruled by the senior. Once the title of nkúmú was also bestowed on persons from other villages, the importance of the E-groups almost completely disappeared. Also, in this category the local group plays a much greater role. Occasionally it even includes dependent [609] villages which have not yet been "paternalized," i.e., which are still regarded as alien. In this connection it should be mentioned that probably all larger local groups tend to reconstitute themselves into kinship groups by reinterpreting the genealogy to suit their purposes. It is certain that the "kinship relation" of many "kinship groups" has been created in this manner. We may dismiss the possibility that groups which are divided from one another by the rule of exogamy will invent a kinship relation so close that a previously possible marriage would be outlawed. Also, the combination of other important functions of the lower ranks resulting from the invention of a closer relationship would run counter to the tendency of progressive differentiation (17).

17. We know through statements of the natives that about one hundred years ago the exogamy limit was lowered to the present level. Before that time only the Lonkûsa was permitted among the Ngele, Nkoto, and Bolfima.

614 621 In general one may assume that local groups will postulate only that kind of kinship relationship which does not necessitate a substantial functional reintegration. For this reason, units above the exogamy limit will easily tend to construe a genealogy which "proves" a kinship relationship. Groups of that type are functionally weak. One can observe processes of this kind both among the group of the Bakonda and among the neighboring E-group, Lonyanyanga. The institution of the nkúmú (see above, p. 14) also appears to have a leveling influence. The privileges of the oldest (and free) group diminish in importance and fall behind the office of nkúmú. The new office is also open to younger and dependent groups.

Sociological Terminology for Kinship Groups

128 Before dealing with the units which are to be regarded as settlement groups, we shall compare the kinship groups of the Ekonda with the sociological ideal types. Keeping in mind the authors mentioned at the beginning, I shall now discuss the various terms used for groups which are applicable to conditions found among the Ekonda. [196]

Family

121 596 The small family is of no importance in the organizational system of the Ekonda. Nevertheless it is very important as the smallest unit of economic life. Each small family is potentially polygynous, but monogynous marriages are more numerous at the present time, especially among the younger generation. In view of this difference between potential and practiced polygyny, it seems advisable to follow Thurnwald in classing the polygamous forms together with the small family and to differentiate its nuclear families (18). In my opinion this approach seems to correspond more closely to its functional importance than Murdock's view, according to which the polygamous family

114 tion between the two terms appeas to me to be very useful, and this seems particularly true if we accept the first definition of clan given by Thurnwald and regard the second as completely irrelevant for our present purposes.

It is true that our A-group lives in a certain district
614 which it claims for itself as its own "province," but it is never-
621 theless difficult to describe this district as a politically sovereign community. A political nature could rather be attributed to those groups which, up to now, we have not described at all, i.e., the settlement communities. Proceeding further, the A-group is integrated into the B-group, the B-group into the C-group, thus forming an endless chain; among those tribes who have a greater degree of genealogical consciousness than the Ekonda -- for example, the neighboring Bongili (25) -- the hierarchy of groups ends with mankind, the hierarchy of ancestors with God.

25. Boelaert, "Les Bongili."

Thurnwald emphasizes this ranked structure, especially 121 in discussing the kinship group. Kirchhoff, however, fails to 614 deal with the problem of the kinship group in a manner which would be of value to us in differentiating between kinship group and clan. Dealing with the organizational structure of the peoples he discussed, he naturally was more interested in defining the border between large family and kinship group. Lowie (26) only discusses the kinship group, "sib," calling it the "'clan' of British anthropologists", (p. 105) or "clans," if patrilineal, and "gentes," if matrilineal, "of most American anthropologists." The "ad infinitum" (p. 106) is also stressed by him in relation to the kinship group. Lowie also admits the possibility of subdivision with respect to his "sib," and consequently he even includes in the kinship group such forms as the "moieties," which according to Thurnwald's definition are still part of it, but which in his view

Local Organization

364 The second diagram[1] shows the settlement pattern of the 621 Isangi group in its old settlement area up to 1949. At this time
178 Isangi was relocated near the highway. Only two of the nuclear kinship groups of Isangi can lay claim to territory reaching far enough toward the east as to extend beyond the new highway. Thus, the resettlement process has led to a complete change of the settlement pattern. However, the functions of the settlement communities have not yet been adapted to the new settlement. At present the inhabitants are still so engaged in speculation about the possibility of a return to their own old territory that they have not yet reformed their village organization.

621 We observe that the village is divided into six settlement
614 communities (30), each of which consists only of the members of one of the two kinship groups of Isangi. [200] We find that only the group of the father, which formerly was a kinship group in its own right, is attached to one settlement community of the kinship group Ngelé. Incidentally, we might point out that the names of the two kinship groups, Ngelé and Nkoto, mean "down the river" and "up the river." The older group is called "down the river" since in ngelé the river is large and wide. We come across this honorary term for the older group in some other villages although there is not always an "up-river" group. No corresponding settlement pattern can be found.

614 The degree of cohesion among the constituent kinship 621 groups in settlement community I is so strong that the entire 202 community has a communal bokendi, a communal messenger.

30. See Diagram 3.

[1] [page 7, category 116.—Analyst]

614 It is the task of the messengers to transmit all important mes-
● 621 sages to the other groups in accordance with a precise plan;
202 this is particularly true regarding the invitations to the meetings
624 of the village council with the nkúmú. At the same time they inform the other groups as to the program of the meeting. The first messenger calls on the messenger of the other community; the old men are gathered at the latter's house in order to receive and to discuss the message. The messenger of this community, in turn, departs for the next in line. As a result of this practice the messenger and his home became one of the centers of social life.

621 The same uniformity is found in community II. Here
614 we can also see the engangala, the meeting place of the village
361 Isangi and of its branch villages. The meeting place is an open 623 space in which stands a short tree with a broad crown. The representatives of the several villages gather in the shade of this tree since one of the open men's houses could not accommodate all of them. The senior of the nuclear kinship groups Mpia (No. 14), Nsambi (No. 15), and Liengo (No. 16) has his house on this spot which is situated on the border of the territory belonging to these three groups. The elder of Mpia, however, is the messenger for the hamlet of Boyeke; he may of course be identical with the "elder on the engangala."

614 Cohesion within the third settlement community was also 621 so strong that it employs only one messenger. The kinship subgroup Nsambóafílé which is concentrated in this hamlet is said to consist of the descendants of an illegitimate child of the daughter of the village founder (see Diagram 1). As is the case in many [782] other villages, it is therefore entrusted with the office of the [624] bosfai, who carries out the sacrifice of human beings and animals on the proper occasions.

614 The three communities just described are relatively 621 homogeneous groups; the three following ones are quite hetero-
624 geneous. The two groups of hamlet IV belong to the kinship sub-202 groups Iyolo and Mbo. In contrast to the kinship subgroups Lovendo and Besilo, they regard themselves as sufficiently different from

614 each other to employ their own messengers. When the messenger
621 of settlement II arrives here, he first calls on the messenger of 624 the nuclear kinship group Boaŝbé (No. 18) and then to Impfúga
202 (No. 26). The messenger from Boaŝbé calls on his relatives in settlement VI, who are the nuclear kinship group Mbelo-Mmuna (No. 22), while the messenger from Impfúga-ńsongõ formerly had to call on the group Bommambo which is now extinct.

Settlement V consisted of three different groups. Bolima, the group of the father, had its own messenger; however, he only received the messages without having to pass them on, which is also the case with all these last groups of the village. Both neighbors had their own messenger. The messenger from settlement I called on the nuclear kinship group Bolesangi, his relatives; the messenger from settlement III went to his relatives of the nuclear kinship group Iruli.

There were also two messengers in the last hamlet, but reports on this subject are insufficient since the nuclear kinship group Bommambo has been extinct for a long time.

178 All the settlements just mentioned have a common
614 characteristic: formerly, at important dance festivals, their 621 young men performed together in one joint corps de ballet. The 595 population was decimated as a result of the rigors of [201] the occupation period and also as a result of the population move-
[161] ment into the cities. Consequently, there are not enough young people any more, and I with II, III with IV, and V with VI act together. Thus, in each case we find Ngelé and Nkoto united in one ballet. Although these groups have also been scattered [561] as a result of the new settlement pattern (next to the highway), the old organizational structure has been preserved, and the young people do not hesitate to walk the long distance to the practice field every day so they can dance in the old groupings.

All of Isangi, all those kinship groups, have one common 621 village chief, the Nkúmú, with an iyolo nafka who gets the meet-626 ings started, and a village court with its judges. There are other 622 groups which correspond to Isangi (31), but have more than one

● 621 nkfimű. They, too, however, have only one man who opens a 624 meeting and one investigating judge. Only one of the nkfimű 622 has the function of judge. Consequently, we may say that even if the office is divided, the group still forms a unit as far as jurisdiction and political organization are concerned.

Among these groups we usually can observe a balanced
614 system of distribution as far as titles and offices are concerned.
621 It may either be predominantly democratic, as in Isangi, so 622 that all groups may lay claim to titles and offices, or it may be 624 oligarchic, as in Mbanga, where all power is vested in the oldest group of sons. In most cases, oligarchical groups tend to disintegrate; the younger groups attempt to free themselves from the rule. Democratic villages usually have a greater degree of cohesion.

In Isangi the small kinship groups of Ndongő (Nos. 2-4), Ngonga (No. 5), and Boyeke (Nos. 14-18) formerly had the privilege of furnishing the nkfimű. This practice has been discarded, and the honor is now rotated among the six local groups of the village. Only the small kinship groups of the Bolfma, Besilo, and Njflőokuli are excluded.

The six settlement communities of Isangi and similar 621 groupings found in other villages are parts of a village which 614 in my opinion are best described by the term hamlet [Weiler].

These are units which are predominantly intentional in nature. In spite of their functional weakness, they have survived even in the new settlement although they may not dwell together in a block. As a result of reintegration, they have lost their function as conscription district for the dancing groups in Isangi (see p. 28), but even at the present time they still represent the most important grouping in Isangi; we were aware of it before identifying any of the kinship groups. It is expected that they will lose their importance if Isangi does not return to its original site. By nature less closely connected with the organization [562] of the village of their husbands, the women have become the point of departure for the new order of things (e.g., for dance groups) which fulfills the requirements of the new settlement conditions.

614 Each hamlet includes one or several message districts.
621 Even at the time of the old settlement pattern the messenger
624 system was determined by the hierarchical structure and not [202] at all by considerations of what was most practical (for example, the shortest route). Consequently this conservative institution of the conservative old men has not been affected at all by the relocation.

The villages are the communities of jurisdiction and of political life. Usually a nkúmú, presides over the meetings. If a village has several nkúmú, one of whom may be the judge or all may preside together, I have used the term "part of a village" [Dorfteil] for the district from which each nkúmú originates.

Those areas which have a special meeting place are here
361 referred to as a "province" [Gau]. The meeting place lies 621 within the territory of the oldest or second-oldest kinship group.
178 The practical importance of this institution for the entire province is minimal, but the two meeting places [202] which we discovered still constituted, until a short time ago, important social centers for the duplicate villages forming the administrative centers of the respective provinces. As a result of the relocation, the meeting places have now lost their function completely.

000 I hope that this paper has added new material to the discussion on the subject of ethno-sociological terminology, and that it will stimulate criticism and a new discussion of this important subject.

224 As to the relations between the fetisher, the hunting fetish, and the individual hunter, we will ignore them, having been unable to obtain any information on this subject in these regions.

Throughout the region we visited, large-scale hunting is done communally. As a rule, all the men participate, including young men from the age of 15. [Ed., the text is not translated from the last paragraph, page 81, to the second paragraph, page 83.]

[83] The catch of the communal hunt is shared among all the families in the village, with the chief and the dignitaries having special rights.

224 ● 622 Individual hunting does not entail any distribution, except when a buffalo, leopard, or elephant is involved. [293] The tail of the buffalo goes to the native chief, who uses it as a fly-chaser and a badge of rank. [281] The skin of the leopard is reserved for the chief, who makes it into a skirt which he displays ostentatiously at important festivities and public dances. The trunk and tusks of the elephant go to the chief, while the bristles go in part to the hunters and [84] in part to the local dignitaries, who use them to make necklaces. [301]

It is fed with grass and other rubbish, which are not very dry so that a great deal of smoke will be produced. All the fish are turned over twice a day. After eight to ten days the operation is finished. The dried, smoked fish are carefully wrapped after being sorted and graded according to size. Part of the fish will make up the family reserve, and the rest will be used as trade goods. When the grid is almost empty, the men go up the river and start fishing again.

SM 226 It is difficult to realize the magnitude of this industry and the unbelievable quantities of fish caught by the natives during their sojourn in the region of the salt grass. We watched one of these miraculous hauls one day, organized through the kind cooperation of Mr. Molin. The river had been dammed for only one night, the natives went up it only 150 [97] meters, this in the middle of the dry season, and yet they brought back four large baskets full of fish.

Leftovers from the meals are ordinarily given to the women and children.

264 415 We did not find tables, spoons, or forks among any of the tribes we visited.

The food is put in small baskets of rattan or raffia splints, plaited in openwork and lined with leaves on the bottom. Sometimes the plate is made of wood or baked clay.

Fig. 82. Native Outdoor Kitchen, Ipanga-Batitu Tribe.

Among the Bateke-Banfumungu, we collected some earthenware plates which look a great deal like European soup plates, but are less symmetrical in shape and deeper. Among the Baboma-Wadia-Basete, on the other hand, the plates look more like our flat plates. Among the Ipanga-Yaelima, basketwork plates are chiefly used, while in the Bena Dibele-Kole region one finds the pottery plate again, a sort of broadly flared,

301 Among the peoples of Lake Leopold II, hair ornaments are rare. Hairpins seem to be unknown; combs are made of raffia splints. A woman prefers ornaments of metal, iron, brass, or copper, while the chiefs and great dignitaries like to wear belts, necklaces, bracelets, and trimmed with cowries. The necklace of solid brass is very popular. The heavier it is, the more it is liked. We saw women wearing necklaces weighing as much as 25 pounds. These necklaces are riveted around the necks of the favorite wives of great chiefs or wealthy dignitaries. In case of divorce or separation, the owner of the necklaces removes them without regard for the suffering or cries of the victim. The women seem to be in no way inconvenienced by these cumbersome ornaments. On rare instances they wrap cloth around them to keep them from rubbing against the collarbone. [183]

584 power to settle disputes. They claim their share of the remuneration from the ndonga. According to the saying -- in archaic language -- botɛ́ wǎ ndonga nd'â dombɛ́, "the power (literally, "the medicine") of the ndonga resides in the judges." Not that the judges themselves have the right or the power to intervene in matrimonial palavers. But they are that many additional witnesses. If the day comes when there is a dispute on the subject of the bride price, especially at the time of a divorce, the ndonga can call on them to help him refresh his memory and thus avoid difficulties. For it can easily happen that after several years the official witness has only a vague and approximate recollection of what was paid. If the judges do not receive anything at the time of payment, they will refuse to give their assistance at the critical moment. It is therefore an intelligent policy to acquiesce to their desires even though strictly speaking they can invoke no real prerogatives.

584
● 622 At the present time the colonial government, having established districts and named chiefs, the latter have had attributed to them the right to officially act as ndonga in matrimonial matters, or at least they have taken advantage of the powers given them and done so. In general [111] they summon the judges of the district at the same time, and the matter is entered after a fashion in the register of settlements. The chief's presence as a witness may have some value, since he can provide additional testimony and writes down the amount of the bride price. But his presence, on the other hand, has the disadvantage of involving him in matters which all in all are none of his business. We are not speaking here of cases in which he or some relatives of his are interested parties in the palaver. If he would be content to be a passive witness and enter the transactions that take place, the situation would be perfect.

184 It is probable that etymologically the word ndonga is derived from the verb root long, intransitive longam, "to be in order, arranged," transitive longy, "to arrange, make as it should be." In addition to the word ndonga, which is used west of the Luilaka, we find the word bokɔ́lo used among the Boángí and the Boóyá (as well as the Elíngá), and ntombi among the Injɔ́lɔ́. The latter term could be the same word as its homonym which means "spy" and is derived from the verb

583ˣ 431 One must be careful not to confuse this boengo with byiko byǎ nyang'ɛ́y'ɔ̌na, an expression frequently heard. The latter includes any payment to the mother and includes the goat and the nkando as well as the boɛ́ngo discussed above and others. The word used in this case is not byǐkɔ́, singular ǐkɔ́, "porcupine," but rather byiko, singular wiko, "price, value" and derived from the verb -ika, "to set a price."

3) Lokolɛ́: a brother or a cousin of the wife asks for a konga. He beats the gong (lokolɛ́) in order to make noise and thus force the husband to satisfy him. That is how this boɛ́ngo seems to have originated. In practice people simply demand a [147] present. The racket can sometimes last for quite a while. But the elders do not allow the gathering to be disrupted if the husband does not have precisely the gift that would give satisfaction.

4) Bakulá, or botúwá: the woman's brothers stick a piece of the trunk of a banana tree (botúwá) into the ground, so that young relatives of the husband may shoot arrows (bakulá) at it. These are then removed by young members of the wife's family who, at the present time, are sometimes given money -- 5 francs, for instance.

[283] [727] 5) Wambá: prisoner's rope, that is, a rope to which war prisoners were formerly tied, two by two (a system now imitated for prisoners of the colonial law enforcement agencies and administration). In the past the patriarch, or head of the family, demanded a konga or a knife as indemnity against the possibility that he or members of his family might be imprisoned as a result of a war caused by the woman [177] [692] being married. Nowadays the chiefs set up by the administration and given the rights of family heads by the European authority have also claimed rights to this boɛ́ngo whose significance, purpose, and even name have completely changed as a result. It is now called bonyogɔ́la w'ɔ̂nkonji, "the chief's chain." It is clear that this payment has become something which it was not meant to be.

6) Etáka: a heavy wooden fork, fastened to the neck. This is a present claimed by the mother, by one of the father's other wives, or by a wife of the woman's brother, against the possibility that they may have to undergo torture by means of the fork because of the women whose bride price is being paid. This could happen if she were

is that of the head of the family, European legislation has, through ignorance, completely abolished the rights of the native family head;
the wife is freed from all ties and is thus abandoned to licentiousness.
Through a legal fiction, clan law has gone over into the hands of the "recognized native courts of justice," which, however, have just as much to do with the clan court as a policeman with a father. The communization of trade, education, and the rearing of the young, as is demonstrated to us by Russia, would revolutionize our society far less than our installation of these so-called native courts of justice has done in the Congo. Education and correction have been replaced by punishment. Politics, which have begun to play such an all-important 602 role in our society, had /155/ almost no importance in Nkundo society.
613 The neighboring clans were all connected with each other through blood relationship, intermarriage, or friendship ties. Only when there was a struggle against a foreign and common enemy did politics have a role to fulfill. And then the same order of rank was observed among the clans as was already indicated for the members of a single clan.

Here also, biased or romantic products of our ideas about barbarism 177 have adapted these so-called intertribal wars to the need that we felt,
728 to civilize the natives at any cost. These wars were not to be com-622 pared with our European wars, in which a mass of people are slaughtered.
In the Congo, no sooner had wounded or dead fallen on both sides than the chiefs were already congregated to conclude a peace treaty.
Here again, we meant to respect the political organization of the natives by the creation of chieftainships and native chiefs, who were to form the political-administrative link between the native clans and the European higher administration. Such chiefs were totally unknown in native society. Together with the establishment of the native courts, the establishment of chieftainships gave the death blow to the actual social organization of the Nkundo-Mongo. The very fact that these institutions are territorial demonstrates clearly that here no ordinary shifting of power has taken place, but simply an elimination of the traditional power in favor of a new colonial power.

Indeed, where formerly the "customary rightful chief" was sought
177 out, even though it was sometimes only a formality, the new formula
622 of the "sectors" has relieved the higher administration from this care too. And it is only to be hoped that this new formula will at least do away with the legal fiction that the "chiefs" are actually "something native," so that they may be classified for once and for all in the 177 622 category of civil servants. In this manner they would fall under the written law and could be obliged to practice monogamy, whereas now nearly all of the "native chiefs" are precisely the maintainers and promoters of polygamy. If this had /156/ been enforced from the start, then polygamy, instead of spreading, would have virtually disappeared from the native society.

5. Splitting of the Clan

613 After all that has been said before, it must be rather apparent how an autonomous clan can split up and, thereby, form two autonomous clans.

When a clan has expanded too far, its leaders cross over the boundaries of blood relationship, and offenses against the law of exogamy occur. When such offenses are multiplied, further separation is gradually aimed at to make marriages possible. Such a situation between two parts of the same clan, who are striving for "legal autonomy," is called lonkana, a term that signifies that unlawful relations exist between the two. It generally occurs between member groups that have the same male ancestor, but not the same female ancestor—that is, they are issue from different wives of the same founder.

Another cause of splitting is the voluntary or obligatory withdrawal of one of the members. When he establishes himself outside, begets a sizeable progeny, and acquires a patrimony of his own, the relations with his own clan become less frequent; and the separated fraction gradually begins to settle smaller lawsuits, to maintain its own graveyard, to bury the umbilical cords of its children in its own territory, to take on its own name, and to refer to its own founder.

Often also at the source of this estrangement lies the refusal of a certain fraction of the clan to submit to the authority of the clan members.

6. Legal Dependents

613 614 608 Until now we have spoken only of the ethnic clan: of the members who belong to it through descent. They /157/ are the sole bearers of

614 each other to employ their own messengers. When the messenger
621 of settlement II arrives here, he first calls on the messenger of 624 the nuclear kinship group Bosɔ́bɛ́ (No. 19) and then to Impínga 202 (No. 26). The messenger from Bosɔ́bɛ́ calls on his relatives in settlement VI, who are the nuclear kinship group Mbelo-Mmuna
(No. 22), while the messenger from Impínga-Ndongɔ́ formerly had to call on the group Bommambo which is now extinct.

Settlement V consisted of three different groups. Bolíma, the group of the father, had its own messenger; however, he only received the messages without having to pass them on, which is also the case with all these last groups of the village. Both neighbors had their own messenger. The messenger from settlement I called on the nuclear kinship group Bolesangi, his relatives; the messenger from settlement III went to his relatives of the nuclear kinship group Ituli.

There were also two messengers in the last hamlet, but reports on this subject are insufficient since the nuclear kinship group Bommambo has been extinct for a long time.

178 All the settlements just mentioned have a common
614 characteristic: formerly, at important dance festivals, their 621 young men performed together in one joint corps de ballet. The 595 population was decimated as a result of the rigors of [201] the [161] occupation period and also as a result of the population movement into the cities. Consequently, there are not enough young people any more, and I with II, III with IV, and V with VI act together. Thus, in each case we find Ngelé and Nkoto united in one ballet. Although these groups have also been scattered [361] as a result of the new settlement pattern (next to the highway), the old organizational structure has been preserved, and the young people do not hesitate to walk the long distance to the practice field every day so they can dance in the old groupings.

621 All of Isangi, all three kinship groups, have one common 624 village chief, the Nkúmû, with an iyolo nsáka who gets the meet-622 ings started, and a village court with its judges. There are other groups which correspond to Isangi (31), but have more than one

---

31. See Müller, Fürstentum, pp. 73 ff., 76 ff., 133 f.

621 nkúmú. They, too, however, have only one man who opens a
624 meeting and one investigating judge. Only one of the nkúmú 622 has the function of judge. Consequently, we may say that even if the office is divided, the group still forms a unit as far as jurisdiction and political organization are concerned.

Among these groups we usually can observe a balanced
614 system of distribution as far as titles and offices are concerned.
621 It may either be predominantly democratic, as in Isangi, so 622 that all groups may lay claim to titles and offices, or it may be 624 oligarchic, as in Mbanga, where all power is vested in the oldest group of sons. In most cases, oligarchical groups tend to disintegrate; the younger groups attempt to free themselves from the rule. Democratic villages usually have a greater degree of cohesion.

In Isangi the small kinship groups of Ndongó (Nos. 2-4), Ngonga (No. 5), and Boyeke (Nos. 14-18) formerly had the privilege of furnishing the nkúmú. This practice has been discarded, and the honor is now rotated among the six local groups of the village. Only the small kinship groups of the Bolíma, Besilo, and Njúmokuli are excluded.

The six settlement communities of Isangi and similar
614 in my opinion are best described by the term hamlet [Weiler].

These are units which are predominantly intentional in nature. In spite of their functional weakness, they have survived even in the new settlement although they may not dwell together in a block. As a result of reintegration, they have lost their function as conscription district for the dancing groups in Isangi (see p. 23), but even at the present time they still represent the most important grouping in Isangi; we were aware of it before identifying any of the kinship groups. It is expected that they will lose their importance if Isangi does not return to its original site. By nature less closely connected with the or-[622] ganization of the village of their husbands, the women have become the point of departure for the new order of things (e.g., for dance groups) which fulfills the requirements of the new settlement conditions.

624 781 513 An nkumu can never walk alone, but must always be accompanied by others, and on no occasion whatsoever may he run. Even though he never washes, if he is out in the rain and sees everybody else hurrying for shelter, he will not quicken his pace. His movements must be slow and deliberate. The nkumu never sleeps alone; waking and sleeping he is attended by someone. But apart from this he is free to go where he wishes. 514 516 The nkumu is not indiscriminate, as others may be, in his private habits, but must use his own latrine at all times, and if travelling must have his own latrine in each place where he stays. The inland nkumu frequently take advantage of this custom by hiding their accumulated brass rods at the bottom of a freshly dug latrine. Such hidden wealth will be acquired by an inheritor at the decease of the nkumu.

In speaking of himself the nkumu never refers to himself by his title but always by his own name.

624 392 562 565 572 The couch upon which the nkumu sits or reclines during the daytime may not be shared indiscriminately with others, but those permitted to sit upon it at the same time as the nkumu are nsami, women, and Batwa. The reservation of this couch for the use of the nkumu is not surprising, but the exceptions are. One explanation given was that women and Batwa are not bato ba ase, persons in particular; they do not count for anything in the social life of the community; they are not really 'people'. Another explanation was that they do not pay fines, this being tantamount to saying that they are exempt from laws and therefore cannot break laws even by doing what would be for others an illegal act. The stool of the nkumu, however, has closer restrictions in the manner of its use. Besides the nkumu only two others may sit upon it, Nsese and Mponge. It is always carried by one of his wives, though not necessarily by any special one.

624 262 763 264 The restrictions concerning the food of the nkumu are many. He may eat food only in his own house, or, if on a journey, in one given over for his use. He may not enter another house to partake of food even if invited to do so. Likewise the nkumu may not eat in the forest, or eat or drink anywhere along the road when on a journey, but must wait until he arrives at a village and has a house at his disposal in order to partake of food and drink. He never 'sleeps with hunger'; even if a wife or child should die causing him great sorrow he must partake of food before going to sleep. The Bongindu nkumu must never go into mourning, and death must be ignored by them, but the inland nkumu are permitted to mourn. All food carried to an nkumu must be covered, this rule even applying to water. Food must not be placed in a basket with high sides (ekoko), but in a shallow one (enyelo), and no food that has been kept overnight in a pot may be eaten by him: swelling of the abdomen will result. Various foods are taboo, among these all fast-moving snakes, though slow-moving ones may be eaten; light-coloured palm-nuts may not be eaten, and a variety of yam known as nsaliki is shunned, for it is with the tough stems of the nsaliki that the dying body of the nkumu will be bound to ensure the sitting posture necessary for burial.

624 623 628 Among regulations roughly classed as social, we have already covered several in references above, and have referred to the nkumu in council. It may be added here that he is expected to agree with the majority of the councillors and not fall out with them. The rules affecting the court of the nkumu are accompanied by severe penalties. There must not be any fighting; if anger is aroused to the point of blows the antagonists

and of the other large units. Since no members of the group [672] are considered capable of conducting affairs, all the legal transactions which they undertake are treated as though they had been sanctioned by the patriarch. To a large extent the members of the group may represent one another. In the absence of the elder, a younger member may act as the representative of the ● [623] group at council meetings. When the senior member dies, his function will be taken over by the next oldest member of the group.

An A-group will split up only through internal conflicts
614 which cannot be bridged or through a large population increase.
602 The newly-formed A-groups continue to maintain a close relationship which, at first, is much closer than among the B-groups whose A-groups have split much earlier. In the higher ranks cohesion after the split diminishes only gradually; thus many gradations develop in the feeling of cohesion. These gradations could not be even approximately reproduced in a diagram with any degree of exactitude. There is no formula by which the split takes place, as there is, for example, among the Tallensi (13)

13. Fortes, The Dynamics of Clanship, p. 34 f.

where it is determined by a certain number of generations.
614 Theoretically the A-groups are "eternal." The A-groups are 596 subdivided into small families. Within the polygynous families
592 nuclear families [Familienkerne] (14) have a semi-independent position economically. Each wife has her own house. A husband's wives and the wives of his sons have their houses within the same homestead. As the master of the homestead, the father has an open shelter where the men spend their time and [768] hold their meetings. Upon the death of the master of the

614 It is the task of the messengers to transmit all important mes-
621 sages to the other groups in accordance with a precise plan;
202 this is particularly true regarding the invitations to the meetings 624 of the village council with the nkúmú. At the same time they inform the other groups as to the program of the meeting. The first messenger calls on the messenger of the other community;
the old men are gathered at the latter's house in order to receive and to discuss the message. The messenger of this community, in turn, departs for the next in line. As a result of this practice the messenger and his home became one of the centers of social life.

621 The same uniformity is found in community II. Here
614 we can also see the engangala, the meeting place of the village
361 Isangi and of its branch villages. The meeting place is an open 623 space in which stands a short tree with a broad crown. The representatives of the several villages gather in the shade of this tree since one of the open men's houses could not accommodate all of them. The senior of the nuclear kinship groups Mpia
(No. 14), Nsambi (No. 15), and Liengo (No. 16) has his house on this spot which is situated on the border of the territory belonging to these three groups. The elder of Mpia, however, is the messenger for the hamlet of Boyeke; he may of course be identical with the "elder on the engangala."

614 Cohesion within the third settlement community was also 621 so strong that it employs only one messenger. The kinship sub-group Nsambdafili which is concentrated in this hamlet is said to consist of the descendants of an illegitimate child of the daughter of the village founder (see Diagram 1). As is the case in many [782 other villages, it is therefore entrusted with the office of the 624] bosáai, who carries out the sacrifice of human beings and animals on the proper occasions.

614 The three communities just described are relatively 621 homogeneous groups; the three following ones are quite hetero-
624 geneous. The two groups of hamlet IV belong to the kinship sub-202 groups Iyolo and Mbo. In contrast to the kinship subgroups Lovendo and Basilo, they regard themselves as sufficiently different from

THE NKUMU OF THE TUMBA

RITUAL CHIEFTAINSHIP ON THE MIDDLE CONGO

H. D. BROWN

10| THE tribes living round Lake Tumba, a lake some thirty-five miles long by twelve wide lying north of Lake Leopold II (approximately 0° 50′ south latitude, [133] and 18° east longitude) and draining into the Congo River at the confluence of the Ubangi, lack cohesion and show a considerable variety of custom and language. But they are known collectively as Tumba, the Government adaptation of the Native term Ntomba. Most of them are found to the east of the lake, the whole group numbering perhaps little more than forty to fifty thousand at the present time, though [747] there is evidence that the last twenty years have seen a great decrease in population. European occupation of this area goes back barely fifty years, Protestant missions having been established for about the same length of time. The first mission post [77] was established at Ikoko on the north-east shore of the lake, one of the villages of a group known as Bonginda. In pursuing this investigation particular attention has been given to the practices of this group, but mention is occasionally made where considerable differences have been found elsewhere.

105 13 The Tumba are agricultural, hunting, and fishing people. Their country is flat and swampy with dense forests, and there are many watercourses flowing into Lake Tumba. There are occasional small, but swampy plains, and one such area, more open, with quite wide stretches of prairie, is a haunt of buffalo. The forests are fairly well supplied with game, and the swamps, streams, and lakes with fish. A heavy rainfall and no distinct dry season make agriculture reasonably easy and famine unknown. Every family has its plantation of manioc, the staple diet, which is supplemented by plantains and bananas. The people make their own tools, formerly smelting their own iron for this purpose, are fairly skilful at making dug-out canoes, engage in weaving raffia and making mats out of split cane, and are efficient at pottery production.

624 10| 178 The role of the nkumu in the socio-religious activities of the community is one of the most interesting features of Tumba life. As a result of European contact the ceremonies connected with the nkumu are rapidly disappearing, but it has been possible to collect considerable information from the older men and women among whom the details are still vividly remembered.[1] The following report refers to the period previous to European occupation and control, a time within the memory of a large number of people, but already sufficiently remote to become a matter of hearsay before the lapse of many more years.

696 [773] An understanding of the place of the nkumu among the Tumba requires a glance at the tribal organization. According to the people themselves, they migrated westward, and coming into these parts chose land for themselves. Among the several

[1] In My Children of the Forest, New York, 1924, pp. [illegible], Andrew F. Hensey has briefly outlined some of the items of interest observed among the nkumu of the district adjacent to that of the present study. These more detailed notes are, however, timely if a record is to be preserved that approaches to accuracy.

516 invading groups of kinsfolk there was always one who was considered as the family head, and this man could claim the title of [illegible], the owner of the land. Round this man the rest of the members of the family group clustered, and he had the general direction of their affairs. He could scarcely be termed a chief, having a paternal oversight rather than exercising any wide authority demanding organizing ability and political astuteness. The succession of [illegible] runs collaterally through younger brothers in the first place; hence if a first-born male happens to hold that position, the succession among his younger brothers is in the order of their birth. When these have all died the succession passes to the next generation. If all the males of a group die, it is possible for a daughter's son to leave his father's side in order to assume the position of [illegible] on his mother's side.

A [illegible] can delegate his duties as head to another member of the family, who is then termed [illegible], the husband of the settlement. For such a privilege payment is generally made to the [illegible]. Round these [illegible] and their immediate kinsmen others gathered, forming, it may be, another section of the same settlement, known then as an [illegible], or, if numerous, another settlement.[1]

624 The [illegible] (or [illegible]) hears and judges cases that come to him, aided [593] always by a group of elders, and directs the activities of the settlement. However, this does not entirely satisfy the Tumba; they want an nkumu also. The nkumu is chosen, not by the whole settlement, but by a single village, or it may be even one [illegible] of a village. If the villages of a settlement were without an nkumu it would generally, but not necessarily, be the [illegible] of the [illegible] which would lead off by seeking one out. The group desiring an nkumu are known as the [illegible], and they look about for a man of the same tribe but not of the same settlement or village, an outsider. He must be a man of some wealth, for actually he will buy his right of authority and pay heavily for it. If the man who is approached accepts, he is known from then on until his accession as Nkumu Abale, the term nkumu not being used until he is finally invested with the insignia of office, the [illegible], or hat of special design. Nkumu Abale's family is known as the [illegible], or [illegible]. This man, [556] once having accepted the invitation to become nkumu, sets about amassing wealth in the form of wives and brass rods. He may be years about it, but he does not thereby forfeit his right to the office, nor apparently worry those who extended the invitation. Should Nkumu Abale die before he is installed as nkumu, or should he wish to withdraw from the honour bestowed upon him, the succession passes to another member of his [illegible]. The succession would normally pass to the eldest male of the [illegible], [781] but many circumstances may intervene to give it to another member of the family. A dream dreamed by a male of the [illegible] to the effect that he should be the nkumu is sufficient to give him the right of succession over the eldest male. When asked [681] whether it was common to lie about such a dream having occurred, in order to gain the right of succession, those questioned received the suggestion with emphatic negatives, for this is no time to lie; any man so doing would be sure to die, and the fear of death would deter him from such practice.

[1] Where practical, the territorial chiefs set up by the Belgian Colonial Government are men chosen because of their right to be known as [illegible] or [illegible]. Often, however, the settlements are so small and lacking in cohesion that it has been necessary to set up chiefs arbitrarily over chiefdoms very much larger than were their own hereditary spheres of influence.

fear of death would deter him from such baseness. Another sign of the chosen 624 ● successor is some untoward experience, such, for example, as finding cowrie shells (worn by nkumu) in a trap in the forest or a net that had been put out to catch fish.

Nkumu Akulu, whether the first of his line or a man succeeding in the office, bears [293] the emblems of his rank. He wears an [illegible] (a branch of a special bush) stuck into his belt on the right side and hanging downwards. The special hat, [illegible], worn [292] by nkumu is not yet his to wear, but he wears an ordinary skin hat known as [illegible], which is the mark of any elder. This hat may be ornamented with feathers if so desired.

When Nkumu Akulu decides that he has acquired sufficient wealth to enable him properly to claim the right of being made an nkumu, he begins his preparatory arrangements. [302] [illegible], a mixture of charcoal with some sticky substance, is smeared over his body with plantain leaves. All ornamented clothing is discarded and a single cloth [292] woven from raffia, and known as [illegible], is worn. He refuses to sit on the benches usually used and instead sits on the bare earth. All this is explained as an attempt on the [516] part of the man about to be raised to the office of nkumu to be different from others, a man apart, separate, peculiar, not partaking in the ordinary interests and affairs of his fellow men.

Nkumu Akulu now leaves his own village accompanied by all his wives and [533 children, and also by a singer, [illegible], who is paid to sing his praises, and by several male Batwa (pygmies), up to half a dozen in number, known as [illegible] because of their 563 duty of blowing gourds and producing sounds which indicate praise of the great 534] man. This party makes the round of villages wherever relatives are found, and the announcement is made that Nkumu Akulu is about to become an nkumu. This 624 pilgrimage accomplished, a 'doctor' (nkanga) is visited by the aspirant to office, 741 who seeks by magic to discover whether it is the propitious time for the ceremony of installation. The whole company retires to the private enclosure at the rear of the 787 house belonging to the nkanga chosen, this being the place where he performs his wonders. The nkanga resorts to [illegible], that particular branch of magic which has to do with reasons for strange and unaccountable phenomena.[1] Nkumu Akulu now seeks some sign as confirmation of his determination to claim his office at this time.
Some native pepper may be wrapped in a leaf or merely covered by it, and left within sight of all, and upon being opened it may be found to have turned into salt, or perhaps it may be some earth that is thus turned to salt. Or a cock may be placed upon Nkumu Akulu's head and covered with a basket and thus left for some time. Upon removing the basket it may be discovered that an egg has been laid. All such tests, 624 if successful, will be regarded as indications that it really is time for Nkumu Akulu to assume the office of nkumu, but if the test fails he will usually go ahead with his plans anyhow, fearing the shame that would come to him should he go back to his home after having made the triumphant round of his relatives' houses. However, should he act thus, and he most certainly will, he knows that his days are numbered,

---

[1] If a man's fields do not produce and he cannot understand why, he will resort to [illegible]. If it is suspected, for example, that the trouble is caused by someone making 'medicine', an arrow shaft is put into a small hole in the ground, and as each name is mentioned, the arrow can be pulled out if the person is innocent, but remains stuck fast in the hole at the mention of the guilty name.

624 and that he may have no more than a month or perhaps a year in which to live and will surely die speedily.

The special objects attaching to the office of nkumu, among these the hat, mpoto, and stool, ebata, are at the same time subject to similar magical acts to determine whether they may be produced for the new nkumu's use. They are not present, being in the possession of the mulonde which will appoint him, but are mentioned by name. Apart from the mpoto, no further ceremony is required to identify these objects with their future owner.

[302] The msingo ended, the Nkomo Akolo smears black mbili all over his body again, 624 before the rites begin to determine which of his wives is to be known as Nsomi, 787 the one who will be closest to her husband throughout his days. For this, magic formulae (bienzalo, sing. enzalo) are used. All the wives sit round in a circle and the ekanga places some irritant such as ground pepper in the eyes of all the women. The wife whose eyes stream most and whose discomfort is also accompanied by a violent shaking of the body is known to be Nsomi. Here again, lying is believed to be out [827] of the question, for the shaking of the body is something that is supposed to be impossible of simulation, the real being easily distinguished by all from the false. Nsomi is now stripped of all clothing and her body smeared by the ekanga with yellow clay on one side, and with white on the other. A belt of leaves is put round her waist 624 and a small bit of cloth between the legs with each end attached to the belt. Near by 784 a gourd with 'medicine' in it has been standing ready for the next step in the ceremonies, and this is now smeared with white clay, a parrot's feather stuck in the neck, and handed to Nsomi, who receives it in one hand. Into the other hand is put a section of plantain stalk, into one end of which has been stuck a parrot's feather. A third feather is placed in her mouth so that she cannot speak, greet anyone, or eat. She is now tied with a cord which is held by one of the young men attending Nkomo Akolo. At this point of the procedure the ekanga states his price [79] for his work, which will be in the neighbourhood of one hundred brass rods, worth 435 to-day about fifty francs, but formerly double that amount. The future nkumu, accompanied as before, leaves for the village of the mulonde. Nsomi starts off at a tremendous pace, for she is now imbued with a sort of frenzied strength, and for this reason has been tied up and put in charge of a strong young man, otherwise she would be off so fast that no one could catch her, and would go into the forest, where she would live for days unseen.

624 In the village of the mulonde the party all sit in an elanga belonging to one of the elders. This is the place where the Tumba men really live—their houses are just [343] sleeping and cooking establishments, but the elanga, having a roof for shade and no walls, is the place where the men congregate and spend their leisure time. It is also 342 the site of the village smithy, which takes up one end. Here, then, Nkomo Akolo and his party sit for a day and a night, and neither he nor Nsomi may eat food or drink [562] wine during this period. Games are played by the mulonde—mock battles, dances, and [577] songs chiefly of battle, and before the first streaks of dawn appear the group in the elanga begins to march up and down the village singing.

At dawn the whole party, accompanied by a large crowd, make their way to a place in the bush where there is an elevation of some sort. Here Nkomo Akolo climbs up and takes his stand, accompanied by Nsomi. Now the mulonde choose the Bilaja

Now the molembe choose the Bilonga

● 624 [535] Ododo, a young woman of their own number, who will thereafter be known by this name. She is an official cymbalist and must always begin beating before others may join in. In reality the members of the molendo have decided beforehand who shall be chosen for this position, and the woman of their choice now takes her stand on the elevation together with Nkumu Akolo and his wife, Nkum.

624 282 The member of the molendo whose right it is by inheritance to place the [illegible] (see Plates) upon the head of the nkumu now comes forward with it. This hat, about twelve inches in height, is woven of raffia and cylindrical in shape, but the brim, instead of being at the base, encircles the top of the crown. It is usually decorated with a burnished brass plate attached to the front, and perhaps a second one behind, and in these modern days it is quite in style to hang a row of safety pins from the 'brim' or 'halo' encircling the crown. When the nkumu is the first of his line, the [illegible] is purchased by him, but in the case of succession it is that used by the deceased predecessor, and has been kept by the molendo until this time. It is his badge of office and sign of authority. The bringing out of the [illegible] is an occasion for 624 merriment. Nkumu Akolo calls for his [illegible], but the molendo tease and tantalize him and ask for money. The amount is a fixed sum, but Nkumu Akolo pays out at first but a few rods, is teased for more, and so on until he has provided the total amount, usually about one hundred. The member of the molendo whose duty it is to place the [illegible] on the head of the nkumu begins to tease the crowd. He chooses various names by which the nkumu might be called, everybody knowing all the time what his name must be. He asks the people, 'Shall we call him so-and-so?' 'We refuse', reply the people. 'Or so-and-so?' 'We refuse.' And each time names whereby nkumu are known are repeated. Finally the correct name is given, as, 'Shall we call him Nkumu Lokombo?' and the crowd roars its approval, 'Ooooo!' The [illegible] then being placed on Nkumu Akolo's head he now becomes Nkumu and leaps down among the crowd, who bear him off to their village with rejoicing. In the choice of names, the first nkumu in a village is known as Nkumu Lokombo. If there is another section of the village with an nkumu of its own, he must take another name, such as Nkumu Ijali Bolanga. Successors must always take the names of their predecessors whatever their own personal names may be. An nkumu chosen by a molendo [553] which is also the [illegible] molendo, the hereditary owner of the land, is known as Nkumu e Bitlad (Nkumu of the lands), for he occupies a more important position than his fellows, and is thus the support which holds up the whole group of nkumu chosen by other molendo.

624 392 The nkumu is borne off to his esaga, his residence, which in this case is temporary, to be replaced later by a permanent one. The esaga comprises the whole unit of buildings for the nkumu, including his own sleeping quarters, the houses for his wives, the ebanga where he spends the daylight hours, and a row of houses for his children. His ebanga and his own sleeping quarters are screened from the public gaze, making [351] a place known as ipaso. In the case of a new nkumu the screen is temporary, but when the permanent esaga is built, a permanent ipaso is made by planting umbrella trees ([illegible], sing. [illegible]) in a rectangular or circular fashion. Here, sheltered 624 from intrusion, the nkumu remains in retirement (andi) for a month.* While he remains

624 them, Nsese is a very prominent figure. Still arrayed as previously described, she sits outside the nsengo near the road on the special stool of the nkumu. Nobody may pass her with food, a humane law, considering that she must spend the day fasting. If anyone attempts to do so she catches the unlucky individual, helps herself to as much of his food as she wants, the victim meanwhile begging her to be merciful and leave him a small portion, and the booty is taken into the ipama. During this sentinel duty Nsese must still keep the parrot's feather in her mouth and maintain silence, so, in case she catches an unsuspecting bearer of food, the remonstrance and argument are all one-sided.[1] After the first day Nsese no longer sits outside the nsengo but goes from place to place in the village, choosing spots where people may least expect her, hoping thus to reap a bigger harvest for her pains. This is kept up for eight days, which comprise two Tumba 'weeks' of three days' work and one of rest. The rest-day is appropriately named bsime bo nsese after the duty of Nsese of sitting doing nothing day by day. The eight days of this ceremony over, Nsese lays aside her gourd and plantain stalk, which are placed at the foot of the first central supporting post of the ekongo on entering. She is given a fresh coating of chalk and three coloured [554] stripes are drawn the length of her back and down her arms. She still remains close to the nkumu.

[566] Various personalities are connected with the nsengo of an nkumu. The Bomb is a male slave, clothed in a skin breech cloth, whose duty it is to receive callers at the ipama before admitting them to the presence of the nkumu.

624 Mpanga is the name taken by the wife first married by the nkumu. From henceforth she no longer accompanies her husband, and their cohabitation ceases unless the 595 nkumu is willing to pay her each time the sum of one hundred rods. But the nkumu is obliged to eat all food she cooks for him even though they have a quarrel. Mpanga does not honour her husband with the special greeting accorded to nkumu, but greets her husband and all other nkumu as she would ordinary people.[2] The second wife of an nkumu must assume the name of Iyomba Angamba, but no importance attaches to her position.

629 Among the Tumba generally, apart from the Bonginda, a woman is chosen from the nsanda to bear the title Balamba Itima i Ekope (Balamba, the 'raison d'être' of 516 the ekope). She is, it would seem, a symbolical figure, a reminder that the ekope owes its existence to the nsanda of which this woman becomes the titular head. While the nkumu is still in seclusion the chosen woman is taken to the open space between the ipama and the row of sons' houses, known as the nsela. Here, in the presence of the assembled crowd she is praised by being addressed, 'Balamba Itima, bosso!' and the crowd exclaims, 'Bosso!'[3] Strips of leopard skin, about eighteen

[843] [1] It is interesting to note that there are some exceptions to those who may be caught and robbed by Nsese during her eight days of watching. No member of the nsanda may be thus treated, twins and their parents are exempt, and also all children born to the nkumu before he attains office, these being named nsese.

[595 545] [2] Besides Mpanga, a mother of twins is also exempt from according these special salutations, and among some groups the father of twins is also exempt.

[3] This ceremony gives husbands of any village, whether they are members of the nsanda or not, the opportunity to single out a favourite wife for special honour, for at this time any woman may be given the name of Balamba, though not with the significant complement of Itima i Ekope. The ceremony is similar, is performed at the nsela, but besides receiving the strips of leopard skin, she must be divested of all her clothing, a new loinlet and mpanga are then placed round her, and the strips of skin then attached to the new belt.

The first male child which was born to the nkumu before he acceded to the office is known as Iyomi Nkoi. If he has none, then the right to this name passes to the first male child to be born to his younger brothers. Any child born on the day that the nkumu is given his nsombo is also called Iyomi; if a male he will be Mole Iyomi, if a female, Mpamba Iyomi.[2] These children must not see the nkumu until they are old enough to know his name and greet him properly, and so they are taken to some village other than the one in which he has his residence. When such children are considered old enough to take up residence in the village of the nkumu it is an occasion for revelry, a big dance, ebale, is held, and there is a feast. The child, Iyomi, is brought to the village of the nkumu with rejoicing, and this is a signal for everybody desiring to do so to help himself to anything belonging to the nkumu. Goats and fowls may be killed and eaten, sugar-cane rooted up, bananas, plantains, and other crops growing near by seized for food. Because of this custom the nkumu will take precautions and send his livestock, at least, off to some other village in order not to lose more than he can help.[3] 852 624 [551]

The eyembe, the singer or singers, and the atoti, the praisers already mentioned, remain with the nkumu during his period of seclusion. Added to these is atembe lokombi, the bearer of the lokombi, a stringed instrument played with the fingers, similar to a bass viol in its general appearance. 624 533 534

Inside the ijumu during the seclusion of the nkumu, few people have the right of entrance, but as one enters the elongo where the daylight hours are spent, one finds the couch of the nkumu on the left and towards the rear. On the same side and towards the front are seated the atembe lokombi and the eyembe. Nome's couch is to the right of, and parallel to, that of the nkumu, but still to the left of the centre posts. To the right of her couch is the fire in the centre, and beyond the fire on the right side is a couch for the mamwi, likewise somewhat to the rear, with a space in front for the atoti. 624 342 352

The month's seclusion being completed, the nkumu prepares to buy the homage of the village. Nome gets rid of her decorative colours, and assumes ordinary attire, becoming like any other of the wives, and is ready to take up all the usual duties of a wife, whether in the garden or at the house. The people are called to come and render to the nkumu their homage and praise. The men come to the ijumu, are admitted to the presence of their nkumu and seat themselves on the bare earth with their legs wide apart and facing him. They then, without uttering a word, greet him in the 624 576

[1] The lombo is a belt which used to be worn by Tumba women encircling the buttocks, and this was used to attach their only garment, the ekoto among the [illegible], this being a short loin cloth, or an ampaga among other groups, this being a woven cloth only worn between the legs.

[2] When a new nkumu assumes office, one already in office will take this opportunity of getting more of his sons named Iyomi. He takes them to the outside of the new nkumu, and having placed a bracelet of cowrie shells on the right wrist, and sometimes one on the right ankle, asks the member of the nkumu whose right it is to give away the nsombo to name them now Bayomi (pl. of 'Iyomi'). This man will then take each a son, and presenting him to the people introduce him by giving him a name, and following with praise as, 'Oto Iyomi Lomen, botoo' and the crowd replies with the customary 'Boo'. [591]

[3] It is well to remember that not every individual bearing names associated with the institution of the nkumu is directly concerned with it. With the practice of 'resurrecting' dead relatives by naming new-born children after them, such names as these become widespread. [551]

624 customary manner, with a double clap. They are told by the nkumu to repeat the salutation, and having done so may be asked to do it a third time. They are then 576 given a few rods in payment. If the nkumu sees some member of his own ekopo coming to greet him, he gives him special honour by ordering him to lie flat on his back instead of merely sitting, and at the end he gives him a larger gift of rods than the others receive. In this way the nkumu may pay out a great many rods to those who thus render him homage. Ordinarily a man will receive five or six, but one
624 specially honoured may be given as many as twenty. From the beginning the nkumu
[556] has to pay heavily for his honours, and only a wealthy man can hope to attain them. For this reason a lawful successor, if not wealthy, may be glad to give up his rights to another more fortunate member of the ekopo. Homage having been paid, word is sent out that the nkumu is about to come forth, and crowds begin to gather. A coat
[302] of red camwood powder mixed with oil is smeared over the nkumu, the brass plates are attached to his montole, and he is attired in all his finery. The crowd outside [533] dances, and when tired sits on the ground to await the rest of the ceremony. Inside, the lokole begins to play, the eyembe to sing, and the Batwa [illegible] to praise the nkumu by uttering an ululating sound. Accompanied by Nsese, Bikpe, and the nsomi, the nkumu himself begins to dance. The temporary protecting screen round the ijemo is pulled down, and he is seen by all. After his dance he retires again and the crowd disperses.

When Nkoma Akala becomes nkumu he changes everything possible so as to [481] become different from other men. Thus he assumes a different gait, a sort of bow-legged waddle, a different tone of voice, and it seems that under this influence even his facial features undergo a change. Accompanied by his retinue, he visits the various villages where he has friends and relatives in order to greet them. This over, the musicians wish to take their departure and are paid for their services by the nkumu.

624 At the conclusion of these ceremonies the nkumu with his ekopo and the mokonde negotiate concerning their obligations to one another. If the nkumu is the first of his 596 line, he and his ekopo are given land to cultivate, while succeeding nkumu simply take over the land originally assigned. The mokonde call their nkumu their wife, and they 621 designate themselves husband. They thus reckon the relationship between mokonde and ekopo to be that of husband and wife, and, as in an actual marriage, there must be an interchange of obligations performed in a spirit of harmony. Also, as in marriage a wife may be divorced, so an nkumu with his ekopo could be sent off to their home and the arrangement terminated. It not infrequently happened that as strangers the ekopo fell out with their hosts and if such a disagreement could not be righted they might be refunded the payments with which they had purchased their rights, and sent off home.

224 Among the reciprocal obligations of mokonde and ekopo are included the sharing of certain animals and birds killed in the hunt, among which are the leopard and
624 elephant. All killed, whether male or female, must be divided. Of certain other
621 animals, including the wild pig, antelope, and buffalo, if a female, no portion is given, if a male, the required portion is presented. These reciprocal obligations are limited 546 strictly to the ekopo and mokonde; if others outside of these groups wish to present the nkumu with meat to honour him or to curry favour, they may do so, but they are under no compulsion. If one of the contracting parties fails to fulfil its pledges in this matter 224

of giving part of the kill, or in anything else, the aggrieved party may call the council 624 together. This consists not only of members of the mokonde and ekope, but of all 596 elders of the village or villages connected with this particular one. The party judged in the wrong, whether ekope or mokonde, will be fined, the injured party receiving its 621 share, and both parties will be charged to live together harmoniously and observe their contracts.

The power of the nkumu was apparently limited, and did not supersede that of 624 the nsomo mokonde. When trials came up, the aggrieved party might go either to the 695 nsomo mokonde or to the nkumu. If it was necessary to call the village elders together about it, both these authorities were present at the hearing. First the young men of the group were allowed to give their verdict, then the old men, after that nsomo mokonde (or the mokonzi a ele), and finally the nkumu was given the privilege of the last word. He would comment on the opinions of each of the judges, criticizing one young man, commending another, and then giving his own verdict, at which the group would assent by saying, 'Even so, grandfather'. The whole group of judges would then fix the fines, a double portion of which went to the nkumu.

The actual manual labour which an nkumu may do excludes anything endangering 624 life or limb, or requiring agility and speed. He may clear the bush for his gardens:
this is a man's work. He may take part in the building of his houses, but may do no high work, and, among the inland groups, it is the work of the Batwa to put the [563] roof on for him. The nkumu may also prepare pitfalls for catching game, but cannot engage in any other type of hunting or do any fishing. Digging a grave is prohibited, for, as we shall see, everything pertaining to death must be ignored by the nkumu.

Other rules affecting the daily life of the nkumu may be roughly divided into three:
those affecting his person, those having to do with his food, and social regulations.

One of the great points of observance in the first class of regulations is the impor- 624 tance of the mamba. The nkumu must on no account be seen during daylight hours 242 with an uncovered head. If he wishes relief from the cumbersome mamba he may take it off in the darkness of his house and put on an ordinary hat made of skins, and when night falls he may walk where he will bareheaded if he so desires. The skin hat, known as losio, may be made from two animals only, in the case of an [824] nkumu, one being the ekalaje, a species of antelope with light-coloured hair, and the other the jado, an animal resembling a beaver. The skin of the ekalaje may be used by anyone, but the jado is reserved for the nkumu only with one exception. The skin [859] of the jado may also be used for the carrying strap for infants known as quamba, which is worn over one shoulder in bandolier fashion. For the nkumu the skin of the jado is limited to the informal hat, losio, and for making into the ekete, a pouch used for carrying small objects and worn like a sporran. As a corollary to the importance of the mamba may be noted the importance attached to the head of the nkumu, which must never be seen uncovered in daylight.

The Bonginda nkumu never wash in the daytime, but may wash at night with hot 624 water. The inland nkumu never wash. Even the Bonginda nkumu never wash their 515 heads, and no nkumu ever cuts his hair. If the nkumu becomes too greatly incon- [184]
venienced, one of his wives may delouse his head, but only within the privacy of the house, by the light that enters the one opening.

624 [781] [513] An nkumu can never walk alone, but must always be accompanied by others, and on no occasion whatsoever may he run. Even though he never washes, if he is out in the rain and sees everybody else hurrying for shelter, he will not quicken his pace. His movements must be slow and deliberate. The nkumu never sleeps alone; waking and sleeping he is attended by someone. But apart from this he is free to go where he wishes. [514] [558] The nkumu is not indiscriminate, as others may be, in his private habits, but must use his own latrine at all times, and if travelling must have his own latrine in each place where he stays. The inland nkumu frequently take advantage of this custom by hiding their accumulated brass rods at the bottom of a freshly dug latrine. Such hidden wealth will be acquired by an inheritor at the decease of the nkumu.

In speaking of himself the nkumu never refers to himself by his title but always by his own name.

624 352 [562 565] [572] The couch upon which the nkumu sits or reclines during the daytime may not be shared indiscriminately with others, but those permitted to sit upon it at the same time as the nkumu are nkumu, women, and Batwa. The reservation of this couch for the use of the nkumu is not surprising, but the exceptions are. One explanation given was that women and Batwa are not bato ba ntu, persons in particular; they do not count for anything in the social life of the community; they are not really "people". Another explanation was that they do not pay fines, this being tantamount to saying that they are exempt from laws and therefore cannot break laws even by doing what would be for others an illegal act. The stool of the nkumu, however, has closer restrictions in the manner of its use. Besides the nkumu only two others may sit upon it, Nsese and Mpenge. It is always carried by one of his wives, though not necessarily by any special one.

624 262 [768] [824] The restrictions concerning the food of the nkumu are many. He may eat food only in his own house, or, if on a journey, in one given over for his use. He may not enter another house to partake of food even if invited to do so. Likewise the nkumu may not eat in the forest, or eat or drink anywhere along the road when on a journey, but must wait until he arrives at a village and has a house at his disposal in order to partake of food and drink. He never "sleeps with hunger"; even if a wife or child should die causing him great sorrow he must partake of food before going to sleep. The Bongindo nkumu must never go into mourning, and death must be ignored by them, but the inland nkumu are permitted to mourn. All food carried to an nkumu must be covered, this rule even applying to water. Food must not be placed in a basket with high sides (ekoko), but in a shallow one (nsanda), and no food that has been kept overnight in a pot may be eaten by him: swelling of the abdomen will result. Various foods are taboo, among these all fast-moving snakes, though slow-moving ones may be eaten; light-coloured palm-nuts may not be eaten, and a variety of yam known as nsoko is shunned, for it is with the tough stems of the nsoko that the dying body of the nkumu will be bound to ensure the sitting posture necessary for burial.

624 [623] [627] Among regulations roughly classed as social, we have already covered several in references above, and have referred to the nkumu in council. It may be added here that he is expected to agree with the majority of the councillors and not fall out with them. The rules affecting the anger of the nkumu are accompanied by severe penalties. There must not be any fighting; if anger is aroused to the point of blows the antagonists must go to the nsakala for their fight, this being the location of the houses belong- 624

ing to the sons of the nkumu. The penalty for breaking this law is a fine, and if no 689 fine were forthcoming hanging used to be the alternative. If a quarrel arises elsewhere and one party wishes to avoid fighting, he may retire to the nsaga and thus be safe. No trees in the nsaga may be climbed. There are, however, privileged classes exempt from all such rules, and these embrace a good many people. Thus, the mother [845] of twins, twins, Batwa, nsoni, and all members of the ntolende and elope are exempt from the laws of the nsaga. If any of these commit acts which are illegal for those [672] coming under the law, they are not held guilty, but their actions will not be condoned;
they will be considered breaches of good conduct, and will be dealt with informally; [622]
the parties will be quietly reprimanded, and advised to observe the proprieties of conduct. For outsiders breaking the laws of the nsaga, what corresponds to a warrant is necessary. It is necessary to catch the culprit in the act and hale him before the [694] nkumu. The nkumu himself cannot do this, nor can any of the elope; it must be done by one of the ntolende, and so if the nkumu sees someone infringing the law he will try to get one of the ntolende on the spot in a hurry in order to catch the offender.

In war,[7] it is the ntolwi e ele who is most active in preparations, but the nkumu 624 will accompany his party to battle, keeping well in the rear, and surrounded by good fighters. He does not wear his nsambo but puts on the informal hat. If an nkumu were 726 captured, he would never be tortured or killed as were other prisoners, unless he specifically sought such a fate. He could be ransomed, and his captors would [72] beseech him to let his people ransom him, but in many cases an nkumu would invite death rather than endure the shame of being yielded up as a prisoner of war.

An nkumu is always addressed by a double clap of the hands, and will not reply to 624 anyone rude enough to speak to him first. In answer to the clap he replies with a word of wisdom expressed in an aphorism or proverb. Such a reply, however, is 576 common to all elders, who have their favourite aphorisms ready for any who pay them special honour. Anything the nkumu says must be answered not by the customary ale baile (even so) which ordinary people use, but with the special word, biaga, which is reserved exclusively for replying to an nkumu, and means the same thing.

When the hour of death approaches, an nkumu is attended by his Batwa. It is a 624 rule that he must not die a natural death, and near the end, while he is still conscious and can still speak, all "free men" clear out and leave the Batwa to proceed to their 763 task of tying the nkumu very tightly with the fibrous yam vines known as nsaki. [563] Often this severe lashing in the sitting posture, known as iloma, is sufficient to finish the nkumu off, but sometimes the work is expedited by twisting his neck.[8] Then it is announced that he is dead, asikiso, this being in contradistinction to the customary phrase ankwa asaki used of the death of ordinary people. While the latter means

[7] Owing to the lack of tribal cohesion, warfare was not on any considerable scale. The method of warfare consisted in sending groups of young men to fight first, the elders only joining in when one side began to get the worst of the fray. Victors and vanquished in such fights were designated "husband" and "wife" respectively, and members of the one group were free to come and go in the villages of the other, and even to help themselves to food. In former times "husband" and "wife" were supposed to combine against their common foe.

[8] Besides nkumu, elderly and rich men, fathers and mothers of twins, and twins are bound in the dead or sitting posture, in contradistinction to the recumbent position which is the one used for ordinary people and slaves. [76]

625 literally that the deceased has hanged the heart, the former is used of a tree which leans over and falls from a great cut at its base.

On the announcement of the death, an expert drummer drums out the news.
629 There will be at least four drums of the type known as lokole, and a nsaye.[1] The four 716 drums are called by the names, Ejande, having the 'biggest voice', that is a deep 594 bass note, Mongye, having a higher note, Mongende, a high pitched note, and Mankoto, 202 having a very high penetrating note. To these four drums others are added; if the nkumu himself did not possess sufficient, they would be borrowed from the surrounding villages, and their notes matched with those of the first three drums, being beaten with them in their turn. Mankoto is beaten simultaneously with Ejande, giving a rhythmic tattoo. When the news of the death has been sent out on Ejande, the funeral drumming commences, as follows:

Mongende.	Botiangana w'Ambe lokolo,
Mongye.	Nsala ikita, otangoanko,
Ejande.	Tokund' ilonga mokoni' a nyama,
	Ombolokoko mosenge,
	Lobanga lolenda moolo,
	Bikoko bilenda loolo.
Nsaye.	Tokilake nkoi nkonge,
	Tokilake nkoi nkonge, &c.

The English and the interpretation are as follows:

Mongende. A scattering of Ambe, the snail. (The mother of twins, always called Ambe, here gives her name to the snail because of her prolific progeny, which, upon being introduced to the world, scatter, while the mother dies. So the death of the nkumu will cause a scattering of his many wives and children.)

Mongye. Feathers fall; pick them up. (That is to say, for your arrow shafts, for if you don't, and come back later, the wind will have scattered them and you won't find them. So while the nkumu was alive it was the time for his children to learn his teachings so that when palavers came after his death they would be well acquainted with his wisdom and know how to settle them.)

Ejande. We are burying the ilonga, husband of animals, You have just eaten nsenge, The chin looks up at the ridge pole, The jaw bones look up at the sky.
825 (The ilonga is an animal much prized for its fat meat; the nkumu always gets his share when it is killed, and the skin is made into carrying straps for infants, and into belts.
563 Batwa are prohibited the use of it for any purpose. It is therefore fitting to liken the nkumu to the ilonga. Nsenge (sing. losenge) is the equivalent of a snack. When a woman brings her cassava from the swamp where it has been soaking for several 364 days, her husband may be too hungry to wait the long hours required to cook it, 262 so to appease his hunger his wife takes a piece or two of the unprepared root, splits it in two, places salt between, wraps it in a lokembe leaf and roasts it in the hot ashes, where it is quickly cooked. So the nkumu just had time to eat a few nsenge; he didn't wait for the big cooking; his life was suddenly cut off.)

Nsaye. Don't pull out the leopard's eyelashes. (That is, while he is alive; now he is dead one can disregard his power.)

[1] A lokole is a slit-gong made from a hollowed log; the two notes are produced by striking the two lips of the slit. A nsaye is a hollowed log, open at one end, across which is stretched a [illegible] hide.

This funeral drumming is kept up for a long time, off and on for days, and is very stirring in its rhythm. While it is going on, the elders congregate in an ebanga. They fast and have nothing to do with their wives during this time. The elaja is mourning, and the notables may be likewise mourning, but for the others it is a time of rejoicing, and also of the relaxing of moral restraints. It is an occasion for dancing by both Batwa and 'freemen', the former regarding this as a time for special rejoicing, for the nkumu was their master and now he is dead they are no longer under restraint. They are free to take any of their master's goods and even to snatch blankets off the corpse. Men and women do not dance together; the women, taking some of their husbands' weapons, go off in one direction, and the men, arrayed in finery, dance at the other end of the village. 624 766 [533] [535] [563]

While the nkumu is still unburied and the drumming is going on, the notables look for a successor among the elaja. Often this man will, as we have seen, have already been designated. The notables, Batwa, and others in the village make up a party, and attired in war finery go off with their weapons as though after a man they wished to kill. As they go they sing:

Nkombe a'mpiike nkolo
We okik mo oko?
Hawk, thou hast destroyed the nest,
Where art thou going to sleep? [539]

Before catching the real successor they catch one or another in fun, singing this song. The man of course refuses to be nkumu, and the point of the song is that because of his refusal the elaja no longer fulfils its function of supplying the notables with nkumu and therefore ceases to be of any use to them. If this man by refusing thus destroys the family nest, where will they sleep?

Finally, after this fun, the real successor is caught, his face daubed with black, and the group sing: [307] [539]

Bolo lowe-a, losolo nkulo.
The cunning animal is hiding, reveal the tortoise.

Thus the new nkumu, like a cunning animal, is hiding, but when discovered, like the tortoise, he will not try to run away. The whole group conducts the new nkumu to the ifuma and sits all night guarding him. Earlier on the day of the actual interment of the dead nkumu, the new one is installed with ceremonies as already described.

On the day the nkumu dies his people scatter to other villages to look for slaves for the executions on the day of the burial. Slave-owners or husbands of unwanted wives ask quietly how much money there is for the man or woman, accept the agreed amount, and tell the buyers to go quietly and catch the slave or wife before anything is suspected and an escape is made. In this connexion we may note two classes of wives, bojiko and iboto. A third class, bosoko, acquired by the payment of a very small bride price, was not nearly so common formerly as at present and may be passed by. A bojiko was a slave wife acquired by capture in war or stolen. If loved by her husband she will take her place practically on an equality with the members of the village, but she may be killed, for she is her husband's possession, 'his money' is the native expression. An iboto is a wife for whom a very high bride price has been paid, obliging her family to give wives to the other family in perpetuity, supplying 766 567 762 582

766 crypt would then be lowered by men in order to leave it as a hollow chamber, and 764 the hole leading down to it filled in with earth.

For a month or two after the burial the festivities and orgies continued. Women 766 would be hanged to create some diversion, but those hanged were not eaten. Decapi-762 tations would continue. According to the informants only slaves brought in from a distance would have to be tied to prevent their escape. The slave members of the 567 household of the dead nkumu would await their turn stoically, content to die that [152] they might accompany their master in his journey to the land of spirits. This may be true but scarcely seems possible. Still another diversion in the funeral orgies was killing in the manner known as [illegible]. If some man who had a slave did not wish him to be hanged or beheaded, he might give him for this other method. As the weeks slipped by, such a one, his life having apparently been spared, would suppose that all was safe and that there was little chance of his being taken, and, thus emboldened, would, instead of keeping at a safe distance, join the crowd to watch a beheading. His death would be prearranged. At the moment of beheading a victim, someone would drive a spear into the unsuspecting man, the whole crowd then using spears and knives to stab and slash until he fell. Some might be tortured to death by being buried up to the neck and left thus exposed to the hot sun without food or water until death intervened, but this was not a common practice at such funerals.

768 The termination of the dead nkumu's affairs took place when the division of the inheritance was made, a long and complicated process.

178 Such were the old days before European penetration. The advent of the white 654 man half a century ago was the beginning of the end. The ceremonies had to be given up, though reluctantly. Occasionally now goats are beheaded in place of human victims, and many of the younger generation find that, even so, the sight is more than they can endure, and they seek refuge elsewhere. Nkumu are not anxious for the honours. They find little or no respect paid to them by the government officials and this is a distinct obstacle to their obtaining honour from their own people. When the nkumu resident in the village adjacent to the mission station died, one of the Natives was asked who would be next. The reply was that probably no one would appear as a successor. Asked why, he answered, 'There are too many trousers.' He meant that too many were adopting the ways of the white man to [643] make the inauguration of another nkumu a success. In his one useful function, that of judge, the paramount chief now takes his place, cases tried must be recorded by a clerk of the court, and fines paid into the treasury of the chieftaincy. With such a state of affairs the old ways drop into desuetude, and the younger generation grow up knowing less of the ways of their fathers as the years pass.

Local Organization

361 621 178 The second diagram[1a] shows the settlement pattern of the Isangi group in its old settlement area up to 1949. At this time Isangi was relocated near the highway. Only two of the nuclear kinship groups of Isangi can lay claim to territory reaching far enough toward the east as to extend beyond the new highway. Thus, the resettlement process has led to a complete change of the settlement pattern. However, the functions of the settlement communities have not yet been adapted to the new settlement. At present the inhabitants are still so engaged in speculation about the possibility of a return to their own old territory that they have not yet reformed their village organization.

621 614 We observe that the village is divided into six settlement communities (30), each of which consists only of the members of one of the two kinship groups of Isangi. (301) We find that only the group of the father, which formerly was a kinship group in its own right, is attached to one settlement community of the kinship group Ngele. Incidentally, we might point out that the names of the two kinship groups, Ngele and Nkoto, mean "down the river" and "up the river." The older group is called "down the river" since in ngele the river is large and wide. We come across this honorary term for the older group in some other villages although there is not always an "up-river" group. No corresponding settlement pattern can be found.

30. See Diagram 2.

[illegible] 621 [illegible] [illegible] The degree of cohesion among the constituent kinship groups in settlement community I is so strong that the entire community has a communal bokendi, a communal messenger.

621
102
624
It is the task of the messengers to transmit all important messages to the other groups in accordance with a precise plan; this is particularly true regarding the invitations to the meetings of the village council with the nkúmú. At the same time they inform the other groups as to the program of the meeting. The first messenger calls on the messenger of the other community; the old men are gathered at the latter's house in order to receive and to discuss the message. The messenger of this community, in turn, departs for the next in line. As a result of this practice the messenger and his home became one of the centers of social life.

621
361
623
The same uniformity is found in community II. Here we can also see the engangela, the meeting place of the village Isangi and of its branch villages. The meeting place is an open space in which stands a short tree with a broad crown. The representatives of the several villages gather in the shade of this tree since one of the open men's houses could not accommodate all of them. The senior of the nuclear kinship groups Mpia (No. 14), Nsambi (No. 15), and Liengo (No. 16) has his house on this spot which is situated on the border of the territory belonging to these three groups. The elder of Mpia, however, is the messenger for the hamlet of Boyeke; he may of course be identical with the "elder on the engangela."

624
Cohesion within the third settlement community was also so strong that it employs only one messenger. The kinship subgroup Nsambiafafé which is concentrated in this hamlet is said to consist of the descendants of an illegitimate child of the daughter of the village founder (see Diagram 1). As is the case in many [793]

[792]
[624]
other villages, it is therefore entrusted with the office of the bonfai, who carries out the sacrifice of human beings and animals on the proper occasions.

624
626
701
The three communities just described are relatively homogeneous groups; the three following ones are quite heterogeneous. The two groups of hamlet IV belong to the kinship subgroups Iyolo and Mbo. In contrast to the kinship subgroups Lovendo and Besilo, they regard themselves as sufficiently different from

614 each other to employ their own messengers. When the messenger
● 621 of settlement II arrives here, he first calls on the messenger of 624 the nuclear kinship group Boaóbé (No. 19) and then to Impónga
202 (No. 26). The messenger from Boaóbé calls on his relatives in settlement VI, who are the nuclear kinship group Mbelo-Mmuna (No. 22), while the messenger from Impónga-Ndongó formerly had to call on the group Bommambo which is now extinct.

Settlement V consisted of three different groups. Bolíma, the group of the father, had its own messenger; however, he only received the messages without having to pass them on, which is also the case with all these last groups of the village. Both neighbors had their own messenger. The messenger from settlement I called on the nuclear kinship group Bolesangi, his relatives; the messenger from settlement III went to his relatives of the nuclear kinship group Ituli.

There were also two messengers in the last hamlet, but reports on this subject are insufficient since the nuclear kinship group Bommambo has been extinct for a long time.

178 All the settlements just mentioned have a common
614 characteristic: formerly, at important dance festivals, their 621 young men performed together in one joint corps de ballet. The 595 population was decimated as a result of the rigors of [201] the occupation period and also as a result of the population move-
[161] ment into the cities. Consequently, there are not enough young people any more, and I with II, III with IV, and V with VI act together. Thus, in each case we find Ngelé and Nkoto united in one ballet. Although these groups have also been scattered
[361] as a result of the new settlement pattern (next to the highway), the old organizational structure has been preserved, and the young people do not hesitate to walk the long distance to the practice field every day so they can dance in the old groupings.

All of Isangi, all three kinship groups, have one common 621 village chief, the Nkúmú, with an iyolo nsáka who gets the meet-624 ings started, and a village court with its judges. There are other 622 groups which correspond to Isangi (31), but have more than one

---

31. See Müller, Fürstentum, pp. 73 ff., 76 ff., 133 f.

621 nkúmú. They, too, however, have only one man who opens a
● 624 meeting and one investigating judge. Only one of the nkúmú 622 has the function of judge. Consequently, we may say that even if the office is divided, the group still forms a unit as far as jurisdiction and political organization are concerned.

Among these groups we usually can observe a balanced
614 system of distribution as far as titles and offices are concerned.
621 It may either be predominantly democratic, as in Isangi, so
622 that all groups may lay claim to titles and offices, or it may be 624 oligarchic, as in Mbanga, where all power is vested in the oldest group of sons. In most cases, oligarchical groups tend to disintegrate; the younger groups attempt to free themselves from the rule. Democratic villages usually have a greater degree of cohesion.

In Isangi the small kinship groups of Ndongó (Nos. 2-4), Ngonga (No. 5), and Boyeke (Nos. 14-18) formerly had the privilege of furnishing the nkúmú. This practice has been discarded, and the honor is now rotated among the six local groups of the village. Only the small kinship groups of the Bolíma, Besilo, and Njiléokuli are excluded.

The six settlement communities of Isangi and similar
614 in my opinion are best described by the term hamlet [Weiler].

These are units which are predominantly intentional in nature. In spite of their functional weakness, they have survived even in the new settlement although they may not dwell together in a block. As a result of reintegration, they have lost their function as conscription district for the dancing groups in Isangi (see p. 29). but even at the present time they still represent the most important grouping in Isangi; we were aware of it before identifying any of the kinship groups. It is expected that they will lose their importance if Isangi does not return to its original site. By nature less closely connected with the or-[562] ganization of the village of their husbands, the women have become the point of departure for the new order of things (e.g., for dance groups) which fulfills the requirements of the new settlement conditions.

619 Each hamlet includes one or several message districts.
621 Even at the time of the old settlement pattern the messenger
● 624 system was determined by the hierarchical structure and not
[202] at all by considerations of what was most practical (for example, the shortest route). Consequently this conservative institution of the conservative old men has not been affected at all by the relocation.

The villages are the communities of jurisdiction and of political life. Usually a nkúmú, presides over the meetings. If a village has several nkúmú, one of whom may be the judge or all may preside together, I have used the term "part of a village" [Dorfteil] for the district from which each nkúmú originates.

361 Those areas which have a special meeting place are here
621 referred to as a "province" [Gau]. The meeting place lies 178 within the territory of the oldest or second-oldest kinship group. The practical importance of this institution for the entire province is minimal, but the two meeting places (202) which we discovered still constituted, until a short time ago, important social centers for the duplicate villages forming the administrative centers of the respective provinces. As a result of the relocation, the meeting places have now lost their function completely.

000 I hope that this paper has added new material to the discussion on the subject of ethno-sociological terminology, and that it will stimulate criticism and a new discussion of this important subject.

582 exclusive rights over her. Hence the proverb: Mbímbo ĩle nd'ése bímbo 836 ífa la nkóló, "bímbo fruit found under the tree have no owner; they [59] belong to the first person who gathers them." Thus a girl for whom nothing has been paid belongs to no one. A woman free in this manner does not infringe on the rights of any man in her sexual relations. There are therefore no sanctions against her licentiousness.

836
867 Furthermore, the discovery of her activities gives rise to no shame. At most more serious parents will rebuke children who go too far -- the girls because they abuse the body and reduce their value for a prospective marriage (2), the boys because they [83] run the risk of financial difficulties (the dangers of adultery, indemnity for childbirth with death as a result, etc.).

● 626
836 Public opinion is even more lenient than the parents. This attitude is easy to understand: strangers need fear no unpleasant consequences. Errors of this sort are generally considered natural weaknesses, provided that they do not occur too frequently. For public opinion is hard on people who run from one to another; they are stigmatized with the name ebébólé, "unfaithful, flighty, without intelligence or reasoning powers," or ebéngé, a stronger term with the same meaning.

836 From all the foregoing should we deduce that every woman is free to indulge fully in fornication? On the basis of the above considerations we could frankly conclude the affirmative. The behavior that can be observed from day to day fully confirms this answer. Some people stray more or less accidentally, but for others the practice quickly becomes a habit. And it can be said of all of them that

[516] 2. Not that a smaller bride price would be given for them. But a serious man would rather not take a woman for wife who has "run around" a great deal and therefore is more likely to commit adultery, to be unfaithful, and less likely to become the mother of a numerous progeny.

584 not a woman become bompāka through the payment of the ikulā? That is what I had always understood, and it seemed logical to me. But in the course of a discussion on the subject, natives contradicted me and said that I was entirely mistaken. I could not make them accept the idea that although a woman is called bompāka when she arrives in her fiancé's clan, she actually becomes bompāka with the official payment of the ikulā, so that nothing but a manner of speaking is involved. They said, "No, as long as a woman has not gone to her husband she is not bompāka."

"But after all," said I, [116] "a very minor difference is involved; the essential thing is in any case the payment of the ikulā.

"It is true that a woman belongs to her husband from the time the ikulā is paid, but she is nevertheless not called bompāka. She is not given that name until she leaves her parents and goes to her husband's home."

"But why?"

[illegible] "Because otherwise the man runs the risk of being mocked and ridiculed. Suppose that after the ikulā he comes back home alone. His future wife is to join him in a few days. He announces the great news to his friends. Then on the day set she does not appear. What shame for him! On the other hand, if everything is kept secret until the moment when no change is to be feared, there are only cries of joy."

On the other hand, this data should be related to the indisputable fact that the payment of the bride price alone very seldom establishes a marriage according to the laws and customs of the various peoples of the Congo. There is almost always another ceremony which in most cases is the handing over of the woman. Because of these facts we are inclined to consider the explanation of the Nkundô, an explanation of convenience which shows the practical aspect of the rule but does not account for it. It actually does not explain why a woman does not become bompāka from the time of the payment which establishes the engagement. On the other hand, it is undeniable that she is not given that name until she has arrived at the home of her husband. It is possible that the fundamental reason for this phenomenon has been forgotten or lost sight of by the natives. The explanation which fits best with the facts that are certain is that the essential

582 constitutes a bride price, it does not bear that name because its legal 562 significance is not the same. The specific name for this particular 583 payment is isongyambóka, from -songya, "to add something new" and mbóka, "path." Thus the new husband adds a new alliance. The verb songa or songya is also used under other circumstances: for a new tile or leaf that is added on to a damaged spot on a roof, for a patch on a piece of clothing, or for something that has been newly introduced. The term therefore seems to indicate that what is involved is not a new marriage but rather a modification grafted on to the old one. Furthermore, the term is often used pejoratively. One may thus suppose that this custom is not very ancient, but of course the evidence is not sufficient.

583 432 It is apparent from the above that the purchase of a woman is a difficult and expensive operation. A kind of second bride price (isongyambóka) and a second wife (inukambónga) cost quite a fortune. In the past the purchaser also had to pay indemnities to the families of men killed in combat (he might have had to pay as much as 100 rings, for the price of one "corpse" was 15 to 20 bakonga, the monetary value of a man) (1). One gets the impression that, though for reasons un- [726] known to us the tribes in question permitted the exchange of women in their laws and customs, they did so unwillingly, and that the persons in authority increased the difficulties, so to speak, in order to frighten the amateurs and to reduce the number of cases to an inescapable minimum.

One might wonder why men do not hesitate in the face of such great financial difficulties. Psychologically, it seems entirely plausible that a man who is in love with another's wife and has the necessary wealth would in his passion throw himself into such an adventure. Probably that is how the practice originated. But this likelihood does not explain the existence of a purchase, since the breaking of the first marriage and the committment to a new one could just as well be 432 583 carried out by the ordinary means of the payment and restitution of a bride price.

At the present time cases of purchase are becoming increasingly rare. This change is probably due to a wider distribution of wealth which has produced a second change, namely that the man makes the initial proposal rather than the woman, who did so according to the ancient custom. 432 583 612

The woman's invitation is public. The man must reply for the sake of his honor. As in the case of an exchange among the Bofyɛ́, he can only escape mockery by following through. If he did not, he would be considered a coward. He would be treated as a pariah; his wife (wives) would leave him, and he would no longer be included in the company of his fellows or at their meals.

Although strictly speaking the matter is outside the limits of this study, it seems to me that it is not irrelevant to mention, for the sake of comparison, that wife purchase is also practiced among the Ntómbá (Waŋgatá, Ibengo) and the Bolóngɛ́ (or Bofiji) between the Congo and the Boloko. They call it by the same name -- isómba, "purchase," and the man who buys in bosómbi, "purchaser." The woman always invites the man by sending him a piece of the ribs of a banana leaf, called a bonengɛ́. She does this publicly; she hands the bonengɛ́ to a relative or friend and says to him out loud and in front of everyone, "Take this bonengɛ́ to so-and-so for me, so that he will come and buy me."

[71] The same custom still exists in certain Ekonda settlements under the jurisdiction of the Bikoro station, such as the Lonyanyanga, Bosango, Balíngo, Babonja, etc., but not in the others, which are within the territory of the Kiri (Buli) station. It is called ehómbaka or esómbaka (the root and [222] the meaning are the same as those of lisómbɛ́ and isómba). Since these peoples are neighbors of the above-mentioned Ntómbá and of other Ntómbá living near the lake which bears their name (in a distorted form) and since, on the other hand, the rest of the Ekonda do not know this custom, we may assume that it was introduced to them by their neighbors to the north and to the west.

592[6] Polygamists as well as some monogamists have a kind of shed where 345 they receive their friends, take care of their affairs, eat their meals, etc. (1)

1. Such a shed is called esamba by the Bombwanja, ingómbe by the other tribes. The Boloko, like the Ntómbá and Bolíngɔ located between the Congo and the Boloko, say bongómbe. The Ekonda say ewánga.

[656] A man who is frequently found in the kitchen or who likes to rest there is the butt of ridicule by both men and women. He is called ilómbelinga (derived from belinga, "smoke," and lómba, "to dodge; to turn the head away in order to protect the eyes against smoke").

2. Illness

593[3] A wife is required to nurse her husband if he is ill, together 758 with his other wives if he is polygamous and, in case of serious illness, with the aid of his female relatives (mother, sisters). Even if they are married and living at a distance, they come to take care of a brother or son; it behooves their husbands to be reasonable and not to try and forbid their absence or prevent this exercise of their duty, for otherwise a man runs a great risk of seeing his wife leave him for good, outraged by this demonstration of his lack of affection for her family.

Together the wives and relatives seek medications and prepare the appropriate potions.

When a wife is ill the husband's female relatives usually come to see her, console her, and administer what care they are capable of giving; as a rule they are well disposed toward the wife of their son, brother, etc. The husband, for his part, must seek medications and help his sick wife. I recall a great palaver apropos of this question. During the illness of his wife Efotɛ, a certain Bokangɛ continuously had relations in his hut with another woman. The matter became public. The guilty husband was 593* 571 763 themselves of the usual and ordinary obligations incumbent upon them on the death of a son-in-law. Should this be taken as a kind of implied condemnation of suicide? [278]

593* 578 627 626 The wisdom of the elders recommends to youth that they not let anger lead them to brutal acts even where, legally, it is permissible to use force. They do not act in such a way through a policy of adaptation to the present regime. Even before the arrival of the white man, they gave lessons in calm and self-mastery. For serious blows, wounds, and especially homicide could have deplorable consequences legally and even politically (war). They preferred recourse to punishments, such as abstention from food and the refusal of debitum conjugale, which although less violent, are not without efficacity. In that way they were also spared the vexation of in-laws, whose pity would be aroused by the wounds and bodily suffering of their child or sister.

578 593* One thing that deserves blows or a good whipping because it is considered a serious failure in the fulfillment of the duties of married life is indifference and negligence in housework. A husband may safely deal forcefully with the situation, although he must first inform the qualified authorities. The following are some examples of such faults: the wife does not give the necessary attention to the kitchen, her children, the cleaning of the hut and court; she neglects her crops, does not go fishing, makes no attempt to obtain salt, etc.; in short, she does not give the required time and care to the tasks incumbent upon her. She herself, her children, and her house remain disgustingly filthy, her fields and banana groves are invaded by weeds and her pantry is devoid of utensils and food, while she wastes her time doing nothing or rather spends it running about the village, going to one woman's house, chatting with another, spending the better part of her day gossiping. The Nkundó does not put up with this sort of behavior, and no one can reproach him. Even other men and the woman's companions condemn [278] such conduct. Often the woman is ridiculed, and on occasion she may [534] hear unflattering comments such as bómot'ów 'asoló, efufa gùŋgamaka, "a gossip, her cloth is to the side," that is, the interminable chatting

Relations Between the Wife and Her Family

588^A 614 Through marriage, a woman does not enter into her husband's family. She continues to belong to her own clan of origin and continues to submit to the special regulations [284] of her family (bokumo) (1) The bokumo pertaining to parturition is excepted, for because of the child she must observe the bokumo of her husband's clan in this realm.

593^A 594 Although the wife is completely dependent on her husband for everything else -- work, property, etc. -- she remains bound to her own parents by obligations of respect, love, and assistance. She has to visit them from time to time, but too great a frequency in these visits meets with disapproval. It is impossible to give a rule defining the proper number. The answer must be provided by good sense. Sensible people prefer that the wife not make too many of these trips. Even her own parents want this to be so. For repeated attentions of this sort are considered evidence of a lack of love and attachment for her husband.

[626] Women who very faithfully stay in their homes and only rarely visit their parents, sometimes yield in face of the teasing of their companions. For the Nkundó is very sensitive to spiteful comments of that kind. Among current expressions there is one that has become a popular saying and is sometimes sung during dances:

1. The bokumo are special regulations governing a given clan, particularly prohibitions against partaking of certain foods (animal or vegetable) always or only at certain times. The punishment for a transgression is a kind of itching which covers the whole body. One might think this is totemism, but the idea of kinship to the forbidden being is entirely absent.

593⁰ 579 Ôtswɛ́ki lifla otswɛ́k'olá, bɛ́fɛ́kolaka mbɛ́k'ɛ́y'olá la ngomɔ'a nkolé, "If you are married go back to your parents, or you will be taught the way with drums and gongs," that is, "when you are dead." (2)

[764] [767] 579 2. A woman is buried in her own native clan. Her corpse is transported there to the accompaniment of drums and horns. The lokolé gong announces her death.

593³ 602 A married woman may not evade the duty of helping her relatives under special circumstances (pregnancy, illness, serious accidents, death). This obligation [205] is not limited to her mother and father, but extends to all her relatives; the closer the degree of kinship, the stricter the obligation.

Besides, love of family is sufficiently developed so that there is no danger of the woman forgetting herself too much in this realm. ●[626] And a husband who would like to prevent her from fulfilling these elementary duties would be much criticized by all and should expect a dissolution of the marriage.

593⁴ 574 358 592 It was said above that a husband builds a hut for his wife. His relatives often assist him in this task. But it also happened -- in the past, for colonization has removed the possibility of it -- that the woman's father wanted to build his daughter's house himself or at least to make the pavement out of clay brought from her native land. This act was a demonstration of wealth and politico-social importance as well as proof of fatherly affection. The husband, for his part, was honored to have married the daughter of such an important man and loved her all the more. Thus a number of women say that "they only cooked on ancestral soil." This soil was brought in baskets across distances up to 50 kilometers by Batswa and by men of the woman's clan or village. Her father could do it because of his great influence and regal rewards (bokɔ́ndo, verb kɔ́nda) were distributed during a feast (ntɔkɔ) given for the workers and their relatives after the task was completed. This was done for Bompeli, daughter of Bokombe of Litɛ́li (Bombwanja) married to Bonyeme w'enyuka of the Basɛ́kɛ́ Mbangó (Bonkoso); for Beluka, daughter of

606 the relations between a wife and her husband's parents are closely connected with the rules pertaining to the prohibition related to affinity and seems to spring from the same source. Therefore it will be useful to have in mind what we have said in the preceding chapter, Article IV.

607 The husband's elder brothers treat his wife as their sister. The wife calls her husband's sisters [300] bakilé, but out of respect she often gives them the title of "mother." (1)

[609] 1. Among the Elinga the wife also calls her husband's sisters bongíli (pl. bangíli); they call her bónangíli (pl. bánangíli). A wife often calls her husband's mother nyangóngíli. Bánangíli l'ánangíli means "the brother's wives and their sisters-in-law."

587 After the husband's death, as has been said suo loco, his father or his brother may marry his widow. But this practice is not well regarded and is permitted only rarely, chiefly when the scattering of the family patrimony is feared or if the two interested parties have an unusual love for each other.

857 602 With respect to children or younger brothers and all those who fall into that category, the situation is altogether different. Illicit relations with wives of their father, grandfather, uncle, elder brother, or elder cousin, are judged much less severely. Generally, misconduct does not give rise to claims for payment, or the payment is demanded "for form's sake" and consists of a hen and a bunch of bananas. By means of this payment the guilty one recognizes his error and renders homage to the right of his elder.

[626] In general public opinion condemns these relations and often with great severity. The question of degree of kinship as well as other considerations result in a great diversity among the cases, so we will examine each situation separately and distinguish each time between the husband's reaction and that of public opinion.

587 626 595 593 A. A woman's misconduct with her husband's son does not result in the payment of an indemnity. Nevertheless, the husband who has been wronged takes action; he defends his rights and is enraged, whether the situation is very serious or not, and especially if he is monogamous. If he has several wives, he is more apt to pass over the matter, unless it involves his favorite. Sometimes he takes revenge by striking the guilty son's mother, taking her hens away from her, etc. But such action may lead to complications: [301] the brother of the woman so treated might intervene, and if the reaction of the husband who has been wronged is too violent or recurs too often, a divorce may result. In any case the father never harms his heedless son's wife, since he loves her like his own daughter.

The father may apply a direct sanction against the offender by delaying the acquisition of a wife for him and refusing his blessings for his son's travels and undertakings -- still a serious thing in purely native society.

Such relations are always greatly criticized by public opinion, even if relatives intervene on the culprit's behalf. The latter is disgraced as a result; he is marked with the epithet etsɔnjɛ́lɔ́, to which [578] often is added the explicative phrase l'ɔ́ɔ́la benyangɛ́ b'ɔ́àngɛ́. Etsɔnjɛ́lɔ́ is derived from etsɔ́, "masculine clothing" and, figuratively, "virility in the physical sense," and from bɛ́lɔ́, "strength." Thus the epithet implies that the culprit is so virile that he goes so far as to unite even with his brothers' mothers.

587 626 Marriage with the father's widow after his death is legitimate. Nevertheless, if the widow has left children, public opinion does not entirely refrain from judgment and though the severity of the criticism cited above will be attenuated, it may still be heard. Such was the case of Yokâ of Bokenyola (Bonjolo), which is well known in this region. He married Lokoké, widow of his father Insilo y Okâtola and mother of Insilo Antoine, present chief of the Bonkoso. (1).

1. With reference to the above-mentioned attitude, an exception must be made with regard to the inheritance of a widow by right

626 of seniority (she is then called bonkúfú -- see Chapter III, Article III). The giving of a widow who is in the position described is preferably avoided.

577
626 Illicit relations between a son and his father's wife are judged with especially great severity if the young man's own mother is still alive. He is reproached for his behavior in terms which are clear and crude: Oósangenya mbindo ilí la mbindo y'ísé ó nyangó, "you unite your stains (impurities) with those of your father and [his] mother"; Ouné ńs'úkí wá wómbúfúé, "you are returning from whence you came." To these expressions is often added ówa lá é olakí likako, "you will die because of your too great wickedness." To the [761] Nkundó this last statement is a kind of curse, and if it is repeated by several persons it will not fail to have its effect. Or, to speak as our people do, if everyone greatly wails over and against this man, he will really die. (1)

1. This attitude of the Nkundó may be one of the reasons why widows are assigned not to the son of the deceased, but to his brother.

If the son in question is not married, especially if he has already reached a relatively advanced age, and if he approaches the wives of his polygamous father, the matter is considered less serious. The latter cannot be too angry, especially when only isolated instances are involved; for other relatives will allow their affection for this young man to speak, since they are aware of his passion and therefore understand his temptations and follies. They would intervene to pacify the father and urge him to prevent the repetition of such occurrences by obtaining a wife for his son. In exceptional cases the family council may even judge the father to be in the wrong because of his harshness toward his son and may allow the latter to take his father's wife away from him (never, however, the first wife, the favorite, or the bolómbu); such was the case we described in 837 626 Chapter II, Article XI, 2. But such a situation is far from ideal in Nkundó eyes and is permitted only if, on the one hand, the son ardently loves the woman and, on the other, if the father is too slow in obtaining a wife for him.

837 682 Here then we observe a conflict between two feelings: a husband's jealousy and the affection of a father and various relatives. That is why it is difficult -- as in many situations -- to draw the line between what is permitted and what is forbidden. From what has preceded and from the general explanations given by natives, we can conclude, however, that: [303] 1) relations between a woman and her husband's son are forbidden and severely judged, but with much more leniency than in the case of "superior" relatives; 2) the [587] father may not go to extremes in repressing misconduct nor ask his own son to pay an indemnity, since to do so would be to enrich himself through his child's misbehaviour, and the latter would have no means of paying him except through him or his mother's clan -- and it would be very unjust and inappropriate to force him to have recourse to the latter.

587 837 607 B. A younger brother calls his elder brother's wife wălí, or wife, and she calls him bóme, or husband, because they may marry one another. Therefore adulterous relations may also be found among them. But in practice some distinctions must be made.

If the younger brother is not married and the elder one has a harem, -- a state of affairs which was very common in the past but today is very rare -- the situation is analogous to the one described above in relation to a father's wife except that there is greater indulgence toward the culprit.

If the elder brother is monogamous and the younger brother a bachelor, relations of the latter with the former's wife when the husband is present are forbidden. If the younger brother nevertheless yields to the temptation, he is condemnable. The husband may not claim an indemnity. But in revenge he may procure for himself a "make-believe indemnity" (nyongo ea boilíamba) by felling one of the culprit's banana trees, taking away his chickens, moving his hut, taking some other similar action. The purpose of these acts, according

597 (F) passion unless he is the nkóló of his sister (F), that is, unless the 578 mother (C) of his sister (E) is the nkita of his aunt (B),[297] who is the 579 sister of his father (A). Indeed in that case his sister may not complain, for she owes him respect and submission; her subordination to her brother and master is greater than the gratitude he owes her for any riches he may have obtained through her or on her account.

603 597 D. In the case of the relationship of a grandson (bonkána) to his grandfather's wives, his freedom is, in practice, complete. Actually, among the Nkundó the affection of a grandfather (nkóko) for his own grandson often exceeds his love for his own son and completely degenerates into weakness. (1) The grandfather puts up with all his

1. As happens very often also in Europe.
See Chapter I, Part 1, Article I, 3.

grandson's carryings-on, his whims, all his teasing, his insults, etc.

After illicit relations the grandson sometimes carries his insolence so far as to spontaneously send his grandfather a "mock" indemnity in the form of a basket filled with stones in the place of copper rings.

● 626 Although the grandfather treats his grandson with good humor,
603 public opinion does not favor the latter's conduct, though it is more
597 lenient than in the cases described above. The public reaction, as well as the sending of the "mock" fine, shows that in principle these relations are censurable and condemned. Because of present circum-
[118] stances, particularly marriage at an earlier age than in the past, the age difference between a grandson and his grandfather's wives has increased considerably in the constantly growing number of cases, and their relations have proportionately decreased. (2) [298]

626

> higher morality -- in our terms. Among them the question of relations between a woman and her husband's son, younger brother, etc., does not even arise. Have they been influenced by some neighboring tribe? Or must we attribute the inferior morality of some of the tribes in this respect to decadence.

837

The following conclusions emerge from this long description:

1) Relations between a man and the wife of his son, younger brother, etc., in short of anyone inferior to him in the family hierarchy, are always strictly prohibited and never occur.

2) They do occur on the other hand between an inferior and the wife of his senior and superior. The degree of kinship between the husband and the culprit plays a considerable role in determining the seriousness or triviality of an infraction, the sanctions applied, and the various consequences. Some relations are accepted, others are censured with varying degrees of leniency, still others are pitilessly criticized.

3) In these matters a distinction may be made between two aspects:

- a) the husband's reaction and the repression of the illicit relations;
- b) the judgment of public opinion;

or:

- a) the financial aspect;
- b) the moral aspect -- to use that term for want of a better one.

Sometimes a third element comes into play, namely the intervention of the family on the side of the culprit against the injured husband who, for one reason or another, is in the wrong himself.

a) The usual sanction for adultery is, for the man, an indemnity to pay. But such a payment cannot be made since no financial transaction -- strictly speaking at least -- may be made

602 within a group of close kin, seeing that, from a certain standpoint, 837 property belongs to all the members, each sooner or later receiving 684 or inheriting from the other. But in cases where other sanctions can be imposed, they are considered legitimate. [309]

b) Except in the case of relations between brother and sister-626 in-law -- within the limits described above -- public opinion is 837 severe in its judgment, even more severe than for ordinary cases of 602 adultery, although because of the more tangible nature of the sanctions imposed against the latter, these seem on the surface to be considered more serious; many natives even have that impression. Or at least that is the first impression that spontaneously comes from their explanations; currently, they stress the indemnity, and in their accounts of ancient proceedings and violent sanctions, they forget the other aspect. Others do not distinguish between the two sides of the problem, or distinguish between them only very poorly. Only in going to the bottom of things do they -- like ourselves -- become aware of the two aspects and the importance of not confusing them.

The leniency we observe in certain cases on the part of the interested parties who have been wronged, and sometimes on the part of public opinion, does not seem to us to have been explained as a leniency based on principle nor as a legitimation of these relations (except in the case of brothers within the limits indicated). They seem rather to spring from the affection they have for the culprit, their sympathy for his condition as a bachelor, a certain community of interests, and finally from an evaluation of certain other elements that may be involved (such as a fundamental jealousy in the case of brothers).

181 in others between inferior and superior relatives is based on their
conception of authority, which is patriarchal, therefore paternal. What is involved is not so much a fear of power as a reverent awe -- although the first should not be excluded. In their eyes an inferior does not exist for the benefit and advantage of the superior, but the reverse; authority exists for the good of the inferior, who to preserve hierarchy and order must submit to the [310] superior. The superior's duty to help his inferior (in his difficulties, his palavers, his poverty),

684 The risk of being wounded, reduced to slavery, or killed, often cools the adulterer's passion. Therefore, the more the husband showed that he was fearless, violent, physically powerful, or of a high social position, the more his wives and their lovers were on their guard. Certain men were so jealous of one of their wives and so determined to take vengeance with extreme severity that the tempters did not even dare to think of approaching her.

2) The payment of an indemnity seems to be the standard sanction. It is the only one that remains legal at the present time; consequently it is coming more and more to the fore.

Any of the types of evidence examined above justify the claim for an indemnity.

The indemnity may be minimal, consisting of 2 to 5 copper rings, or heavy, going up to 20 to 30 rings or a slave. The maximum is always demanded for adultery with a favorite. The size of the payment depends on the persons involved, the relationships that bind them, the frequency of misconduct, and the nature of the action observed. For instance, if the husband catches the couple when arranging a meeting or exchanging gifts, the indemnity will be small; if, on the other hand, he has caught them in flagrante delicto, it will be high.

[626] A man who demands a high indemnity must expect to be treated the same way should the occasion arise. The application of the law of retaliation in that case is fully approved by Nkundó opinion.

684 585 [609] In addition to the situations examined in the preceding article, there exists another which does not result in an indemnity claim. It arises if the culprit belongs to a clan of slaves or is in some other way subject or inferior (mpámá or bowɛ́lɛ́). (1) Even if the husband catches the culprit in the act, he politely asks him to go away and leave his house [321] and his wife: óntsíkɛ́l'ílombe, njóyá ɛ́! Here is true Nkundó courtesy in practice. It might

1. Strangers who are settled with a tribe or group but are in no way related to them.

684 that she becomes accustomed to her husband's relations with various 581 other women. Consequently, the reaction of the women in general
562 [325] against adultery is much weaker than that of the men. Moreover, because of this same system, a woman is much more exposed to weakness, and stronger sanctions are therefore necessary to insure her fidelity.

Finally, there is one last reason for considering a woman's misconduct as more serious. It is the danger of conception through adultery, with all the attendant consequences: risks for the pregnant woman, forced continence for the husband, etc. (1)

1. See no. 6 below as well as Chapter I, Part 2, Article IV, 3, and Chapter X, Article II, 3.

From the description of sanctions it is apparent that in spite
562 of the woman's inferior position, Nkundó law does not leave husbands
684 the full and complete freedom which, according to certain writers, they are accorded among other peoples. Even if the means of repression available to the wife do not incontestably prove that the husband has an obligation of conjugal fidelity -- and the wife's legal status explains a great deal -- the fact remains that the ndonga as well as public opinion approve of even her violent reaction, proving that she is right and the husband wrong.

5. Public opinion

626 Public opinion is fairly lenient in relation to isolated in-837 stances (yětsi, efongo). It clearly recognizes the error involved in infringing on the conjugal rights of another, but the error is attributed to human weakness. In the case of habit the situation is different; it is criticized frequently and severely. Habitual sinners
[192] are called efáfóká (from the verb fafoka, literally "to flutter" and figuratively "to flirt"), ebóngá or ebábóngá (from the verb bâbonga) or ebáboá (from bâboa) "to flutter, to be flighty and fickle." These epithets are applied primarily to women, who are more subject to this failing than men.

626 The shame attached to the discovery of this sort of miscon-
837 duct in the better circles in Europe is unknown among the Nkundó.
This is natural since isolated instances are readily excused. As to [152] the habitual offenders, they are sensitive [326] to the above-mentioned epithets but will not correct their ways on this account any more than people in other parts of the world.

An adulterous husband is criticized as much as an adulterous
837 wife in spite of the difference in the means of repression which 626 684 Nkundó law provides for their respective misconduct.

Public opinion therefore corroborates the conclusion toward which our examination of sanctions has pointed, namely that adultery is condemned by the Nkundó. Opinion is not based on the existence of the sanction but seems to spring from their innate mentality, which makes them perceive adultery as a disorder.

6. Aggravating circumstances

837 If a case of adultery is followed by conception, it becomes 842 especially serious, and for the husband as much as for the natural 672 father. Indeed the latter must assume all the consequences. When circumstances permit the husband makes his wife denounce her accomplice, and she does not refuse to do so. The husband then calls a meeting and demands a pledge (ndanga) from the culprit, who in that way acknowledges that he is at fault and shows his willingness to assume all responsibility. If there is a miscarriage or the child dies during delivery, the natural father must pay the legal father an indemnity of "a slave" or more (sometimes 50 rings); a smaller indemnity is required for a child who is only deformed or sickly. If the mother dies the indemnity consists of a slave and 50 rings, and it may go as high as 100 rings.

In the interim the husband no longer goes near his wife. He leaves her to her lover, who must "preserve the foetus" and observe all the rites and practices associated with pregnancy and childbirth, since, physically, he is the father. (1) [327]

Article II, 3. For analogous practices

595 587 a man and another's wife which is legitimate, regulated, officially acknowledged, and accepted. It is not a marriage; there is no bride price nor are there witnesses other than the woman herself; the wife does not belong to the secondary husband, and in case of a rupture of relations, there is no restitution of valuables however numerous they may be. A man who in this manner purchases the right to cohabit with the wife of another does so because of poverty; he does not have the means to pay a bride price for this woman or ● [626] any other. Therefore he is disdained and scorned by his fellows. To a certain extent the husband and the lover share a common life: they give each other presents and food, help each other, eat together, and call each other bakalé, the same name by which wives of a polygamist address each other.

Such a concubinage can last fairly long. It is usually difficult to break, for the legitimate husband takes such a breaking up badly and considers it an injustice. If the husband is rich and influential, it is dangerous for the partner to dissolve the relationship for he will have to count on the husband's wrath. Thus in the past such a union could continue for many years (in that case it was called ekókó) until the lover (bonsámbá, pl. bansámbá) was rich enough to free himself. Often it continued for an entire lifetime, and the partner settled in the loánjá (a place occupied by a man and his wives) of the husband (linsámbá jǎ njeléngwá, enjwáki); he thus became like the husband's child. Nowadays this custom has become much less common because of the freedom resulting from colonization as well as the greater possibility of acquiring wealth. This diminution shows that the practice is not ideal, even in native eyes, and is only a last resort resulting from the state of the distribution of wealth.

A man who desires to live in concubinage with another man's wife has some relations with her in secret and then makes the matter public. For that purpose he gives the woman a knife or a few bakonga to take to her [337] husband. Or he may even call a meeting of the patriarchs and pay the husband in front of them. To make a concubinage public in this way is called ója linsámbá, "to make

765 expected to attend. It is usually at this time that the negotiations occur relative to a replacement for the deceased (Chapter III, Article IV).

Article II. Seclusion of Widows

As I have described in the article cited, widows (bituka, sing. etuka, or, among the Bombwanja, besámanyi, sing. bosámanyi) are compelled to remain in seclusion for a long time. Before the ceremony of being lifted from the ground, they are ostensibly not permitted to go out. Later they are allowed more freedom; they can go everywhere to do their work, even to the markets. But they are required to spend their nights in the communal seclusion hut.

A widow who did not conform to these rules would meet
● [624] with serious criticism. She would be said to have not loved her husband (and consequently suspected of having caused his death by sorcery). Moreover, she would be exposed to the avenging anger of the deceased, who would disturb her sleep, thrash her if she went to the forest alone, [422] or would even come to take her into the next world with him.

Insofar as possible all the widows are brought together in one and the same hut. To complete their separation from the world, the entrance is closed by means of a circle of palms, the same as for the seclusion hut of a nursing woman, a bolúmbú, or a woman possessed by the spirit of bongóli (yebola). This is to prevent widows from having relations with passers-by.

The name of the seclusion hut is lokásá (the same as the word for "leaf."). The Bombwanja use the word lokombí (from komba, "to shut," "to enclose"); the Injóló and the Boángí say lonkíndá. (1)

1. The Ekonda use the word itálé.

must go to the monkeke for their fight, this being the location of the houses belonging to the sons of the nkumu. 624 The penalty for breaking this law is a fine, and if no 689 fine were forthcoming hanging used to be the alternative. If a quarrel arises elsewhere and one party wishes to avoid fighting, he may retire to the nongo and thus be safe. No trees in the mongo may be climbed. There are, however, privileged classes exempt from all such rules, and these embrace a good many people. [845] Thus, the mother of twins, twins, Batwa, maomi, and all members of the molembe and ekopo are exempt from the laws of the mongo. [672] If any of these commit acts which are illegal for those coming under the law, they are not held guilty, but their actions will not be condoned; they will be considered breaches of good conduct, and will be dealt with informally; [626] the parties will be quietly reprimanded, and adjured to observe the proprieties of conduct. For outsiders breaking the laws of the nongo, what corresponds to a warrant is necessary. It is necessary to catch the culprit in the act and hale him before the [696] nkumu. The nkumu himself cannot do this, nor can any of the ekopo; it must be done by one of the molembe, and so if the nkumu sees someone infringing the law he will try to get one of the molembe on the spot in a hurry in order to catch the offender.

In war,[1] it is the molomi o ehe who is most active in preparations, but the nkumu 624 will accompany his party to battle, keeping well in the rear, and surrounded by good 726 fighters. He does not wear his montolo but puts on the informal hat. If an nkumu were captured, he would never be tortured or killed as were other prisoners, unless he [727] specifically sought such a fate. He could be ransomed, and his captors would beseech him to let his people ransom him, but in many cases an nkumu would invite death rather than endure the shame of being yielded up as a prisoner of war.

An nkumu is always addressed by a double clap of the hands, and will not reply to 624 anyone rude enough to speak to him first. In answer to the clap he replies with a 576 word of wisdom expressed in an aphorism or proverb. Such a reply, however, is common to all elders, who have their favourite aphorisms ready for any who pay them special honour. Anything the nkumu says must be answered not by the customary nko boiko (even so) which ordinary people use, but with the special word, bionga, which is reserved exclusively for replying to an nkumu, and means the same thing.

When the hour of death approaches, an nkumu is attended by his Batwa. It is a 624 rule that he must not die a natural death, and near the end, while he is still conscious 763 and can still speak, all 'free men' clear out and leave the Batwa pygmies to their task of tying the nkumu very tightly with the fibrous yam vines known as menkiki. [563] Often this secure lashing in the sitting posture, known as ilima, is sufficient to finish the nkumu off, but sometimes the work is expedited by twisting his neck.[2] Then it is announced that he is dead, aokilwa, this being in contradistinction to the customary phrase aokoma moloko used of the death of ordinary people. While the latter means

[1] Owing to the lack of tribal cohesion, warfare was not on any considerable scale. The method of warfare consisted in sending groups of young men to fight first, the elders only joining in when one side began to get the worst of the fray. Victors and vanquished in such fights were designated 'husband' and 'wife' respectively, and members of the one group were free to come and go in the villages of the other, and even to help themselves to food. In future wars 'husband' and 'wife' were supposed to combine against their common foes.

[2] Besides nkumu, elderly and rich men, fathers and mothers of twins, and twins are buried in the ilima or sitting posture, in contradistinction to the monrepa position which is the recumbent one used for ordinary people and slaves. [764]

578 the effect does not vary greatly. [275] The only difference is in 593x the intensity of rage and of the reactions, which depends on the individual temperaments of the interested parties.

578 A Nkundó is greatly outraged by obscenities hurled at him by 593x his wife, especially if she attacks him in public. His reaction is al-
● 627 ways violent. Usually it comes to blows, a thrashing, and sometimes the knife. But if the husband wants to remain within the limits of the law, he cannot injure or, more especially, kill his wife on his own authority. Before going any further, he must bring his case before the ndonga. His family is invited to the meeting and, if possible, so is the wife's father. The outraged husband presents his case and warns the persons assembled that one day his exasperation will lead him to take up the knife. Having taken his case before qualified persons, the husband can from then on go ahead and avenge himself for the disgraces his wife may inflict on him; it is lawful for him to do so. If the guilty woman starts again, no one can accuse her husband of wronging her, for she herself is at fault and he has warned her in accordance with all the rules of the law.

593x Modern young people do not always follow this procedure.
578 But their revolutionary spirit often brings them reprimands and often [178] gets them into great difficulties. The elders jealously guard their authority, and no one may reproach them for doing so. Therefore in a palaver of this sort, a father will sometimes foresake his son.

602 brings forth reprimands on the part of the husband and his parents which obviously can easily degenerate into quarrels. If the omissions are so frequent and of such a nature that they can no longer be explained as simply forgetting, a whim, or a fit of peevishness, but [299] are taken to indicate spitefulness or vulgarity, the matter is [627] brought before the ndonga (who is often assisted by the family tribunal) or brought before the authority constituted by the woman's kin. If in spite of everything the expected improvement does not take place, the break-up is inevitable.

606 The husband's father and mother extend the same affection to their son's wife as they feel toward him. They consider her their own child, and it is not unusual to find that their love for the wife equals their feeling for their own son. She is only a relative by marriage, but out of affection for her they call her their child. She, for [601] her part, does not use toward them the term bakanga (or bakiló) but out of filial respect calls them "father" and "mother." Exceptions to this practice may be found, however.

606 224 If the father (and those who fall in the same category such as uncles, elder brothers, etc.) kills a large game animal, he is expected to give his son's (or brother's, etc.) wife a piece of meat, whose size depends on the number of daughters-in-law he has and which consists of one or several chops (bokálako) (1) and the piece at the nape of the neck (botómbyá).

606 835 Illicit relations between the husband's father and his daughter-in-law would be an unheard of crime. The same would be true with respect to any of the "superior" relatives. (2) The laws regulating

421 613 have seen them as money transactions. We have obtruded our point of view and destroyed the whole legal system of the natives. It is through our materialization of those securities that we have lowered the native woman to a plaything of money and a piece of merchandise.

586 595 As for the two outgrowths of the native system, divorce and polygamy, neither is inherent in the legal system as such. They are only abuses which have taken root and which clash with the principles of the native law itself. By its nature, native marriage is also indissoluble, and polygamy has only been able to exist through a popular confusion between paternal and marital law.

4. Legal Power in the Clan

613 627 In Nkundo society all individuals do not have equal rights or powers, as in the Napoleonic law books, /154/ but the natural rights concerning people are still completely recognized. All value and power comes from God, through the ancestors. Those who are nearest to God are thus the highest in position, his first representatives. There is no question of absolutism or despotism. Just as the blood is divided among all clan members in a descending line, so also are authority and legal power. They are one as a legal entity in relation to the outside world; nevertheless, each member takes part and has a vote in the internal administration of justice, so that, when clan interests are discussed and dealt with, each member may sit in the place accorded to him and take part in decisions. In a legal sense there is, therefore, no question of a separate family council, which would assist the clan leader, but all decisions are made communally.

594 627 A single exception to this does exist, namely, that which gives the head of the nuclear family legal power over his wife and children, and then only with the acknowledgment and approval of the clan. Differences between autonomous clans are settled by the clans involved, a sort of international court of law where friendly clans may also be brought in as arbiters.

627 Such an arrangement made the court absolutely "paternal." The whole procedure was one of a reconciliatory character, which resorted to coercive measures only when necessary, and did its utmost to save the honor and the welfare of the involved clans, and to compensate for, to restore, and to prevent further offenses.

4. Treason

● 628 602 Treachery and treason between relatives by marriage were not unusual. The proverb says bomóng'ôsulu nd'ôkiló, "treason exists [294] chiefly on the part of relative by marriage." Not that this happened through any fundamental maliciousness apart from perhaps some rare exception. But in case of a war or particularly of a vendetta, relative by marriage did not hesitate to betray his in-law and thus send him to his death.

We shall limit ourselves to giving two case histories which are well known to the current generation. (1)

1. I do not know exactly when these events occurred. In any case they date back to the time of the Independent State and to the beginning of the occupation.

At the time when the Ingende post was occupied by the white "Itumbambíle" and that of Ikéngé by "Bosénjá," some men from [266] Boálá (Ikákema y'ôselo, Bombwanja) surprised an inhabitant of Bokukó (Wǎngatá), killed him, and ate him. Shortly thereafter Lokwa jw'ǒyelé, a man from Boálá, went to visit his sister Eúmé, who was married to Imbilé is'éy'osola of Ikonjí. It happened that the latter was a maternal uncle of the victim of the Boálá men. Was Lokwa unaware of this relationship? Or did he trust his brother-in-law? Whatever the case he was well received. Nevertheless, Imbilé had not forgotten his nephew's assassination and went to inform his close kin of this good opportunity to avenge the murder. One evening they broke into the hut that had been placed at the visitor's disposal and found him there with his sister Eúmé and his wife Lompoko. The [266] two women managed to escape, but Lokwa was taken, killed, and eaten. Naturally, his sister Eúmé did not return to her husband, and there was no question of a restitution of the bride price.

The second case dates from the same period. Two Batswa of [266] Mbálanga (Etóontále, Bongili), Bokéngo and Boláyengé, surprised Mboko Ilombá of Boálá in the forest, killed him, and ate him.

628 602 Some time thereafter, a man named Bengɔ́ngɔ́ from the Ndongɔ́ village of the Bongíli went to Boɛ́lɛ́ to visit his sister Bosɛ́ka, who was married to Eale ɛ̂a Bofekɛ́. The latter told him that the village was enraged because of the assassination of one of their people by the Batswa of the Bongíli. He advised him to go [295] and hide in the fallow ground lest excited men come upon him and revenge themselves on him. He led his brother-in-law there himself: Therefore he knew the exact location of his hiding place and ran to betray him to the others. They encircled the fallow ground and easily found poor Bengɔ́ngɔ́, who was pitilessly massacred and eaten. His sister Bosɛ́ka never knew of her husband's treachery; she thought that despite all his precautions, the other inhabitants had discovered her brother's hiding place. (1) [266]

[649] 1. We should not be too astonished that during that period the Europeans did not intervene in these wars, vendettas, massacres, and acts of cannibalism. They let the natives do as they pleased among themselves and demanded only that they leave them alone and render them services and tribute. They had other things to do in those times. The white men Ǎmbɛ́ and Baisǎnkoi, of whom the natives still speak with respectful fear, were the first to begin punishing acts of barbarism in this region.

602 This hypocrisy on the part of the husband toward his wife and brother-in-law is due to the presence of two opposing feelings within him -- on the one hand, the love of his family and the feeling of solidarity which engenders hate and the desire for vengeance; on the other, love for his spouse. As these feelings are in complete contradiction with each other, he cannot reconcile them. But at least he can preserve appearances.

[539] This situation is referred to in the following proverb: bokilɔ́ ɛ́kwǐsɛ́kɛ́, wɛ̌ngoyak'eyalo, "if your bokilɔ́ has hidden you, change

602 539 shelters." There is another, which is cruder: bokiló tótswe nkɛ́lɛ́: bafumba bálɛkɛ mbá, emí ńkɔlɛ́kɛ wɛ̌. "relative by marriage, let us go to the palm grove; the bafumba ants (Dorylus wilverthii) eat palm nuts; I will eat you." The following saying, applied to someone who is always trying to clear himself, is a more or less involuntary accusation: mpɔ̂l 'ɔ̌kiló, ńtúfa é mpɔ́ngɔ; mpɔ́ngɔ y'ɔ̌kiló nsako ngá mbwá, "I do not eat my relative by marriage; on the contrary, I dip (food) in his fat; an in-law's fat is as tasty as a dog's." [296]

602 528 Nevertheless, a man never goes so far as to cause the death of his sister's daughter's or other relative's husband. Or, as the Nkundó say, one does not kill a person by whom one has been enriched. What is the reason for this distinction? According to our people it is the affection they feel toward their sister, daughter, etc.; they love them too much to pain them by taking away their husbands.

This treacherous and barbarous conduct is therefore directed by the bokiló toward the bokanga, that is, by those who have paid the bride price to those who have received it, but never the reverse.

Appendix

000 This appendix pertains to each of the three preceding articles. Therefore it may reasonably be placed here. It does not deal with any special law nor with a custom that is legal, universal, or common. It is concerned with isolated cases. But it seems to me that the few lines to follow are not without interest, since they give a good indication of the mentality that may be found among these people.

602 578 It may happen that a woman has a complaint or feels she has cause to be dissatisfied with one of her relatives, for example her brother. In her opinion he may not be sufficiently kind and generous toward her, or he may treat her in a manner she considers unfair. In a moment of anger she reveals her feelings to her husband and incites him to avenge her by injuring or even killing the one who has offended her.

That is what happened several decades ago to Bosela w'ɔ̌mpwengɛ́ of Bolɛ́nge (Bongíli) (who died in 1932, a very old man). His wife Ilumbɛ́ was very dissatisfied in that her brother did not give 586* 577 continuous state of enmity existed between his clan and the husband's, or if the husband owed him a substantial debt, one that clearly equaled the woman's bride price. In the first case a new war followed almost inevitably. Later on the woman's family contacted the new son-in-law. The gifts they brought were considered the dowry, and he began to pay the bride price. But there was no question of reimbursing the bride price to the first husband; relations between him and the woman's clan were completely broken. The difference between this situation and the standard procedure described above lies precisely in the fact that there is no restitution. In the case of a debt there was no restitution either. The woman's flight constituted a compensation (lowáála) and was therefore so designated (N. aȯkenda ndá lowáála). If the husband lodged a complaint, the judges sent him a piece of bofofó (1) to let him know that they did not want to concern themselves with his case, which he himself knew to have very poor grounds. Even the members of his own clan prevented him from making war; they knew perfectly well that the wrong was entirely on their relative's side.

The practice of taking refuge that we have just described was simply known as bejwó, bǒmoto áótswá bejwó, because that word was the principal one in the ultimatum.

As we have said above, the custom here described disappeared 178 586* 577 with colonization. Even though the scope of this study does not extend to the Nkundó who are settled north of the Tshuapa, it [393] may be of interest to note that an evolution of this custom is taking shape in the Losanganya region. If a woman is condemned for leaving the conjugal household and imprisoned, she asks someone to marry her -- if the opportunity presents itself. If the man accepts

These ornaments are not at all consistent. They vary according to taste and the whims and means of the natives, but certain parts of the dress costume worn by the betrothed couple at the dances celebrating the engagement seem to have a special meaning, to which we shall return later.

Article XII. The Attitude Toward the Bride Price

583x
562 1. What is the woman's attitude toward the bride price?

Only we Europeans can ask such a question. To the Nkundó mind it is superfluous -- in fact it is really stupid. The bride-price system is the normal system [178] of marriage. The Nkundó do not conceive of marriage in any other way. Without the payment of a bride price there is no marriage; the woman is not considered to be a wife, she is simply a slave. This notion is a necessary consequence of the bride-price system. Thus it is not surprising that the woman is very much attached to this system, and that under normal conditions -- that is, when there is no European influence -- she does not want any union without a bride price, for she would then be a slave. This is obvious. All these ideas are held together like the links of a chain.

2. Our attitude toward the bride price

589x
648 At the beginning of colonization the Europeans, government agents as well as missionaries, viewed with repugnance a marriage system based on the payment of a bride price. In their eyes it was neither more nor less than the sale of women and therefore a form of slavery. They felt they should counteract it by abolishing the bride price and introducing marriage in the European manner, which seemed more consistent with man's free nature. Many Blacks employed by the Whites as soldiers, laborers, etc., were thus married without bride price. Nevertheless, no direct action was taken against the system. Later it became apparent that it would be harmful to abolish this ancestral custom before it was possible to replace it with a better system. (1) In the end it was realized that the payment

---

1. It is not even enough to substitute a better system; those who are to benefit from it must understand it and be convinced that it is better.

583x 648 of a bride price was not at all a purchase. (2) [179]

2. One reason why Europeans were so slow in getting a realistic picture of the nature of the bride price was undoubtedly their lack of linguistic knowledge. The natives did not know the Lobangi language spoken to them first nor the Lingala used later, and so perforce in these languages they used (and still use) terms whose meaning is vague and broad. Thus they said -- and still often say -- the word sɔ́mba, "to buy," for "marriage," although their own language contains terms which are very precise.

Having gradually become informed as to the true nature of the bride price, a number of Europeans began to favor a return to the old system. Some took a radical and intransigent stand on the matters; others approached the question in a more reasonable manner, taking into account the changes that had resulted from colonization. It was perceived that the natives were not yet ready for the abolition of their ancestral laws and that marriages without a bride price rarely lasted, in part because the old sanctions had not been replaced with new measures adapted to the circumstances. Finally the government as well as the missions more or less strictly required that the matter of the bride price be settled before a "civil" or a "religious" marriage ceremony.

583x 182 Many Europeans wish for the abolition of the bride-price system because it seems inferior to them. And actually in the present circumstances of time and place, it does constitute an obstacle to the evolution of the natives toward a better social and moral condition. (1)

1. This is especially true of the consequences of the nkita system.

But such an abolition is neither practicable nor expedient. This system penetrates and molds, so to speak, the whole familial and social life

602 Some time thereafter, a man named Bengɔ́ngɔ́ from the Ndo̲ngɔ̲́ village of the Bongíli went to Boɛ́lɛ́ to visit his sister Bosɛ́ka, who was married to Eale ɛ́â Bofekɛ́. The latter told him that the village was enraged because of the assassination of one of their people by the Batswa of the Bongíli. 595 831 x And it is not difficult to understand this fact. For indeed polygamy constitutes a legitimate and easy means by which a man may enjoy several women without being bothered by palavers, difficulties, etc. The mentality of many men who care little about moral laws as well as the tendency of a disordered instinct to multiply its objects only confirm this observation. Often one sees men who were monogamists at first begin by taking a second wife out of passion. Then gradually their passion becomes greater rather than appeased, and so a harem is built up progressively.

595 178 x The changes introduced by colonization in the economic life of this people have not resulted in a decrease of polygamy. In the absence of exact figures we must be satisfied with simple visual observations, but in certain regions one has the impression that the harems have become smaller but, on the other hand, that the number of polygamists has increased, and therefore [375] the desire for polygamy, that is, its affective cause, has [651] not diminished. Nor does the extra tax frighten or stop the polygamists. The great means for changing the Nkundó attitude in this realm will always be the action of the missions and the penetration of Christian ethics, seconded by a government attitude favoring monogamy. (1)

[177] Another means, undoubtedly secondary but still important, is the example of European couples. The Blacks are imitative, and native women envy the lot of the white woman, so that European households are propaganda for monogamy when they behave well.

● [648] 1. The favorable attitude of the colonial government toward monogamy is expressed chiefly in the permission given to a polygamist's extra wives to abandon their husband in order to contract a monogamous union, preferably in a mission, under the supervision of missionaries.

548 In a center like Coquilhatville there are loose women who live in concubinage, first with one man and then another, a few days or weeks with this one, then the same length of time with that one; they are paid by each man but refuse to give up their freedom permanently. It is true that this city is outside the geographical limits of our study, but since it is located close to Nkundó territory and is important to them, I have touched on it briefly. No brothels are to be found there, and one does not encounter professional streetwalkers except for a few women who solicit among ship's crews. Most of the prostitutes in Coquilhatville are single girls or divorcées (legally or in fact). This disguised form of prostitution is not regulated here as it is in Leopoldville. (1) Nevertheless, the [77] government recognizes, at least in practice, the existence of a class of "free women" present in considerable numbers. Their way of life is contagious to such a degree that -- to an extent which varies greatly -- a noticeable number of girls who live with their parents but aspire to luxury have been seduced by it. (1)

● [651] 1. In the capital all native women who are adult and able bodied and who theoretically are living alone are taxed 50 francs (the certificates of payment show, in addition to other information, the number, name and address of the person taxed). This tax is not the equivalent of a permit to engage in licentious behavior or libertinism. It is not called a "prostitution tax" or any equivalent name, but some Europeans call it that because it has that appearance.

In addition there is a real regulation concerning prostitution; it is the Governor General's order of November 5, 1913, which establishes cards and periodical sanitary examinations for prostitutes. It would seem to be applied in Matadi, Leopoldville, and Elisabethville.

M 342 with rattan thongs. These walls are very strong and durable. The roof is usually covered with thatch, but it frequently happens that the native also uses panels of nse-nse to cover his hut. [43]

M 361 Among the peoples who live west of the lake, the huts are grouped in clusters of two or three and placed in two parallel lines. The free space between the clusters is very limited, so much so that at first sight all the huts seem to be continuous. The doors always open on the large street.

M 342 177 ● 656 We also visited a number of villages where earthen dwellings, built by administrative order, stretched out the whole length of the village. As a rule, however, these huts, which we regard as an improvement from the standpoint of hygiene and comfort, were not favored by the natives. The Negro had carried out the task imposed upon him, but he refused to enjoy it. His primitive hut, which was better adapted to the necessities of his life, retained its appeal and its occupants.

M 361 342 Among the Tumba of the east shore of the lake, we observed that the hut tends to present certain characteristics relating it to the type of hut with an arched roof found among the Buli [Oli] and farther north. The ridge, instead of being straight, extends beyond the ends of the hut and dips down, giving the whole structure the appearance of a bow bent [44] chiefly at the two ends. In certain dwellings the doors are placed in the side wall facing the main thoroughfare, and the huts are built in groups standing more or less close together. In other huts, on the other hand, the door is located in the gable wall and opens on a small veranda formed by the projecting roof front. The huts built this way are placed in a line, but are separated, and although the space between the two lines forms the chief thoroughfare of the village, each hut nevertheless boasts a small individual courtyard in front of the veranda. As to the method of construction, it is identical to those we noted in the region west of the lake.

M S 361 342 Among the peoples of the lower Lukenie, the huts are also built by the same method and with identical materials. The door, however, is nearly always in the gable wall, at the end where the roof projects, slightly curved, to form the veranda. 301 1 meter or 1.50 meters long; spiral shaped; the women wore these rolled around their legs as copper leggings.

[543] 4. Bakonga: copper rings which served as arm bands and foot bands and also as collars. The size differed for small or large persons; the weight is from one half kilo to 5 kilos.

436 5. Mitako: copper wire about 4 millimeters thick and 25 centimeters long, usually bent like a hairpin. The mitako served as a uniform currency, from which the other values and prices were reckoned, like the franc with us. The value of the mitako was formerly reckoned at five centimes.

583 Formerly the bride price, which was paid for a wife in al-
435 most all of Equatorial Africa, was from 5 to 20 bakonga. (The value of the bakonga differed greatly according to the weight. The average value, however, is estimated at 2.50 francs.) This payment was further supplemented with slaves or wives. This manner of payment and the bride price still exist in the districts where the natives have not yet, or practically not, come in contact with Europeans. Also, [567] it was sometimes paid with only slaves or women. The price for one female slave was relatively much less than for another woman.

178 Through the occupation of the Congo by Europeans, the 583 family life of the natives has necessarily undergone great changes, and their customs and habits as well.

In the first place the natives have found themselves deprived of their wives by the sentinels of the Independent Congo State.
[661] These black sentinels, appointed in the villages by the State to supervise the reaping of caoutchouc, assumed an unlimited power. They took as many wives of the natives as they chose and did not pay for a single one.

Next many black soldiers, servant boys, and workmen of the Europeans also took wives everywhere in the beginning, without bothering about the native customs, that is, without paying for those wives; and this often happened under the protective power of their Whites.

all fulfilled in one person. But such individuals do exist, if in the person of the investigator they find sympathy, broad ideas, a lack of all European racism, understanding, a knowledge of their language, and a benevolent devotion to their interests, individually and as a group.

Even if one has the good fortune to find a native who, after much experience, reaches the point where he will say spontaneously: "This is done often, but it is against the law; the law says thus and so; this decision of the tribunal was partial for such or such reason," -- an infinitely valuable situation, but one which arises very rarely -- one is not thereby absolved of the need to check his statements. But the further one goes, the more it is possible to be aware of the reality and to appraise the informant's value in this sphere and the usefulness of his statements.

These considerations are particularly valuable in making the distinction between obligations and social decorum or good manners, between legal obligations and obligations of kinship and mutual assistance. In current practice the Nkundó make no clear lines of demarcation between these categories, since they have never codified their law or attempted to set up a clear and precise classification. They feel no more need for this than, for instance, they or even we "civilized" people bother about setting up a grammar for our native tongue, which we speak correctly and without the slightest difficulty, purely out of habit.

[124]
An investigation in the legal domain is made [18] very difficult by the patriarchal and feudal character of these peoples, added to the lack of writing. Not only is there an adaptation to circumstances -- the felicitous flexibility of native laws -- in which jurisprudence plays a great role, but the Nkundó, while knowing well what is lawful and what is not, generally does not clearly understand the nature of an obligation, and above all he does not know its source.

121
One's chances of obtaining good results in the inquiry are greatly increased by the use of hypothetical cases, presented to the individuals one knows best and whom one knows to be in no way involved. It is always worthwhile to use this method as a means of completing and perhaps correcting conclusions based on the examination

582
602 The dispensation is given by the ndonga acting with the family council, which often yields before the fact, particularly if the second reason is involved. (1)

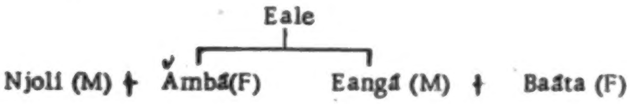
●[671] 2. Contrary to European law, which recognizes only a direct affinity between husband and his wife's family, Nkundó law also recognizes an indirect affinity, so that a person is affinally related even to the spouses of his wife's relatives. That is, each person is affinally related, not only to his spouse's kin, but also to their relatives by marriage. Thus, in the example below, Njoli and Baáta are true relatives by marriage, though indirect ones. (2)

> 2. The Nkundó do not make a terminological distinction between the two types of affinity. We are using the terms "direct" and "indirect" for the sake of convenience and clarity.



There is an important difference between the two types of affinity: direct affinity is a much greater obstacle to marriage than indirect affinity, and exceptions are made only rarely and only for certain degrees of relationship.

576 3) A distinction must be made between "superior" and "inferior" relatives, that is, between those who have [253] precedence

586 simply said that she has left her husband (aɔ̂kɔ́fa) and has been taken
837 in marriage by X (aɔ̂kúmbwa ɛ́ka Sóngɔ́ló). Having fallen in love
587 with another man's wife [390] and desiring to marry her, a man tries to win her favor. If she consents he collects the valuables necessary for the bride price. He then asks the woman to come to him and pays the bride price as for any marriage.

Instead of going directly to her seducer, the woman may also first go to her parents, especially if they are in favor of her plan. If they are not she would not succeed, because they would prevent her from carrying it out.

Cases of njangó were formerly rare because they were risky.
[721] As a matter of fact, they constituted a casus belli. Anyone who undertook such a venture had to be in a position to take the conse-
[178] quences of his act, especially with respect to the payment of an indemnity. Nowadays, on the other hand, these occurrences are much more frequent, even when the new husband does not have the means to pay the bride price at once. Nevertheless, the reversal in government policy is beginning to produce good results. The woman, or her mother, is often imprisoned; rarely the seducer. This penalty is often sufficient to restore order. But to keep from being exposed to further difficulties caused by the woman who no longer loves him, the abandoned husband sometimes refuses to take back his unfaithful wife.

The rarity of cases in former times as well as the fact that
● [671] they constituted a legitimate reason for war shows that the njangó did not have the approval of Nkundɔ́ law but that it was more or less considered an infraction.

2) Taking refuge. Because of the change in circumstances,
586 the practice of taking refuge is no longer common today. It used 577 to be done as follows: A woman who absolutely wanted to leave her husband and had no means of doing so, since no man had asked for her in marriage and her parents were powerless to help her, went secretly to a rich and influential man whom she would have liked as a husband. She arrived unexpectedly, stood before him, or even threw herself at him, crying, [391] Bejwɔ́ bɛ̌kɛ̌! ónjéngé,

Ntomba

224 of the two arches, and the other one is held in place by a mobile stick (D) placed transversally between the tips of the arches in such a fashion as to bar the mouth of the hole. In leaving or returning, the rodent sticks its head through the noose, and being impeded by the transverse stick (D), it pushes the stick aside with its paws, releasing the trigger stick (C) and the bent branch (E) which snaps up. The rodent is automatically caught in the noose, pulled up, and strangled. This snare is remarkably sensitive, and the rodent who tackles it is invariably caught.

The natives also set up snares for antelope. Being very observant, they quickly discover the place where an antelope passes regularly, as well as the size of the animal. They place a rattan noose at this spot and carefully hide it in the grass and leaves. The animal sticks its head through the noose in passing and is trapped. The more the animal struggles, the tighter the noose is drawn.

The native sets traps for the large flesh-eaters, hyenas, leopards, and large wild cats. [Ed., the text is not translated from the third paragraph, page 62, to the second paragraph, page 64.]

[64] Hunting the elephant and the hippopotamus involves traps, pitfalls, the spear, and the harpoon.

The pitfalls consist of large holes dug along the paths frequented by the pachyderms. These holes are three to four meters long, two meters wide, and four to five meters deep. At the bottom, the native plants wooden stakes whose ends, carved to a point, are hardened by fire. The opening is hidden by a mat of tree branches and roughly plaited creepers, covered with leaves and grass. These traps are a real danger to travelers in the country, and therefore the native is required to indicate their presence by a conventional sign prominently displayed. I first noticed these signposts between the Mosengere villages of Lokila and Gomo Erenge: a strong stake perpendicular to the ground, on top of which the native fastens a hoop and a stick. The latter is fixed obliquely to the ground in the direction of a straight line from the post to the trap. If a native neglects to place the signpost, he [672] loses his right to the game caught in the trap, and he is held responsible for any accidents that might result from his negligence.

593x If one day the marriage is dissolved, the wife may no longer
421 claim any right to the fields, utensils, clothing, etc. She does not [586] inherit from her husband. When she herself dies, her family has no right to anything she may have left except, of course, to valuables she has received on the occasion of the marriage of one of her daughters. (2)

2. See Chapter II, Article V. For fuller details, see Chapter VIII, Article V, and Chapter IX, Articles IV and VII.

593x The woman's position with respect to property has yet another 672 consequence; a husband is responsible for damage caused by his wife.
421 He is the one who must pay the indemnity. The same is true for any debts she may have contracted. If she has borrowed, her creditor claims his due not from the woman nor her family, but from her husband. He alone is recognized as legally responsible, since he alone has the rights to his wife's economic activity, and profits as well as losses from it. Afterward he has the right to scold and even beat his wife for causing him this financial injury. However, an exception is made in cases where the woman's family officially acknowledges, by publicly paying a ndanga before witnesses, that she is at fault and thus frees the husband of any responsibility.

We may thus draw the following conclusions:

1) A woman is not an owner.

2) However she has the right to a reasonable amount for her various needs. This right is not a true property right (jus in re); it is a right to what is necessary for subsistence (jus ad rem).

3) Thus it is not possible for a woman's parents to inherit the goods which her husband has placed at her disposal [265].

4) A wife never acts in her own name but as her husband's agent; therefore he is legally responsible.

593 required to re-establish peace and harmony by means of a considerable 758 boɔ́ndo, for having failed to take care of his wife and for having shown complete thoughtlessness and indifference.

If the illness becomes prolonged or serious, neither the hus-
593 band nor his relatives have the leisure to nurse or take care of her.
758 To remedy this situation and at the same time give the woman's 672 parents the satisfaction of being able to help their daughter themselves, the husband sends her to them. He takes her there himself or calls them to come and get her. He communicates the news by sending his ndonga who bears a token payment (ndanga, loákako) such as a knife, a copper ring, etc. This ndanga is a pledge, evidence for the family that their daughter was ill on arrival and did not acquire her infirmity while with them. Without this pledge they would not want to take her; they would prefer to treat her in her husband's home. Or if the husband were to send her home without a ndanga, they would call the ndonga to witness this infraction of the rules. Or the fact that the husband has done this might be considered as a repudiation of his wife, pure and simple. In any case the husband would be in the wrong, and under these conditions the legal responsibility for his wife's death would fall entirely on him (see Chapter IX, Article X).

593 When the wife is cured, her parents send a message to their 758 son-in-law to urge him to come and take his wife back.

Even if they have not been invited by the husband, the wife's parents come to see their daughter when they hear of her illness [268] in order to take her away with them and care for her. She usually follows them, but she is not required to do so since she belongs to her husband. People even cite the names of women who despite the insistence of their families did not want to be cared for at home, but have preferred to die in their husband's arms, so to speak. Among them were Bolɔ́mbɔ́ w'Ikofo of Bombɛ́nga w'Ɔ̂kenda (Besombɔ́) married to Iembe y'Ilongo of Engɔ́njɔ́; Baleko of Nsekɛ́ married to Eanga ɛá Jatá of Nkɛ́lengo; Iombe of Bosáá married to Bokɔ́lɔ́mbwá of Iálá; Balengola of Ntɔ́mbá (Bombwanja) married to Lompoko of Mbelɛ́; Mpɛ́mbɛ́ of Bonganda (Bonkoso) married to Imbamba of Bonjoku;

593* Efala of Longa married to Ìfolí of Bokɛ́nyola (Bonjoku); Basɛ́sɛ́ of 758 Mbelɛ́ married to Nkengo of Litɔ́li.

If the woman went to her family in good health and contracted an infirmity there, her parents are responsible for it. They are obliged to nurse her and to assume all the expenses due to her treatment. After she is cured they send her back with a quantity of nkomɛ́ for her husband. Usually the matter ends there. If relations between the two families are not very good, however, the husband will claim an indemnity, which varies with the situation and to which he is entitled even if he does not claim it.

This stipulation of the law holds even if the woman has gone to see her mother, father, etc., at the time of an illness or for any other reason.

It does not hold, on the other hand, if the wife has been ordered to go to her parents by her husband, or if she has fled the home shared with her husband because of ill treatment or of serious failings on his part; this point will be explained below in number 3. In such cases the husband is legally responsible for the illness.

Certain situations may arise which are intermediate to the ones discussed. Thus, for example, a wife may make a visit on her own initiative [269] but for her husband's good. Theoretically, he should win the case. Note, finally, that a stay of only twenty-four hours is not considered sufficient to make responsibility for an illness fall on the wife's family.

Colonization has produced an entirely new situation.
178 Colonial law has given the extra wives of polygamists the freedom
595* to go to a mission in order to be instructed in the Christian religion 758 and to contract a monogamous marriage (provided the customary
● 672 rules governing the dissolution of marriages are observed). Such a 797 woman may fall ill at the mission. If her illness has no troublesome consequences, it does not result in a dispute. But if the illness becomes chronic and in some way detrimental to the abandoned spouse, it may do so.

The polygamists declare that they are free of any responsibility, which they place on the woman's family. But the family has 178 nothing to do with it; it is unjust to bring them into the matter.

595x Since this legislation is intended to combat polygamy, it is natural 758 that the polygamous husband be the one who suffers from it.

●672 The following is a recent example of this situation: Mbőyő
797 Julienne, sister of Botűna Jean of Balondő, married to a polygamist by the name of Insílo of Bokenyola (Bonjoku), went to Bokuma Mission, where she contracted an incurable illness. (1) Because of her illness she found it impossible to remarry. She therefore left the mission but was no longer accepted by the husband she had lived with so that she had to live in her brother's home. Insílo insisted that her brother reimburse him for the bride price, maintaining that in going to the mission, the woman had divorced him; his real reason, however, [270] was that she had become unfit to fulfill the duties of a wife. Since Mbőyő did not fall ill in his home, he held her family responsible.

593x 3. Abandonment of the home shared by the couple

586x In the case of serious failings on the part of a husband, a woman's usual weapon is to leave their common home and return to her father's house. If the reason for her flight is serious, it is up to the husband to go and bring her back. She will not return on her own initiative. If he refuses to make the first step, he will be accused as much by public opinion as by his parents-in-law of not loving his wife, and a rupture will become inevitable. It is therefore his duty to go to his wife's parents. They will ask him to explain the situation. The wife, too, will say what she thinks. The parents will settle their difference. Whether or not the ndonga is present will depend on the

1. It was a sort of illness with nervous symptoms. From a scientific viewpoint, it is more than likely that she had this illness before her arrival at the mission, although it was only manifested there. But the natives do not make this distinction, so it is not relevant to our topic.

626 The shame attached to the discovery of this sort of misconduct in the better circles in Europe is unknown among the Nkundó. 837 This is natural since isolated instances are readily excused. As to [152] the habitual offenders, they are sensitive [326] to the above-mentioned epithets but will not correct their ways on this account any more than people in other parts of the world.

837 626 684 An adulterous husband is criticized as much as an adulterous wife in spite of the difference in the means of repression which Nkundó law provides for their respective misconduct.

Public opinion therefore corroborates the conclusion toward which our examination of sanctions has pointed, namely that adultery is condemned by the Nkundó. Opinion is not based on the existence of the sanction but seems to spring from their innate mentality, which makes them perceive adultery as a disorder.

6. Aggravating circumstances

837 842 672 If a case of adultery is followed by conception, it becomes especially serious, and for the husband as much as for the natural father. Indeed the latter must assume all the consequences. When circumstances permit the husband makes his wife denounce her accomplice, and she does not refuse to do so. The husband then calls a meeting and demands a pledge (ndanga) from the culprit, who in that way acknowledges that he is at fault and shows his willingness to assume all responsibility. If there is a miscarriage or the child dies during delivery, the natural father must pay the legal father an indemnity of "a slave" or more (sometimes 50 rings); a smaller indemnity is required for a child who is only deformed or sickly. If the mother dies the indemnity consists of a slave and 50 rings, and it may go as high as 100 rings.

In the interim the husband no longer goes near his wife. He leaves her to her lover, who must "preserve the foetus" and observe all the rites and practices associated with pregnancy and childbirth, since, physically, he is the father. (1) [327]

1. For fuller details see Chapter X, Article II, 3. For analogous practices

837
[842] in the case of an unmarried mother, see Chapter I, Part 1, Article III, 3.

[843] Adultery also becomes especially serious during the period preceding childbirth when there is a special prohibition against it, as endangering the lives of both mother and child, as we will explain in Chapter X, Article III.

7. Remarks and general conclusions

837
[721] 1) In former times the offense of adultery, even in its mildest form, that is, an isolated act, was one of the chief causes of "wars" between villages. Sometimes both sides called on their relatives by marriage to assist them, and the result was a general upheaval.

837
595* 2) As a rule a husband wants his wife to be faithful. Doubtless there are exceptions. Most if not all of them were formerly found among the old polygamists. At their age they were disgusted with continual palavers, and their experience as men had taught them that they often became angry and uselessly complicated their little lives. They preferred to close their eyes, like good old Bo̲no̲f w'ĩko̲lo̲ngó̲ of Ite̲ko̲ (the Bombwanja clan of the Boóyá). He came to see me in the Christian village of Bombomba through which I was passing at the beginning of March, 1933. I asked him why he was adorned with so many bells, and he answered naively, "I always wear them. That way my wives know of my coming already from a distance. It gives them time to stop slandering me and to send their lovers away." When I expressed my surprise that he did not want to catch them in the act in order to punish them and end their infidelities, he answered me with a smile, "No, Father, jealousy . . . is for the young. As for me, I have seen so much of it that I no longer have any desire to get angry and make palavers for these trivialities."

548
837
595 Since the coming of the Europeans some unscrupulous men -- especially polygamists -- have been engaging in [328] a kind of procuring. They send their wives to commit adultery in order to be able to catch them in the act and thus enrich themselves. Or else they lend their wives for one night or more to laborers or soldiers who are

567

could not be otherwise. In such matters each group took care only of its own interests; and none of the procedures usually accompanying the dissolution of a marriage were observed. However, the husband was entitled to an indemnity, in the form of persons or valuables, from the member of his clan who had fomented the war and was held responsible for all its consequences, whatever the way in which he had provoked it. If necessary, this member could be forced to pay. If he did not have the means to pay indemnities, he himself was reduced to slavery, if the influence of the families involved did not prevent this occurrence. When the woman was enfranchised and a new bride price was paid for her, her family was expected to reimburse her former husband.

● [672]

Since, at present, slavery has been abolished, ransom can no longer be paid. A master who wishes to enfranchise a slave woman who has remained faithful to him, simply gives her family the bride price and then goes with his wife to her home to receive the dowry.

Article VI. Life in a Harem

595ˣ Wives of the same husband address each other among themselves as bakalé (sing. bokalé). Their husband calls them all baálí, [358] "wives." All except for true slaves are married by means of a bride price. A woman's sons call their mother's bakalé baálí, "wives," but out of respect toward the older ones

586x 672 If the wife is ill she may have become ill at her husband's home or elsewhere and these two possible situations must be considered separately. In the first instance there is no cause for divorce, since responsibility for her illness rests entirely with the husband. On the other hand, if the wife contracted her illness while staying with her family, the family must shoulder the responsibility, and if her illness is incurable, the husband can have recourse to divorce. But this is not so if the wife has gone to her parents' home in response to her husband's express order, or if she ran away from the husband's for reasons which are just and reasonable. Some situations may give rise to violent disputes. Such is the case, for example, of an illness during a visit undertaken at the wife's own initiative but for the good of the husband. Theoretically, he should win the case. Also, a stay of twenty-four hours is not considered sufficient to place the responsibility for the illness on the wife's family. (1)

1. For details see Chapter VI, Article III, 3 and 4. See also Chapter IX, Article X.

586x The difference between the consequences of the husband's illness and his wife's is of a practical nature. A husband who suffers from an incurable illness or one that takes too long to cure is usually (though not always) abandoned by his wife. If no other man pays a bride price for her, the marriage continues. If the woman finds a lover, he pays the bride price, which is turned over to the first husband, completing the divorce. But it is not possible to say that the man's illness per se is a cause of divorce, for the wife is under an obligation to take care of a sick husband. [378] But in practice neither of the two families involved demand the application of this law. All yield to the wishes of the woman, who will refuse to continue a union that has so little attraction for her.

Thus illness is not a legally valid reason for divorce. But in practice it is recognized as a situation that can result in the dissolution of a marriage.

[842] Although the Nkundó ardently desire children, sterility

586x and this was generally the case -- he did not kill him personally 682 but assigned the task to someone else -- his son, his younger [563] brother, or nephew, etc. Preferably, he hired a Botswá. The price for this service was 20 copper rings, the sum of the bride price paid [612] for a Botswá woman. Nkundó law places the entire responsibility for an assassination and all its consequences upon the person who orders it performed. Certain of the Batswa specialized in this field.
Among them (of those dependent on the Bombwanja) were Esenge of Bokengé, Mbólókó of Bombembe, Wai w'ìtúmola of Bakoyó;
Lǔwá jw'ìtómbengándá (died in 1933) also of Bakoyó; Botómba wá
Lokio and Mpótó éy'Ilókó of Mbanja (still alive).

The scorned husband had still other means of taking revenge 586x or obtaining indemnification. He made use of them only if the occasion was favorable or if he was not in a position [382] to go into expensive adventures such as a war or an assassination. They were the following:

3) Ikákelo: (1) A relative of his who was married into the unfaithful wife's clan could be prevented from returning to her husband.

4) The seizure of one of the wives of his recalcitrant father-in-law, or of one of the latter's relatives. This action is called by the generic term lowáála, which signifies "compensation." (2)

The prisoner was usually put in an etáka (a wooden fork fastened to the neck) (3) to prevent her flight and hasten the reimbursement of [567] the bride price. If the matter was not settled she became a slave.

586 other." (1)
[672]

1. Except, of course, if the new husband puts himself in the wrong by taking the woman home with him before the divorce is completed (see above).

The term for making restitution of the bride price is [192] úndoja (baúmbá, jengí, etc.); [399] its intransitive form is úndola ("to recover the cost of the bride price," and the passive is únjwa, "to be restituted." The noun is njúndó or wúndó ("restitution," "reimbursement").

2. Methods of making restitution

The woman's father can pay back the bride price in two ways:

1) By means of valuables received from the new husband. In this case the more the latter hastens his payment, the sooner the new union will be made final.

2) By means of his own wealth, lontumú or bokakata (ekakata), an intensitive derived from likata, "hand." This method of payment settles the matter more quickly and avoids complaints lodged by the former husband. Sometimes restitution is made in this manner to show wealth and generosity.

In such a case the father acts spontaneously of his own free will. But can he be required to thus make restitution with his own wealth?

Yes. If the bride price is still in the hands of the woman's family, it must be returned immediately. This rule is easily understood, for under these circumstances no practical difficulty stands in the way of reimbursement.

Although as a rule the bride-price valuables will already have been spent for the acquisition of another wife (the nkita), this is not always the case. For example, only a very short time may have elapsed between the conclusion of the marriage and the divorce. But such a case was and is rare. Instances where the bride price was still in the family's possession were even rarer in the past, for people did not want bride-price wealth to remain

768 Nkundó categorically state that the situation now under discussion does not result in the payment of an indemnity.

This observation again brings out the basic difference between jengí and bosóngo, which we have already discussed in Chapter II, Article IX, 2 and Article XII, 5, and suggests that the walo constitutes the marriage agreement, whereas the bosóngo is the substitution of a person for the one that is lost to the clan through the marriage of one of their members.

Article X

A Woman's Death at the Home of Her Own Family

768 593 672 We have already drawn the reader's attention several times to the fact that a husband is responsible for his wife because, in accordance with the clan agreement between the families, she "belongs" to him. [451] The consequence of this stipulation of Nkundó law is that the husband assumes all risks relating to the wife; hence he must take upon himself all the damages resulting from her death. There are exceptions to this general rule, however, under the following two circumstances:

1) If the wife dies while at the home of her own family.

2) If the wife dies after having left her own husband for another.

In this article we will examine the first of these two possible situations, leaving the second one for the next article.

If a wife dies while at her own family's home, an exception is made if certain conditions are fulfilled. There are several situations possible:

1) The wife returns to her family because she is exasperated with the unfair treatment she receives from her husband. He may not be fulfilling his duties toward her, may be mistreating her unjustly, etc., as we have seen in Chapter VI, Article III. The situation becomes unbearable. In that case the husband is clearly in the wrong, and the wife has the right to seek a little peace in her parents' home. Under such conditions, if she dies before the

768 husband has come to take her back through arranging a palaver by ●672 means of a boóndo, he has no right to complain. He himself
593x brought on such difficulties by his unfair way of behaving. He is obliged to make the funeral payments. Because of the strained relations between him and his father-in-law, the affinal relationship is broken. That is why he will ordinarily refuse to pay the nkunjí, at least when he has had no children by this woman. If he omits the payment even though there are progeny, the children are taken from him by their mother's family.

This situation seldom arose in the past. Young and impetuous husbands were almost nonexistent. The old men kept the women for themselves. Age and experience with life had made them more settled, calmer, more reasonable, so they did not throw themselves into adventures [452] whose outcome were necessarily to their disadvantage. Since today men marry considerably younger, such situations can arise more easily; although, on the other hand, a permanent dissolution of the marriage occurs most frequently before the possible development described.

2) The wife leaves her husband without just reason and, having returned to her family, dies there. In the past such a situation was quite rare (Chapter VIII, Article II, 1, A). If no war occurred before the death of the fugitive (a war automatically terminated the affair), the husband had every right to reimbursement or to a substitution of another wife for the deceased. The situation is therefore identical to the one that follows. But there is no longer any question of sending back the corpse, and if the husband wants to break the alliance permanently he does not even need to pay the nkunjí.

Nowadays this situation has become far more common. It presents no special difficulty; the ancient custom continues to be observed.

It is almost trifling to mention that the matter of total or 768 partial reimbusement of the bride price can be handled through 593x friendly transactions between the husband and his parents-in-law. The following case is typical: Bonjeló of Iámbo (Bonkoso) inherited Boélé, daughter of Lokálámbá is Ibele of Bonganda. After some years she left her husband, returned home, and died. Her father

768 sent the notification gift and even added dogs to it, because he 583x was interested in keeping the affinal relationship. The corpse was not sent since the woman had died of an infectious disease and the body was decomposing rapidly so that contagion was feared. Lokálámbá presented the widower with his youngest daughter Mbangó as a substitute. But since she was quite young, Bonjeló did not want her. He was satisfied with an indemnity because -- after all -- he too wanted to remain on good terms with his father-in-law. The latter sent him 22 rings as an ilengé (slave), and thus the matter was closed. [453]

3) The wife has returned to her family on her own initiative
768 in order to visit her parents, nurse them, or to participate in her ●672 family's communal fishing, to get her supply of edible caterpillars, 593x or for any other reason. In such a case the responsibility passes from the husband to the parents. The family must notify the husband of the death (always, of course, through the ndonga). When the husband receives the news he accuses his parents-in-law, saying: lóómbomela walí, "You have killed my wife." He demands that the corpse be sent to him so that he can wash it, adorn it in an appropriate manner, and mourn for the deceased. Subsequently he sends the corpse back with the ndonga and demands that another wife be substituted for the deceased or, if none is available, that the bride price be returned to him. As long as his father-in-law does not fulfill his obligations, the husband will not bring the funeral payments. Moreover, if the family of the deceased is recalcitrant or too slow, he will practice ikákelo, that is, he will hold one of his kinswomen who is married into the clan of the deceased in order to obtain her bride price. In this way he will obtain the valuables to which he is entitled; the two bride prices balance one another and the matter is settled permanently. In that case he naturally retains all his rights over his children.

This solution applies on even stronger grounds if the wife's family themselves have called her home.

If the wife falls ill in her parents' home, it may happen that her husband wants to care for her himself. He will demand

768 a pledge (ndanga) from his father-in-law to the effect that the ●672 illness started in his home. If he neglects to take this precaution 593x and his wife dies, he has no legal means to claim indemnification.

4) A solution identical to the one described above is applied even if a wife goes to her parents for her husband's personal benefit in order to get him something he needs, such as beer for a [454] feast, valuables with which to settle a palaver, etc. It holds true even if the husband has sent her expressly for this purpose.

This situation easily gives rise to violent disputes, however. The wife's family tries to reject the husband's claims by objecting that it is he himself who sent his wife, or at least that she came to them solely for his sake. Nevertheless, in the end the husband is the one who is right and who wins the case. (1)

1. A stay of twenty-four hours is not considered sufficient to place the civil responsibility for an illness, nor therefore for death, on the wife's family.

5) The wife goes home ill. As we have seen in Chapter VI, Article III, 2, the parents are not willing to nurse their daughter unless their son-in-law -- always through the ndonga -- gives them a ndanga in testimony of the fact that she was ill when she left him. The husband thus recognizes his responsibility for all possible consequences of the illness. Consequently, he can make no claims in case of death.

Since the civil responsibility for the death falls to the husband, the latter is notified by the ndonga, but the family does not send him a notification ring. The ndanga for the illness takes the place of this payment. The widower asks that the corpse be brought to him so that he can perform the last rites, and this request is always granted. There is nothing special about the rest of the procedure; everything takes place as if the wife had died in her husband's home.

6) The wife is repudiated by her husband. In the past this happened only if the woman behaved very badly and showed herself to be incorrigible. As we have seen in Chapter VIII, Article II, 1, no. 2, the husband did not send her back to her family; he 768 ●672 593x fastened her to a fork (etáka) until he was reimbursed. Sometimes the ndonga intervened to free her, but by doing so he took upon himself the responsibility of making restitution of the bride price. In this last [465] instance, if the wife died in the home of her family, the husband was entitled to reimbursement just as he would be in case of a divorce. Thus we come back to the situation described under 2) and 3), the forms varying according to whether or not the widower wanted to continue the affinal relationship.

[178] Nowadays the situation has changed entirely. The colonial administration no longer permits the use of the etáka. Consequently, a man who wants to get rid of his incorrigible wife acts in such a way that she will leave him of her own free will. And the situation is again that described in 2).

If the husband has sent his wife away himself by placing her in the hands of the ndonga, his parents-in-law will refuse him an indemnity or any restitution of the bride price and often will not even accept the nkunjí. They answer his demands by telling him that he should not have repudiated the wife whom he freely chose for himself. Thus most men resort to the procedure described in the next paragraph. There are circumstances, however, under which this mode of action is more difficult; this is so especially in the case of monogamists, since its execution requires several weeks, sometimes several months. In the interim the wife does as she pleases and neglects her husband, so that the latter practically finds himself a bachelor.

797 768 672 593x Evangelization has added a second difficulty. Catholic marriage is indissoluble. Catechumens and Christians who wish to marry must therefore be careful. Before admitting them to religious marriage, we require that at least the walo be paid. But the young men know the temperament and value of their fiancées only through experience. In almost every case therefore they have this experience at home before the walo, in accordance with their ancestral custom. Then, if one of the two parties is pagan (which happens very often), the disciplinary rules of the Catholic missions in the Congo require that they spend a minimum of six months

797 preparing at a mission station or catechumenate [456]. During 768 the experimental period, the engaged pair sometimes find faults
672 in each other which lead them to foresee a married life filled with 593x difficulties and resulting in a breakup. Therefore it is preferable that they carry out the required measures before marriage. The woman is usually the source of the difficulties. The female sex has hardly been touched by evangelization, chiefly because pagan parents, who do not oppose the Christianization and education of their boys, take their revenge on the girls. What they fear particularly is the girls' opposition to premature marriages or their flight to the centers. For those people, therefore, it is almost impossible to get round the difficulty in such a way. As the situation is not provided for in traditional law and, furthermore, most of the natives who hold power are clearly indifferent, if not hostile, to evangelization and the stability of Christian marriage, these special circumstances are not taken into account in any way, to the great detriment of the young people who are thus caught between their consciences and their temporal interests (which in this instance have strong repercussions on their moral life). The attitude of almost all the chiefs and judges in this matter is not contrary to ancestral law -- since the situation was unknown -- but it is certainly opposed to the spirit of that law.

7) The couple go to the home of the wife's family together.
672 Illness and death that come unexpectedly during such a visit are 768 imputed solely to the husband, who retains all the risks except,
593x of course, if the husband returns home but his wife does not follow him, remaining with her parents. Indeed in such a case we fall back on the solution described in 2).

8) Here we come back to the possibility indicated at the end of Article IX, 1, namely that of the wife who dies in her [457] family's home before the walo is paid. If the husband is in the wrong (see under 1), 5), and 7), the solution given in the article in question retains all its validity; the husband's "responsibility" remains intact. In the other instances it is reduced but not taken away. Actually, two laws are in conflict. On the one hand, there is the "responsibility" of the husband who has not fully acquitted

768 672 593x himself of his obligations, and, on the other, the "responsibility" of the woman who did not remain with her husband. To draw a comparison from the realm of accounting, there are two sides, debit and credit. But the latter lies chiefly on the side of the woman's family, for at the time of death the woman is not yet a wife in the full sense of the word. Consequently, the husband must pay an indemnity. But the fact that his fiancée died at home with her family is for him an extenuating circumstance as a result of which the indemnity is reduced, so that he need only pay about a half, that is, around 25 to 35 rings.

Conclusions

The explanations given may seem a little wordy. Nevertheless, it was useful to indicate all the diversity of possible situations in order to deduce the rule and to grasp the basis of the system from actual facts. Everything considered, it would thus appear that the husband assumes all risks with regard to his wife, and that he must bear all the damages resulting from her loss. She really belongs to him and not to her family in spite of any impression one may have that on the contrary the woman belongs more to her parents than to her husband. For even in the instances where she dies in her parents' home, having gone there for a justifiable reason, her death is considered an injustice toward her husband, since a wife's place is in the conjugal home. Such is the general rule. Exceptionally, in special instances defined by law, a woman's parents reassume the risks for her, that is, they again become responsible for her. [458]

Article XI

A Wife's Death in the Home of Another Man

768 672 Here we will consider what happens if a woman who has left her husband and gone to another man dies in the home of the latter before the restitution of the bride price to the former. Two situations may arise:

768 672 1) The walo may have been paid by the second husband, but restitution to the first husband may not yet have been made. The latter is entitled to reimbursement of the bride price just as he would be if the woman had not died (Chapter VIII, Article III), whereas the rules given in the preceding article are applicable to the new husband.

2) The walo may not yet have been paid; in that case the second husband must conform to the rules given in Article IV, 1 and Article X, 8). The first husband must recover the valuables to which he is entitled in accordance with the rules indicated in Chapter VIII, Article III.

Here are two recent instances:

Ifomí yǎ Lokombe, daughter of Ikotama of Bontole wá Yǔyokonda (Bongíli), was married to Baleka of Nkílenjóló (Losenge, Bombwanja). One day she went to Bempumbá to be baptized by the Protestant missionary. On her way back she was delayed by Ilumbé of Iámbo (Bonkoso), who wanted to marry her. He gave Ikotama an ikulá. Shortly thereafter Ifomí died. Ilumbé was obliged to pay a large indemnity, equaling the entire bride price, to Ifomí's father, who in turn had to reimburse Baleka.

Âmbá, daughter of Nkálanga of Ifutó (Bongíli) was married to Yônjwa of Boímbo. She left him for Bengóngó of Boambá, who paid the ikulá. One day when Bengóngó was returning from a trip, Âmbá ran to meet him in order to bid him welcome. But in her haste she struck the root of a shrub, stumbled, and fell. Her fall must have caused internal injuries, for she was forced to remain in bed and died shortly thereafter. Bengóngó was obliged [459] to pay an indemnity of 30 rings plus two slaves, or a total of 80 rings, to Nkálanga, who in turn reimbursed the first husband.

The case is comparable to that of a wife's death which occurs in her husband's home but is caused by another man -- who either had daily relations with her or caused a pregnancy which resulted in her death. The responsibility in either case falls upon the lover, who must indemnify the husband. The indemnity is always very large, equaling the amount of a bride price or more. (1)

1. See Chapter I, Part II, Article V, 1, and Chapter VI, Article VII, 6.

768 672 178 Colonization has given rise to a new legal situation which is not provided for in Nkundó traditional law. If a woman takes advantage of the freedom permitted her by colonial legislation and goes to a mission to obtain instruction and make a monogamous marriage, and then contracts an illness from which she dies (at the mission, in the hospital, or even in the home of her family -- a question of place which has no legal importance), we find ourselves confronted by an entirely new situation. The husband no longer considers the woman his wife since she has left him, even though theoretically she continues to retain that status. On the other hand, she has not gone back to her family or gone to live with another man.

Polygamous husbands want to throw the "responsibility" back upon the woman's parents. But actually they have no part in the events, and it is unfair to involve them in the situation.

They do not bring the mission into the matter. As a matter [197] of fact, the mission performs a service to the woman and to society as a whole in trying to elevate it morally and culturally.

What should one think of this situation? In the preceding article we have seen that the husband assumes all risks in relation to the wife. Certain exceptions to this rule [460], which we have explained, have been formulated in Nkundó law; but outside of them, the law retains its dominion, since the exceptions are narrowly defined. Thus it applies to the situation with which we are dealing, and consequently the damages must remain on the husband's account.

Moreover, this interpretation is to be encouraged for the following reason:

The purpose of the legislation involved is to protect freedom in this matter of capital importance and to favor monogamy and the gradual abandonment of polygamy. Polygamists -- as a group -- must perforce suffer from it in one way or another. It is inconceivable that a struggle against an abuse would not affect the persons guilty of it.

Such cases are still very rare, but their frequency may increase with the progress of evangelization. 768

672 682 In terminating this duscussion we must make one point that is related to both of the last two articles. The cause of death has no

768 legal importance. The solutions given are the same whether the 672 cause of death be organic or criminal. If the latter is the case,
682 however, the murderer must pay an indemnity, which is given to the person who has been wronged, whether it be the woman's husband or her family; in any case he thus satisfies the requirements of justice.

A woman may be murdered while she is visiting one of her husband's kinswomen in accordance with her husband's wishes. In that case the sister-in-law's husband bears the responsibility. He must indemnify the victim's husband, and he himself is entitled to indemnification by the murderer. To simplify this procedure, the murderer can make his payment directly to the widower; justice is still safeguarded. But in no case does the indemnity go to the victim's father, for legally and economically it belongs to the husband, not to the father, who is indemnified through the funeral payments. [461]

Conclusions

1) A marital union is broken by death only for the person who 581 dies. For the one who remains alive, the dissolution is completed 768 only after other procedures. If the husband dies the widow remains the wife of the heirs and is free only after restitution of the bride price has been made. At the death of the wife the husband can marry a substitute.

A widow's remarriage without restitution of the bride price
581 (and therefore without a new bride price), or that of a widower
587 with a substitute, is considered a continuation of a pre-existing 768 union which has not been dissolved. This continuation is not absolute, however. Actually, it is perfect only in the case of the husband's death, in which case his kin group inherits all his rights and therefore also the rights to the wives he has acquired by means of his capital. On the other hand, if a widower is to continue the relationship after his wife's death, he must pay another bride price.

The difference between the two instances is due to the connection of the bride price with the "ownership" of a woman; she remains subject to it and as a result becomes legally the spouse

853 The child is given to a wet nurse (a kinswoman, a stranger, a Botswa woman, depending on who is available).

847 If the mother's body shows no signs of evil-doing or of 845 "the hatred of others," it is thought that her death was caused
843 by evil spells on the part of the child. Thereupon some kill the child to prevent it from doing harm during its whole life; others, on the contrary, spare it despite everything.

843 If the husband (for it is he above all who is involved, since he is most exposed to possible lapses) has unfortunately been guilty
837 of misconduct, his wife has only a slim chance [478] of salvation. Nevertheless, it is still possible for her to be saved, on condition that from then on her husband abstain from any sexual act and from all the accidental gestures and actions described above. The least he can do under these circumstances is to inform his wife of his indiscretion so that she can take precautions. If he wants to [672] ward off any possibility of causing his wife's certain death, he sends her home and gives his father-in-law a pledge (ndanga) through which he recognizes his guilt and shows his intention to assume the entire responsibility for his misdeed. An upright man prefers to act in this fashion, for he never knows whether one day he will not inadvertently violate one of the prohibitions.

B. The child's death is the result of the putrefaction of 853 the mother's milk, the mother being thus incapable of nursing.
837 As in the preceding case, the offense is a priori imputed to the husband -- iaś aboma bǒna la ndota. (1) Since he has wronged no one but himself, no palaver ensues; the "natural" punishment is sufficient. This does not mean that he is not the object of evil tongues; people point at him and at times remind him of his misdeed. To remove the blame from himself, he can resort to

624 An nkumu can never walk alone, but must always be accompanied by others, and on no occasion whatsoever may he run. Even though he never washes, if he is out [781] in the rain and sees everybody else hurrying for shelter, he will not quicken his pace.
[513] His movements must be slow and deliberate. The nkumu never sleeps alone; waking and sleeping he is attended by someone. But apart from this he is free to go where he wishes. The nkumu is not indiscriminate, as others may be, in his private habits, but [514] must use his own latrine at all times, and if travelling must have his own latrine in each place where he stays. The inland nkumu frequently take advantage of this custom [556] by hiding their accumulated brass rods at the bottom of a freshly dug latrine. Such hidden wealth will be acquired by an inheritor at the decease of the nkumu.

In speaking of himself the nkumu never refers to himself by his title but always by his own name.

624 The couch upon which the nkumu sits or reclines during the daytime may not be shared indiscriminately with others, but those permitted to sit upon it at the same 352 time as the nkumu are nsomi, women, and Batwa. The reservation of this couch for [562 the use of the nkumu is not surprising, but the exceptions are. One explanation given 565] was that women and Batwa are not bato ba sai, persons in particular; they do not count for anything in the social life of the community; they are not really 'people'. Another explanation was that they do not pay fines, this being tantamount to saying [672] that they are exempt from laws and therefore cannot break laws even by doing what would be for others an illegal act. The stool of the nkumu, however, has closer restrictions in the manner of its use. Besides the nkumu only two others may sit upon it, Nsese and Mpenge. It is always carried by one of his wives, though not necessarily by any special one.

624 The restrictions concerning the food of the nkumu are many. He may eat food only in his own house, or, if on a journey, in one given over for his use. He may not 262 enter another house to partake of food even if invited to do so. Likewise the nkumu may not eat in the forest, or eat or drink anywhere along the road when on a journey, but must wait until he arrives at a village and has a house at his disposal in order to partake of food and drink. He never 'sleeps with hunger'; even if a wife or child should die causing him great sorrow he must partake of food before going to sleep.
[765] The Bonginda nkumu must never go into mourning, and death must be ignored by them, but the inland nkumu are permitted to mourn. All food carried to an nkumu must be covered, this rule even applying to water. Food must not be placed in a basket with high sides (ekolo), but in a shallow one (mpale), and no food that has been kept overnight in a pot may be eaten by him: swelling of the abdomen will result. Various foods are taboo, among these all fast-moving snakes, though slow-
[828] moving ones may be eaten; light-coloured palm-nuts may not be eaten, and a variety of yam known as mokiki is shunned, for it is with the tough stems of the mokiki that the dying body of the nkumu will be bound to ensure the sitting posture necessary for burial.

624 Among regulations roughly classed as social, we have already covered several in references above, and have referred to the nkumu in council. It may be added here that [623] he is expected to agree with the majority of the councillors and not fall out with them. The rules affecting the usage of the nkumu are accompanied by severe penalties. There [681] must not be any fighting; if anger is aroused to the point of blows the antagonists

must go to the monkeke for their fight, this being the location of the houses belonging to the sons of the nkumu. The penalty for breaking this law is a fine, and if no fine were forthcoming hanging used to be the alternative. If a quarrel arises elsewhere and one party wishes to avoid fighting, he may retire to the songo and thus be safe. No trees in the songo may be climbed. There are, however, privileged classes exempt from all such rules, and these embrace a good many people. Thus, the mother of twins, twins, Batwa, maomi, and all members of the molembe and ekopo are exempt from the laws of the songo. If any of these commit acts which are illegal for those coming under the law, they are not held guilty, but their actions will not be condoned; they will be considered breaches of good conduct, and will be dealt with informally; the parties will be quietly reprimanded, and adjured to observe the proprieties of conduct. For outsiders breaking the laws of the songo, what corresponds to a warrant is necessary. It is necessary to catch the culprit in the act and hale him before the nkumu. The nkumu himself cannot do this, nor can any of the ekopo; it must be done by one of the molembe, and so if the nkumu sees someone infringing the law he will try to get one of the molembe on the spot in a hurry in order to catch the offender. 624 689 [845] [672] [626] [696]

In war,[1] it is the molomi o eke who is most active in preparations, but the nkumu will accompany his party to battle, keeping well in the rear, and surrounded by good fighters. He does not wear his montolo but puts on the informal hat. If an nkumu were captured, he would never be tortured or killed as were other prisoners, unless he specifically sought such a fate. He could be ransomed, and his captors would beseech him to let his people ransom him, but in many cases an nkumu would invite death rather than endure the shame of being yielded up as a prisoner of war. 624 726 [727]

An nkumu is always addressed by a double clap of the hands, and will not reply to anyone rude enough to speak to him first. In answer to the clap he replies with a word of wisdom expressed in an aphorism or proverb. Such a reply, however, is common to all elders, who have their favourite aphorisms ready for any who pay them special honour. Anything the nkumu says must be answered not by the customary ako boiko (even so) which ordinary people use, but with the special word, bienge, which is reserved exclusively for replying to an nkumu, and means the same thing. 624 576

When the hour of death approaches, an nkumu is attended by his Batwa. It is a rule that he must not die a natural death, and near the end, while he is still conscious and can still speak, all 'free men' clear out and leave the Batwa pygmies to their task of tying the nkumu very tightly with the fibrous yam vines known as monkiki. Often this secure lashing in the sitting posture, known as ilima, is sufficient to finish the nkumu off, but sometimes the work is expedited by twisting his neck.[2] Then it is announced that he is dead, aokilwa, this being in contradistinction to the customary phrase ankema aoleke used of the death of ordinary people. While the latter means 624 763 [563]

[1] Owing to the lack of tribal cohesion, warfare was not on any considerable scale. The method of warfare consisted in sending groups of young men to fight first, the elders only joining in when one side began to get the worst of the fray. Victors and vanquished in such fights were designated 'husband' and 'wife' respectively, and members of the one group were free to come and go in the villages of the other, and even to help themselves to food. In future wars 'husband' and 'wife' were supposed to combine against their common foes.

[2] Besides nkumu, elderly and rich men, fathers and mothers of twins, and twins are buried in the ilima or sitting posture, in contradistinction to the [illegible] position which is the recumbent one used for ordinary people and slaves. [764]

614 He represents the A-group in the council of elders of the village and of the other large units. Since no members of the group [672] are considered capable of conducting affairs, all the legal transactions which they undertake are treated as though they had been sanctioned by the patriarch. To a large extent the members of the group may represent one another. In the absence of the elder, a younger member may act as the representative of the [623] group at council meetings. When the senior member dies, his function will be taken over by the next oldest member of the group.

An A-group will split up only through internal conflicts
614 which cannot be bridged or through a large population increase.
602 The newly-formed A-groups continue to maintain a close relationship which, at first, is much closer than among the B-groups whose A-groups have split much earlier. In the higher ranks cohesion after the split diminishes only gradually; thus many gradations develop in the feeling of cohesion. These gradations could not be even approximately reproduced in a diagram with any degree of exactitude. There is no formula by which the split takes place, as there is, for example, among the Tallensi (13)
where it is determined by a certain number of generations.
614 Theoretically the A-groups are "eternal." The A-groups are 596 subdivided into small families. Within the polygynous families
592 nuclear families [Familienkerne] (14) have a semi-independent position economically. Each wife has her own house. A husband's wives and the wives of his sons have their houses within the same homestead. As the master of the homestead, the father has an open shelter where the men spend their time and [769] hold their meetings. Upon the death of the master of the 589 on the husband's wealth). Theoretically, the knife should be an efamba.

431 In practice it is sometimes possible to substitute an empɔ̂te in an [412] attractive wooden sheath amply adorned with "copper-plated nails."
At other times the knife and spears may be replaced by their corresponding value in bakonga. This is considered the most important ● [675] boɛ́ngo, and therefore no one gives up his claim to it. If the son-in-law cannot present it to his father-in-law immediately, he promises to do so later, and his father-in-law does not fail to make use of any opportunity to remind him of his promise. Some men insist on a wɛ̌ko as pledge. Others are satisfied with a piece of loasi or a bosɔ́ngɔ́ (splinter or part of the trunk of a palm tree), which the husband gives to the ndonga as a token of acknowledgement of his debt and as evidence of his willingness to pay it as soon as he has the means.
Some men, however, insist so strongly on the boɛ́ngo that they will not accept the walo [146] before they have received it. Thus, one day recently, Lomanga d'Ifutɔ́ (Bongîli) refused to accept the walo for his daughter Ekofo, engaged to Bokungɔ́ w'akɛyɛ (of Bongíli, Ndongɔ́). He insisted that the father of the latter, Bokungɔ́ w'is'ɛ́y' - Ingilɛ first go back to get his boɛ́ngo. Since he was unable to find five spears, he substituted for them a second knife and a copper ring; these were accepted by old Lomanga. Shortly thereafter the same thing happened to Bokungɔ́ of Bontole (Bongíli), who wanted to pay the walo for his fiancée Ngelɛ́ of Boɔ̃mbo (Bombwanja), the sister of Bongondɛ́, clerk of the Bombwanja. The woman's family refused to take the bride price before receiving the ifakɛ l'akongɛ b'is'ɛ́y'ɔ̌na boɛ́ngo.

2) Byĭkɔ́ byɛ̌ nyang'ey'ɔ̌na, "porcupines for the mother."
[251] This present consists of two or three fresh or smoked porcupine.
Bɛ́tomba, baatɛ birds, or bekɔ́sa fish may be substituted for them.
The substitution of hens is not well regarded, because they are within the realm of the nkomí. If someone does not have the means to satisfy this requirement, he gives the mother two copper rings saying mɛkɛ bakonga bɛ́fɛ́ yɔ́sombe byĭkɔ́ bikɛ̌, "here are two copper rings; go and buy yourself some porcupines." Fabrics are sometimes substituted nowadays.

Although the husband has full conjugal rights over the bodɔ́ngɛ́, and her activities, she is not strictly speaking his wife. It may simply be said that she belongs to him, and the fact that she belongs to him gives him the rights of a so-called husband. He has no obligations toward her, as he would have in an ordinary marriage. Thus in the example given above, if the woman dies while living with Ekamba, her father has no claim, even if no bride-price payment has been made; because he gave his daughter to Ekamba on his own initiative. If the bodɔ́ngɛ́ runs away from her owner he is entitled to a normal reimbursement of the valuables lent by him and to an additional 10 to 20 rings (or more, in proportion to the size of the loan) as damages for his loss. This supplement is due him even if he has paid a bride price to the woman's father for a legitimate marriage.

For if he loves this woman there is no reason why he cannot marry her properly. He will be especially willing to do so because as long as she remains simply a security, she is viewed with contempt and mocked by her fellows. They say, "You are not a wife, you are only a bodɔ́ngɛ́; there is no difference between you and a slave, for your husband has not paid a bride price for you."

Once the bride price is paid the bodɔ́ngɛ́ becomes a real wife, and all the rules of law are applicable to this [212] union, which from then on is a normal marriage in every way comparable to a marriage by nkumbɔ́. As to the loan, it is then included in the total amount of the bride price.

426 585 675 The pawning of a woman is also carried out through the mediation of a ndonga who, however, bears a special name, ndonga éá ntsíkɔɔ́nda, which is literally translated as "witness of I have not asked you." He is thus contrasted with a ndonga in the usual sense for the

426 following reason: a true ndonga is designated by the husband while, 583 in this instance, on the contrary, the intervention is requested by 625 the girl's father. Consequently, a man who takes a boɔ́ngɛ́ as security against a loan is not obliged to recognize him as a proper official witness. This witness is not a ndonga of a marriage, but he must bear witness to the security agreement.

When a woman given as boɔ́ngɛ́ ran away from her owner, the latter attacked the ndonga and, if he found an opportunity, made him prisoner. If the matter were not settled, he could reduce the ndonga to slavery. But if he did so, he had to expect vengeance on part of the ndonga's family, although, according to the usual and legitimate norm, their vengeance should rather be directed against the man who asked for their relative's intervention. For it is he who is responsible for everything and who rightly should bear all the consequences. The exception, which sometimes really occurred, was due to the idea that "might is right" which, here as in "civilized" countries, is often true. (1)

1. This situation is not the only one in which a ndonga ɛ́â ntsikoońda participates. The intervention of such a person may also be required under other circumstances. For example, Esalɛ́ of Bonkoso was taken prisoner by Isia of Bongíli. Mpetsí was related to Esalɛ́ and bound by friendship to Isia. He begged the latter to give Esalɛ́ back his freedom and guaranteed the payment of the ransom; he thus became a ndonga ɛ́â ntsikoońnd. If the payment is delayed too long, Isia will take vengeance upon Mpetsí and even has the right to abduct his wife as compensation.

When a man who has received a boɔ́ngɛ́ wants to marry her properly he designates his own ndonga, who must fulfill [213] all the conditions required. Thus the ndonga who participates in the pawning is not the ndonga of the marriage. However, since the former has 426 589x 675 participated in handing over the boɔ́ngɛ, he is usually allowed the honor of being a supplementary witness to the chief ndonga.

Everything that has been said shows clearly that the offer of a boɔ́ngɛ may in no way be considered a marriage, even though it has some of the external characteristics of a marital union.

A very similar practice but one which now belongs to the past is that of offering a woman in begging for peace (boɔ́ndo). The following is an example from history: (1) At the time when the peoples now living in this area were still settled near the sources of the Ikelemba, there was a war between the families of Mpumo, ancestor of the Boɛndɛ, and Lonyango, ancestor of the Bonkoso. The latter, defeated, called for help from the family of Bokungɔ, their bonankɛnɛ and one of the ancestors of the Bongíli. Bokungɔ's family inflicted a stinging defeat on Mpumo.

Mpumo was frightened and begged for peace, offering Bokungɔ his sister Mbɛlaka. Bokungɔ accepted. But since he liked this woman, he wanted to contract a regular marriage with her. Therefore he paid a high bride price. But as Mbɛlaka was of a good family, she declared that she did not want to go to her husband alone and insisted that her father send an ebísa with her. (2) Her relative Wela of Ngombe (Boímbo) was assigned to her. But the old father, wanting to show off his wealth, went even further and added a second ebísa, namely Ɛúmɛ, daughter of Bokelɛ of Bokɛtola, his maternal uncle. Finally, to complete this already ample dowry, Mpumo gave his daughter several men who were Mpɛmɛ (dependents) "to work the bellows in Bokungɔ's iron foundry." [214] Among them, according to the story, were Bokuka, Líkitɛ, Engota, Lofalanga, and others.

1. We are giving this story in detail because it is a living illustration of certain manifestations of Nkundɔ social life.

2. See Chapter VII, Article IV.

426 Similarly, Mpumo received Lifomɛ, daughter of Ikɔ́lɛ́ as a 583x boɔ́ndo. Her brother, Ndyɛ̂ntíkala, ancestor of the Mbɛ́ngɛ (Liɔ́ko, ● 675 Ekonda), offered her to Mpumo in asking for peace. Mpumo married her in the regular manner. In his fight against the Ekonda this same Mpumo in the same manner obtained Boɔ́ngɔ́, the sister of Bangɔ́ndɔ́ of Mpɛnjwɛ (Wɛ̂yɛ).

Since the victor in war usually wanted to marry the woman in the proper fashion by paying a bride price, the handing over of a relative as boɔ́ndo may be compared to the practice common in Europe in the Middle Ages, when a prince would marry his daughter or sister off to a competitor or an adversary to seal the peace between them. In both cases, therefore, a kind of political marriage is involved.

Article VI. Exchange

583x When they speak of the exchange of women (yenjɛ, from the 187 verb enja, "to exchange" in general), the tribes under discussion do not all refer to the same thing. According to the situation, several types of exchange may be distinguished.

1) The pure Nkundɔ́ have a practice of exchanging daughters, sisters, relatives. This exchange is always carried out through the payment of bride price and the agency of a ndonga. Thus two regular marriages by nkumbɔ́ are involved, and the term "exchange" is only very inappropriately applied to them. The two men who give each other their sisters in marriage are each contracting an ordinary marriage according to the usual norms.

2) Sometimes the term "exchange" is applied to the practice of ikɛkelo, which is better explained through an example than by a long discussion. Suppose that Eale marries the woman Ambɛ. Lokio, Eale's sister, [215] is married to Isia. Ambɛ leaves her husband for one of Isia's relatives. At the first opportunity Eale detains his sister Lokio at his home, thus taking her from her husband, and since his wife Ambɛ does not return to him, he hands his sister Lokio over to another man in marriage. Or suppose that Eale has married one of Isia's relatives, and Isia has married a relative of Eale. If one of the wives leaves her

Such conduct on the part of a father during his son's lifetime would give the son full rights to vengeance (assassination, war with the help of the mother's clan, etc.), for it would be equivalent to a real disavowal of his son. But the case is purely hypothetical.

Indeed [782] when Mbálaka was married, he killed one of his wives, cut her into pieces, and sent the "meat" to his son-in-law as "the first hen" that his wife would prepare for him. But he did not have to pay ● [682] [614] the indemnity because the victim's clan was too weak to attempt a war; they did not dare to make a claim and, in order to avoid even greater misfortunes, they resigned themselves to this revolting ignominy.

Article V

Relations Between the Husband and His Wife's Family

606 As has already been said, kinship by marriage is called likiló,
607 and relatives by marriage are called bokiló, bakiló. Mbótsoló is a term of respect for very close relatives by marriage (father-in-law, mother-in-law, sometimes brother-in-law or sister-in-law). When there is a considerable age difference between two affinal relatives, the elder one sometimes calls the younger bokilówalɛ́. This happens most frequently when the son-in-law is so young that he can still be considered a child. This term can even be used by an elder brother > for this right was recognized by the written laws which have assigned the functions formerly exercised by the "fathers" of families to them. But they are required to act in conformity with the common law, and therefore to listen to the ndonga and report to him.

Before colonization the Nkundó often used other means.

586ˣ Before exploring the question of bride-price reimbursement, we will examine these various actions. For greater clarity we will distinguish between the customs of the pre-European regime and actual practice. Two specific cases will be described at the end.

1. In the past

Let us again make a distinction between two situations:

A. First hypothesis: a wife left her husband. She ran away to her family, first informing the ndonga. If she did not go to him but went straight home instead, the ndonga felt that he had been disregarded, and serious consequences followed, for he inevitably found her in the wrong. That is why this situation very seldom arose. [381] The woman explained her conduct to the ndonga. It was his duty to reconcile her and her husband. A divorce never took place without many interventions on the part of the ndonga.

[721] 1) If in spite of all attempts the woman was absolutely unwilling to stay with her husband and definitely left him, the result in most cases was war, unless, of course, the husband also did not care to continue the unhappy union. In such a case he was satisfied with claiming a reimbursement of the bride price. The war, like all others, ended in peace and indemnification; nothing further was discussed. The war was fought against the woman's clan if restitution of the bride price was delayed or not made. However, if the woman went to another man without first going to her family, the abandoned husband declared war on his rival and left his parents-in-law in peace.

682 2) Sometimes the abandoned husband took revenge on his rival by assassinating him. If the possibility was open to him --

586* and this was generally the case -- he did not kill him personally
682 but assigned the task to someone else -- his son, his younger
[563] brother, or nephew, etc. Preferably, he hired a Botswá. The price for this service was 20 copper rings, the sum of the bride price paid [672] for a Botswá woman. Nkundó law places the entire responsibility for an assassination and all its consequences upon the person who orders it performed. Certain of the Batswa specialized in this field. Among them (of those dependent on the Bombwanja) were Esenge of Bokengé, Mbólókó of Bombembe, Wai w'ìtúmola of Bakoyó; Lúwá jw'ìtómbengándá (died in 1933) also of Bakoyó; Botómba wá Lokio and Mpótó éy'Ilókó of Mbanja (still alive).

The scorned husband had still other means of taking revenge
586* or obtaining indemnification. He made use of them only if the occasion was favorable or if he was not in a position [382] to go into expensive adventures such as a war or an assassination. They were the following:

3) Ikákelo: (1) A relative of his who was married into the unfaithful wife's clan could be prevented from returning to her husband.

4) The seizure of one of the wives of his recalcitrant father-in-law, or of one of the latter's relatives. This action is called by the generic term lowáála, which signifies "compensation." (2)

The prisoner was usually put in an etáka (a wooden fork fastened to the neck) (3) to prevent her flight and hasten the reimbursement of [567] the bride price. If the matter was not settled she became a slave.

768 infraction to follow him in death. It is obeyed even if [445] it is 428 manifestly unfair. They fear reprisal by the deceased, such as that 178 which is thought to have happened after the death of Iloko is Efekele of Lofelí. He had killed his own brother, Mpénda éâ nkotonkale, ● [682] because the latter had tasted freshly brewed beer instead of leaving that honor to him -- an action which constituted an extremely serious offense. But since the punishment was out of all proportion to the act, the whole family united against the murderer, who was obliged to flee. At his death he disinherited all his brothers in favor of his sons. This will, considered unreasonable and unfair, was not respected; Iloko's only brother, Bondélé wǎ Wǐlima, took Bonyengú, the favorite, for himself. But he soon died, and his death was attributed to Iloko's vengeance. Several years ago the family met to finally settle the matter of the inheritance. The largest portion was set aside for Iloko's sons, but one part was awarded to other relatives who were not named in the excluding clause, which referred only to the Baséká Banângâ, that is, to Iloko's own brothers.

Sons are never disinherited. If one of them behaves very badly toward his father, when the latter dies he refuses him his benediction (bokako w'ôlótsi) and curses him bokako wǎ tu yo).

3. Inheritance from the wife

768 As we have seen in Chapter VI, Article II, a wife has no
428 rights of ownership over the fruits of her own labors or of the couple's joint efforts. Consequently, her family can make no claims as regards inheritance; there is nothing to inherit.

Although all the fruits of the wife's activities belong to the husband, most men do not require that their rights be rigidly respected. They leave a part, or the whole, to the family of the [446] deceased, as is done in the case of a widow. (1) After the feast at the end of mourning, the two clans make an inventory of the property in question. Usually whatever products of her work the woman has left are divided equally between the two clans. Some

768 Colonization has given rise to a new legal situation which is 672 not provided for in Nkundó traditional law. If a woman takes ad-
178 vantage of the freedom permitted her by colonial legislation and goes to a mission to obtain instruction and make a monogamous marriage, and then contracts an illness from which she dies (at the mission, in the hospital, or even in the home of her family -- a question of place which has no legal importance), we find ourselves confronted by an entirely new situation. The husband no longer considers the woman his wife since she has left him, even though theoretically she continues to retain that status. On the other hand, she has not gone back to her family or gone to live with another man.

Polygamous husbands want to throw the "responsibility" back upon the woman's parents. But actually they have no part in the events, and it is unfair to involve them in the situation.

They do not bring the mission into the matter. As a matter
[797] of fact, the mission performs a service to the woman and to society as a whole in trying to elevate it morally and culturally.

What should one think of this situation? In the preceding article we have seen that the husband assumes all risks in relation to the wife. Certain exceptions to this rule [460], which we have explained, have been formulated in Nkundó law; but outside of them, the law retains its dominion, since the exceptions are narrowly defined. Thus it applies to the situation with which we are dealing, and consequently the damages must remain on the husband's account.

Moreover, this interpretation is to be encouraged for the following reason:

The purpose of the legislation involved is to protect freedom in this matter of capital importance and to favor monogamy and the gradual abandonment of polygamy. Polygamists -- as a group -- must perforce suffer from it in one way or another. It is inconceivable that a struggle against an abuse would not affect the persons guilty of it.

Such cases are still very rare, but their frequency may in-768 crease with the progress of evangelization.

672 In terminating this duscussion we must make one point that ●682 is related to both of the last two articles. The cause of death has no

768 legal importance. The solutions given are the same whether the 672 cause of death be organic or criminal. If the latter is the case,
● 682 however, the murderer must pay an indemnity, which is given to the person who has been wronged, whether it be the woman's husband or her family; in any case he thus satisfies the requirements of justice.

A woman may be murdered while she is visiting one of her husband's kinswomen in accordance with her husband's wishes. In that case the sister-in-law's husband bears the responsibility. He must indemnify the victim's husband, and he himself is entitled to indemnification by the murderer. To simplify this procedure, the murderer can make his payment directly to the widower; justice is still safeguarded. But in no case does the indemnity go to the victim's father, for legally and economically it belongs to the husband, not to the father, who is indemnified through the funeral payments. [461]

Conclusions

1) A marital union is broken by death only for the person who 581 dies. For the one who remains alive, the dissolution is completed 768 only after other procedures. If the husband dies the widow remains the wife of the heirs and is free only after restitution of the bride price has been made. At the death of the wife the husband can marry a substitute.

A widow's remarriage without restitution of the bride price
581 (and therefore without a new bride price), or that of a widower
587 with a substitute, is considered a continuation of a pre-existing 768 union which has not been dissolved. This continuation is not absolute, however, Actually, it is perfect only in the case of the husband's death, in which case his kin group inherits all his rights and therefore also the rights to the wives he has acquired by means of his capital. On the other hand, if a widower is to continue the relationship after his wife's death, he must pay another bride price.

The difference between the two instances is due to the connection of the bride price with the "ownership" of a woman; she remains subject to it and as a result becomes legally the spouse

847 they could count. Nevertheless, if it happens to a young unmarried mother, little or no fuss is made over it because no one can feel wronged; at most the culprit is scolded. For a married woman, on the other hand, it is one of the most serious infractions. Her husband has an immediate right to the fetus that would have become his child. He cannot beat or mistreat the offender in punishment, for her condition will not permit violence, but he can abandon her to her fate by refusing her all assistance, in particular by refusing to bring her firewood, the heat of which she greatly needs under such circumstances. For she has done him an enormous wrong and has acted with real malice (aônjokel'inkúnyɛ́, he says), since he married her chiefly so that she would give him descendants. If she dies it is her own fault. Even her family will not support her, for
● [682] they would be accused of being involved in the crime; inevitably they would lose the case and be condemned to indemnify the husband.

843 An abortion which is ascertained to be involuntary [i.e., a miscarriage] is treated like an accident or an illness and the appropriate legal stipulations are applied to it. Thus if it happens while the woman is at her parents' home, the responsibility for it falls on them. Usually the palaver is settled in a friendly manner; the family makes a few nkɔmɛ payments, and the question is closed. If relations between the husband and his son-in-law are somewhat strained, the dispute may be drawn out and may result in the breaking up of the marriage. If the woman dies from the accident, the rules given in Article X of the preceding chapter come into play. [469]

Article II. Conception and Pregnancy

833 The Nkundó have only a partial notion of the phenomena of conception. They are well aware of which acts cause the procreation of children. They have a perfect knowledge of anatomy and a rich vocabulary pertaining to sexual life. But they know only as much about physiological processes as experience can teach them. Furthermore, they believe that the act of procreation must be repeated several times in order to produce its natural result. Note,

M 778 of the most disparate and incongruous objects, [22] white, black, or red clay, ngula /Ed., redwood powder/, chicken feet, heads, beaks, claws, and feathers, shells, palm nuts, etc., all mixed together in a large pot or in an old worn basket. It is from this magic treasure that the fetisher takes a pinch or two which he wraps carefully in a little bag and hands over to those who resort to him. [T 771] As for the human figurines so often found in the huts of the Bateke and Banfumu, we do not believe that they are fetishes. In our opinion, they are guardian figurines for children, carved before their birth and preserved until they reach marriageable age.

M 791 824 Some fetishers manage to gain quite a reputation, and their services are purchased for a very high fee. They are familiar with the properties of certain plants, and they keep this knowledge secret and exploit it as much as possible. It would be wrong to believe that the fetisher's practices are all based on mystification.

M 278 695 Ebandia, the high chief of the Mosengere, knew the secret of certain poisons. He knew effective remedies for certain kinds of festering wounds; he proportioned the quantity of poison at ordeals so as to make its action violent or slow, and he was familiar with an antidote which cancelled out the effects of the poison.

M 278 695 684 A few hours before our arrival at Penge, Ebandia had subjected [23] one of his wives to trial by poison, on the mere suspicion that she might have gone too far with a native during a slightly prolonged stay in the forest. Ebandia accused her of adultery, prepared the beverage, and compelled the poor woman to prove her innocence by taking the poison. The unfortunate creature rebelled. A quarrel arose, and the village natives, when informed of the matter, protested against it, to no avail, however. The old tyrant carried out the ordeal. He had been notified of our impending arrival, and after allowing the unfortunate woman to suffer horribly for nearly two hours, he gave her the antidote. Five hours later, all the effects of the poison were gone. [Ed., the text is not translated from the last paragraph, page 23, to the second paragraph, page 26.]

T 764 [26] In general the natives have a kind of cult of the dead. In the Bateke-Banfumu region, the corpse is wrapped in fabrics. The more important the deceased person is, the larger the bundle. His whole wealth in fabrics goes with him to the grave. Prior

576 even answer her husband, but he may indicate his presence by coughing lightly.

Any infraction of these rules is considered a grave insult. A 574 person offended in this manner may seek revenge by violent means,
576 either personally or through the medium of his son, brother, etc.
578 According to native justice he will always be in the right, even if 831 the quarrel becomes bloody. The simple act of uttering obscenities while passing in front of a house in which there is someone who is entitled to the speaker's respect may result in reprisals by the latter. (1)

1. See Jadot, Blancs et Noirs au Congo belge [Whites and Blacks in the Belgian Congo], p. 90.

578 Crude language is especially reprehensible and wounding if it
834 contains allusions to incest or other reflections on a relative whom the speaker wants to insult. And it must be admitted that such expressions may go beyond the limits (for example: coi cum patre, matre, fratre, sorore, etc.). In connection with this topic it should be noted that reference is always made to a relative of the opposite sex to that of the person who is directly or indirectly being addressed. Furthermore, licentious talk and the use of indecorous language are more severely condemned when they take place in the presence of [554] women and old people [60] or are said by a slave in front of his master, by a Bo̱twa in front of a Booto (1).

1. See Introduction, footnote 2, p. 4.

578 If a man catches anyone uttering obscenities in front of his
● 684 wife, especially if they are addressed to her personally, he can start 834 action in adultery proceedings. If the woman refuses to listen to the seducer, she will not answer him, or sometimes, annoyed at the insult, she may retort by insulting his mother. She can complain, but generally she does not do so. Is she ashamed, or is she afraid that the tempter might make public some excess in her conduct which he has discovered? In any case a woman is more sensitive than a man to the 578 shame of obscenities. They say: blekɛ nsɔ́nvi ɛ́à bitɔ́li ñ'kɔ́moto.

684 Bɔ́moto ndɛ́ ndota (itɔ́fɛ́) "A woman is a ndota snake. Just as that 834 reptile twists through the grass and rolls up as soon as it sees a man approaching, so a woman finds it difficult to endure any obscenity."

The ideal way to be sure whether an expression is actually considered indecent is to check whether it may be used in the presence of a close relative, for a Nkundó never utters an obscenity in front of such a person.

195 578 834 Among the Nkundó, as in Europe, certain indelicate exclamations are so deeply rooted that they seem to have lost their original meaning, that is, most of the population no longer thinks of it at all. That a few more serious and modest individuals are still aware of it is apparent from the way they change the pronounciation of the terms in question.

Licentious expressions are never considered indecent and shock no one when they are uttered in a group or during group activities.
[571] Such activities include communal fishing and hunting expeditions, [61] drinking parties, dances, funerals, and -- at the present time -- communal work on a road, a resthouse, etc.

Thus we see that in these matters there is a remarkable discretion side by side with a certain degree of tolerance, which may be carried quite far. Licentious remarks are not condemned in themselves, but only because of fortuitous circumstances, so we see that the Nkundó do not consider them from a moral point of view, as we do, but from a social one. But the fact that those are precisely the words which can become indecent and socially bad shows that the native sees in their content something shocking, shameful, some quality likely to give offense. The freedom exercised in certain cases does not alter this general conclusion but simply gives evidence of he inclinations of a passionate nature.

3. Dances

Nkundó dances change periodically, as is the fashion in Europe. Old dances are given up after a time and are replaced by others which are newly invented or recently introduced. The dances fashionable at the present time came from the Besongó, who are by 369 548 2) There is a considerable excess of bachelors over eligible women.

[694] 3) The freedom to commit adultery: no sanctions were provided.[1]

[586] 4) The difficulty of finding a suitable husband experienced by many girls born in the centers. Marriages between individuals belonging to different groups (especially certain ones) seldom last. And since inhabitants of the centers have no fixed or stable residence, they intend sooner or later to go back to their tribe of origin. Serious-minded parents therefore discourage and thwart these "mixed" marriages. (1)

1. On this subject, read Jadot's fine page in Blancs et Noirs au Congo Belge [Whites and Blacks in the Belgian Congo], p. 132, beginning: "La prostitution devait inevitablement . . . (Prostitution was inevitably . . .).

[361] In the region under discussion there are only a few lightly populated centers: plantations, government or business stations, and small commercial centers. From time to time the bachelors there satisfy their desires with the wives of their fellow workers, and especially with women who come from the interior to sell their products at market. But they do not avoid one of the consequences of prostitution, namely the spreading of venereal diseases.

It is possible to conclude that in the past prostitution existed only in a very broad sense [75] and there was very little of it. [114] In Engel's article, "Les Wangata" op. cit., he writes that among the Wangata "prostitution no longer exists." If the eminent author is using the term according to the meaning in the dictionary, we may ask on what basis he is implicitly stating that this institution existed in the past. If prostitution is broadly defined, then the facts contradict his remark, for actually it has not ceased to develop among the tribes he discussed, who are located very close to the city of Coquilhatville and its various suburbs.

[1] [i.e., in the centers.—Analyst]

848 614 593 What happens is that when such a woman goes to live with her husband and her child is too young to remain with his grandparents, she takes him along. Later when the boy reaches adulthood, he sometimes settles with the clan of his mother's husband and produces a posterity. But he is more or less discredited by the adopting clan (and by the others). He has no political rights there, no mpifo. His posterity is called mbɔ́solɛ́ (from mbɔ́sa, "behind" and bolɛ́, "clan of origin"). (2) Its members may marry members of the adopting clan, excepting of course the descendants of their common mother. They also have their own cemetery. They thus form a separate clan within the village.

The practice of "bringing a child in the sling" seems to be disappearing at the present time, because everyone wants to remain in his own clan. Government policy deprives natives who do not live with their own families of almost all their rights. Moreover, [91] today it is much easier than in the past to procure the means for establishing a home. This last problem was certainly an important reason why a man would settle with the clan of his mother's husband.

848 684 The preceding clearly shows that a lover by whom an unmarried girl has a child incurs no blame, penalty, or fine. He has no obligation to care either for the mother or the child. Neither justice nor propriety requires him to marry the unwed mother. No indemnity is exacted.

There is only one exception: that is, if the mother dies as a result of the pregnancy or the delivery, or if the child is stillborn or born sickly, deformed, or crippled. In such cases the lover has to pay a heavy indemnity (mbɛ́laka) (1) That is why an unmarried woman who is pregnant is pressed into giving the name of her accomplice as

2. They also say "he was brought in the sling," bɔ̂yɛ́lákɛ́ ndá lɔmbɛ́.

1. For the child, the indemnity goes up to 50 rings; for the mother, 50 rings and a slave (or his equivalent in currency), or 75 to 100 rings.

849 soon as her family becomes aware of her condition. The accomplice 684 is made officially responsible and is required to accept this responsible and is required to accept this responsibility by publicly pledging his willingness to take all consequences upon himself. This pledge like all pledges is called ndanga. It consists of a knife, a ring of copper or brass, a spear, or similar objects. (2)

2. The same custom is practiced in the case of pregnancy resulting from adultery.

Article V. Sexual Intercourse

833 Although this subject is extremely delicate and therefore difficult to investigate and describe, it does not seem pointless to note here a few details with which I have become acquainted. We will discuss in succession a few circumstances relative to the act, then rape, and finally what are called incomplete acts. [92]

1. Circumstances relative to the act

The Nkundô have intercourse lying on their sides. Nowadays, [illegible] natives who have had frequent contacts with Whites are beginning to abandon the old manner for that of the Europeans. The spirit of imitation probably plays some part in the transformation which is beginning, but the gradual spread of the knowledge that the European system makes conception more likely is also a factor.

Even for illicit relations our natives seldom choose the forest or near-by palm or banana groves. Usually they prefer an isolated hut, or they take advantage of the absence of witnesses who might intrude on them. At night they are generally afraid of anything that stirs in the forest.

833 The Nkundô have sexual relations only during the night. To 753 do so in the daytime would be to risk being striken by a mortal illness
684 called bombilɛ (derived from mbilɛ "noon;" by extension, "day").

833 753 684 which has a strong resemblance to sleeping sickness. (1) One of its symptoms is a weakness of the lower limbs. Instances are cited of individuals who were unable to resist their passions and were punished in this manner. Apparently only the woman dies. As soon as her family discovers that she is stricken, the guilty woman denounces her accomplice. The latter is held responsible and is required to pay a heavy indemnity, which may amount to several dozen copper rings.

1. It is not sleeping sickness itself, however, for that disease seems formerly to have been unknown in this area.

833 751 Here as in many other situations the Nkundó have found a way to avoid the danger. There is an antidote (mengó), and it is water (bási bale mengó éá bombilé). Thus those who are unable to control their aroused passions during the day, satisfy it in a shallow stream.

833 753 The fear of bombilé has been greatly shaken [93] by colonization. If we are to believe the natives, foreign soldiers are responsible for this change also. But the behavior of the latter could not completely destroy the ancient feeling, probably due to a natural shame which makes them seek darkness and privacy for acts of this sort.

833 [575] [842] After intercourse a native woman usually gives herself a douche. She does so for the sake of cleanliness. It often happens, however, that she does not wait long enough before doing so, and thus she neutralizes the effect of the intercourse. This is chiefly a matter of carelessness. Nevertheless, under certain circumstances she may use this means to prevent conception. (1)

1. See Chapter X, Article I, 2.

833 826 According to my informants, some women have constitutional abnormalities which repel men. As everything readily becomes public, such flaws are quickly known after marriage, though not quite as readily beforehand. Actually love can -- and often does -- cause them to be overlooked. But after the first ardor has cooled, such a situation may become a threat to the stability of a marriage. When quarrels

584 then does she acquire her own establishment. From that moment on she lives permanently with her husband-to-be.

She has come from her parents' home empty handed, without any utensils whatsoever. In her new dwelling she finds everything. Her mother-in-law and sisters-in-law give her what she needs: baskets, pots, gourds, mats, mortars, pestles, and even chickens.

It will be apparent from the preceding that there are no particular rites or ceremonies nor is any special attire worn.

By this time the bompɛka is already considered a wife; [119]
584 595 she has all the rights and duties of that status: cohabitation, household tasks, etc. Everything she produces or earns belongs to her husband. Her own family no longer has any rights to the fruits of her work. If, after the payment of the ikulɛ and before any further payment,
● [586] the husband discovers that there are relations between his fiancée and another man, the latter is considered an adulterer and is liable to the sanctions designed to check such infractions. The older the woman, the greater the indemnity, which may be as high as 5 to 10 rings (see Chapter VI, Article VII).

It is logically consistent with what we have described that the fiancé has no special name. Since he is actually a husband, that is what he is called (bǒme).

During this period the engaged pair get to know each other physically and morally (sexual relations, work, temperament, virtues, faults). A figurative expression is used to describe what happens -- bakɛngola mpokɛ, "they are trying out the pot." The explanation
[585] for this saying is that before a new pot (mpokɛ) is used, it is placed on [252] a shelf above the fire and left there for several days, so that it will harden and become heat resistant. If it cracks it is not suitable for food preparation; if not, one can cook in it without fear. This process is called kɛngola mpokɛ, and the term has been transferred to the trial period of the newlyweds. Thus it is a sort of novitiate, and the English term which can be used to approximate this situation most closely is clearly "engagement," "engaged."

This first period can last several months.. Meanwhile the husband seeks the valuables needed for the ndanga payment.

In these instances there is a temporary suspension of rights or rather a change in the individual entitled to them. These adjustments are made very frequently and can affect several people. Bride prices may even fall to fairly distant relatives, even in the maternal line. The transactions are performed by the patriarchs for the greatest good of the family as a whole. New rights benefiting the person originally entitled to the bride price are being created, and 585 607 the woman married by its means has become the equivalent of a nkita in relation to him -- as is the following instance:

Bakutu b'Ôfóngé (Boniface) of Bombénga w'Ôkenda (Besombó, Bombwanja) has a sister Wétsi, whose bride price serves to provide his paternal uncle, Elongama éy'ituta, with a wife, Ikóko of Ndongó-Bongíli. Bakutu's rights over his niece, Bakutu, daughter of Bolófo, are transferred to Bofénda d'Ekókola, son of his paternal great-aunt Etáka and therefore, in Nkundó terminology, to his father. As a result he obtains the rights over the bride price of Wángi, the daughter of his uncle [166] and Ikókó. At the same time he acquires a certain authority over Bofénda, the beneficiary of the bride price that was originally intended for him, and over the latter's children.

When the bride price is meant to procure a nkita, there is nothing to prevent the remainder, should there be any, from being used to pay a debt, a fine, etc., or, more especially, from being given to a relative so that he can procure a wife for himself.

If, in an exceptional case, the bride price is not used for its ●[684] original purpose, this deviation constitutes an infraction of the law, because it is a violation of the rights of the girl for whom the bride price was paid, for she is thus deprived of her nkita and consequently of certain advantages. It may happen, however, that there is a conflict between this law and some other. In such cases of circumstances beyond one's control, it is up to the legal authorities to determine which of the two has priority.

Such was the case of Boléi, daughter of Ifolé y'Ôngámá, of the Baséká Longwâne of Bonjoku (Botikoso). She was married to Bombélenga 426 As soon as the bosɔ́lɔ́ is assigned to the person entitled to her, 764 she leaves the group of widows and goes to the home of her new hus- 587 band. From then on she may cohabit with him, since from that moment the pair are absolved from the observance of the regulations and prohibitions of mourning. Because of her affection for her deceased husband and her sorrow, the woman sometimes begs her new husband to be patient and wait a while. Her wishes are respected, for a refusal to acquiesce would be a very serious offense, which could lead to an immediate rupture of the relationship.

The woman chosen as bosɔ́lɔ́ may refuse the husband for whom she is intended, though such cases are rare and in the past were even unknown. The following instance [204] goes back to 1932: Mpia of Mbanja "acquired" Bɔ̂ngongo of Ilángɛ as wife for his eldest son, Bompelɛ. But the young man did not want her. So as not to waste his money, the father incorporated the woman into his harem. When the old man died, Bɔ̂ngongo was given to this same Bompelɛ as a bosɔ́lɔ́. This time it was she who did not want him, and, to make matters worse, all the other widows also refused. Subsequently, a second cousin of Bompelɛ named Bosɛnjɛ wanted to marry Bɔ̂ngongo. But out of spite, Bompelɛ did not want to yield her to him except against the payment of a bride price.

Even if the woman makes no objection -- and she generally does not -- and accepts the new husband without loving him, either out of indifference, or to be able to come out of seclusion, or for any other reason, she may always find a way to leave him, if she wishes, for another close relative whom she prefers. This fact indicates that, although theoretically the union of the bosɔ́lɔ́ is supposed to be more stable than a simple marriage by inheritance, in practice it is not; and it does not attain the degree of permanence characteristic of a marriage by nkumbɔ́. The reason is probably to be found in the fact that the union with a bosɔ́lɔ́ and the ordinary form of marriage by inheritance are fundamentally identical, and the rights of the family play a great role in both of them. The following is a recent case history: Ifungɛ, daughter of Esukɛlu of Bongangɛ (Boɛndɛ) and widow [illegible] of Bolɛkɛlɛ of Bongíli was assigned as bosɔ́lɔ́ to her husband's eldest son, named Boongo. Later she claimed that she did not love Boongo but 429 768 587 689 that she wanted to become the wife of his brother Ekamba. Ekamba did not object. But very soon she broke this union as well. This time the chief decided she was going too far and to please Boongo, who had settled with his mother's clan of which he also was a member, he sentenced her to several weeks in prison. All sensible people approved of the chief's attitude. In spite of the suppression of such excesses, a suppression which is necessary, the woman's freedom is protected.

428 768 587 We have already indicated that from a moral point of view the marriage of a bosóló may be considered on the same level as the inheritance of any woman if she remains among the close kin of the deceased. The only difference is that such a union is somewhat more difficult to break.

Article IV. The Replacement or Substitution

586 587 When a marriage is broken, instead of completing the divorce by restitution of the bride price, the woman's family often has recourse to the practice of replacing the divorcée by one of her relatives (such as a sister, cousin, or niece). The act of replacement, as well as the woman substituted, is called bankitsɛ́. (1) This name is plural noun derived from kita, "to become," kitana, "to replace, to succeed." The singular would be linkitsɛ́, but it is never applied to this situation.

The substitute usually does not object to the social obligation that falls upon her, unless she feels an unusual repugnance toward the husband. In that case an attempt is made to find someone else in the family. A family may go so far as to take one of its members away from her husband in order to substitute her for the divorcée, especially if no other substitute is to be found and if they care more about the marriage that has been broken than about her union.

The Nkundó give the following justifications for the practice of substitution:

1. The Ekonda say nkitsɛ́.

684 582 There is no sanction against the infraction of the law of exogamy. There is only the opposition of the parents and patriarchs, and a quasi-innate habit.

582 614 Note also that members of certain clans frequently marry members of certain others, among whom they prefer to choose their wives. Therefore a good proportion of the women married into any given family will belong to one particular clan. The Wafɛ (Bakɛala), for instance take a great many of their wives from among the Bongale w'ɔtɔlɔ.

[174] 582 614 We may reasonably assume that the ancestors of related groups, who now marry among themselves, formerly practiced exogamy. If this assumption is correct, it must be admitted that with the progressive growth of families, this rule has been relaxed in certain respects so that the present situation has resulted. Consequently, it would not be surprising if these legal provisions became even less rigorous in the future. Actually, some young people have begun to [178] violate the rules of exogamy and their example has freed the whole family. (2) Thus the Bokɛtola maintain that their two groupings, Bompela and Ilɔngɛ, who now intermarry, formerly comprised a [251] single exogamous entity. Contemporary instances appear here and there, but they remain very rare, even between persons who are very distantly related, and much rarer between close kin. (1) For the Nkundɔ still feel very strongly about this law. The bulk of the people are entirely opposed to any laxity or violations and the patriarchs and notables act against them with all their power. But the strength of

2. See Chapter I, Article VII, 1.

1. A recent case was that of Elimá and Bolɛfe, who both belonged to the exogamous group of Bokenyola of the Bonjoku, but one belonged to the Baɛkɛ Bokɔyɔ family and the other to the Baɛkɛ Njoli.

593x We should add that in some households, difficulties arise
606 rather easily during the visits of parents or parents-in-law, because 578 of the sensibilities, incompatibility of character, or discontent of one party who may consider the other guilty of discourtesy, lack of delicacy, disrespect, or stinginess toward the visiting parents. The same is true for the rearing of children. [273]

4. Punishments

593x Nkundɔ́ law permits a husband to inflict corporeal punish-578 ment (bikɔ́njwá, sing. ekɔ́njwá) on his wife, its nature varying with the seriousness of the case. Obviously these sanctions, expressly [576] permitted by law, cannot give rise to claims on the woman's part or result in the obligation to pay a boɔ́ndo. [Editor's note: Unless,
of course, the husband -- acting in excess of his rights -- is more violent than the occasion warrants for under such conditions, the wife, supported by her family, attacks the husband, who is then ● [634] forced to acknowledge the harm he has done and make reparation by means of a boɔ́ndo.] If she is hurt she may claim a supplementary payment called liombo (from the verb bomba) or "bandage" (for the wound); it consists of 5 rings or more, depending on the situation.
[826] The loss or breaking of a tooth is considered a serious injury. For this is a real injury to the woman and, in the case of front teeth, to her beauty. (1) Of course, as explained above, the wife will first have run home, and it is there that the dispute is examined.

593x For the sake of a clearer understanding, let us go into a few 578 details concerning the penal stipulations of Nkundɔ́ law in relation 644 to the life of a married couple.

Usually, in a simple domestic quarrel, the couple does no more than tell each other some home truths, seasoning their speeches

[304] 1. Because they are filed, the incisors are much less resistant than normal teeth. Teeth filing is practiced for reasons of beauty.

578 with a few vulgarities. If the woman goes beyond that, her husband 593x gives her a good slap, but he cannot allow himself to exercise his 684 muscles further upon her.

If a woman's tongue is too voluble and she permits herself to deliver gross insults without a suitable reason, her lack of respect is considered punishable. It is not considered proper [274] to right this wrong by means of blows, however, although in practice impetuous young men do not always restrain themselves. The sanction preached by tribal wisdom is the man's abstention from food prepared by the guilty wife, and his refusal to perform the conjugal act. A Nkundó woman is very sensitive to such measures. If she is really recognized to be in the wrong and peace is not promptly re-established, the wife's [576] family will beg the husband to calm down and offer him a boóndo, which may be as great as the value of a dog.

578
In the course of a quarrel a Nkundó woman may resort to a roundabout way of expressing her feelings; instead of cursing her husband directly she will address herself to a domestic animal which passes in front of her. The man is naturally not deceived, and the effect is identical.

What we have said applies to ordinary insults such as to wish a person's death, which may be expressed in the following ways: owá "drop dead," nkoi ákokumbé, "may a leopard get you"; njwá ákokoté, "may a snake bite you": ófówé é? "aren't you dying?"; okona, "why don't you get sick"; bákotómbé ndá ngélo, "may you be carried to the cemetery"; bákokundé, "may you be buried." Invectives based on physical defects or designed to humiliate a man fall in the same category. For instance a woman may call her husband bololé or etula, "a nobody," or imemelo, "idiot," or inyanyama, "beast," etc.

If, on the other hand, the woman in her volubility attacks her husband's parents, the matter becomes more serious. The Nkundó react very badly to verbal excesses directed toward them. Whether he is subject to teasing on their account or to insults such as "eat your mother (or father)," or to obscenities in relation to them, or whether the speaker "disinters" deceased parents in evoking their memory, (1)

[195] 1. For the sake of documentation on Nkundó psychology and morals, here is the Latin text

> 603 higher morality -- in our terms. Among > 837 them the question of relations between a > 626 woman and her husband's son, younger > 184 brother, etc., does not even arise. Have > they been influenced by some neighboring > tribe? Or must we attribute the inferior > morality of some of the tribes in this re> spect to decadence.

837 The following conclusions emerge from this long description:

602 1) Relations between a man and the wife of his son, younger brother, etc., in short of anyone inferior to him in the family hierarchy, are always strictly prohibited and never occur.

2) They do occur on the other hand between an inferior and the wife of his senior and superior. The degree of kinship between the husband and the culprit plays a considerable role in determining the seriousness or triviality of an infraction, the sanctions applied, and the various consequences. Some relations are accepted, others are censured with varying degrees of leniency, still others are pitilessly criticized.

3) In these matters a distinction may be made between two aspects:

a) the husband's reaction and the repression of the illicit relations;

b) the judgment of public opinion;

or:

a) the financial aspect;

b) the moral aspect -- to use that term for want of a better one.

Sometimes a third element comes into play, namely the intervention of the family on the side of the culprit against the injured husband who, for one reason or another, is in the wrong himself.

602 a) The usual sanction for adultery is, for the man, an 837 indemnity to pay. But such a payment cannot be made since no
684 financial transaction -- strictly speaking at least -- may be made

602 within a group of close kin, seeing that, from a certain standpoint, 837 property belongs to all the members, each sooner or later receiving 684 or inheriting from the other. But in cases where other sanctions can be imposed, they are considered legitimate. [309]

b) Except in the case of relations between brother and sister-626 in-law -- within the limits described above -- public opinion is 837 severe in its judgment, even more severe than for ordinary cases of 602 adultery, although because of the more tangible nature of the sanctions imposed against the latter, these seem on the surface to be considered more serious; many natives even have that impression. Or at least that is the first impression that spontaneously comes from their explanations; currently, they stress the indemnity, and in their accounts of ancient proceedings and violent sanctions, they forget the other aspect. Others do not distinguish between the two sides of the problem, or distinguish between them only very poorly. Only in going to the bottom of things do they -- like ourselves -- become aware of the two aspects and the importance of not confusing them.

The leniency we observe in certain cases on the part of the interested parties who have been wronged, and sometimes on the part of public opinion, does not seem to us to have been explained as a leniency based on principle nor as a legitimation of these relations (except in the case of brothers within the limits indicated). They seem rather to spring from the affection they have for the culprit, their sympathy for his condition as a bachelor, a certain community of interests, and finally from an evaluation of certain other elements that may be involved (such as a fundamental jealousy in the case of brothers).

602 The great distinction made by the Nkundó in this realm as
181 in others between inferior and superior relatives is based on their conception of authority, which is patriarchal, therefore paternal. What is involved is not so much a fear of power as a reverent awe -- although the first should not be excluded. In their eyes an inferior does not exist for the benefit and advantage of the superior, but the reverse; authority exists for the good of the inferior, who to preserve hierarchy and order must submit to the [310] superior. The superior's duty to help his inferior (in his difficulties, his palavers, his poverty),

837 431 substituted for all these items. As a rule the woman demands some remuneration although there are exceptions, which may be frequent or rare, depending on the region and on the nature of the persons involved. They are due to extraordinary passion or to the woman's love for her lover. (1)

1. See Chapter I, Part 1, Article IV.

3. Evidence of adultery

837 684 The strength of the evidence may vary.

● 1) The strongest evidence is finding the couple in flagrante delicto. No objection will hold up against it, and it constitutes for the application of the severest sanctions. The act must be observed by the husband. The testimony of a third party is never introduced. If another person discovers the adultery and favors the husband, that person will inform the latter so that he can take precautions in order to catch the culprits personally. If it is discovered by the woman's father or other close relative who favors the husband, [606] he informs the latter and, if possible, calls him to witness the infraction himself. If he does so, the husband must give the indemnity to his father-in-law. This is not a legal obligation but one imposed by good relations and decorum, since the father-in-law has shown good will and affection toward his son-in-law.

3) A third form of evidence can be obtained by surprising the lovers while they are planning a meeting. The husband can accuse them on the spot and try to extract a complete confession from his wife on the subject of the past or the future. If possible he assures himself of the co-operation of witnesses. If he foresees a denial on his wife's part, he lets the occasion pass and looks for a good opportunity to surprise the culprits in the act. Regardless of the

937 684 wife's inclinations, a husband often will not intervene at once; he will give no sign of what he has observed but will skillfully seek an opportunity to observe the pair in flagrante delicto, so that he can take more violent action. This approach is absolutely necessary if he has nothing but suspicions, even if they are well founded. To act otherwise would not have great results and would show a lack of judgment -- often true of young, inexperienced husbands or ones with too irascible a temperament. An intercepted message bearing an invitation or an acceptance has the same practical value.

This form of evidence is weaker than the two preceding ones -- unless these are added -- and justifies only certain sanctions.

4) The sight of lovers giving gifts, either from hand to hand or through an intermediary (" with so-and-so's compliments") also has its value as evidence. But here again the best approach is to use this evidence as a means of obtaining the wife's confession. That is the only practical value of discovering gifts in the wife's possession. If a wife finds no explanations that will pacify the husband, she is forced to admit the act and denounce her accomplice.

4. Sanctions

684 Nkundó law includes several sanctions against adultery some of which are applicable to the spouse, some to the accomplice, and some to an intermediary (ekímɔ). There are differences [315] in the application of these sanctions depending on the gravity of the case (for instance, repetition of an offence or a habitual offence), the inclinations or temperaments of the persons involved, and the value of the evidence. Although the sanctions are legitimated by law, most of them are applied at the spouse's initiative; but in some instances the authority of the family as well as that of the ndonga have to be involved. Therefore the following varied situations should be pointed out:

A. A husband's sanctions against an adulterous wife.

a) In the case of a delicto flagrante, the husband may beat his wife, wound her, and even kill her. Neither she nor her family have the right to complain. If he kills her he is no longer entitled

● 684 to a reimbursement of the bride price, any more than if she had [721] died of natural causes. In past times death under these circumstances usually resulted in a war between clans. But this extreme situation actually arose only very rarely, if the man was excessively jealous and had other wives or the means to obtain them, or was embittered by persistent and incorrigible infidelity. Most frequently a husband's foresight of the loss he would sustain, in the last analysis keeps him from such drastic action. He limits himself to beating or injuring the culprit or to applying other forms of chastisement or punishment (see below under b); see above, Article III, 2.

If the husband has sufficient evidence, of the sort described above, but has not caught the culprits in the act, the wife can expect a good whipping, accompanied by a whole string of vulgar ex-
[578] pressions and assorted insults (femina foetidissima, tempore menstruationis putor tuus venit in nares omnium hominum, etc.) as well as [583] a heap of obscenities pertaining to the female genital organs. The husband who acts in this manner is not reprimanded. On the contrary, he acts thus out of jealousy; our Nkundó say that his anger is an anger of love.

In these punishments the Nkundó above all recognize the exasperation that springs from legitimate jealousy. That is why the husband acts on his own initiative. Besides, when he [316] finds himself confronted with the fact it would be psychologically difficult for him to calm himself first in order to go and inform the ndonga.

It was extremely unusual for a man to kill his wife calmly and deliberately. Such a thing happened only if her infidelities were continuous and she had erred in many other ways as well. And even then this conduct was found only in certain extremely cruel families. It was known that Iloko is 'Ôkungú and Bengóngó byǎ Kundú had acted in this fashion; both were members of the Bongilá (Besombó), a family which, in its songs, boasted of eating their own wives.

b) Tortures. The husband may also have recourse to several types of torture. Most important among them are the following:

1) The etáka, which is the standard torture so to speak. It is a heavy wooden fork which is attached to the neck. It prevents

[1] [i.e., a husband's killing his wife for adultery.—Analyst]

684 movement and therefore serves as the Nkundő prison. But in addition, if it is applied for a long time, it becomes a real torture; the skin becomes painful and comes off, inflammations readily appear, and bugs sometimes lodge there.

As soon as the woman's family hears (through the ndonga) that she is being so tortured, they often come and beg her husband to [576] free her. To pacify and propitiate him, they offer him an ad hoc payment, that is, a boőndo of a few copper rings. Generally, he yields to their entreaties. A good relationship and his respect toward them require that he not remain indifferent to their supplications, especially as he needs them for the stability of the marriage and the good functioning of the household.

2) Byę́ngętanyi, or handcuffs, which consist of sticks attached either to the wrists or to the ankles (to prevent walking), or to both arms and feet. Two sticks were used, one above and one below, with the limb placed in between, and they were tied with ropes that were attached and fastened in notches made at [317] each end of the sticks. In rare instances the wrists were bound. To increase the pain and immobility, the ropes were shrunk and hardened by pouring water on them. These handcuffs were generally added to the etɛ́ka and were never applied alone.

3) Exposure to the bites of nkongồtő ants. In the region under [184] discussion, I have never heard the people speak of exposure to bafumba (Dorylus), or even to the venomous benkǒnkőme. This fact contrasts with the practice of other Mőngo tribes and with the content of certain legends (evolution?).

4) The pouring of water containing pepper into the vagina. Sometimes the genital organs were rubbed with crushed pepper.

5) Exposure of the sex organs to fire. A burning log was held near them.

The last two types of torture were the most dreadful.

We can add one last form of punishment which is derived from the same legal rules, although it is not a torture:

[834] 6) Nudity. The husband tears off the guilty woman's garments and thus exposes her to public shame. Even if she resorts to using leaves, no one mistakes the situation, and her shame is only partly reduced.

684 Any of the types of evidence listed above is sufficient to 596 legitimize the application of one or another of these penalties.
576 Nevertheless, the husband is required first to notify the elder mem-
584 bers of his family and the ndonga, who do not permit him to act unless the misdeeds have occurred repeatedly. The readiness to accord the husband permission depends on the temperament of the interested parties and on a great many circumstances, the most important of which is the respective social prominence of the parties involved.

The need to ask permission of the "fathers" and the ndonga, which we have already encountered in reference to other situations (above, Article III, 4), does not weaken the husband's rights [318], but it limits their use. It is not a legal obligation but one that is imposed for family reasons, which are as follows:

1) The respect due to the "fathers" in this as in all important matters;

2) The respect due to the ndonga, who in marital matters is the husband's superior and whose intervention must be called upon in any serious situation;

3) The repercussions of any inconsiderate or rash action on the entire family (enmities, wars, etc.).

If forbearance and patience are fruitless, no one can blame the husband any longer. And when the woman's family compares the censurable conduct of their daughter with the generosity of their son-in-law, they will naturally be inclined to find that he is in the right and so usually will not intervene against him.

Note also that the Nkundó invoke the need to maintain their honor as justification for the obligation to notify the authorities. They must be able to inform the unfaithful woman's clan and thus safeguard their good reputation as defenders of order and public peace.

684 A woman whose husband loved her very much was subjected 593 to the etáka only. He would reprimand her and strike her, and would try to correct her behavior by means of gentleness and leniency.

As we will see suo loco, a husband who is exasperated by the incorrigible infidelity of a wife whose performance of other wifely

684 duties is also unsatisfactory, may sometimes resort to divorce or to 593 selling her into slavery, but rarely to killing.

Colonization has abolished torture, slavery, killing, and the
684 legitimacy of assassination. A husband has no other sanction against 178 an unfaithful wife than to insult and beat her. And even there European law forces him to restrain himself lest he commit excesses which [319] involve him in a trial before the white man's court. Fortunately for marital fidelity, a reaction in favor of the repression of adultery has recently begun, following the official establishment of native jurisdiction. In the not too distant future, this reaction will culminate in a return to ancestral law in a form adapted to present circumstances.

B. Against the accomplice, the injured husband has the right
684 to make use of two sanctions: violence and the payment of an
596 "indemnity."

1) If the husband catches the accomplice in the act, he always has the right to wound him, or even to kill him, or reduce him to slavery. The last two forms of vengeance were not practiced unless the respective villages of the husband and the culprit were fairly distant from each other and not bound to each other by any special ties (friendship, mutual assistance, or affinity). This reservation existed because of consideration for the offender's relatives, the desire not to bring them excessive sorrow. Another cause for caution and calm is the economic or military inferiority of the husband's clan, or the fearlessness, the valor in battle, in a word, the strength of the culprit's family. A special case which makes all other considerations disappear is adultery with a favorite, whose husband's love for her is especially passionate and jealous.

If the offender's adultery was not limited to a few isolated acts but was becoming a real habit, or if he had already seduced many women, resulting in many palavers for his family, the husband could be bolder. For the rake's close kin would finally be exasperated with his incorrigible and disastrous misconduct and would rather be rid of him. (1) [320]

1. See also Chapter VIII, Article II, 2, A.

684 The risk of being wounded, reduced to slavery, or killed, often cools the adulterer's passion. Therefore, the more the husband showed that he was fearless, violent, physically powerful, or of a high social position, the more his wives and their lovers were on their guard. Certain men were so jealous of one of their wives and so determined to take vengeance with extreme severity that the tempters did not even dare to think of approaching her.

9) The payment of an indemnity seems to be the standard sanction. It is the only one that remains legal at the present time; consequently it is coming more and more to the fore.

Any of the types of evidence examined above justify the claim for an indemnity.

The indemnity may be minimal, consisting of 2 to 5 copper rings, or heavy, going up to 20 to 30 rings or a slave. The maximum is always demanded for adultery with a favorite. The size of the payment depends on the persons involved, the relationships that bind them, the frequency of misconduct, and the nature of the action observed. For instance, if the husband catches the couple when arranging a meeting or exchanging gifts, the indemnity will be small; if, on the other hand, he has caught them _in flagrante delicto_, it will be high.

[626] A man who demands a high indemnity must expect to be treated the same way should the occasion arise. The application of the law of retaliation in that case is fully approved by Nkundó opinion.

684 565 [629] In addition to the situations examined in the preceding article, there exists another which does not result in an indemnity claim. It arises if the culprit belongs to a clan of slaves or is in some other way subject or inferior (_mpámá_ or _bowɛ́lɛ́_). (1) Even

1. Strangers who are settled with a tribe or group but are in no way related to them.

If the husband catches the culprit in the act, he politely asks him to go away and leave his house [321] and his wife: _dumíkɛ́lí 'îlombe, ntsyá ɛ́!_ Here is true Nkundó courtesy in practice. It might

684 525 certainly happen that a husband who was too jealous or impetuous would wound, kill, or sell his rival. But this was an exception and was always condemned since it was absolutely lacking in chivalry. In any case there can never be any question of demanding an indemnity; such an act would be absolutely shameful.

The culprit is notified of the demand for an indemnity by 684 574 the ndonga, who in difficult cases is accompanied by various notables. If the husband foresees strong opposition on the debtor's part, he gives the ndonga a special present of a bunch of bananas and two fish (or a hen) "so that he would not be forced to eat the rival's food."

A persistent and categorical refusal to pay the indemnity is 684 unusual. For it can have serious consequences: the taking in custody followed by enslavement because of debts, or [the taking of] compensation in the person of his wife or of a relative, or the retention [by her relatives] of a relative of the creditor who is married into the debtor's clan (ikɔ́kelo). Since these practices of taking hostages and of bodily constraint have been abolished, there remains the intervention of the courts, seconded by the police.

What is the Nkundó idea of this payment which we have called an indemnity in order to facilitate its description? The question is difficult to answer. Here are the linguistic facts which may provide elements of the solution:

The payment for adultery is called nyongo, and the word is 684 172 used together with the verb ka, "to give." The expression is equivalent to the verb lingala fɔ́ta (from which the noun bofɔ́to is derived). It signifies "payment" in the broadest sense and thus also covers our words "pay," "salary," "remuneration." In addition to its application in the case of adultery, it is also used in many other situations, such as remuneration for work, payment for a service, etc. Nyongo does not mean "compensation," which is called lowɛ́ɛla, nor "a payment making amends [322] and apologizing for an offense," which is bododo, nor "indemnification" (mbɛ́laka). What the expression has in common with the last term is the concept of a

684 [592] a payment rightly owed, and in the absence of an adequate translation, "indemnity" is still the least inaccurate. (1)

[625] 1. The words used for "reward" are bokondo, which is a reward for an unusual service, like the capture of a leopard or another "royal" animal (nyam ɛ'ekofo, such as a python, an eagle, etc.) or a beautiful dance, and mbuteji, which is a reward for small services.

One point remains to be noted. The two forms of punishment, violence and indemnity, may not be combined, and this principle is applied in all situations (2). Should this prohibition be construed as an implicit condemnation of violent measures? Or have we here the use of a system of settlement? It is difficult to settle this question, and actually the two explanations overlap at least in part.

684 562 It is not without interest to note that, in order to justify sanctions against the accomplice, the Nkundó invoke his frequently dominant role in adultery. Actually they reason that a woman is weak by nature; her emotions predominate, she is easily led and resists enticement only with difficulty. A man on the other hand is more reasonable, better able to control himself. Sanctions enacted and applied against the wife alone would not only leave out the punishment of one of the two culprits,but they would also be inadequate for the preservation of social order, since the woman remains exposed to succumbing out of weakness in spite of the penalties. The severity of Nkundó law with regard to the corporal punishment of the wife, which exists in spite of these considerations, are explained in terms of the woman's sensitive nature and of the power her husband has over her which he lacks in relation to her accomplice.

C. Against a husband and his accomplice. There is no
684 specific sanction in Nkundó law against a husband's adultery, [323] but an outraged wife may take revenge on him, as on her rival. Her weapons against her husband include invective, the refusal of food, drink, baths, and finally of debitum conjugale. These are appreciable punishments about which the husband can in no way complain, for he would be found entirely in the wrong. The woman's actions stem from a legitimate jealousy. Sometimes her feeling [534] becomes so intense that she tears off her clothing and stands before her husband completely naked; this shames him greatly and constitutes a stinging reproach. Invectives flow out of the wife's mouth
[578] in torrents: ilolé ingé, itutula ingé, inyanyama ingé, owé lóí ô ndé nyongo, ndé ntémbé, "that imbecile, that good for nothing, that beast, one day you'll die of penalties, of being caught in flagrante delicto . . . ." Then there is a whole string of the usual in-[152] sults. Our Nkundó say that the more abundant the insults, the greater is the woman's love. She may carry on like this for days, even for weeks. Her responses to her husband's adultery are thus of the same sort as those she makes use of under other circumstances.

If a jealous wife sets fire to the hut in which her husband yielded to his passion, no one can reproach her. The damage was caused on her husband's account.

Against the woman accomplice, the wife may use more violent means. She may fight her, strike her, even injure her. The rival's husband will demand a liombo, or payment "for blows and wounds," which has to be paid not by the wife's family, but by the guilty husband. Thus in the final analysis it is again he who is punished. If the offending woman is killed, it is again the unfaithful husband who is obliged to pay an indemnity to the widower. (See Article II.)

One form of punishment to which a wife likes to have recourse to take revenge on her adulterous husband and his accomplice if she catches them in the act is to pour a pot of hot or boiling water on their bodies. [324]

D. Against the go-between (1) Nkundó law permits all sorts of invective, blows, and a good whipping. Formerly the most serious situation arose if a woman was called directly. In the past, if favored by circumstances (especially the social position of the families involved), certain of the more jealous and bold men caught the go-between and sold him as a slave. This punishment was entirely legitimate, even though the person for whom the go-between acted was the one primarily guilty and therefore the prisoner's family could attack him on that account. People cite the rather recent historic case of Bonkáfɛ́ is Ilóko of Ilenge (Ntɔ́mbá, Wángatá), who sold a Botswa named Bompáte into slavery because the latter had brought a lover's gift to Wáfya, his favorite.

1. The Nkundó generally use go-betweens to tender invitations to women; these are frequently children between the ages of six and fourteen. The disastrous effect of such a practice on the bringing up of young people is easily understood. In some groups it has inflicted a real moral evil.

E. Conclusion. In examining the various sanctions that Nkundó law provides against adulterers and their accomplices, we are struck by a noticeable difference among the cases. Although a wife has certain means to check her husband's misconduct, she is unquestionably less well armed than he. This is a logical consequence of the nature of Nkundó marriage. A husband defends his "property," whereas a wife is not an "owner." Furthermore, in this realm the requirements are stricter for a woman than for a man. Even in Europe the misconduct of a man is judged very differently than a woman's weakness, the latter being considered much more serious and shameful, even though -- in an absolute sense -- the two are equal. Finally, the system of polygamy plays a role, for it tends to weaken a wife's love and consequently her jealousy, so 684 581 562 that she becomes accustomed to her husband's relations with various other women. Consequently, the reaction of the women in general [325] against adultery is much weaker than that of the men. Moreover, because of this same system, a woman is much more exposed to weakness, and stronger sanctions are therefore necessary to insure her fidelity.

Finally, there is one last reason for considering a woman's misconduct as more serious. It is the danger of conception through adultery, with all the attendant consequences: risks for the pregnant woman, forced continence for the husband, etc. (1)

1. See no. 6 below as well as Chapter I, Part 2, Article IV, 3, and Chapter X, Article II, 3.

562 684 From the description of sanctions it is apparent that in spite of the woman's inferior position, Nkundó law does not leave husbands the full and complete freedom which, according to certain writers, they are accorded among other peoples. Even if the means of repression available to the wife do not incontestably prove that the husband has an obligation of conjugal fidelity -- and the wife's legal status explains a great deal -- the fact remains that the nkonga as well as public opinion approve of even her violent reaction, proving that she is right and the husband wrong.

5. Public opinion

626 637 Public opinion is fairly lenient in relation to isolated instances (yĕsi, efongo). It clearly recognizes the error involved in infringing on the conjugal rights of another, but the error is attributed to human weakness. In the case of habit the situation is different; it is criticized frequently and severely. Habitual sinners [illegible] are called elɔ́fɔ́kɔ́ (from the verb lofoka, literally "to flutter" and figuratively "to flirt"), elɔ́ngɛ or elɔ́lɔ́ngɛ (from the verb lɔ̂longa) or elɔ́lɔ́ɔ́ (from lɔ̂loa) "to flutter, to be flighty and fickle." These epithets are applied primarily to women, who are more subject to this failing than men.

626 The shame attached to the discovery of this sort of miscon-
[837] duct in the better circles in Europe is unknown among the Nkundó.
This is natural since isolated instances are readily excused. As to [152] the habitual offenders, they are sensitive [326] to the above-mentioned epithets but will not correct their ways on this account any more than people in other parts of the world.

[57] An adulterous husband is criticized as much as an adulterous wife in spite of the difference in the means of repression which 626 Nkundó law provides for their respective misconduct.
684

Public opinion therefore corroborates the conclusion toward which our examination of sanctions has pointed, namely that adultery is condemned by the Nkundó. Opinion is not based on the existence of the sanction but seems to spring from their innate mentality, which makes them perceive adultery as a disorder.

6. Aggravating circumstances

[837] If a case of adultery is followed by conception, it becomes 842 especially serious, and for the husband as much as for the natural 672 father. Indeed the latter must assume all the consequences. When circumstances permit the husband makes his wife denounce her accomplice, and she does not refuse to do so. The husband then calls a meeting and demands a pledge (ndanga) from the culprit, who in that way acknowledges that he is at fault and shows his willingness to assume all responsibility. If there is a miscarriage or the child dies during delivery, the natural father must pay the legal father an indemnity of "a slave" or more (sometimes 50 rings); a smaller indemnity is required for a child who is only deformed or sickly. If the mother dies the indemnity consists of a slave and 50 rings, and it may go as high as 100 rings.

In the interim the husband no longer goes near his wife. He leaves her to her lover, who must "preserve the foetus" and observe all the rites and practices associated with pregnancy and childbirth, since, physically, he is the father. (1) [327]

1. For fuller details see Chapter X, Article II, 3. For analogous practices

595 great ceremonies because they lack the necessary wealth.

596 The bomɛ́tsa is never nkɔ́ndɛ́. But before he makes one of his wives a nkɔ́ndɛ́ a husband must ask the advice and approval of the [591] bomɛ́tsa. For that purpose he presents her with a bompɛ́ngɛ́ (a dog, a goat, some rings), which expresses his recognition of her right and authority and at the same time is intended to secure a favorable response. If the bomɛ́tsa does not agree, the matter is not followed through. But that situation is only hypothetical. In practice the bomɛ́tsa yields to her husband's preferences, since he has recognized her rights in the proper fashion.

When a husband wants to create a nkɔ́ndɛ́, he first makes all the preparations, brews the sugar-cane beer and collects all the riches that are to be distributed. Then he invites the neighboring villages and calls together his relatives. On the assigned day, the assembly having gathered, the chosen wife puts on her most beautiful garments and adorns herself with her richest ornaments. She [592] seats herself on a magnificent bosɛ́nga [345] (a portable couch) (1) in front of the audience. Her husband then announces to those assembled that henceforth this woman is to be his favorite; woe unto the man who has the temerity to seduce her or even show affection toward her -- he will be a dead man (or he will have to pay an ● [684] enormous indemnity of 25 to 50 bakonga). In the past it often happened that a seducer was killed or reduced to slavery without further ado. When the husband has paid 25 rings or more to the wife's family and gifts have been distributed to the assembled patriarchs, his words are ratified by the assembly, and henceforth the contract between them and the husband is sealed. Dances, song, and drink follow.

[292] The favorite wears no special garb. She wears the same clothing as all the other women and wears furs only for dances.

The term universally employed to signify the breaking up of a marriage by the wife is bokôfo, derived from the verb kôfa. This word is not used for a wife's repudiation by her husband. Therefore, its meaning is not equivalent to "divorce"; it means rather "to break the union with the husband." The transitive causative form (kôfya) means "to provoke this break." It actually does happen that the woman's family causes the dissolution of a marriage for the sake of a more advantageous union. This should be understood in the context of what we have explained concerning reasons for divorce. Serious failures in the husband's fulfillment of his duties to his parents-in-law are mainly involved here. The [587] remarriage of a divorcée is described by the generic term kumbwa, "to be married to someone."

B. Second hypothesis: a husband wanted to get rid of his wife. Old natives stated very categorically that such behavior on the husband's part was due not to the cooling of his love, but to [383] incorrigible conduct on the wife's part. He was reduced to this extremity by the impossibility of continuing conjugal life with her.

586 584 He did everything in his power to forestall the flight of his wife by making the first move. After having vainly tried to bring her around through the intervention of her parents and especially the ndonga, he had recourse to one of the following means, which he could in fact use successively. But first he was required to inform the witness and to obtain his approval as well as that of the family authorities. The measures were as follows:

[illegible] a) Submission to the etâka, a heavy wooden fork fastened to the neck. When the husband has placed the etâka on his wife, the ndonga informed her parents of what had happened. They could then come and free their daughter by returning the bride price. If the husband applied the etâka against the wishes of the witness, the latter could release the prisoner. But in so doing he became guarantor of the reimbursement of the bride price; he became personally responsible for it.

[illegible] The husband was authorized to keep his wife under this form of torture for months. If his parents-in-law would not or could not 586 husband's knowledge, or taking refuge) and did so, her remarriage was illegal. Before the law the new husband was simply a thief, since he held a person near him over whom he had no rights. For this reason the husband could declare war on him, which he was not permitted to do in the other case, the question of his marriage being a matter between him and his wife's family.

Another consequence of that legal ruling is the following: If the woman who has left her legitimate husband wishes to return to him, she can advise him of her intention by a secret message. She asks him to come and get her at the moment when her lover is to pay the bride price (ndanga or walo, depending on the instance). She urges the latter to meet his financial obligations. On the day set the legitimate husband, accompanied by his ndonga, goes and hides near the place where the payment is to be made. At an opportune moment he comes out of his hiding place ● [591] and seizes the valuables that have been set out, saying to his rival: "I have caught you in adultery with my wife; these valuables belong to me as indemnity." [396] The woman's family takes his side, and the husband who has seduced her finds himself at a disadvantage and is sent away empty handed, for he is clearly entirely in the wrong.

If the legitimate husband belonged to an influential family he might risk the assassination of his rival if he saw a possibility. But then the situation was complicated by a war.

Furthermore, if the fugitive becomes pregnant as a result of her relations with her lover before the procedure of bride-price payment and reimbursement has been carried out, the child belongs, not to the natural father, but to the abandoned husband, who remains its legal father.

178 586 Nowadays everything has changed. A woman who leaves her husband cannot legitimately cohabit with another man. But during the past years no sanction remained. The imprisonment of the divorcing woman (mentioned above) could revive the ancient law while adapting it to circumstances. Furthermore, since the marriage is not dissolved, the alleged second husband could be condemned by the native courts for complicity in adultery.

853 an ordeal or ask a magician's judgment or a magical practice to 857 reveal the culprit. The culprit who is discovered is not subject to any social sanction; he is punished by the ordeal itself or the spell cast against him.

●[684] If the mother's adultery is proven through her having been caught in the act, her seducer is considered guilty. He must pay the death indemnity (20 to 30 copper rings). The woman is not at all involved as far as society is concerned; it is a matter between her and her husband.

751 In order to prevent any harmful effect on the child, the 854 Nkundó resort to a potion called bondandota, which will be explained in [478] the next article, 3. "Medication" by scarification might also be mentioned. This therapy is applied to the parents as well as to the child. If the father is wealthy, he invites the wife's family to come and perform the operation themselves. As in all comparable situations, the invitation is accompanied by the handing over of a pledge, and farewell presents (belingako) are given at the end of the visit. In addition the wife very often goes to live with her parents for some time after her seclusion in order to increase the efficacy of the treatment.

843 The sanction incurred for a violation of the secondary
[684] stipulations is less serious. For instance, the pregnant woman suffers from violent migraines, which often cause fainting and sometimes make delivery very difficult; thus they can even cause death. The husband is seldom bothered by these headaches. But he takes great pains to faithfully observe the law in order to spare his wife such painful consequences and to avoid the death of the child being born.

Apart from sexual abstention and the rules connected with it, the couple are also subject to various prohibitions which are clearly based on superstitious ideas. Thus:

1) They must neither go down into a well nor dig in the earth. The woman would die, for it is as if they were digging her grave.

2) They must not carry anything together with another person, for that is how corpses are carried, and such carrying would be the cause of death, through imitation of the woman's funeral procession.

853 the sap, which she then mixes with water. The resulting liquid is 857 oily and foams like soap. She places a few drops on a piece of banana leaf and makes a sachet of it. She holds this against the breast for a certain time until the boil, similar to a blood clot or a piece of liver, leaves the breast and enters the sachet. She then shows it to those present. From then on the mother can nurse her child without fear; her milk has become healthy and normal.

2) The mother's public confession must include the names
837 of all the men with whom she has had carnal relations since the 853 child's conception. Other groups, such as the Injóló ; extend this
● 684 obligation even to instances preceding that moment but which 783 have not been declared at a previous occasion. The confession is public. The masseuse related to the husband begins to crush the leaves to be used in rubbing the breast; as she moves the pestle and says to the mother, "Name a man." The mother replies by giving a name. The masseuse says nyongo, "indemnity."
Then all those present say yengô, yengô, yengô, "absolved ".
Then it is the other masseuse's turn, and she interrogates the mother in the same way. The process continues till all the names have been cited. If [496] the mother cites the name of a man who is a close relative of her husband and who therefore does not need to pay an indemnity, the masseuse does not reply nyongo. Instead a member of the husband's clan makes the gesture signifying [20] exemption: he holds the kernel of a palm nut (lolikɔ) in his left hand and throws it by means of a small board which he holds in his right. Among the Injóló the man takes two kernels and strikes them against each other and then throws them away. Were the woman to suppress a name the child would die. If she has no admission to make, she replies, "No one besides my husband."

The indemnity that must be paid by those who are obligated to do so consists of a hen and a bunch of bananas (or their cash value) which are to be given to the masseuses, who will then divide them. Were the accused to refuse, the husband would demand a regular indemnity from him after the end of the seclusion.

The Bombwanja have this confession at the time of the [illegible] fastening of the fetus. A few old women married into the clan carry out the interrogation. The kernel of the fruit of the palm is thrown by means of a knife.

595 wife was called Lonkata. This was, however, more a category, for there were sometimes four Lonkata in a harem. The rest were ordinary wives. Among the Ekonda, the first wife was called Nkumokolo, just like the Bomatsa. The second wife was called Ekila or Nkonde. The remaining wives were the ordinary wives of the harem.

595 484 The first wife, Bomatsa, always remained at home and never left the harem. The second, Ekila or Nkonde, accompanied the polygynist everywhere; she was at his side on all his trips. The Bolumbu usually went completely alone to do errands in other villages.

595 These old customs of priority among the wives are now gradually beginning to disappear.

684 It was forbidden under severe penalty to have relations with the first, second, or third wife of the polygynist. The penalties were death, slavery, or a large fine.

This was their law concerning adultery, enforced with severe punishment.

595 837 The ordinary wives of the harem were less strictly guarded. This often depended on the jealousy or indifference of the polygynist. Anyone who had relations with these wives had to pay a fine, or rather, a price of prostitution. Since the wives were almost all in the possession of the polygynists, there were naturally many men without a wife. These, then, often had relations with the ordinary wives of the polygynists. Also, the sons of the polygynist had relations with them; the polygynist himself sometimes even had relations with the ordinary wives of his neighbor. This was the bad consequence and the immorality of polygyny.

595 586 It is easy to understand that the ordinary wives of the polygynist, having relations with others, often left their husband, or rather, their master in order to go to another. The ordinary wives constituted the largest number. It is because of this that one now finds many women who have had three or four, sometimes even seven, different husbands in succession. Among some tribes, [534] the Ekonda among them, they were stricter; a wife who had already left her husband or master two or more times was considered to have little worth.

567 595 The female slaves who were taken in war were given by the polygynist to his male slaves as wives. They could also be installed in the harem among the ordinary wives. Their children could have the same rights as the other children of the polygynist

M 226 685 In individual fishing, the fish belong to the owner of the trap or to the person who set it. The native respects this right, and, moreover, custom punishes offenses very severely. Native law is rigorous to the point that a man caught red-handed in theft is liable to be driven from the community.

M 226 The yield from individual fishing is of hardly any importance. This kind of fishing is practiced only to vary the diet a little, and it is successful only because of the tremendous abundance of fish in these rivers.

M S 226 Communal fishing is much more productive. Certain tribes, or to be more exact, certain families among the peoples of the Fimi, Lake Leopold II, and the lower Lukenie make a veritable

607 extended to relatives with whom marriage prohibited, such as nieces
837 who are banankɔ́nɔ́, who are his wife's "mothers." (1)

1. See Chapter V, Article IV and the examples cited there (for instance, examples 25, 26, 17).

When such relatives of the wife marry, the situation changes. They belong to another man, and a continuation of the same practice as when they are single produces very serious cases of adultery. There are differences depending on the degree of affinity, however. In addition to the usual sanctions against adultery, other measures may be taken, especially the dissolution of the marriage. An especially serious case, but one which is more or less hypothetical, would be adultery between a man and his father-in-law's wife; a special feeling of shame is connected with it, and our Nkundó say that the two persons are like a Botswá and his master. Misconduct with the wife of a brother-in-law (or cousin-in-law) is also a very serious matter. The latter may take his sister (or cousin) away from the guilty husband and thus break the marriage. The same applies to adultery with a nyangɔ̂kilɔ́. (1)

1. See Chapter V, Article IV and the examples given there (for instance, examples 25, 26, 17).

3. Legal matters

606
615 Here we must examine the manner in which breaches of the law are settled between parents-in-law and son-in-law. It is known that among these peoples justice, in the strict sense of the word, is one of the most prominent aspects of social legislation. Theft is one of the principal causes for shame and was formerly severely punished. The thief, especially if he continued to repeat his offence, could be sold as a slave.

If one of the wife's relatives were found guilty of stealing from his (or her) relative by marriage, or even from one of the latter's relatives, the family tribunal was assembled. Out of consideration for the ties of kinship between the thief and the wife and in order not to sadden her and her family, the guilty person was not sold as a slave. He was simply turned over to the woman [293] and her family, and they were told: "Here he is; he has been found guilty of theft and should have been reduced to slavery. Out of respect for you, however, we are not selling him; we are rolling (-kilimola) him toward you. Take him as bride price and add him to the sum of the bosóngo." Thus the matter was settled in a friendly fashion. If subsequently there was a divorce, the wife's family had to restore not only the bride price that had been paid but also an additional slave for the member of their group that the husband had yielded in this fashion. Thus, the transaction was not at all a fictional one.

Conversely, the same procedure was adopted in relation to a relative of the husband who had violated the rules of justice to the detriment of a member of the family related by marriage. But in that case the extradition of the guilty party was considered as the addition of a slave to the amount of the nkɔmɛ.

[539] Hence the saying: bokiló ntɛ́wɛ́kɛ́ ndá ngonda ɛy'okanga, "a parent-in-law cannot die in the forest of his relatives by marriage."

The situation is no different nowadays. The only change is that, instead of giving back a slave if a dissolution of the marriage occurs, the equivalent value is paid in copper rings, etc.

60
The same customs governed conduct toward prisoners of war. For instance, in the course of a war Eale became the master of Bombolo, whose cousin is married to Iloko, a close relative of Eale. Iloko interceded with Eale in order to obtain Bombolo's freedom, and Bombolo was sent home but was to be considered as bosóngo. The liberated prisoner thus was classed as a slave given as part of the bride price, as in the preceding case, and all the appropriate rules were followed.

In every case at least a few beéngo in addition to the 764 bombémbé and the botsá w'îlaká are always claimed. The latter payments can never be omitted. The belt is a payment made exclusively to the mother and by rights it goes to the mother's clan.

The higher the amount of these funeral payments, the more 764 the son-in-law is welcome. The alliance is perfect. Therefore, 606 not only will the wife's family reciprocate his fine feelings by adding 607 a few more dogs, but in addition the son-in-law will be well received and successful in his application when, after the period of mourning, he brings the sum of the ibóloóko in order to obtain a substitute for the deceased. (2) In addition, if the relations with his in-laws have been excellent, he will easily obtain the substitute in advance, so that she can care for him during the entire mourning period.

There are severe sanctions against the omission of the 764 funeral payments. [439] Neglecting to send the notification gift 609 alone is enough to set these in motion. They are: the breaking off of the affinal relationship; the loss of the children, since the father's offense is equal to a repudiation; and finally molestation of the culprit by the spirit of the deceased. Thus at Bokátola (Bompela) one can find two boys, Botéfuí and Ikembá, the children of Bonyongela of Ilángá and Etáka of Bokátola. They have now been incorporated into their mother's clan, because their father did not send a nsango. On stronger grounds the same is true for the whole nkunjí.

Article V. The Social Position of a Widow

In Chapter III, Articles II and IV, we have already noted 768 that in the eyes of the Nkundó, the death of the husband does 587 not dissolve a marriage. The union continues, and even after mourning it is not broken ipso facto. Even to have the woman taken and treated as a wife by another man is not enough to end it. As

2. See Chapter III, Article IV.

596 invading groups of kinsfolk there was always one who was considered as the family head, and this man could claim the title of mwene mokonda, the owner of the land. Round this man the rest of the members of the family group clustered, and he had the general direction of their affairs. He could scarcely be termed a chief, having a paternal oversight rather than exercising any wide authority demanding organizing ability and political astuteness. The succession of mwene mokonda runs collaterally through younger brothers in the first place; hence if a first-born male happens to hold that position, the succession among his younger brothers is in the order of their birth. When these have all died the succession passes to the next generation. If all the males of a group die, it is possible for a daughter's son to leave his father's side in order to assume the position of mwene mokonda on his mother's side.

A mwene mokonda can delegate his duties as head to another member of the family, who is then termed mobali e ele, the husband of the settlement. For such a privilege payment is generally made to the mwene mokonda. Round these mwene mokonda and their immediate kinsmen others gathered, forming, it may be, another section of the same settlement, known then as an etuka, or, if numerous, another settlement.[1]

624 [593] The mwene mokonda (or mobali e ele) hears and judges cases that come to him, aided always by a group of elders, and directs the activities of the settlement. However, this does not entirely satisfy the Tumba; they want an nkumu also. The nkumu is chosen, not by the whole settlement, but by a single village, or it may be even one etuka of a village. If the villages of a settlement were without an nkumu it would generally, but not necessarily, be the etuka of the mwene mokonda which would lead off by seeking one out. The group desiring an nkumu are known as the mokonda, and they look about for a man of the same tribe but not of the same settlement or village, an outsider. He must be a man of some wealth, for actually he will buy his right of authority and pay heavily for it. If the man who is approached accepts, he is known from then on until his accession as Nkomo Akolo, the term nkumu not being used until he is finally invested with the insignia of office, the mosola, or hat of special design. Nkomo Akolo's family is known as the ekoja, or mango. This man, [556] once having accepted the invitation to become nkumu, sets about amassing wealth in the form of wives and brass rods. He may be years about it, but he does not thereby forfeit his right to the office, nor apparently weary those who extended the invitation. Should Nkomo Akolo die before he is installed as nkumu, or should he wish to withdraw from the honour bestowed upon him, the succession passes to another member of his ekoja. The succession would normally pass to the eldest male of the ekoja, [787] but many circumstances may interfere to give it to another member of the family. A dream dreamed by a male of the ekoja to the effect that he should be the nkumu is sufficient to give him the right of succession over the eldest male. When asked whether it was common to lie about such a dream having occurred, in order to gain [681] the right of succession, those questioned received the suggestion with emphatic negatives, for this is no time to lie; any man so doing would be sure to die, and the fear of death would deter him from such presumption.

[1] Where possible, the invested chiefs set up by the Belgian Colonial Government are those chosen because of their right to be known as mwene mokonda or mobali e ele. Often, however, the settlements are so small and lacking in cohesion that it has been necessary to set up chiefs arbitrarily over chieftaincies very much larger than were their own hereditary spheres of influence.

624 [781] [513] An nkumu can never walk alone, but must always be accompanied by others, and on no occasion whatsoever may he run. Even though he never washes, if he is out in the rain and sees everybody else hurrying for shelter, he will not quicken his pace. His movements must be slow and deliberate. The nkumu never sleeps alone; waking and sleeping he is attended by someone. But apart from this he is free to go where he wishes. The nkumu is not indiscriminate, as others may be, in his private habits, but must use his own latrine at all times, and if travelling must have his own latrine in each place where he stays. The inland nkumu frequently take advantage of this custom by hiding their accumulated brass rods at the bottom of a freshly dug latrine. Such hidden wealth will be acquired by an inheritor at the decease of the nkumu.

In speaking of himself the nkumu never refers to himself by his title but always by his own name.

624 352 [562 825] [572] The couch upon which the nkumu sits or reclines during the daytime may not be shared indiscriminately with others, but those permitted to sit upon it at the same time as the nkumu are nsami, women, and Batwa. The reservation of this couch for the use of the nkumu is not surprising, but the exceptions are. One explanation given was that women and Batwa are not bato ba ne, persons in particular; they do not count for anything in the social life of the community; they are not really 'people'. Another explanation was that they do not pay fines, this being tantamount to saying that they are exempt from laws and therefore cannot break laws even by doing what would be for others an illegal act. The stool of the nkumu, however, has closer restrictions in the manner of its use. Besides the nkumu only two others may sit upon it, Nome and Mpanga. It is always carried by one of his wives, though not necessarily by any special one.

624 262 The restrictions concerning the food of the nkumu are many. He may eat food only in his own house, or, if on a journey, in one given over for his use. He may not enter another house to partake of food even if invited to do so. Likewise the nkumu may not eat in the forest, or eat or drink anywhere along the road when on a journey, but must wait until he arrives at a village and has a house at his disposal in order to partake of food and drink. He never 'sleeps with hunger'; even if a wife or child should die causing him great sorrow he must partake of food before going to sleep. The Bonginda nkumu must never go into mourning, and death must be ignored by them, but the inland nkumu are permitted to mourn. All food carried to an nkumu must be covered, this rule even applying to water. Food must not be placed in a basket with high sides (ntele), but in a shallow one (mpete), and no food that has been kept overnight in a pot may be eaten by him: swelling of the abdomen will result. Various foods are taboo, among these all fast-moving snakes, though slow-moving ones may be eaten; light-coloured palm-nuts may not be eaten, and a variety of yam known as nsolo is shunned, for it is with the tough stems of the nsolo that the dying body of the nkumu will be bound to ensure the sitting posture necessary for burial.

624 Among regulations roughly classed as social, we have already covered several in references above, and have referred to the nkumu in council. It may be added here that he is expected to agree with the majority of the councillors and not fall out with them. The rules affecting the anger of the nkumu are accompanied by severe penalties. There must not be any fighting; if anger is aroused to the point of blows the antagonists must go to the nsekele for their fight, this being the location of the houses belong- 624

ing to the sons of the nkumu. The penalty for breaking this law is a fine, and if no 689 fine were forthcoming hanging used to be the alternative. If a quarrel arises elsewhere and one party wishes to avoid fighting, he may retire to the nsange and thus be safe. No trees in the nsange may be climbed. There are, however, privileged classes exempt from all such rules, and these embrace a good many people. Thus, the mother [645] of twins, twins, Batwa, nsona, and all members of the mokonda and elonja are exempt from the laws of the nsange. If any of these commit acts which are illegal for those [672] coming under the law, they are not held guilty, but their actions will not be condoned;
they will be considered breaches of good conduct, and will be dealt with informally; [624]
the parties will be quietly reprimanded, and adjured to observe the proprieties of conduct. For outsiders breaking the laws of the nsange, what corresponds to a warrant is necessary. It is necessary to catch the culprit in the act and hale him before the [694] nkumu. The nkumu himself cannot do this, nor can any of the elonja; it must be done by one of the mokonda, and so if the nkumu sees someone infringing the law he will try to get one of the mokonda on the spot in a hurry in order to catch the offender.

In war,[1] it is the nkumu e ale who is most active in preparations, but the nkumu 624 will accompany his party to battle, keeping well in the rear, and surrounded by good fighters. He does not wear his nsambi but puts on the informal hat. If an nkumu were 726 captured, he would never be tortured or killed as were other prisoners, unless he specifically sought such a fate. He could be ransomed, and his captors would [727] beseech him to let his people ransom him, but in many cases an nkumu would invite death rather than endure the shame of being yielded up as a prisoner of war.

An nkumu is always addressed by a double clap of the hands, and will not reply to 624 anyone rude enough to speak to him first. In answer to the clap he replies with a word of wisdom expressed in an aphorism or proverb. Such a reply, however, is 576 common to all elders, who have their favourite aphorisms ready for any who pay them special honour. Anything the nkumu says must be answered not by the customary ale bolo (even so) which ordinary people use, but with the special word, biongo, which is reserved exclusively for replying to an nkumu, and means the same thing.

When the hour of death approaches, an nkumu is attended by his Batwa. It is a 624 rule that he must not die a natural death, and near the end, while he is still conscious 763 and can still speak, all "free men" clear out and leave the Batwa pygmies to their task of tying the nkumu very tightly with the fibrous yam vines known as ntsidiki. [563] Often this secure lashing in the sitting posture, known as ilimo, is sufficient to finish the nkumu off, but sometimes the work is expedited by twisting his neck.[2] Then it is announced that he is dead, asililoa, this being in contradistinction to the customary phrase ankwa awiiki used of the death of ordinary people. While the latter means

[1] Owing to the lack of tribal cohesion, warfare was not on any considerable scale. The method of warfare consisted in sending groups of young men to fight first, the elders only joining in when one side began to get the worst of the fray. Victors and vanquished in such fights were designated "husband" and "wife" respectively, and members of the one group were free to come and go in the villages of the other, and even to help themselves to food. In future wars "husband" and "wife" were supposed to combine against their common foe.

[2] Besides nkumu, elderly and rich men, fathers and mothers of twins, and twins are buried in the ilimo or sitting posture, in contradistinction to the mlongo position which is the recumbent one used for ordinary people and slaves. [762]

113 more ground than ours, since it even includes a discussion of the Mbole.

H. Brepoels, "Het Familiehoofd bij de Nkundó-Negers," Congo, 1930, Vol. 2, p. 322.

124 We have tried to make our data as complete as possible. We have given here not only the major trends and basic principles, but also the particulars, even those that seem most insignificant. They are always interesting, and sometimes more so than one may have suspected at first. All the material has been discussed over and over again, in private and in public, with very varied people at different times and places, and the points that presented the greatest difficulty were gone over countless times.

121 In general we have preferred to use the descriptive and analytic method. We have drawn conclusions and principles from the data. Although case histories naturally lengthened the text of this work, we have not hesitated to insert them at various points. They are the best means of bringing out certain rules or customs and bringing to life the psychology of our people.

121 69 In this respect a remark should be made whose importance deserves our attention for a moment. The examination of judicial cases of which we have been direct or indirect witnesses does not provide a scientific certainty about the laws -- or "the customs," to use the term so frequently applied (1). For not all [16] that is done

1. It is unfortunate that this term has become so fashionable, for it lacks precision. Indeed, it may mean simply "practice, usage," or it may be used in the legal sense of "a practice having the force of a law." Often a confusion between the two meanings is created, and all customs are considered to be legally obligatory, when actually, some practices are outside common law, and others are in opposition to it. For the sake of precision in ethnographic and ethnological works, it would be well to use this ambiguous term as little as possible and to distinguish clearly among legal procedures, the laws and custom or usage.

121 is in accordance with justice. The observation that the natives behave in one fashion or another, and that this or that palaver is often 69 settled in a particular way, is not a sufficient basis for concluding that such is the law.

Infractions of the rules of social justice are more frequent than one would suspect. The principles are good, but often passions prevent their application, and frequently there are neither sanctions to support a weakness of will nor rewards to stimulate loyal adherence.

Furthermore, one should not invoke the variability and con-121 tinuous transformation of native law (as does Dr. T. Seitz, for ex-
119
69 ample, in Africa, Vol. 3, No. 1, p. 89) without first establishing whether the judgments rendered have been in conformity with the law. The remark made by this eminent author further on in his article, "Welche Rolle dabei das Machtmoment," etc. . . . weakens his first statement and shows precisely that an accurate knowledge of legal prescriptions cannot be attained solely on the basis of the verdicts of tribunals, and that partiality often plays a considerable part. The observation made by the former governor of the Cameroons may be applied to the Belgian Congo and often to "civilized" countries as well -- partially and the abuse of power are nowhere unknown.

We must also take into account the possibility of the judges'
121 ignorance, as well as our own difficulty in understanding their sentences, 69 since important points of fact and law are sometimes left unmentioned, and yet are implied.

It is not surprising that there are complicated cases where it is very difficult for the natives, however intelligent and impartial, to settle the dispute and provide a fair and legitimate solution. The law cannot foresee for every case the infinite variety of personal, local, and modal circumstances that may occur.

Only the analysis and comparison of diverse cases, [17] their solutions, sanctions, and consequences, together with discussions with discreet and impartial natives who are knowing and skillful and who have learned to know us and to understand what we want to learn from them, and who are sincerely disposed to help us at the same time, can produce a rational and reasoned certainty which conforms to reality. These conditions are numerous, and it is difficult to find them

121 all fulfilled in one person. But such individuals do exist, if in the 69 person of the investigator they find sympathy, broad ideas, a lack of all European racism, understanding, a knowledge of their language, and a benevolent devotion to their interests, individually and as a group.

Even if one has the good fortune to find a native who, after 121 much experience, reaches the point where he will say spontaneously: 124 "This is done often, but it is against the law; the law says thus and so; this decision of the tribunal was partial for such or such reason," -- an infinitely valuable situation, but one which arises very rarely -- one is not thereby absolved of the need to check his statements. But the further one goes, the more it is possible to be aware of the reality and to appraise the informant's value in this sphere and the usefulness of his statements.

These considerations are particularly valuable in making the 121 distinction between obligations and social decorum or good manners, 183 between legal obligations and obligations of kinship and mutual 671 assistance. In current practice the Nkundó make no clear lines of demarcation between these categories, since they have never codified their law or attempted to set up a clear and precise classification.
They feel no more need for this than, for instance, they or even we "civilized" people bother about setting up a grammar for our native tongue, which we speak correctly and without the slightest difficulty, purely out of habit.

An investigation in the legal domain is made [18] very diffi-[124] cult by the patriarchal and feudal character of these peoples, added to the lack of writing. Not only is there an adaptation to circumstances -- the felicitous flexibility of native laws -- in which jurisprudence plays a great role, but the Nkundó, while knowing well what is lawful and what is not, generally does not clearly understand the nature of an obligation, and above all he does not know its source.

One's chances of obtaining good results in the inquiry are 121 greatly increased by the use of hypothetical cases, presented to the 124 individuals one knows best and whom one knows to be in no way involved. It is always worthwhile to use this method as a means of completing and perhaps correcting conclusions based on the examination

8. Those who are entitled to the bride price

583⁴
596
It is apparent from everything we have said that the bride price is placed in the possession of the father of the woman for whom it has been paid. In his absence it goes to his eldest brother or, if his [illegible] has settled there and inherited the father's authority, he is the one to receive the bride price of his niece (cousin in our terms). Otherwise it goes to the eldest son. In short, the rights to a bride price are passed down in the order of the family hierarchy.

The mother's clan receives the copper spirals, the goat, and certain of the beɔ́ngo. [176]

There are circumstances, however, under which this order can be destroyed so that the father's clan does not get the slightest portion of the bride price. This happens if the daughter who is to be married has left her father's clan for a sufficiently good reason and has been adopted by her mother's family. The following is a historic example of such a case:

573⁶
671
The events took place at Bompɔ́ma (Injɔ́lɔ́) between 1890 and 1900. One of the inhabitants, Ilɔ́njɔ́ yă Ngombɔla had had two children by his wife, Eale of Bokɔ́ndela (Bɔ́ngɔ́): a boy, Mpulɛ́ɛfɛ́se and a girl, Embɔ́ɔmbi. The girl was abducted by one of the black soldiers who had come to occupy the region and was taken by him to his native village, somewhere near Coq. The wife of another man from Bompɔ́ma, named Iɛ̂ntulu, was carried off and taken away by another soldier. Ilɔ́njɔ́ owed Iɛ̂ntulu a dog. The latter took advantage of the disorder caused by the beginning of the occupation to demand his due with violent threats. Ilɔ́njɔ́, having no dog and probably frightened, handed his son over to his creditor. Iɛ̂ntulu hastened to find the soldier who had taken his wife and offered to give the latter the slave boy in exchange for her. The pair came to an agreement, and the soldier took away the boy, who died in his master's hands in a manner unknown to me.

Still during the time of the Independent State, Embɔ́ɔmbi was able to make her way back to her country. Passing her mother's village, she heard how her father had acted toward her brother Mpulɛ́ɛfɛ́se. Indignant, she decided not to continue on her way: she 585 declared that she was breaking with her father and wished instead to 596 live at the home of her maternal uncle Isɛla. After a time, a cer-●691/ tain Belekɔ came to ask for her in marriage and paid the bride price to Isɛla.

In 1922, Ilɔnjɔ went to Boɛndela and presented a complaint to Chief Efɔle against Isɛla, because the latter had taken his daughter's bride price. Efɔle, assisted by the messenger Bongimɛ and by notables, decided in favor of the accused; Since the plaintiff had gravely offended his daughter by delivering her brother into [177] slavery, which resulted in his death, he first had to be reconciled with her. If she accepted his apologies, the father would receive her bride price. They agreed on the nature of the reconciliation gift (bɔfɔdɔ): Ilɔnjɔ would pay a goat. Since he did not have it with him he handed over his knife as a pledge (wɛ̌kɔ). Iomɛ, the bɔnanikɔnɛ of Isɛla (who by then had died), promised to make restitution of the bride price and in anticipation paid 12 rings and 3 knives. Ilɔnjɔ went back home. They awaited him in vain; they did not see him again -- neither him nor his goat.

Act three: February, 1933. Efɔle, Bongimɛ, and the rest had been removed as a result of a reorganization of districts. Bokwɛla had been made chief of the Boɛngɛ. The district tribunal began to function again, and our Ilɔnjɔ took advantage of the situation and recommenced his attack. He brought complaint against Iomɛ and against Isɛla's brother, Engongolo, who was not there in 1922 but who now had returned home. On March 6, 1933 the palaver was settled. Naturally, the men who newly held their authority found this a good opportunity to strengthen their position and did the exact opposite of their predecessors. They condemned Iomɛ and Engongolo and decided in favor of Ilɔnjɔ.

Here we see a real abuse of power. For according to Nkundɔ law, only Ilɔnjɔ was in the wrong. He had conducted himself badly all the way down the line. His daughter had no obligation to recognize him as father, since he had virtually disowned her in the first place. And her mother's clan could have, even should have, received the bride price (see also the case described in Chapter IX, Article IV).

178 currency, but in articles on which the natives fix a conventional 583 price, usually much higher than the actual value. Thus, for in- 435 stance, a pataki, or piston rifle, was always reckoned at 3,000 mitako; it did not matter that it was only worth 1, 500. There are, [546] therefore, only very few women who are paid for with nkesi in real currency or mitako.

691 583 178 The tragic result of this exaggerated rise in prices is that the mutual debts and difficulties among the natives have been increased, so that they are almost impossible to solve. In the attempt to settle a dispute, five other disputes come into it, all equally complicated, for the simple reason that the money, the mitako, to be paid does not exist, and it is forbidden to pay with women. To settle a dispute, several months are sometimes necessary, or a whole year. Other disputes never end, but pass on from father to son and are brought by each one in turn before each new District Administrator. In the districts where the bride price has not been raised, the difficulties and disputes are not nearly as numerous and are easy to solve. In the districts where the purchase price and the bride price of the women have become excessively high, the natives themselves admit that their disputes could formerly be solved easily, but that this is at present almost impossible.

It is unnecessary to say that this situation is harmful to the task of civilizing [the country] and to the mutual good relations of the natives. The natives are constantly coming to the District Administrator of the area to lay before him their disputes over women who have not been paid for. These disputes take up a great deal of the costly time of the administrator. He must hear and settle these usually very complicated disputes, for often the general peace of a village or district depends on it.

Also the natives themselves spend whole days and weeks doing nothing besides holding meetings to discuss the unpayable debts of bride price and the purchase price of wives, simply because the prices are excessive. For lack of currency, they pay each other with each other's debts, which usually complicates the business even more.

To improve this condition, the price of women and the bride price should be lowered, greatly lowered. We have seen that this was possible and practical when once a District Administrator who knew the native customs very well in the area of Coquilhatville really began to do it.

837 577 their sense of the personal injustice involved. But they do not reason out these feelings; they follow them spontaneously, blindly.

There is a greater awareness of the social evil in adultery. But it is based not on the philosophical considerations of this harm in itself, but on the consequences of individual cases for the proper functioning of society -- palavers, financial difficulties, enmities, quarrels, wars.

This it seems to me is the present state of their ideas. It does not preclude the possibility that the law and sanctions against adultery may rest on an ultimate basis of moral ideas. And more particularly it is quite possible that the moral idea [331] operates only in the form of a feeling of the great principles of fundamental natural law which is innate to all human reason.

837 177 5) No one will be astonished if we say that colonization, far from reducing the frequency of adultery, actually contributed to its considerable increase. The abolition of native penalties and punishments together with a great freedom of movement could not help but lead, naturally, to this state of affairs. Every informed colonial who is in close contact with the natives is aware of the situation. "The prohibition of corporal punishments which, according to custom, were the sanctions imposed against a woman's adultery have brought about a license whose extent can be measured by the degree to which a group is subject to our occupation. The forgetfulness if not the contempt for the promises of marriage is nowhere carried so far as in places where the customary disciplines have been completely removed." [837] (Maj. Engels, Bulletin Soc. Belge. Et. Col., cited in Congo, 3rd year, Vol. 1; p. 77, April, 1922). That is why various persons have repeatedly called for sanctions against adultery to replace the ancestral means of repression that have been abolished.

● 692 177 837 But the decrees hoped for have never passed beyond the stage of mere projects. Fortunately, another step, and a fundamental one, has been taken in the meantime through the establishment of native jurisdiction (1926). Under the guidance and control of European authorities, native courts will turn the helm halfway back to the ancient sanctions, adapting these all the while to the new conditions created by colonization and by the introduction of more humanitarian 627 ideas. Nevertheless, great care must be exercised not to go to ex-

681 tremes in introducing these ideas to the point where a society only
671 just beginning to emerge from a pagan barbarism because of the presence of a civilization based on Christianity, is treated as an equal of European communities. Native society must evolve gradually and harmoniously. Rushing is often synonymous with breaking, and it is always a [312] great mistake. And in the matters under discussion, the abolition of sanctions which, in spite of their imperfection and their inadequacy for fulfilling the whole task, have been shown to have a real efficacy, has removed all the coercive power of Nkundó law. A sentimental and excessive humanitarianism must yield before the native society's right to respect for its vital institutions -- unless these are entirely to be condemned -- and therefore before the necessity for severe punishments which it cannot do without for the moment. For our natives are not yet ready for a complete abolition of their customary sanctions, since they still lack a new foundation that would replace their fear of the ancient penalties. Let us therefore take care not to take all means of punishment away from husbands and wives, even if they seem somewhat violent from our viewpoint. Finally, there is no sense in overstressing a respect for members of the weaker sex, who by their very nature sometimes need punishment for the greater good of the whole community. Moreover, as for this respect, our Nkundó do not understand it at all; the way we conceive of it is entirely opposed to their mentality and their laws. Therefore, everything will work out more easily if the native courts are given sufficient latitude to act in the spirit of their ancestral law and if their activity is guided by a constant, informed, and sympathetic control whose sole aim is the healthy evolution of native society.

620 If it is applied within these limits and under these conditions, Nkundó law can redress many wrongs and help to save native society from the abyss into which it is in danger of falling. In spite of its faults and imperfections, it is preferable not only to the system of freedom (or license) which has reigned for many years, but also to

586ᵃ In spite of the opposition of several old-fashioned chiefs, 692 [388] the native courts that were recognized or established by the decree of 1926 have begun to make use of the powers the govern-
178 ment has assigned to them. They are called upon to play a great role in setting matters right, especially if their work is closely supervised and regularly checked. To accomplish this end, these courts must continue to act in the spirit of the ancient laws, taking into account only the change in circumstances (1).

1. See Chapter VI, Article VII, 7.

586ᵇ The chief measure for the restoration of order advocated 178 by the natives is the imprisonment of the wife who attempts a divorce. This practice would be a continuation of the custom of applying the etâka and an adaptation of it to present circumstances. Like the former practice, it would have a double effect: it would restrain flightiness and license, on the one hand, and, on the other, it would ensure the reimbursement of the bride price in cases where no reconciliation is possible. But its execution would be taken out of the husband's hands and handed over to the chief. Europeans who are in contact with the natives and concerned about the social order also favor this evolution of the common law.

Another way of combating such a situation would be the use of pressure against the guilty woman's parents, chiefly through the imprisonment of her mother. This measure has no basis in ancient law, except for war -- which did not touch the mother and actually was only moderately useful -- and the system of compensation (lowâfia) -- which depended on the availability of opportunities and was used through the husband's own initiative. This practice therefore cannot be approved as such, but it might be acceptable in cases where the parents are really at fault. For instance, they may have in one way or another incited their daughter to break her marriage although she had no acceptable reason for doing so, or, although a legitimate declaration [389] of divorce has been made, they might refuse to make restitution of the bride price. 596 invading groups of kinsfolk there was always one who was considered as the family head, and this man could claim the title of mwene mokonda, the owner of the land. Round this man the rest of the members of the family group clustered, and he had the general direction of their affairs. He could scarcely be termed a chief, having a paternal overlight rather than exercising any wide authority demanding organizing ability and political acumen. The succession of mwene mokonda runs collaterally through younger brothers in the first place; hence if a first-born male happens to hold that position, the succession among his younger brothers is in the order of their birth. When these have all died the succession passes to the next generation. If all the males of a group die, it is possible for a daughter's son to leave his father's side in order to assume the position of mwene mokonda on his mother's side.

A mwene mokonda can delegate his duties as head to another member of the family, who is then termed moloni e ele, the husband of the settlement. For such a privilege payment is generally made to the mwene mokonda. Round these mwene mokonda and their immediate kinsmen others gathered, forming, it may be, another section of the same settlement, known then as an etuka, or, if numerous, another settlement.[1]

624 The mwene mokonda (or moloni e ele) hears and judges cases that come to him, aided always by a group of elders, and directs the activities of the settlement. However, [593] this does not entirely satisfy the Tumba; they want an nkumu also. The nkumu is chosen, not by the whole settlement, but by a single village, or it may be even one etuka of a village. If the villages of a settlement were without an nkumu it would generally, but not necessarily, be the etuka of the mwene mokonda which would lead off by seeking one out. The group desiring an nkumu are known as the mokonda, and they look about for a man of the same tribe but not of the same settlement or village, an outsider. He must be a man of some wealth, for actually he will buy his right of authority and pay heavily for it. If the man who is approached accepts, he is known from then on until his accession as Nkoma Abale, the term nkumu not being used until he is finally invested with the insignia of office, the [illegible], or hat of special design. Nkoma Abale's family is known as the ekoja, or [illegible]. This man, [556] once having accepted the invitation to become nkumu, sets about amassing wealth in the form of wives and brass rods. He may be years about it, but he does not thereby forfeit his right to the office, nor apparently weary those who extended the invitation. Should Nkoma Abale die before he is installed as nkumu, or should he wish to withdraw from the honour bestowed upon him, the succession passes to another member of his ekoja. The succession would normally pass to the eldest male of the ekoja, [787] but many circumstances may interfere to give it to another member of the family. A dream dreamed by a male of the ekoja to the effect that he should be the nkumu is sufficient to give him the right of succession over the eldest male. When asked [681] whether it was common to lie about such a dream having occurred, in order to gain the right of succession, those questioned received the suggestion with emphatic negatives, for this is no time to lie; any man so doing would be sure to die, and the force of death would drive him from such [illegible].

[1] Where practical, the invested chiefs set up by the Belgian Colonial Government are men chosen because of their right to be known as mwene mokonda or moloni e ele. Often, however, the settlements are so small and lacking in cohesion that it has been necessary to set up chiefs arbitrarily over chieftaincies very much larger than were their own hereditary spheres of influence.

764 crypt would then be barred by mats in order to leave it as a hollow chamber, and 762 the hole leading down to it filled in with earth.

For a month or two after the burial the festivities and orgies continued. Women 764 would be hanged to create some diversion, but those hanged were not eaten. Decapi-762 tations would continue. According to the informants only slaves brought in from a distance would have to be tied to prevent their escape. The slave members of the 567 household of the dead nkumu would await their turn stoically, content to die that [652] they might accompany their master in his journey to the land of spirits. This may be true but scarcely seems possible. Still another diversion in the funeral orgies was killing in the manner known as [illegible]. If some man who had a slave did not wish him to be hanged or beheaded, he might give him for this other method. As the weeks slipped by, such a one, his life having apparently been spared, would suppose that all was safe and that there was little chance of his being taken, and, thus emboldened, would, instead of keeping at a safe distance, join the crowd to watch a beheading. His death would be prearranged. At the moment of beheading a victim, someone would drive a spear into the unsuspecting man, the whole crowd then using spears and knives to stab and slash until he fell. Some might be tortured to death by being buried up to the neck and left thus exposed to the hot sun without food or water until death intervened, but this was not a common practice at such funerals.

768 The termination of the dead nkumu's affairs took place when the division of the inheritance was made, a long and complicated process.

178 Such were the old days before European penetration. The advent of the white
624 man half a century ago was the beginning of the end. The ceremonies had to be given up, though reluctantly. Occasionally now goats are beheaded in place of human victims, and many of the younger generation find that, even so, the sight is more than they can endure, and they seek refuge elsewhere. Nkumu are not anxious for the honours. They find little or no respect paid to them by the government officials and this is a distinct obstacle to their obtaining honour from their own people. When the nkumu resident in the village adjacent to the mission station died, one of the Natives was asked who would be next. The reply was that probably no one would appear as a successor. Asked why, he answered, "There are too many trousers." He meant that too many were adopting the ways of the white man to

M 778 of the most disparate and incongruous objects, [22] white, black, or red clay, ngula /Ed., redwood powder/, chicken feet, heads, beaks, claws, and feathers, shells, palm nuts, etc., all mixed together in a large pot or in an old worn basket. It is from this magic treasure that the fetisher takes a pinch or two which he wraps carefully in a little bag and hands over to those who resort [T 778] to him. As for the human figurines so often found in the huts of the Bateke and Banfumu, we do not believe that they are fetishes. In our opinion, they are guardian figurines for children, carved before their birth and preserved until they reach marriageable age.

M 781 824 Some fetishers manage to gain quite a reputation, and their services are purchased for a very high fee. They are familiar with the properties of certain plants, and they keep this knowledge secret and exploit it as much as possible. It would be wrong to believe that the fetisher's practices are all based on mystification.

M 278 ●695 Ebandia, the high chief of the Mosengere, knew the secret of certain poisons. He knew effective remedies for certain kinds of festering wounds; he proportioned the quantity of poison at ordeals so as to make its action violent or slow, and he was familiar with an antidote which cancelled out the effects of the poison.

M 278 695 684 A few hours before our arrival at Penge, Ebandia had subjected [23] one of his wives to trial by poison, on the mere suspicion that she might have gone too far with a native during a slightly prolonged stay in the forest. Ebandia accused her of adultery, prepared the beverage, and compelled the poor woman to prove her innocence by taking the poison. The unfortunate creature rebelled. A quarrel arose, and the village natives, when informed of the matter, protested against it, to no avail, however. The old tyrant carried out the ordeal. He had been notified of our impending arrival, and after allowing the unfortunate woman to suffer horribly for nearly two hours, he gave her the antidote. Five hours later, all the effects of the poison were gone. [Ed., the text is not translated from the last paragraph, page 23, to the second paragraph, page 26.]

T 764 [26] In general the natives have a kind of cult of the dead. In the Bateke-Banfumu region, the corpse is wrapped in fabrics. The more important the deceased person is, the larger the bundle. His whole wealth in fabrics goes with him to the grave. Prior no compulsion. If one of the contracting parties fails to fulfil its pledges in this matter of giving part of the kill, or in anything else, the aggrieved party may call the council together. This consists not only of members of the ndonde and ekopo, but of all elders of the village or villages connected with this particular one. The party judged in the wrong, whether ekopo or ndonde, will be fined, the injured party receiving its share, and both parties will be charged to live together harmoniously and observe their contracts. 224 624 596 621

The power of the nkumu was apparently limited, and did not supersede that of the mwene ndonde. When trials came up, the aggrieved party might go either to the mwene ndonde or to the nkumu. If it was necessary to call the village elders together about it, both these authorities were present at the hearing. First the young men of the group were allowed to give their verdict, then the old men, after that mwene ndonde (or the ndonei e ole), and finally the nkumu was given the privilege of the last word. He would comment on the opinions of each of the judges, criticising one young man, commending another, and then giving his own verdict, at which the group would assent by saying, 'Even so, grandfather'. The whole group of judges would then fix the fines, a double portion of which went to the nkumu. 624 695

The actual manual labour which an nkumu may do excludes anything endangering life or limb, or requiring agility and speed. He may clear the bush for his gardens: this is a man's work. He may take part in the building of his houses, but may do no high work, and, among the inland groups, it is the work of the Batwa to put the roof on for him. The nkumu may also prepare pitfalls for catching game, but cannot engage in any other type of hunting or do any fishing. Digging a grave is prohibited, for, as we shall see, everything pertaining to death must be ignored by the nkumu. 624 [563]

Other rules affecting the daily life of the nkumu may be roughly divided into three: those affecting his person, those having to do with his food, and social regulations.

One of the great points of observance in the first class of regulations is the importance of the mosisi. The nkumu must on no account be seen during daylight hours with an uncovered head. If he wishes relief from the cumbersome mosisi he may take it off in the darkness of his house and put on an ordinary hat made of skin, and when night falls he may walk where he will bareheaded if he so desires. The skin hat, known as botolo, may be made from two animals only, in the case of an nkumu, one being the ndekpe, a species of antelope with light-coloured hair, and the other the jada, an animal resembling a beaver. The skin of the ndekpe may be used by anyone, but the jada is reserved for the nkumu only with one exception. The skin of the jada may also be used for the carrying strap for infants known as ejamba, which is worn over one shoulder in bandolier fashion. For the nkumu the skin of the jada is limited to the informal hat, botolo, and for making into the ndoto, a pouch used for carrying small objects and worn like a sporran. As a corollary to the importance of the mosisi may be noted the importance attached to the head of the nkumu, which must never be seen uncovered in daylight. 624 292 [524] [859]

The Bongindu nkumu never wash in the daytime, but may wash at night with hot water. The inland nkumu never wash. Even the Bongindu nkumu never wash their heads, and no nkumu ever cuts his hair. If the nkumu becomes too greatly inconvenienced, one of his wives may delouse his head, but only within the privacy of the house, by the light that enters the one opening. 624 515 [181] must go to the mbokolo for their fight, this being the location of the houses belonging to the wives of the nkumu. The penalty for breaking this law is a fine, and if no fine were forthcoming hanging used to be the alternative. If a quarrel arises elsewhere and one party wishes to avoid fighting, he may retire to the nsanga and thus be safe. No trees in the nsanga may be climbed. There are, however, privileged classes exempt from all such rules, and these embrace a good many people. Thus, the mother of twins, twins, Batwa, mwani, and all members of the mokondo and elenja are exempt from the laws of the nsanga. If any of these commit acts which are illegal for those coming under the law, they are not held guilty, but their actions will not be condoned; they will be considered breaches of good conduct, and will be dealt with informally; the parties will be quietly reprimanded, and adjured to observe the proprieties of conduct. For outsiders breaking the laws of the nsanga, what corresponds to a warrant is necessary. It is necessary to catch the culprit in the act and hale him before the nkumu. The nkumu himself cannot do this, nor can any of the elenja; it must be done by one of the mokondo, and so if the nkumu sees someone infringing the law he will try to get one of the mokondo on the spot in a hurry in order to catch the offender. 624 681 [609] [673] [624] [629]

In war,[1] it is the mokonzi a ele who is most active in preparations, but the nkumu will accompany his party to battle, keeping well in the rear, and surrounded by good fighters. He does not wear his mantsh but puts on the informal hat. If an nkumu were captured, he would never be tortured or killed as were other prisoners, unless he specifically sought such a fate. He could be ransomed, and his captors would beseech him to let his people ransom him, but in many cases an nkumu would invite death rather than endure the shame of being yielded up as a prisoner of war. 681 726 [72]

An nkumu is always addressed by a double clap of the hands, and will not reply to anyone rude enough to speak to him first. In answer to the clap he replies with a word of wisdom expressed in an aphorism or proverb. Such a reply, however, is common to all elders, who have their favourite aphorisms ready for any who pay them special honour. Anything the nkumu says must be answered not by the customary ndo boko (yes sir) which ordinary people use, but with the special word, bonge, which is reserved exclusively for replying to an nkumu, and means the same thing. 624 578

When the hour of death approaches, an nkumu is attended by his Batwa. It is a rule that he must not die a natural death, and near the end, while he is still conscious and can still speak, all 'free men' clear out and leave the Batwa pygmies to their task of tying the nkumu very tightly with the fibrous yam vines known as nkoko. Often this severe lashing in the sitting posture, known as iloku, is sufficient to finish the nkumu off, but sometimes the work is expedited by twisting his neck.[2] Then it is announced that he is dead, asiki, this being in contradistinction to the customary phrase ankumu asiko used of the death of ordinary people. While the latter means 624 763 [563]

[1] Owing to the lack of tribal cohesion, warfare was not on any considerable scale. The method of warfare consisted in sending groups of young men to fight first, the elders only joining in when one side began to get the worst of the fray. Victors and vanquished in such fights were designated 'husband' and 'wife' respectively, and members of the one group were free to come and go in the villages of the other, and even to help themselves to food. In future wars 'husband' and 'wife' were supposed to combine against their common foe.

[2] Besides nkumu, elderly and old men, Batwa and mothers of twins, and twins are buried in the iloku or sitting posture, in contradistinction to the average position which is the recumbent one used for ordinary people and slaves. [762]

Yaelima

411 Yaelima it is sometimes as deep as five centimeters. The bow and arrow of the type we have just described serves both as an offensive and a defensive weapon. Its importance as a weapon must have formerly been greater. In our time wars between tribes have become almost impossible. Attacks and reprisals by individuals, on the other hand, are still rather frequent. This is especially true of the region east of Opombo. Every free Ipanga, Batitu, Bokala, and Yaelima owns a bow and arrows and does not hesitate to use them either to defend himself or to attack. [721 578]

224 Hunting with bow and arrow is done on an individual basis. The game taken in this way belongs wholly to the hunter. [69]

[341] Among the Yaelima we found an arrow with a removable head that is notably larger, wider, and stronger, and that is attached to the shaft by thin cords. The natives use these arrows for hunting antelope and buffalo. When the animal is hit, the arrowhead penetrates its body, and the surprised victim flees into the bush or forest. The shaft of the arrow, buffeted by the tall grass or lianas, gradually works itself loose. The head, attached to the shaft by a cord, remains in the wound. With each motion, the animal enlarges its wound. The shaft, sooner or later, is caught in the lianas or grass, with the result that the head is violently jerked from the wound, making it a mortal one. This very dangerous weapon is not widespread, and for good cause. The native can use it effectively only for a point-blank shot. The range of the bow is limited; the arrow with the removable point is heavy; the iron point is very wide and has small barbs. To succeed in planting this arrow in the body of the animal, it is necessary to creep to within several meters of the game, to string the bow without attracting the animal's attention, and to hit it in the belly. The wounded beast may seek its salvation in wild and fatal running, but it sometimes turns against its attacker. In any case, the hunter who uses these arrows cannot do so without risking great [70] danger. Although the native likes to hunt, he also fears the dangers associated with this occupation. The only ones who use these arrows are the intrepid true hunters who have inherited some of the instinct and audacity of the Batua [Twa]. Inunu, chief of the Batitu of the Oshwe region, who was audacious to the highest possible degree and feared no animal, obstacle, or danger, asserted to me that he and a few other hunters did not hesitate to attack elephants with this weapon.

583 men although their first marriage has not been broken and no new 581 marriage agreement has been concluded.
164 The data given above provides no confirmation in the [114] Nkundó tribes under study of the statement made by Engels "Les Wangata [The Wangata]," Revue congolaise, 1910, p. 35) that among the Wangata "her husband can exchange her . . . she can make no protest." (1)

1. The Ekonda apply the term lienjɛ only to an exchange of daughters or sisters. They have a specific term: mpɛ́ngɔ́. Note, by the way, that certain Mbólɛ tribes who practice a true wife exchange designate it by the same name: impɛ́ngɔ́.

Article VII. Purchase

432 The purchase of women is not practiced by the Nkundó tribes 562 under discussion here nor even by the Bombwanja. The practice is to 58 be found only among the Elingɛ. What is involved is not a marriage by means of a bride price but a real purchase; that is, a man buys a woman from her husband for a certain sum. He does not go through the woman's parents, as in an ordinary marriage by bride-price payment, but addresses himself directly to the husband.

In general it is the woman who makes the proposal that a man buy her in this manner. Sometimes a man wants to take a woman and [721] first comes to an agreement with her. Before the Europeans arrived such a situation generally led to a war between clans or villages. After an armistice the palaver was settled, and the [219] purchaser paid the husband. Nowadays, since the Nkundó no longer dare to [117] fight because of the legal sanctions that inevitably follow, when a woman abandons her husband for another man who wants to buy her, the parties involved bring the palaver before the judges. As the woman wants only her new husband, and as, on the other hand, war and the punishment of women have been abolished, the first husband has no

684 to a reimbursement of the bride price, any more than if she had [illegible] died of natural causes. In past times death under these circumstances[1] usually resulted in a war between clans. But this extreme situation actually arose only very rarely, if the man was excessively jealous and had other wives or the means to obtain them, or was embittered by persistent and incorrigible infidelity. Most frequently a husband's foresight of the loss he would sustain, in the last analysis keeps him from such drastic action. He limits himself to beating or injuring the culprit or to applying other forms of chastisement or punishment (see below under b); see above, Article III, 9.

If the husband has sufficient evidence, of the sort described above, but has not caught the culprits in the act, the wife can expect a good whipping, accompanied by a whole string of vulgar expressions and assorted insults [576] (femina foetidissima, tempore menstruationis putor tuus venit in nares omnium hominum, etc.) as well as a heap of obscenities pertaining to the female genital organs. [illegible] The husband who acts in this manner is not reprimanded. On the contrary, he acts thus out of jealousy: our Nkundô say that his anger is an anger of love.

In these punishments the Nkundô above all recognize the exasperation that springs from legitimate jealousy. That is why the husband acts on his own initiative. Besides, when he [316] finds himself confronted with the fact it would be psychologically difficult for him to calm himself first in order to go and inform the ndonga.

It was extremely unusual for a man to kill his wife calmly and deliberately. Such a thing happened only if her infidelities were continuous and she had erred in many other ways as well. And even then this conduct was found only in certain extremely cruel families. It was known that Iloko is 'Ôkungô and Bengóngó byâ Kundô had acted in this fashion; both were members of the Bongilâ (Besombô), a family which, in its songs, boasted of eating their own wives.

b) Tortures. The husband may also have recourse to several types of torture. Most important among them are the following:

1) The etéka, which is the standard torture so to speak. It is a heavy wooden fork which is attached to the neck. It prevents

(843)

In the case of an unmarried mother, see
Chapter I, Part 1, Article III, 3.

[843] Adultery also becomes especially serious during the period preceding childbirth when there is a special prohibition against it, as endangering the lives of both mother and child, as we will explain in Chapter X, Article III.

7. Remarks and general conclusions

837 [726] 1) In former times the offense of adultery, even in its mildest form, that is, an isolated act, was one of the chief causes of "wars" between villages. Sometimes both sides called on their relatives by marriage to assist them, and the result was a general upheaval.

837 595 2) As a rule a husband wants his wife to be faithful. Doubtless there are exceptions. Most if not all of them were formerly found among the old polygamists. At their age they were disgusted with continual palavers, and their experience as men had taught them that they often became angry and uselessly complicated their little lives. They preferred to close their eyes, like good old Bonsof w'Ilolongo of Ituko (the Bombwanja clan of the Bofiji). He came to see me in the Christian village of Bombomba through which I was passing at the beginning of March, 1933. I asked him why he was adorned with so many bells, and he answered naively, "I always wear them. That way my wives know of my coming already from a distance. It gives them time to stop slandering me and to send their lovers away." When I expressed my surprise that he did not want to catch them in the act in order to punish them and end their infidelities, he answered me with a smile, "No, Father, jealousy . . . is for the young. As for me, I have seen so much of it that I no longer have any desire to get angry and make palavers for these trivialities."

558 837 595 Since the coming of the Europeans some unscrupulous men -- especially polygamists -- have been engaging in [328] a kind of procuring. They send their wives to commit adultery in order to be able to catch them in the act and thus enrich themselves. Or else they lend their wives for one night or more to laborers or soldiers who are this outrage ([illegible]). It is a kind of national dishonor. This observation also clearly pinpoints the great difference between the favorite and the bolímbé.

The following custom should be mentioned in this connection: if any man, even a stranger or one who comes from a great distance, comes and -- over the fence -- strikes the roof of a bolímbé's [illegible] of seclusion with his [illegible] (1) as a call to war, the whole village is obliged to take up arms to defend him. All the men [302] accompany him and unite with his family against the enemy clan, whatever the distance may be. The Nkundó say that the act of touching the bolímbé's hut infuriates the entire clan and makes them take up arms without hesitation. (1)

One last indication of the social nature of this institution is the fact that the bolímbé has the right to sit beside her husband at public gatherings and feasts, a prerogative which she alone of all women possesses. With her is a boy or girl who serves as her "boy" and carries the seat (bofoya) on which she sits.

When a bolímbé dies her husband may put another in her place. To do so he repeats the ceremony described above. It is called sangoja bolímbé, "to make succeed to the title of bolímbé."

As we saw in Chapter I, Part 1, Article II, a man may even make his daughter a bolímbé.

178 for this right was recognized by the written laws which have assigned the functions formerly exercised by the "fathers" of families to them. But they are required to act in conformity with the common law, and therefore to listen to the ndonga and report to him.

Before colonization the Nkundó often used other means.

586 Before exploring the question of bride-price reimbursement, we will examine these various actions. For greater clarity we will distinguish between the customs of the pre-European regime and actual practice. Two specific cases will be described at the end.

1. In the past

Let us again make a distinction between two situations:

A. First hypothesis: a wife left her husband. She ran away, to her family, first informing the ndonga. If she did not go to him but went straight home instead, the ndonga felt that he had been disregarded, and serious consequences followed, for he inevitably found her in the wrong. That is why this situation very seldom arose. [201] The woman explained her conduct to the ndonga. It was his duty to reconcile her and her husband. A divorce never took place without many interventions on the part of the ndonga.

1) If in spite of all attempts the woman was absolutely un-
[72] willing to stay with her husband and definitely left him, the result in most cases was war, unless, of course, the husband also did not care to continue the unhappy union. In such a case he was satisfied with claiming a reimbursement of the bride price. The war, like all others, ended in peace and indemnification; nothing further was discussed. The war was fought against the woman's clan if restitution of the bride price was delayed or not made. However, if the woman went to another man without first going to her family, the abandoned husband declared war on his rival and left his parents-in-law in peace.

682 2) Sometimes the abandoned husband took revenge on his rival by assassinating him. If the possibility was open to him --

586° make it possible for him to recover his claim, he had recourse to the second means:

586° b) Reducing his wife to slavery (bonyamó, from the verb
681 nyamola). The husband had the right to use this means immediately, without having first tried the étaka. But such action was not approved of and was undertaken only if the woman's family were themselves exasperated by the endless suits and the continual shame that their unworthy daughter caused them.

● [721] The reduction of a woman to slavery usually caused a war, for her clan would not put up with such an insult. In some instances they did not seek revenge, however, either out of fear, because they did not feel in a position to resist, or because they recognized that the husband had good reasons for what he did. [304]

The woman's relatives could subsequently buy her back. (1)

[181] 1. If the Nkundó sold an Elinga woman into slavery, her people never troubled them with a war. For they did not know how to attack, were not good at marching, were strangers to the forest, and were inferior in military valor. Therefore they were satisfied with buying back their kinswoman.

In some instances, not wanting to be exposed to further palavers or further shame caused by their daughter's continued misconduct after having bought her back, they left her to her fate. Their love for their child and their desire to preserve their honor and good reputation were in conflict, and which of the two sentiments triumphed depended on circumstances of men and things. In such a situation, as with respect to theft and other habits that brought dishonor, it was not rare (nor is it even today) to find that the desire to preserve honor triumphed over affection or financial interests.

[584] Before reducing a wife to slavery, even more than before confining her to the etâka, a man was required to communicate his intentions to the ndonga. Otherwise, the latter would declare war that there were no further means for a reconciliation, returned her to her parents. No violence was used against her, nor could the husband demand an immediate and direct reimbursement of the bride price. The husband had to wait until the wife he had repudiated found a new husband and the latter had paid a bride price for her. If the parents-in-law showed ill will toward him, however, [72] they could expect a war.

The conclusion that can be drawn from the preceding data is that although Nkundó law is very severe against the wife who does not acquit herself of her marital obligations, it does not leave the husband entirely free to do as he pleases. Ancestral law demanded grave reasons as the basis for any measures he took against her, [204] and the application of this law was well regulated. The differences between the various situations are an eloquent demonstration of this fact.

As we have seen above, the term bokáfo is not applied to repudiation by either party. In the case of the husband the Nkundó say that he asóna, "no longer wants her"; the noun is lotóno. This term does not apply specifically to this situation; it refers to any person or thing one does not want. The special manner in which the wife is sent back by being handed over to the ndonga is also called by a generic term ómola, "to cause to start moving, to make go away"; the noun is njómó.

2. At the present time

Considerable changes have been introduced as a result of colonization. Wars, torture, human sacrifice, and slavery have been abolished. The possibilities are now reduced to the woman's flight, with or without notification of the ndonga, or a repudiation pure and simple. The intervention of the ndonga is only rarely omitted; it is still considered important. As a matter of fact, it would be against his financial interests to make an enemy of him. A woman who leaves her husband returns home, goes directly to another man, or lives a debauched life in some center, large or small. There is nothing left but to proceed with the refunding of the bride price. Thus everything is reduced to its simplest form.

A Nkundó woman is held back only by the fear of punishment and other consequences of her action, or by her love for her husband,

586 simply said that she has left her husband (ankodia) and has been taken 583 in marriage by X (añkómbwa éka bingéli). Having fallen in love
587 with another man's wife [390] and desiring to marry her, a man tries to win her favor. If she consents he collects the valuables necessary for the bride price. He then asks the woman to come to him and pays the bride price as for any marriage.

Instead of going directly to her seducer, the woman may also first go to her parents, especially if they are in favor of her plan. If they are not she would not succeed, because they would prevent her from carrying it out.

● [721] Cases of njangó were formerly rare because they were risky. As a matter of fact, they constituted a casus belli. Anyone who undertook such a venture had to be in a position to take the consequences of his act, especially with respect to the payment of an indemnity. [178] Nowadays, on the other hand, these occurrences are much more frequent, even when the new husband does not have the means to pay the bride price at once. Nevertheless, the reversal in government policy is beginning to produce good results. The woman, or her mother, is often imprisoned; rarely the seducer. This penalty is often sufficient to restore order. But to keep from being exposed to further difficulties caused by the woman who no longer loves him, the abandoned husband sometimes refuses to take back his unfaithful wife.

The rarity of cases in former times as well as the fact that [671] they constituted a legitimate reason for war shows that the njangó did not have the approval of Nkundó law but that it was more or less considered an infraction.

586 3) Taking refuge. Because of the change in circumstances,
577 the practice of taking refuge is no longer common today. It used to be done as follows: A woman who absolutely wanted to leave her husband and had no means of doing so, since no man had asked for her in marriage and her parents were powerless to help her, went secretly to a rich and influential man whom she would have liked as a husband. She arrived unexpectedly, stood before him, or even threw herself at him, crying, [391] Bejwó běkě! ònjéngé.

586 587 failure to help or respect them. After the union broke up, Bokeló, the woman's father, refused to make restitution of anything whatsoever. His answer to Engfandó was, "You should have left another man's wife alone."

Yet all this was in flagrant opposition to Nkundó law. 1) Engfandó was wrong to take another man's wife home with him. 2) Iengó could have taken Engfandó's valuables away from him at the time the latter was making the payment; it was his right. But 3) Bokeló was also in the wrong. The question [410] of seduction and adultery was none of his business but Iengó's. If he did not like Engfandó's behavior, he could have handled the situation differently. Now he had valuables to which he no longer had any rights; he had to return them.

Conclusion

586 The nature of the reimbursement of marriage payments and the various circumstances under which it is made might suggest the conclusion that these goods are not acquired permanently, but rather that they constitute securities. The few exceptions where there is no reimbursement could not change this view. In fact the reason for them is clear -- compensation for that which is not restituted is made in other ways. (1)

● [721] 1. This observation -- like others made earlier -- might lead us to believe that in the mind of the Nkundó war and other bloody practices are only means which have little to recommend them and that basically our people disapprove of them.

Nevertheless, this conclusion does not hold up if we compare all the foregoing with what occurs when a marriage is broken through death. For in the latter case nothing at all is returned; everything that was given by each party remains permanently theirs. No payment is demanded even for the children (see below).

573 [illegible] consists of a beautifully fashioned native knife, or a lance, or mitako [copper wire used as currency]. In some areas, it was the polygynist who attended the mother at the birth of the daughter. He had the wood gathered, water brought, and food prepared. If, then, the expected child was a boy, the security was usually returned, and the contract declared null and void. If, however, the one who had given the security was a village chief or a man of importance, then the father of the child tried to give him another daughter. The father had, for instance, at an earlier time given a daughter to another man of much less importance. In the above-mentioned case, he would give back the bride price received, take his daughter back, and give her to the polygynist from whom he expected a larger bride price.

573 Sometimes too the boy was taken by the polygynist and remained in his family until the father could trade a daughter for him.

573 591 While very young and still a child, the little daughter was installed in the harem of the polygynist. She was brought up there, together with other children of her age and status; or rather, she grew up there in the midst of those heathen customs without any upbringing.

595 The composition of the harem of a polygamist:

The first wife was called the Bomatsa; she preceded all the other wives in rank, and in the absence of the polygynist, she was the mistress of the harem.

The second wife was called Ekila; she was the most loved and preceded all the remaining wives. She was also called Nkonda.

The third wife was called Bolumbu. At the appointment of the Bolumbu, a certain ceremony took place, and the wife was clothed with an animal skin. The Nku, a sort of patriarch and magician, sometimes had three or four Bolumbu who served as messengers to other villages. In this capacity they had special privileges. For instance, to attack a Bolumbu was a reason for declaring war. [361] [721]

[533] The remaining women were simply women of the harem, without distinction.

595 In the area of Monjoku, among the Bolee [Bole], the first wife was called Nkisa, with the same rank as Bomatsa. The second 202 198 The White hears only the difference in tempo, nothing more. The Negro miles away understands what is being telephoned.

The lokole language consists chiefly of metaphors and is thus not intelligible to any White in the whole of the Congo. The Negroes are proud of their invention and also pleased that the White, who otherwise can do everything, is not able to understand their lokole.

Every man has his own name (nkombo) on the lokole with which he makes himself known. Because such a name often covers several lines of script, chiefly expressed in metaphors giving facts of the public life of the Negro concerned, it would be a physical impossibility for a White to master the lokole language in the way a Negro does. Actually, not even all Negroes understand the art of beating the lokole.

[562] The women have a general name; beating the lokole is only for the men, and no woman understands the art. The women understand what is being broadcast when the lokole is beaten, but they cannot beat it themselves. Moreover, they would be ashamed to attempt it; this is no task for a woman, and they would be laughed at. The lokole name, or nkombo, of the women is as follows:

Bali la tolombo besaleki lisala, besaleki tombokoko, tond' al' isuso, befambe eka lisala.

"Women in numbers, worked the garden, prepared much to eat, consisting of bananas, to eat out of the garden."

A White, personally, has no nkombo of his own on the lokole, but to announce the arrival of a White in a village, the following is spread around far and wide:

Lolema ja lifeka feka, esongo etenaka nkola.

"The bat flies about everywhere, the pin wounds the nails of the feet."

With "the bat flies about everywhere" is to be understood the government agent who goes from village to village collecting the taxes. "The pin wounds the nails of the feet" means that, just as [726] the Negroes go on the warpath with sharp pointed sticks dipped in poison to wound the enemies' feet, the government agent is always on his rounds with his rifle, ready for the fray.

The nkombo of the Catholic missionary is as follows: [102]

(1) Bansele nsele ba nkanga; (2) bofala boki ndaki lisako nda lokombo; (3) etafe bolo; (4) benanga bekendaka la mperu.

must go to the nsakala for their fight, this being the location of the houses belonging to the sons of the nkumu. The penalty for breaking this law is a fine, and if no fine were forthcoming hanging used to be the alternative. If a quarrel arises elsewhere and one party wishes to avoid fighting, he may retire to the nsaga and thus be safe. No trees in the nsaga may be climbed. There are, however, privileged classes exempt from all such rules, and these embrace a good many people. Thus, the mother of twins, twins, Batwa, mwasi, and all members of the ntolende and elenge are exempt from the laws of the nsaga. If any of these commit acts which are illegal for those coming under the law, they are not held guilty, but their actions will not be condoned; they will be considered breaches of good conduct, and will be dealt with informally; the parties will be quietly reprimanded, and adjured to observe the proprieties of conduct. For outsiders breaking the laws of the nsaga, what corresponds to a warrant is necessary. It is necessary to catch the culprit in the act and hale him before the nkumu. The nkumu himself cannot do this, nor can any of the elenge; it must be done by one of the ntolende, and so if the nkumu sees someone infringing the law he will try to get one of the ntolende on the spot in a hurry in order to catch the offender. 628 628 [648] [672] [632] [624]

In war,[7] it is the nsalami a ole who is most active in preparations, but the nkumu will accompany his party to battle, keeping well in the rear, and surrounded by good fighters. He does not wear his nsasala but puts on the informal hat. If an nkumu were captured, he would never be tortured or killed as were other prisoners, unless he specifically sought such a fate. He could be ransomed, and his captors would beseech him to let his people ransom him, but in many cases an nkumu would invite death rather than endure the shame of being yielded up as a prisoner of war. 624 726 ● [726]

An nkumu is always addressed by a double clap of the hands, and will not reply to anyone rude enough to speak to him first. In answer to the clap he replies with a word of wisdom expressed in an aphorism or proverb. Such a reply, however, is common to all elders, who have their favourite aphorisms ready for any who pay them special honour. Anything the nkumu says must be answered not by the customary ale bolo (even so) which ordinary people use, but with the special word, binga, which is reserved exclusively for replying to an nkumu, and means the same thing. 624 578

When the hour of death approaches, an nkumu is attended by his Batwa. It is a rule that he must not die a natural death, and near the end, while he is still conscious and can still speak, all 'free men' clear out and leave the Batwa pygmies to their task of tying the nkumu very tightly with the lianas yam vines known as nsolola. Often this secure lashing in the sitting posture, known as ilesa, is sufficient to finish the nkumu off, but sometimes the work is expedited by twisting his neck.[8] Then it is announced that he is dead, asilibe, this being in contradistinction to the customary phrase aolamo ankele used of the death of ordinary people. While the latter means 624 763 [563]

[7] Owing to the lack of tribal cohesion, warfare was not on any considerable scale. The method of warfare consisted in sending groups of young men to fight first, the elders only joining in when one side began to get the worst of the fray. Victors and vanquished in such fights were designated 'husband' and 'wife' respectively, and members of the one group were free to come and go in the villages of the other, and even to help themselves to food. In future wars 'husband' and 'wife' were supposed to combine against their common foes.

[8] Besides nkumu, elderly and rich men, fathers and mothers of twins, and twins are buried in the ilesa or sitting posture, in contradistinction to the extended position which is the customary one used for ordinary people and slaves. [764]

[illegible] One must be careful not to confuse this bosongo with byiko byă oyeng'ëty'ëna, an expression frequently heard. The latter includes any payment to the mother and includes the goat and the nkundo as well as the bosongo discussed above and others. The word used in this case is not byĭkó, singular ĭkó, "porcupine," but rather byiko, singular wiko, "price, value" and derived from the verb -ika, "to set a price."

3) Lokolé: a brother or a cousin of the wife asks for a konga. He beats the gong (lokolé) in order to make noise and thus force the husband to satisfy him. That is how this bosongo seems to have originated. In practice people simply demand a [147] present. The racket can sometimes last for quite a while. But the elders do not allow the gathering to be disrupted if the husband does not have precisely the gift that would give satisfaction.

4) Bekulé, or bokfwá: the woman's brothers stick a piece of the trunk of a banana tree (bokfwá) into the ground, so that young relatives of the husband may shoot arrows (bekulé) at it. These are then removed by young members of the wife's family who, at the present time, are sometimes given money -- 5 francs, for instance.

[illegible] [721] 5) Wambá: prisoner's rope, that is, a rope to which war prisoners were formerly tied, two by two (a system now imitated for prisoners of the colonial law enforcement agencies and administration). In the past the patriarch, or head of the family, demanded a konga or a knife as indemnity against the possibility that he or members of his family might be imprisoned as a result of a war caused by the woman being married. Nowadays the chiefs set up by the administration and given the rights of family heads by the European authority have also claimed rights to this bosongo whose significance, purpose, and even name have completely changed as a result. It is now called bonyodia w'ĕkanji, "the chief's chain." It is clear that this payment has become something which it was not meant to be. [illegible]

6) Etúka: a heavy wooden fork, fastened to the neck. This is a present claimed by the mother, by one of the father's other wives, or by a wife of the woman's brother, against the possibility that they may have to undergo torture by means of the fork because of the woman whose bride price is being paid. This could happen if she were 585* used by her father, Nkambe ɛy'ɔmɔla of Bolɛ́fɔla (Bonjɔbu), to pay a 607 supplement for his wife Bekombe. On this account the latter became her daughter's nkita. The double bride price served to obtain the wife Lintambe for Ilɔ́tɔ y'ɔnguma, Bekombe's brother and Mbɛlɛ's uncle, and Lintambe thus belonged to both mother and daughter, but the two did not fight about the matter.

One person can have two or more nkita, especially if her bride price is so large that it can be used to obtain several wives. Such is the case of Mputɛ (Sofia) of the Baɛfɛ Mbangɔ of Bongando (Bonkoso). Her first husband, Mpɛ́nda of Lofelɛ, paid 40 rings and a slave. With this sum Mputɛ's uncle, [172] Mbangɔ ɛy'akoso (who had settled with the Elɔ́ngɔ l'Iɔmɔma, his mother's clan), paid the bride price for Bonjɛ́lɛ of Nkɛlongo. (1) In the meantime, Mpɛ́nda was killed in a fight with his brother, Iloko. Mputɛ married Elɔ́ngola, Mpɛ́nda's nephew, but then he died after two or three years of marriage. She was then married to Lokonga of Lɔ́ngɛ (Nkɔle), whose life was not much longer, and finally to Bakutu (Boniface) of Bombɛ́nga w'ɔ̃kenda (Besombɔ, Bombwanja), who paid a considerable bride price. A part of this bride price was a compensation to the family of the last husband, and another portion was used by Mbangɔ to acquire as wife, Bengelɛ of Ekɛkola. By means of the bride price paid by Lokonga, Mbangɔ (Joseph), a first cousin of Mputɛ, obtained the wife Bolɛ́jɛ (who came from the Ionda). Lastly, Bakutu gave Bonjɛ́kyɛ (Christophe) of Losɛlinga, a distant cousin of Mputɛ, the necessary bride price to marry Embongɛmbembe of Lɔ́ngɛ, who on this account also became the nkita of Mputɛ, though not in the strict sense of the term. Mputɛ thus has four nkita, although not all of them are living.

[727]
1. During a war against the Nkɛlongo, this woman had been captured by the Elɔ́ngɛ, who wanted to sacrifice her to the ikwɛ at a feast which terminated the mourning. But Mbangɔ begged the notables to let her live because he loved her very much and wanted to marry her.

583 constitutes a bride price, it does not bear that name because its legal significance is not the same. The specific name for this particular payment is isongyambóka, from -songya, "to add something new" and mbóka, "path." Thus the new husband adds a new alliance. The verb songa or songya is also used under other circumstances: for a new tile or leaf that is added on to a damaged spot on a roof, for a patch on a piece of clothing, or for something that has been newly introduced. The term therefore seems to indicate that what is involved is not a new marriage but rather a modification grafted on to the old one. Furthermore, the term is often used pejoratively. One may thus suppose that this custom is not very ancient, but of course the evidence is not sufficient.

583²
432 It is apparent from the above that the purchase of a woman is a difficult and expensive operation. A kind of second bride price (isongyambóka) and a second wife (inukamiéfoga) cost quite a fortune. In the past the purchaser also had to pay indemnities to the families of men killed in combat (he might have had to pay as much as 100 rings, for the price of one "corpse" was 15 to 20 bakonga, the monetary value of a man) (1). One gets the impression that, though for reasons un- [626] known to us the tribes in question permitted the exchange of women in their laws and customs, they did so unwillingly, and that the persons in authority increased the difficulties, so to speak, in order to frighten the amateurs and to reduce the number of cases to an inescapable minimum.

One might wonder why men do not hesitate in the face of such great financial difficulties. Psychologically, it seems entirely plausible that a man who is in love with another's wife and has the necessary wealth would in his passion throw himself into such an adventure. Probably that is how the practice originated. But this likelihood does not explain the existence of a purchase, since the breaking of the first marriage and the committment to a new one could just as well be

606 685 If one of the wife's relatives were found guilty of stealing from his (or her) relative by marriage, or even from one of the latter's relatives, the family tribunal was assembled. Out of consideration for the ties of kinship between the thief and the wife and in order not to sadden her and her family, the guilty person was not sold as a slave. He was simply turned over to the woman [293] and her family, and they were told: "Here he is; he has been found guilty of theft and should have been reduced to slavery. Out of respect for you, however, we are not selling him; we are rolling (-kilimola) him toward you. Take him as bride price and add him to the sum of the bosɔ́ngo." Thus the matter was settled in a friendly fashion. If subsequently there was a divorce, the wife's family had to restore not only the bride price that had been paid but also an additional slave for the member of their group that the husband had yielded in this fashion. Thus, the transaction was not at all a fictional one.

Conversely, the same procedure was adopted in relation to a relative of the husband who had violated the rules of justice to the detriment of a member of the family related by marriage. But in that case the extradition of the guilty party was considered as the addition of a slave to the amount of the nkɔmɛ.

The situation is no different nowadays. The only change is that, instead of giving back a slave if a dissolution of the marriage occurs, the equivalent value is paid in copper rings, etc.

The same customs governed conduct toward prisoners of war. ● 727 606 For instance, in the course of a war Eale became the master of Bombolo, whose cousin is married to Iloko, a close relative of Eale. Iloko interceded with Eale in order to obtain Bombolo's freedom, and Bombolo was sent home but was to be considered as bosɔ́ngo. The liberated prisoner thus was classed as a slave given as part of the bride price, as in the preceding case, and all the appropriate rules were followed.

595 A slave woman may be chosen as a favorite. Since this choice is a matter of preference, there is no reason why not. This is not true of the rank of bolɔ́mbɔ́, which can never be attained by a slave, as an examination of this eminent position clearly shows. The following slave women are cited among those who were made nkɔ́ndɛ́ by their husbands: Bolɔ́nge by Bakengɔ́ ba Lokolí of Nsekɛ́; Bokɛ́tu by Ekányaka ɛ́y'ondɔ́kɔ́ of Etɔ́ontálɛ́; Ntsimbo by Bombengɛ́lá of Etɔ́ontálɛ́.

When a polygamist felt a very special love for a slave, and had the means to do so, he would enfranchise her and then pay a regular bride price for her. In order for this to happen the woman's family had to intervene, either on its own initiative or by invitation of the husband. Once the ransom was paid, the woman was free. She returned home, and her husband followed her to pay the bride price; thus she became a regular wife on the same basis [357] as any other woman. The procedure was the same whether the slave had been captured personally by the husband or had been bought or acquired as part of a bride price or by some other means.

Such was the case of Bolɔ́mbɔ́, daughter of Boɛ́kwá of Boɛ́ndɛ́ (Bombwanja), who was taken by Esalɛ́ of Ekɔ́kola and bought by Efoloko of Lofelí. She was enfranchised at her father's initiative, and he subsequently married her off in a regular fashion. Another case was that of Etáka, daughter of Elongama ɛ́a Longɔ́mbá of Besombɔ́, who was married to Bonyongela of Bowɛ́lɛ́. During a war she was taken prisoner by Betɔ́kɔ́ of Ekɔ́kola, who wanted to marry her properly and therefore contacted Elongama. The latter arranged the matter of the ransom and took his daughter with him. Then Betɔ́kɔ́ went to Besombɔ́ to pay the bride price. (1)

●[721] 1. Almost all slave women were reduced to their condition, directly or indirectly, because of a war. If they were already married, their marriages were considered as dissolved. Under the circumstances it > could not be otherwise. In such matters each group took care only of its own interests; and none of the procedures usually accompanying the dissolution of a marriage were observed. However, the husband was entitled to an indemnity, in the form of persons or valuables, from the member of his clan who had fomented the war and was held responsible for all its consequences, whatever the way in which he had provoked it. If necessary, this member could be forced to pay. If he did not have the means to pay indemnities, he himself was reduced to slavery, if the influence of the families involved did not prevent this occurrence. When the woman was enfranchised and a new bride price was paid for her, her family was expected to reimburse her former husband.

[672]

Since, at present, slavery has been abolished, ransom can no longer be paid. A master who wishes to enfranchise a slave woman who has remained faithful to him, simply gives her family the bride price and then goes with his wife to her home to receive the dowry.

do not chase me away!" In such circumstances, the insult of invoking a man's deceased parents is like an ultimatum; it imposes an obligation which the person thus addressed cannot escape. (2)

2. See Chapter VI, Article V, 4, Appendix.

Therefore the man in question could not send the woman away; he had to take her under his protection. He called his kin group and explained the situation to them. If his close relatives agreed -- and it was their duty and honor to -- they instructed him to pay the bride price for her. But the abandoned husband intervened to prevent this transaction. Either he declared war, or he begged his rival to return his wife to him. If he took the first course, the two ●[127] adversaries paid indemnities for the warriors fallen in battle on their respective sides after the hostilities were terminated; then when peace was concluded, the matter was settled all the same, and the woman succeeded in her purpose. If the husband took the second alternative, and the man who received the fugitive was disposed to yield to his request, the latter would ask the husband for a payment (nyongo) that would free him from the obligation imposed on him by the wife's "oath." This payment was a sort of indemnification for the insult and for the blemish on his honor. Therefore the amount was fairly high: 20 to 25 copper rings, equaling the price of a slave.

The woman was surrendered either because the man to whom she had addressed herself did not love her, or because he and his family did not want to get involved in any disputes.

For the husband, war was a bad expedient; he would necessarily lose. The correct and ideal procedure was to try and have his wife returned to him. This fact is an indication that recourse to arms was an infraction of the law rather than a legitimate means. [392]

It could also happen that the man kept the woman but did not immediately pay the bride price. This occurred either if a

178 586x 577 her proposal, he collects the bride price and produces it before the chief. With the consent of this authority, he pays it to the woman's parents, who make restitution to the husband. (1)

1. See also Chapter III, Article VI.

586x ●727 3) War. The last of the special ways in which a marriage may be broken is the following: If a woman were captured in a war and not freed, thus becoming a slave, by that very fact her marriage was broken. Under the circumstances it could not have been otherwise, since each group was concerned only with its own interests. As we have seen in the preceding chapter, the slave was incorporated into the harem of one of the members of the clan who took her prisoner, or she was sold to some man for this purpose. If her real husband did not have the means to free her -- and we are speaking under that assumption, for if he did the union would not be dissolved -- he was unable to oppose what was done. Nevertheless, he was entitled to indemnification by the member of the clan who was responsible for the war, and he could use force to support his claim. If the woman were freed by her family, and her owner then paid them a bride price in order to contract a regular marriage, the former husband had a right to a return of the bride price paid by him. (See Chapter VII, Article V).

586x In concluding this account, we should note that a woman who has left her husband to go to another man may return to the first one [394] after a fairly long time has elapsed. There may be two reasons for such a return:

Either the woman does not find what she was looking for with her new husband and finds her hopes deceived, or in comparing her present situation with the life she had previously led she regrets her action. Knowing the love her former husband always bore her, she risks returning to him, and usually she is not rejected.

Or the new husband finds that after having paid part of the bride price he is unable to fulfill the rest of his obligation. Since a woman does not wish to be a wife without bride price -- outside of modern exceptions -- she turns back.

586 x In most cases the husband and his parents-in-law try to continue their relationship despite the breakup. If the woman persists in not wanting to go back to her husband despite the pressure, the entreaties, and even the curses of her family, the parents sub- [587] stitute a sister or relative (bankitsa) for her, unless, of course, no relative is available. For in that case they must resign themselves to the restitution of the bride price and a permanent dissolution of the relationship. No new bride-price payment is made for the substitute, as the original bride price is valid for the new union, as we have explained in Chapter III, Article IV.

Finally, there is an exception to the general principle: there is no restitution of the bride price if for some reason there is equivalent compensation of some sort. Nowadays this exception is seldom encountered, as will be apparent from the following details: for example, such an exception occurs if the right of ikɔ́kelo has been exercised, or if the wife of one of the relatives-in-law has been seized. Even if the amount of one bride price is larger than the other, the excess is not returned. Nor is there any obligation to restore the bride price if the wife has been reduced to slavery or has been killed. There are also the cases of the dissolution of marriage cited in Chapter V, Article IV, 2, no. 2, example 17, and in Chapter VI, Article V, 4. If the breakup caused ●[127] a war and the number killed on each side was considerable (three, five, six corpses), the matter rests there; when the families of those killed have been indemnified, there is no more talk of reimbursement. Occasionally, an influential and rich man who at the same time was spiteful or excessively proud, would take up arms a second time. He claimed that he would not stop until he had the bride-price valuables in his hands. Such behavior met with disapproval everywhere, and even his own family tried to stop him. If the opposing clan was sufficiently strong and stubborn in the struggle, the husband obtained nothing at all. But the desire to [555] get revenge or to be famous as a warrior sometimes caused a man to scorn financial losses. Finally, according to the notions of our natives, a case of enmity between two clans (which we have cited in relation to a woman's application for refuge) should be included in the category of compensations.

must go to the monkeke for their fight, this being the location of the houses belonging 624 to the sons of the nkumu. The penalty for breaking this law is a fine, and if no 689 fine were forthcoming hanging used to be the alternative. If a quarrel arises elsewhere and one party wishes to avoid fighting, he may retire to the mongo and thus be safe. No trees in the mongo may be climbed. There are, however, privileged classes exempt from all such rules, and these embrace a good many people. Thus, the mother [845] of twins, twins, Batwa, maomi, and all members of the molembe and ekopo are exempt from the laws of the mongo. If any of these commit acts which are illegal for those [672] coming under the law, they are not held guilty, but their actions will not be condoned;
they will be considered breaches of good conduct, and will be dealt with informally; [626]
the parties will be quietly reprimanded, and adjured to observe the proprieties of conduct. For outsiders breaking the laws of the mongo, what corresponds to a warrant is necessary. It is necessary to catch the culprit in the act and hale him before the [696] nkumu. The nkumu himself cannot do this, nor can any of the ekopo; it must be done by one of the molembe, and so if the nkumu sees someone infringing the law he will try to get one of the molembe on the spot in a hurry in order to catch the offender.

In war,[1] it is the molomi o ehe who is most active in preparations, but the nkumu 624 will accompany his party to battle, keeping well in the rear, and surrounded by good fighters. He does not wear his montolo but puts on the informal hat. If an nkumu were 726 captured, he would never be tortured or killed as were other prisoners, unless he specifically sought such a fate. He could be ransomed, and his captors would [727] beseech him to let his people ransom him, but in many cases an nkumu would invite death rather than endure the shame of being yielded up as a prisoner of war.

An nkumu is always addressed by a double clap of the hands, and will not reply to 624 anyone rude enough to speak to him first. In answer to the clap he replies with a word of wisdom expressed in an aphorism or proverb. Such a reply, however, is 576 common to all elders, who have their favourite aphorisms ready for any who pay them special honour. Anything the nkumu says must be answered not by the customary nko baiko (even so) which ordinary people use, but with the special word, biongo, which is reserved exclusively for replying to an nkumu, and means the same thing.

When the hour of death approaches, an nkumu is attended by his Batwa. It is a 624 rule that he must not die a natural death, and near the end, while he is still conscious and can still speak, all 'free men' clear out and leave the Batwa pygmies to their 763 task of tying the nkumu very tightly with the fibrous yam vines known as menkiki. [563]
Often this secure lashing in the sitting posture, known as ilima, is sufficient to finish
the nkumu off, but sometimes the work is expedited by twisting his neck.[2] Then it is announced that he is dead, aokilwa, this being in contradistinction to the customary phrase aokoma moloko used of the death of ordinary people. While the latter means

[1] Owing to the lack of tribal cohesion, warfare was not on any considerable scale. The method of warfare consisted in sending groups of young men to fight first, the elders only joining in when one side began to get the worst of the fray. Victors and vanquished in such fights were designated 'husband' and 'wife' respectively, and members of the one group were free to come and go in the villages of the other, and even to help themselves to food. In future wars 'husband' and 'wife' were supposed to combine against their common foes.

[2] Besides nkumu, elderly and rich men, fathers and mothers of twins, and twins are buried in the ilima or sitting posture, in contradistinction to the monsepo position which is the recumbent one used for ordinary people and slaves. [764]

171 they distinguish very clearly between the bolɔ́mbɔ and the 595x favorite. They even added that the nkɔ́mɔ enjoy no privileges
554 in this realm. (1)

> 1. The institution of the nkɔ́mɔ is not very widespread among the tribes treated in our study. (See "Les Coutumes funéraires des Nkundó [Funeral customs of the Nkundo]," in Anthropos) (in press).

In the course of a visit I myself made to the western Bolɛ́ngɛ (in September, 1933), I learned that a man who had a special position could have two belɔ́mbɔ; the bomɛtsa proposed her ebísa as candidate, and the second wife did the same for hers. Thus there was a bolɔ́mbɛ w'ìlɔ́me and a bolɔ́mbɛ w'ìɛli (the latter more especially called ekila. I also observed that they made a very clear distinction between bolɔ́mbɔ and [354] nkɔ́ndɛ, just like the peoples treated in this study.

As to the function of messenger, which is attributed to the bolɔ́mbɔ by Engels (as well as by Father Kaptein, in Congo, 1922, Vol. 1, p. 532), it is not performed more by her than by any other woman in the harem. Any of them, without distinction based on rank or date of marriage, may be charged with a mission. The only custom of this sort which involves such a distinction is found among the Bolɛ́ngɛ-Ntɔ́mbɔ living between the Congo and the Boloko. It is as follows: an influential [128] man sometimes sent his belɔ́mbɔ (one or two) to stop a quarrel, or even a battle between two villages. When she intervened, the opposing parties made a truce, pending the arrival and the decision of her husband in person.

Article IV. The Ebísa

595x An ebísa is a woman taken as wife by the husband of one 583x of her relatives -- a sister, aunt, or older cousin. The relative

177 Although even St. Thomas teaches that the only natural authority is that of the head of the family, European legislation has, through ignorance, completely abolished the rights of the native family head;
the wife is freed from all ties and is thus abandoned to licentiousness.
Through a legal fiction, clan law has gone over into the hands of the "recognized native courts of justice," which, however, have just as much to do with the clan court as a policeman with a father. The communization of trade, education, and the rearing of the young, as is demonstrated to us by Russia, would revolutionize our society far less than our installation of these so-called native courts of justice has done in the Congo. Education and correction have been replaced by punishment. Politics, which have begun to play such an all-important 602 role in our society, had /155/ almost no importance in Nkundo society.
613 The neighboring clans were all connected with each other through blood relationship, intermarriage, or friendship ties. Only when there was a struggle against a foreign and common enemy did politics have a role to fulfill. And then the same order of rank was observed among the clans as was already indicated for the members of a single clan.

Here also, biased or romantic products of our ideas about barbarism 177 have adapted these so-called intertribal wars to the need that we felt, 728 to civilize the natives at any cost. These wars were not to be compared 622 with our European wars, in which a mass of people are slaughtered.
In the Congo, no sooner had wounded or dead fallen on both sides than the chiefs were already congregated to conclude a peace treaty.
Here again, we meant to respect the political organization of the natives by the creation of chieftainships and native chiefs, who were to form the political-administrative link between the native clans and the European higher administration. Such chiefs were totally unknown in native society. Together with the establishment of the native courts, the establishment of chieftainships gave the death blow to the actual social organization of the Nkundo-Mongo. The very fact that these institutions are territorial demonstrates clearly that here no ordinary shifting of power has taken place, but simply an elimination of the traditional power in favor of a new colonial power.

Indeed, where formerly the "customary rightful chief" was sought
177 out, even though it was sometimes only a formality, the new formula
622 of the "sectors" has relieved the higher administration from this care too. And it is only to be hoped that this new formula will at least do away with the legal fiction that the "chiefs" are actually "something native," so that they may be classified for once and for all in the short to permit a thorough study of their religious life and its attendant customs.

We ascertained that the native, as a rule, acknowledges the existence of a higher spirit. During my stay in the village of Kapanda, Banfumungu tribe, I had the opportunity to question a chief on the subject. M T 776

"Who causes the sun and the moon to rise? Who gave you the fish of the river and the animals of the plain, Matali?"

The chief looked at me for an instant, dumbfounded, and then replied, "Nzambi ve Mundele?" "Was it not Nzambi, White man?"

"Why, then, do you not call upon Nzambi to protect your crops, favor your fishing, and grant you success in hunting, Matali?" [20]

584 woman sends them to her family. Distant relatives fulfill their obligations by bringing meat or fish, and nowadays also money or some small present, which is not included in the bride price.

The husband's gifts consist of a small knife and a few (5) arrows (at the time of the Independent State a bundle of copper wires called nngelo or mitako and at the present time 5 or 10 francs, for example). These presents from the husband are not bosambelo, for he does not give his fiancée his hand; they are yěkola (greeting) and are not part of the bride price. The woman sends them to her parents.

If the husband does not yet have a house or cultivated fields of 591 his own, [138] as was formerly often the case, (1) the engaged couple live in the hut of the parents for the time being. The woman obtains food from her mother-in-law's fields and prepares it at the hearth of the latter, until the young man has built his hut and established his own fields.

[736] 1. Orphans were almost the only ones who had their own houses and cultivated fields. Of course, we are not speaking of men who were previously married.

Nowadays it no longer happens that a young man who wants to take a wife still lacks his own house. From the time of puberty on, young men moved by the desire for freedom leave the parental home and build huts for themselves where they can live alone or with some companion or other and enjoy their freedom.

6. The life of the engaged couple

584 The bompaka lives in the home of her husband, goes there to talk to him and to sleep with him. During the first three or four days she does not work, unless she is a very active person. Subsequently she takes care of all the household tasks and prepares meals at the hearth under the supervision of her mother-in-law. Only after a few weeks, when she has become accustomed to her new way of living, is she introduced to the customs of her new family; only

Article VI. The Economic Position of a Widow

736 768 As long as her seclusion lasts, a widow continues to live with the family of her deceased husband. She supplies herself with food from the crops she has grown. The tools her husband has given her remain in her hands, and she makes use of them as soon as she can. As to the various utensils which must be destroyed, they are replaced by others lent her by the family of the deceased, for she may no longer use those which served her in her husband's lifetime.

In order to better express the magnitude of their mourning, the Nkundó often refrain [441] from using the products of the farms established by the deceased. Therefore, instead of continuing to cultivate the existing crops of manioc and vegetables, the widow prefers to seek provisions in the fields of the close relatives of the deceased. Or a man who has already chosen her may place his fields at her disposal. If neither of these sources is available and she wishes to observe the rule rigorously, she must purchase what she needs in this realm.

736 768 421 As we have seen in Chapter VI, Article II, a widow has no claim to the fruits of her labors. Neither the money she has earned and which is intended for the common needs of the household, nor the crops she has set up, nor the fish she has caught, nor the caterpillars she has gathered in the forest belong to her. Everything goes to the heirs. Her property is limited to objects she may have received as her personal share in her daughter's bride price, or as some other payment belonging exclusively to the mother.

If the widow remains in the family of the deceased, however, her fields, tools, etc., are left to her, for under those conditions there is no reason to take them away from her. But if she [787] remarries elsewhere, the heirs are pitiless. A Nkundó does not want the family wealth to be scattered or squandered in any way. The law says lokutu lǒkísó lőfótsw'înyamő, "our patrimony can not be alienated."

736 768 In point of fact the widow is treated more favorably, at least in the best instances. If her relations with the family have been good, they will not refuse her some small object that she

736 may wish to keep. In exemplary unions she is allowed to keep 768 the mats she has woven with her own hands, and the goods she received from her husband -- fabrics, beads, hens, even goats and dogs, and even sometimes what she has acquired through joint efforts with her husband (crops, livestock) -- are divided equally. The division is usually carried out with a generous attitude toward the widow, and if there is only one object of a kind the tendency is to let her have it. [442] Such conduct springs from pure generosity, for -- as has already been said -- the woman has absolutely no claim. In the past it followed only upon extraordinarily happy unions, and particularly in consideration of the relationship between the two families and the affection of one of the immediate heirs for the widow.

At the present time the influence of the missions is increasing 736 the number of instances of generosity toward the widow and starting 768 an inclination to make it a general rule. Thus good Christian 797 families -- if they are not thwarted by their pagan relatives -- leave the widow those objects she personally used, such as clothing, utensils, a trunk, and even a sewing machine.

Article VII. Economic Effects of Death

1. Bride price and dowry

768 The death of one of the spouses dissolves a marriage only 583x from a certain point of view and only as a union between two specific individuals. A marriage is absolutely broken only by the death of both spouses (or by divorce).

Unlike divorce death does not bring about any repayment either of the bride price or of the dowry (nkǫmí). When the wife dies, all these payments remain in the hands of the respective parties. When a husband dies, the widow continues to belong to the heirs; she is part of the inheritance. The children belong to the father and his family; no new payment for them is necessary.

833 753 684 which has a strong resemblance to sleeping sickness. (1) One of its symptoms is a weakness of the lower limbs. Instances are cited of individuals who were unable to resist their passions and were punished in this manner. Apparently only the woman dies. As soon as her family discovers that she is stricken, the guilty woman denounces her accomplice. The latter is held responsible and is required to pay a heavy indemnity, which may amount to several dozen copper rings.

833 [751] Here as in many other situations the Nkundó have found a way to avoid the danger. There is an antidote (nsengó), and it is water (basi bale nsengó éâ bombilé). Thus those who are unable to control their aroused passions during the day, satisfy it in a shallow stream.

833 753 The fear of bombilé has been greatly shaken [93] by colonization. If we are to believe the natives, foreign soldiers are responsible for this change also. But the behavior of the latter could not completely destroy the ancient feeling, probably due to a natural shame which makes them seek darkness and privacy for acts of this sort.

833 [515] [842] After intercourse a native woman usually gives herself a douche. She does so for the sake of cleanliness. It often happens, however, that she does not wait long enough before doing so, and thus she neutralizes the effect of the intercourse. This is chiefly a matter of carelessness. Nevertheless, under certain circumstances she may use this means to prevent conception. (1)

833 826 According to my informants, some women have constitutional abnormalities which repel men. As everything readily becomes public, such flaws are quickly known after marriage, though not quite as readily beforehand. Actually love can -- and often does -- cause them to be overlooked. But after the first ardor has cooled, such a situation may become a threat to the stability of a marriage. When quarrels

[781] women receive other signs: an unexpected obstacle in the form of a stone, a stump, a root, the capture of a tree frog which comes and jumps onto the shoulder, etc

A spirit loves and protects only a child he himself has given. He abhors and hates to the death the living gifts of his fellow spirits. If there are several bilímá in the vicinity of a single village, however, the Nkundó explain the absence of the usual rivalries by considering them as related; one is the husband, another the wife, others the children; that is why they do not oppose each other.

Thus an elímá is hostile to any fetus not of his creation.
843 Nevertheless, his spiteful action only begins at the end of several weeks, and even then the pregnancy must have gone far enough to be visible (jěmi jôkela isómbá) Does it take time for him to obtain evidence that the fruit in question is undoubtedly his own gift?

In any case the consequence of this belief is that a woman who has been pregnant for several months cannot long [472] reside in foreign parts, and one who, after conception, has accompanied a husband who has gone to work elsewhere, returns to her village to complete the last period of pregnancy and to deliver.

However, there is an antidote (nsengó) against this murderous action of the spirits. [751] It may be obtained from a person who knows the recipe (this person is not the nkanga or "doctor"). The protective compound is wrapped in a bit of cloth and, by means of a thread of fibers from the lokósá creeper, is tied in the middle of a rope braided with the fibers of the ikuluyaéndé bush, which the threatened woman ties around her hips. (1)

[115]

1. These data on the subject of the elímá is diametrically opposed to the ideas of Father Schebesta (Vollblutneger und Halbzwerge, p. 241, and W. Schmidt, Der Ursprung der Gottesidee, Vol. 4, p. 322), based on the word of his interpreter, Bern. Bongonga of Boúlama (Bombwanja) (now deceased), who was

853 an ordeal or ask a magician's judgment or a magical practice to 857 reveal the culprit. The culprit who is discovered is not subject to any social sanction; he is punished by the ordeal itself or the spell cast against him.

If the mother's adultery is proven through her having been [684] caught in the act, her seducer is considered guilty. He must pay the death indemnity (20 to 30 copper rings). The woman is not at all involved as far as society is concerned; it is a matter between her and her husband.

In order to prevent any harmful effect on the child, the
● 757 Nkundó resort to a potion called bondandota, which will be ex-
854 plained in [479] the next article, 3. "Medication" by scarfication might also be mentioned. This therapy is applied to the parents as well as to the child. If the father is wealthy, he invites the wife's family to come and perform the operation themselves. As in all comparable situations, the invitation is accompanied by the handing over of a pledge, and farewell presents (belingako) are given at the end of the visit. In addition the wife very often goes to live with her parents for some time after her seclusion in order to increase the efficacy of the treatment.

The sanction incurred for a violation of the secondary
843 stipulations is less serious. For instance, the pregnant woman suffers
[684] from violent migraines, which often cause fainting and sometimes make delivery very difficult; thus they can even cause death. The husband is seldom bothered by these headaches. But he takes great pains to faithfully observe the law in order to spare his wife such painful consequences and to avoid the death of the child being born.

Apart from sexual abstention and the rules connected with it, the couple are also subject to various prohibitions which are clearly based on superstitious ideas. Thus:

1) They must neither go down into a well nor dig [illegible] the earth. The woman would die, for it is as if they were digging her grave.

2) They must not carry anything together with another person, for that is how corpses are carried, and such carrying would be the cause of death, through imitation of the woman's funeral procession.

862 does not really stop nursing till it is about two years old, and sometimes two and a half if it has a weak constitution.

Weaning is not accompanied by any ceremony or feast. In order to break the child's habit, the mother smears her nipples [824] with the sap of the lifété fruit (a kind of small sweet pimento or eggplant) or with a pimento-pepper extract (imbénga). Sometimes she leaves the child with some relative (daughter, sister, etc.) for a time [498] while she lives elsewhere.

As we have seen above, after weaning, the ekelé-bokeka period comes to an end for the mother, and her infidelities no longer have repercussions on the life of her child.

[653] 8) If the mother dies while the infant is still being nursed, [583] the task of nursing is turned over to some woman who is disposed to undertake it even a Botswa, and there always is one. After the child is weaned the woman is suitably recompensed. The use of [235] goat's milk is unknown.

854/ 751/ [553] 9) Young children frequently suffer convulsions. This illness is thought to be caused by hawks, and for that reason it is called mpulú (bird). The Nkundó try to prevent it by hanging an amulet around children's necks; it is usually the clavicular triangle of a hen's carcass. In addition they know a remedy whose purpose is to strengthen the nerves: the child is laid on a mat stretched out anywhere on the roof of the hut. An eyewash (bolóí) is prepared from the sap of leaves from the litóyansombo bush and extract of mbólé (fruit of the bosoombó). Using a leaf shaped into a horn, a few drops are put into the child's eyes. Then the father or some other relative pulls out the mat from under the child and lifts it several times, shouting: tá tá tá.

856 10) No special importance is attached to teething. But a child whose upper teeth come in before the lower ones (a defect called ingondo) is considered abnormal. Therefore he is forbidden to eat the first fruits of hunting or fishing in an enclosure (mpao), lest the latter lose their productivity.

845 [202] The event is announced by the usual signal, but the signal is doubled or, if the children are of different sexes, the signal for each sex is given once. It is followed by the dance beat: two [535] or three long and two short.

845 778 The next day the father's relatives go outside the village, preferably to a crossroads. On each side they plant a stalk of lokókólókó. All around the stalk they spread a little heap of small branches and various leaves called jǔké. It is a sign and a place of benediction and good fortune. Each passer-by stops, picks two leaves, places one on each pile, spits on it, and says swá.(2) Then they clap hands and twice sing out, yelí yeye. Such behavior brings the benediction of the twins upon a person's journey, his undertakings, his marriage. The umbilical cord as well as the placenta and membrane are buried under the heap.

845 362 [386] Every morning the mother and father draw two stripes with kaolin on the middle of their foreheads and on their arms, above and below the elbow. They do the same to the twins. (3) They continue doing so until the child is weaned. If after that time one of the children falls ill, they begin again treating him in this manner until he is cured, taking care not to omit his brother, lest he too fall ill. For while these designs are signs of joy, they are ●[751] above all a prophylactic measure against children's fever (ikútswáki), [502] called wǎsanyi when it occurs in twins or in a child following them, and manifests itself chiefly by tumors of the head and face.

845 551 Twins are invariably called Mbóyó and Bokétu, names given to the first born and the second respectively, whatever their sex. The Bombwanja (like the Ekonda) use the names Mbóó and Mpia, respectively. The mother takes the name of Ǎmbá.

2. Onomatopoeia for "spit."

3. Sometimes a double stripe is added at the temples The kaolin may be used pure or mixed with the red paint called ngóla.

843 777 The Nkundó know an antidote (nsengó or losenjó), however, a means of getting rid of such annoying obstacles. Of the three known processes the last is especially common at present.

[625] 1) The husband (or any person to whom the weká is attached and who wants to be rid of it) picks up a nkôngolí chilopod, naturally by means of a leaf, encloses it in a large leaf which he binds with a thin creeper, and makes a small package of it, as one makes a package of meat, fish, etc. He gives this package to his wife, who thinks it contains food and opens it without any suspicion. But when she sees the detested arthropod, she throws it far from her with cries of disgust, while her husband says to her, "You are the one who remains with the wěká." As a result he himself is freed from it.

2) A second means is to take the pregnant woman by the nose when an opportunity presents itself and to say to her: "May the wěká remain attached to you."

[252] [264] 3) The woman prepares some imbóndó (manioc leaves [474] salted and dipped in palm oil). The two spouses eat it together contrary to the usual practice. But the husband arranges matters in such a way that his wife gets the last mouthful and keeps the leaf which serves as a plate and represents the wěká. Then the husband says to her, "Keep the wěká for yourself."

The wěká cannot be detached from the woman, for she is the bomóngo wěká, "the owner of the wěká," the one who is the basis for it. For her it continues until the child is on the point of being born (elaká ó jěmi jǒtúnda, literally "he has come to the end of his growth," or jǒkékama, "has turned to one side"), and thus, in practice, until the birth of the child.

● [152] If a first wife dies at the beginning of her first pregnancy, a cesarian operation must be performed on her. The fetus is removed (it is still no more than an embryo -- iléngélá or bokelé, literally "an egg," or ilóngó, literally "blood") so that it can be buried behind the hut. An omission of this practice would result in the death through pregnancy of the deceased's husband's other wives or of the women he will subsequently marry.

848 soon as her family becomes aware of her condition. The accomplice
684 is made officially responsible and is required to accept this responsible and is required to accept this responsibility by publicly pledging his willingness to take all consequences upon himself. This pledge like all pledges is called ndanga. It consists of a knife, a ring of copper or brass, a spear, or similar objects. (2)

2. The same custom is practiced in the case of pregnancy resulting from adultery.

Article V. Sexual Intercourse

833 Although this subject is extremely delicate and therefore difficult to investigate and describe, it does not seem pointless to note here a few details with which I have become acquainted. We will discuss in succession a few circumstances relative to the act, then rape, and finally what are called incomplete acts. [92]

1. Circumstances relative to the act

[177] The Nkundɔ́ have intercourse lying on their sides. Nowadays, natives who have had frequent contacts with Whites are beginning to abandon the old manner for that of the Europeans. The spirit of imitation probably plays some part in the transformation which is beginning, but the gradual spread of the knowledge that the European system makes conception more likely is also a factor.

Even for illicit relations our natives seldom choose the forest or near-by palm or banana groves. Usually they prefer an isolated hut, or they take advantage of the absence of witnesses who might intrude on them. At night they are generally afraid of anything that stirs in the forest.

833 The Nkundɔ́ have sexual relations only during the night. To 753 do so in the daytime would be to risk being striken by a mortal illness
684 called bombilɛ́ (derived from mbilɛ́ "noon," by extension, "day"),

833 753 684 which has a strong resemblance to sleeping sickness. (1) One of its symptoms is a weakness of the lower limbs. Instances are cited of individuals who were unable to resist their passions and were punished in this manner. Apparently only the woman dies. As soon as her family discovers that she is stricken, the guilty woman denounces her accomplice. The latter is held responsible and is required to pay a heavy indemnity, which may amount to several dozen copper rings.

[1] It is not sleeping sickness itself, however, for that disease seems formerly to have been unknown in this area.

833 751 Here as in many other situations the Nkundɔ́ have found a way to avoid the danger. There is an antidote (nsengɔ́), and it is water (bàsi bale nsengɔ́ ɛ́â bombilɛ́). Thus those who are unable to control their aroused passions during the day, satisfy it in a shallow stream.

833 753 The fear of bombilɛ́ has been greatly shaken [93] by colonization. If we are to believe the natives, foreign soldiers are responsible for this change also. But the behavior of the latter could not completely destroy the ancient feeling, probably due to a natural shame which makes them seek darkness and privacy for acts of this sort.

833 [515] [842] After intercourse a native woman usually gives herself a douche. She does so for the sake of cleanliness. It often happens, however, that she does not wait long enough before doing so, and thus she neutralizes the effect of the intercourse. This is chiefly a matter of carelessness. Nevertheless, under certain circumstances she may use this means to prevent conception. (1)

[1] See Chapter X, Article I, 2.

833 826 According to my informants, some women have constitutional abnormalities which repel men. As everything readily becomes public, such flaws are quickly known after marriage, though not quite as readily beforehand. Actually love can -- and often does -- cause them to be overlooked. But after the first ardor has cooled, such a situation may become a threat to the stability of a marriage. When quarrels

853 The child is given to a wet nurse (a kinswoman, a stranger, a Bo̱tswa woman, depending on who is available).

847 If the mother's body shows no signs of evil-doing or of 845 "the hatred of others," it is thought that her death was caused 843 by evil spells on the part of the child. Thereupon some kill the child to prevent it from doing harm during its whole life; others, on the contrary, spare it despite everything.

If the husband (for it is he above all who is involved, since 843 he is most exposed to possible lapses) has unfortunately been guilty
837 of misconduct, his wife has only a slim chance [478] of salvation. Nevertheless, it is still possible for her to be saved, on condition that from then on her husband abstain from any sexual act and from all the accidental gestures and actions described above. The least he can do under these circumstances is to inform his wife of his indiscretion so that she can take precautions. If he wants to [672] ward off any possibility of causing his wife's certain death, he sends her home and gives his father-in-law a pledge (ndanga) through which he recognizes his guilt and shows his intention to assume the entire responsibility for his misdeed. An upright man prefers to act in this fashion, for he never knows whether one day he will not inadvertently violate one of the prohibitions.

B. The child's death is the result of the putrefaction of 853 the mother's milk, the mother being thus incapable of nursing.
837 As in the preceding case, the offense is a priori imputed to the husband -- isé aɓoma bǒ̱na la ndota. (1) Since he has wronged no one but himself, no palaver ensues; the "natural" punishment is sufficient. This does not mean that he is not the object of evil tongues; people point at him and at times remind him of his misdeed. To remove the blame from himself, he can resort to 843 3) They must not climb up on the roof (they are not forbidden to climb a palm tree in order to cut off nuts)

4) They must not eat animals killed by a carnivore (leopard,
843 crocodile, etc.), or the child would die a sudden and unnatural
262 death like the victims of such wild beasts. [480]
825

5) They must abstain from animals such as porcupines, anteaters, certain birds, crocodiles, and gavials, (1) who are in the habit of living in the hollows of trees or in dens. The delivery would be very painful if they ate them, for the child would roll up and crouch in the mother's womb. Fish that find shelter in passageways do not produce such consequences and are therefore eaten.

6) They must not eat turtles (2). A very difficult birth is feared, for the turtle withdraws into its shell and encloses its anal extremities as in a vise, and the child would do the same.

7) They must not eat the head of a monkey. The child would be born with deep-set eyes resembling the monkey's.

8) They must not eat the large antelope known as mbuli, because it has a long neck and flabby flesh, and the child would acquire the same defects.

● [753] 9) They must not eat the lioóló fish, which would cause migraines, since it swims fiercely without direction.

The results of bokeka and the obligations resulting from it 843 are connected with natural paternity. Thus, if a woman becomes 437 pregnant as a result of relations with a regular, recognized lover, the latter must assume all responsibility. He is required to "fasten the fetus" and to observe all the regulations pertaining to the

1. In this region women never eat snakes or bats (loléma, bọnkọ́ḿ, ffukyá).

2. In some tribes (Bongili, Bonkoso) women always abstain from eating such reptiles.

846 to be able to nurse the child together." This does not mean that 833 from then on they may have regular sexual relations, for these are not permitted until after the end of seclusion. But if they were to omit the act at this time, they would have to abstain from it until the child is weaned. The Nkundó say that the act is performed "only a little." For many it becomes masturbation; others withdraw before obtaining the effect of the act. In no case may the act reach its natural climax. The reason for this practice is unknown to me. Perhaps it is done in order not to molest the woman while she is in a painful condition.

The next day the ashes in the hearth of the seclusion hut
846 are swept out, and the fire becomes "ordinary"; anyone may use it and eat food prepared on it.

4) The umbilical cord is dried on the bolíkó (a tray or shelf) and then buried at the foot of a young banana tree planted for that purpose, preferably under a bọnkọḿ tree if possible. The ashes and sweepings from the seclusion hut are thrown there. The banana tree is called nkíndá. (1) Its fruit may be eaten only by the child's ● [153] grandfather and grandmother. If another person eats it, he will be punished with a headache of a nervous type.

The umbilical cord is always buried in the father's native
846 soil. People who are far from home (laborers for the Whites, etc.)
614 preserve the umbilical cords of their children with great care in order to take them back [489] when they return to their village, or send them back when a favorable opportunity arises. The Nkundó hold to this usage tenaciously, because a person whose umbilical cord is not buried in the lands of his paternal clan has no authority in the group. The person involved would meet with the following objection: ntákokúndela lokolé, ntákokundela lọkọkí, óyakúmya ngámo? olě nk'eyâya, "The lokolé was not beaten for you, your

846 taking the child would cause the child's death. The same precau-789 tion is also in order if the husband goes on a trip before the child's birth and does not return till after the delivery

We have just seen that the harmful effects of the father's 846 misconduct on his child's life is effectuated through the father's 837 act of taking the child on his knees. Thus the Nkundó speak of baóngó b'âbé, "a father's bad knees," to indicate his reprehensible [826] conduct, and they say that the bondandota potion is administered to the child so that it will not die because of the father's bad
knees. (1)

When a child has painful and persistent diarrhea, it is often 753 interpreted as the effect of the father's infidelity. As soon as they 854 become aware of it, the couple separate for some time, and the father no longer touches the child. [492]

Contrary to what one reads on this subject about other peo-
837 ples of the Congo, Nkundó couples do not have to remain continent
834 beyond the period of seclusion. The separation ceremony gives the 789 husband back the freedom of action he had before his wife's pregnancy. For the wife the bokeka remains strict with respect to illicit relations until the child is weaned. However she, too, may regain her freedom by having recourse to an antidote, the ingredients of which she purchases from a person who holds the secret. The ingredients are placed in a small antelope horn which is then stopped [824] up by means of bolaká (resin from the Symphonia gabonensis). The interested party wears it about her loins on a string or a bead belt or, preferably, on a special creeper. This amulet protects the child's life from the harmful influence of the mother's acts of adultery, but it does so only on condition that she does not separate herself from the child, as we will explain further on. This procedure

---

1. The expression baóngó b'âbé is also used when an undertaking which requires continence is unsuccessful. (See Article II, 3).

862 does not really stop nursing till it is about two years old, and sometimes two and a half if it has a weak constitution.

Weaning is not accompanied by any ceremony or feast. In order to break the child's habit, the mother smears her nipples [824] with the sap of the lifété fruit (a kind of small sweet pimento or eggplant) or with a pimento-pepper extract (imbénga). Sometimes she leaves the child with some relative (daughter, sister, etc.) for a time [498] while she lives elsewhere.

As we have seen above, after weaning, the ekelé-bokeka period comes to an end for the mother, and her infidelities no longer have repercussions on the life of her child.

[853] 8) If the mother dies while the infant is still being nursed, [563] the task of nursing is turned over to some woman who is disposed to undertake it even a Botswa, and there always is one. After the child is weaned the woman is suitably recompensed. The use of [235] goat's milk is unknown.

854 9) Young children frequently suffer convulsions. This illness
751 is thought to be caused by hawks, and for that reason it is called [153] mpulú (bird). The Nkundó try to prevent it by hanging an amulet around children's necks; it is usually the clavicular triangle of a hen's carcass. In addition they know a remedy whose purpose is to strengthen the nerves: the child is laid on a mat stretched out anywhere on the roof of the hut. An eyewash (bolóí) is prepared from the sap of leaves from the litóyansombo bush and extract of mbólé (fruit of the bosoombó). Using a leaf shaped into a horn, a few drops are put into the child's eyes. Then the father or some other relative pulls out the mat from under the child and lifts it several times, shouting: tá tá tá.

856 10) No special importance is attached to teething. But a child whose upper teeth come in before the lower ones (a defect called ingondo) is considered abnormal. Therefore he is forbidden to eat the first fruits of hunting or fishing in an enclosure (mpao), lest the latter lose their productivity.

fear. (1) Thus the very number of violations would have gradually made the practice customary. Powerless to stop it, the persons in authority, guardians of traditional morality, would have contented themselves with channeling the development and restricting it to a minimum by being lenient on the subject of extramarital relations in order to save the principle of exogamy. This explanatory hypothesis can find a little confirmation in the fact that at the very beginning of colonization when European influence was not felt as yet, there were isolated and very rare cases of marriage in opposition to the law of exogamy between members of groups which were only very distantly related but already practiced lonkâna. The exception then became the rule, and from then on the two groupings in question intermarried regularly and without hindrance, while other families remained under the ancient law. Thus there is the known case of Boyela village (Bakɛala), which includes the Bokambɛ, Bembakɔ, Besɔlɔ, and Bekɔlama (extinct), all descendants of Ngonde and one wife; his union with another spouse gave rise to the Lilekɛ and the Likongo, to whom Bongilɛ, a group related through marriage (likilo), is attached. These two groups of families could not intermarry, but they did engage in lonkâna. Around the time of the first arrival of the Whites, a member of the Bembakɔ [100] family a certain Bonjɔmbɔ was impelled by an excessive love to violate the law of exogamy by taking Bolondɔ of Lilekɛ for his wife. As his love did not cool and the marriage proved stable, it was recognized and accepted as legitimate. Since then the two groups in question have each become exogamous.

754

2. Between close relatives

Incest between close relatives has no special name of its own. As a matter of fact, it never occurs as an outgrowth of passion. We

1. Actually, no sanction is provided against marriages within an exogamous entity; everything lies in the opposition of parents and elders and in a habit which is almost innate.

835 754 encounter it only in connection with magical practices and sorcery (botɛ, plural betɛ), for which it is the nsimbo, that is, the condition without which the betɛ would lack efficacy. If the nsimbo is not observed, the botɛ turns against its owner and, by a reversal of its effect (bosesengano), brings death to the latter. Therefore the interested parties submit to these degrading requirements despite their natural repugnance. Depending on the case, incest with the mother, the daughter, or the sister is required. The first of these eventualities is the most repugnant to our natives. Though it goes altogether against the grain to do so, the mother submits to this ignominy to save the life of her foolhardy and greedy son.

The nsimbo of incest does not exist in all botɛ. [184] It even seems to have been absent from the betɛ which are ancient and purely Nkundó. It is found primarily in the big modern betɛ, which have been imported from other peoples or invented on the spot since colonization. (1)

Article VIII. Love Philters

832 The Nkundó are familiar with two love philters, the efóndɛ and the bontálá. Other modern betɛ may produce the same effect in part or secondarily. Here [101] we will only deal with the first two, which are "pure" and ancient love philters.

The love philters (botɛ w'ělangyá) serve to gain the heart of a young girl as much as to entice a married woman away from her husband.

1. Efóndɛ

Efónde (1) is a common charm. Anyone can procure it from the maker in consideration of the appropriate payment, of course. Various kinds of efóndɛ exist, differing as to the ingredients used, the manner

1. Efónde is often used as a synonym of elangyá in its sexual meaning.

586* 789 especially very early in the morning at the crowing of the cock. (1)

> 1. The natives also use this means to call their children who long ago left for the "lowlands" and whose return they ardently desire.

If the one who is called does not return, the charm will take revenge either on her or on her lover, depending on the desire of the person operating it. Another intervention on his part is then required, however, and it varies according to the form used. Note that according to the native view it is impossible for the wife not to hear the call, no matter how far away she may be. If she does not return, it is because she is being obstinate and deserves to be punished.

The spirit of vengeance alone is involved in:

586* 754 [237] 2) The ngondé. This charm comes from the Coquilhatville region or even further away. The word ngondé is the Lolíngá form of the Lonkundó word nkondé, which means "gavial." The teeth of this reptile actually play a part in its composition. It is used to punish any thief by death. Therefore it has been declared effective against anyone who tries to seduce the wife of another. It will cause the culprit's feet to swell and to open with pus. Like the above practices, this one has not yet crossed Momboyo.

832 177 Such usages like many others have therefore been recently introduced. Before the arrival of Europeans in these parts, only love philters were known. However, it is easily understandable that the Nkundó gladly and confidently received these new practices which are so useful -- in their opinion -- and operate in a domain of capital importance for which colonization has deprived them of their ancient sanctions and means of prevention. [417]

843 837 This law requiring a most strict fidelity lasts until the end of the bokeka for the husband, but until the weaning of the child for the wife. It is especially strict for the period of seclusion (see below, Article III, 3).

The violation of the essential stipulation of this interdict (-fénda bokeka) results either in the death of the woman during pregnancy and especially during seclusion or in the death of the child later on. [477]

A. If the woman dies during this period, the suspicion is placed a priori on her husband. The Nkundő say ab̂fénda wǎlɪ́, "he has transgressed against his wife." Unless he can prove his innocence through public actions, the judgment of a magician, or autopsy[sic].

If the woman has been the victim of a seducer, he is held responsible and must pay a large indemnity equivalent to the bride price that was paid for the deceased. If no other man is involved, the affair has no consequences.

843 163 754 845 853 In the past the combined autopsy and Caesarian section was always performed. It had a dual purpose: to remove the child and to examine the mother. If the operation revealed the existence of a "stomach" (likundű), the deceased was of a noxious (lilọka) nature or constitution and therefore caused the death of her child. If the child remained alive, it proved that he was of a magically superior nature and was able to resist the natural evil spells of his mother, which thus turned against their unwitting author. (1)

1. The Nkundő believe that only animals have a "stomach" (likundű). If a human being has one, that is, if his viscera are large, curved, in compartments, in a word, abnormal, that person is an evildoer. He commits evil acts voluntarily or, most frequently, unknowingly. Some men with a likundű can be recognized by the fact that they eat their nails, hair, etc. The Nkundő must certainly have observed relationships between this habit and a deformity of the stomach.

576
845 from the others. They thus rank with the great notables of the past. [sic]

845 When the children grow up and become self-sufficient, all the special regulations lose their force and they become like 554 everybody else. Nothing distinguishes them from the rest in marriage, death, etc No preference is shown for or against them. But their descendants will again produce twins.

Thus the Nkundó consider twins as extraordinary children,
845 but they do not carry this view to extremes. They are pleased to receive two children at a time, although they believe that under such circumstances the pregnancy and delivery are more dangerous for the mother. That is why she is called boyé̱ngwá since, despite the seriousness of the situation, she did not die This epithet is also applied to the father and to the twins, probably for the same reason as well as because of their immunity with respect to prohibitions. If the twins are of different sexes, however, the mother is not as likely to be called boyé̱ngwá, since she is liko̱ka, "harmful." (1)

1. See above, Article II, 3.

945 It is apparent from the above description that twins are 789 considered to be somewhat tainted with magic. The existence of 754 this belief is confirmed by the prohibition against throwing anything (stone, palm kernel, etc.) onto their hut, the same prohibition applying to anyone who possesses a charm or practices sorcery or protective magic. In addition they possess a certain innate ability to cast a spell over the activities (hunting, fishing) of others. That is why persons who are afraid of being harmed by them smear themselves with kaolin in the same way as do such children and their parents. [505]

The Nkundó have had cases of triplets, but they are ex-
845 tremely rare. The youngest of the three is called Yé̱nde̱mbe̱, or Yé̱nde̱nde̱, or Yé̱le̱le̱. The only special practice with reference to the youngest one is that he can never be ordered to do any work, be sent to carry a message, run any errand, etc., áfótswé ntómo.

845 puberty, by his father. The performance of this role entails continence (bokeka) for the person who undertakes it, even with respect to the spouse. A violation of this rule prevents healing of the wound or at least makes the process very long and difficult. (1)

[755] 1. A similar bokeka applies to anyone nursing a large gangrenous ulcer (wǎlé).

The foreskin that has been cut off is dried on the bolíkó (tray or shelf). Then no one bothers with it any longer, and it usually remains there, dusty and dirty, for an indefinite period of time if the rats leave it alone.

[556] Circumcision is not an occasion for feasts or ceremonies. Sometimes a man who is rich and vain will give a feast, but this is not at all a common practice

The term "to circumcise" is translated in Lonkundo as téna bonsé, "to cut off the foreskin." The less vulgar term and one used much more frequently is téna nsóngé, "to cut off the tip." A much too decent circumlocution is téna batói, "to cut off the ears."

The reason for this custom has already been given in Chapter I, Part II, Article II, 2.

Article VIII. Education

857 From an early age a Nkundó child must perform various small services for his parents, especially in the household; he is asked to draw water, fetch firewood, take care of a little brother or sister, etc. The demands for such services are addressed chiefly to girls, but boys are not at all exempt. By the very nature of things, however, the latter are less frequently asked to help.

Quite early a boy may accompany his father on trips, at meetings, legal debates, etc The father makes a bow and arrows for him and teaches him the art of using them. The great pastime

844 are not too rare. (2)

> 2. Ease in delivery is called bosánjá;
> difficulty is called bonsombo.

A husband asks his mother-in-law to come and help her daughter. Other kinswomen of the husband or the wife do not refuse [482] their services either. Among them there is always one who is more expert in these matters and who acts as a midwife (mbótsi).

The delivery takes place in the banana grove behind the hut; there is light and air there. In the house it would be more difficult.

The husband cannot be present at this event. His presence would make it difficult and painful. The further away he is, the better. The prohibition is not rigid, however; if there is no one to help his wife (as in the case of an unexpected delivery in the forest, etc.), he will have no hesitation whatsoever in helping her with all the power and skill at his command.

To facilitate the arrival of the child, the midwife gives the wife a potion to drink "in order to make slippery" (boté wǎ [278] boséli), and administers a douche containing bofímo bark.

If the pains continue for several days and all medication is 845 without results, it is assumed that some evil spell (liloka) is at work. To neutralize it the woman in labor is "blessed" (-saka). For that purpose her family and that of her husband each bring a stalk of the bokaakó plant (bosáánga). Two kinswomen, each with the stalk of her respective clan, squeeze out the sap with which they smear the woman's abdomen. After that the delivery takes place in a normal fashion.

845 The nkanga (doctor-magician) only intervenes when a woman
756 has already had several miscarriages or when all her children die.
769 If he is consulted he invariably attributes such misfortunes to the action of spirits of the deceased, who may be appeased by offerings and the promise that a manifestation of their will be heeded with respect to the naming of the child. Usually he adds that a few alimentary prohibitions must be observed until the child is weaned.

515 834 are reassured by the fact that they are in a group, so that no one feels singled out by the gaze of the passer-by. Washing away from major streams is always surrounded by more propriety. For this purpose a [343] small enclosure (ikomba) is built behind the hut or among the banana trees, or a small thicket is allowed to grow there. By this means the native is sheltered from indiscreet glances if he wants to take a ● [757] bath or give himself an enema. As a matter of fact these things are done preferably after dark.

834 152 5) Violent anger or sorrow drown out modesty, just as they momentarily destroy the use of reason and suppress all feelings which are contradictory or simply different. In this situation, too, the man shows himself superior to the woman. He is less impulsive, calmer, less prone to lose control of his actions, to be carried away by his anger. Thus he almost never strips himself bare. The woman, on the other hand, readily strips off all her clothing. This behavior is extremely common; a woman undresses completely whenever she experiences great sorrow or intense anger. Luckily for propriety's sake some friend or relative always hastens to cover at least the essential parts. For a woman who throws off her clothing exposes herself to the mockery and jeers of spectators. (1)

1. An angry woman may also undress to shame her husband; it is a way of insulting and mocking him.

833 6) The Nkundó practice sexual intercourse only at night. I believe that this custom is due to their sense of propriety, [57] supplemented by a superstitious explanation which will be described in detail in Article V.

593x 834 7) The sense of modesty has its fullest expression in relation to parents, brothers, sisters, etc. Thus it is unheard of that a son should see his mother naked: bɔ̌na ɛ́tɛ̃nɛ́kɛ́ ɛ̌sunvɛ́ nvangɔ́. If an adult daughter is ill and requires personal care (such as an enema, for example), the father has to take care of her himself if no other female relative is near by. But their sense of modesty is such that they both shed tears over the event. As a matter of fact this situation

843 bokeka. The same is true if the pregnancy is the result of adultery; 837 the natural father must bear all the consequences of his act. The husband is absolved from them and has no relations with his wife until the end of this particular pregnancy. The culprit must give him a pledge by which he publically recognizes his responsibility, and he is expected to fulfill all the duties of a husband. Therefore he may have relations with the woman during her entire pregnancy without paying additional indemnities. If any accident befalls the mother or the child, he is made to pay a large indemnity.

Note finally that, as we have pointed out in Chapter II, [583] Article XI, no bride-price payment can be made from the time the pregnancy becomes visible until after the end of the period of seclusion.

843 844 ● 757 To facilitate childbirth the previously mentioned concoction of various leaves mixed with kaolin (isaɔ́) is continuously applied to the abdomen. Medical scarifications on the abdomen are also performed.

Finally, as the time of delivery approaches, special douches [278] made from a concoction of the bark of the boſmbo tree (1) are administered. All these treatments are called betɛ́ byá bosánjɔ́, that is, medicines (for the purpose) of an easy delivery.

Article III. Birth

844 1. Delivery

A woman remains with her husband for childbirth; she does not go home to her family. Only exceptionally does she give birth elsewhere -- for instance, if she has been sent home for one reason or another, or during a trip, while working in the fields, near a stream, or a spring, etc. Such sudden unexpected deliveries

1. Certain douches, especially the one made of boſmbo, are also used as abortive agents.

837 is not morally condoned, and a woman who resorts to it does not 834 escape criticism. She is compared to a goat, who does not have 789 a regular and steady husband: álómya bóna lontaa, "she nurses her child as a goat does." (1)

1. The opposite of lómya lontaa, -- if it is used to show the contrast -- is lómya lontómbá.

When the separation ceremony is ended, the mother is 846 adorned with all her ornaments and goes out to walk in a procession through the village. The child is carried by an older sister, a niece, etc. He is taken around the village, bánangya bǒna l'olóló Small presents are offered him everywhere -- an arrow, a small knife, a hairpin, etc There is no feast, however; if that honor were accorded him he would die of it (for when someone dies, there is always a feast of farewell in his honor). [493]

Article IV. Nursing

853 During the first few days after birth an infant does not suck the milk of its mother, since it is "too hot." He is fed by a third person, preferably a relative.

On the third day the following occurs:

953 1) The mother's breasts are massaged (-kulola baéle). For 757 this purpose the Nkundó use leaves of the bǒte creeper and the lilongyá plant (Adenostemma viscosum Forst.), a green leaf from a banana tree called nselenge, several pieces of peeled sugar cane, the tips of the dried leaves of any banana tree, and sometimes other plants are added as well. All the ingredients are crushed, then boiled, and white sand and a bit of red paint are mixed in with them. The mixture is called ndengó. It is prepared by the women who are in charge of massaging the breasts. The bǒte leaves, however, must be picked by the father. He goes to the forest early in the morning and first shakes the creeper so that all leaves that are not firmly attached will fall off. Then he climbs it and picks the desired

853 quantity of leaves, which he puts in his little basket called ilámbá.
● 757 If a leaf falls in the course of this operation, he must stop and throw away all that he has picked up to that point. The massage cannot take place on that day for it would cause the child to die falling and withering like a leaf. The father must start all over again the next day.

There are always two masseuses: one of the husband's kinswoman and one of the wife's. (1) They crush the leaves in

1. The Injóló sometimes permit a man to perform the massage.

[783] the same single mortar (eoka). The mother meanwhile must make her public confession, of which we will speak again in a moment. When the substances intended for rubbing have been prepared, the two masseuses begin their operation, which must be quite painful. The husband's relative takes care of the right breast, the wife's concentrates on [494] the left. (1)

1. This is a natural arrangement for our people; the term used to indicate "husband" (bóme) is undoubtedly etymologically related to the one denoting "the right" (elóme), and there is some likelihood that the same is true for wǎlɛ́ (wife) and iáli (left).

They energetically massage the breasts from the top to the bottom with the mixture. After a few minutes they test the milk by letting a few drops run out onto a burning fragment of pottery. If the reaction is normal the mother begins to nurse. If on the other hand, the milk curdles and solidifies (baɛ́le báonda) like rubber, it is a sign that it is of bad quality because of the presence of an internal boil in the breast, called ǐtsɛ́. In that case the knowledge and skill of a woman expert is called upon. The latter rubs the leaves of a creeper between her hands in order to extract

853 the sap, which she then mixes with water. The resulting liquid is 751 oily and foams like soap. She places a few drops on a piece of banana leaf and makes a sachet of it. She holds this against the breast for a certain time until the boil, similar to a blood clot or a piece of liver, leaves the breast and enters the sachet. She then shows it to those present. From then on the mother can nurse her child without fear; her milk has become healthy and normal.

2) The mother's public confession must include the names
837 of all the men with whom she has had carnal relations since the 853 child's conception. Other groups, such as the Injóló, extend this 684 obligation even to instances preceding that moment but which 783 have not been declared at a previous occasion. The confession is public. The masseuse related to the husband begins to crush the leaves to be used in rubbing the breast; as she moves the pestle and says to the mother, "Name a man." The mother replies by giving a name. The masseuse says nyongo, "indemnity."
Then all those present say yengô, yengô, yengô, "absolved"
Then it is the other masseuse's turn, and she interrogates the mother in the same way. The process continues till all the names have been cited. If [495] the mother cites the name of a man who is a close relative of her husband and who therefore does not need to pay an indemnity, the masseuse does not reply nyongo. Instead a member of the husband's clan makes the gesture signifying [201] exemption: he holds the kernel of a palm nut (lolikâ) in his left hand and throws it by means of a small board which he holds in his right. Among the Injóló the man takes two kernels and strikes them against each other and then throws them away. Were the woman to suppress a name the child would die. If she has no admission to make, she replies, "No one besides my husband."

The indemnity that must be paid by those who are obligated
to do so consists of a hen and a bunch of bananas (or their cash value) which are to be given to the masseuses, who will then divide them. Were the accused to refuse, the husband would demand a regular indemnity from him after the end of the seclusion.

The Bombwanja have this confession at the time of the [184] fastening of the fetus. A few old women married into the clan carry out the interrogation. The kernel of the fruit of the palm is thrown by means of a knife.

837 Note, finally, that the confession is restricted to married 783 women. It is never expected of a young unmarried mother. Therefore it would seem to be a practice connected with marriage (a 853 social institution) and not with childbirth (a physiological phenomenon).

This confession is called etato or lotato, from the verb
[192] -tata, "to confess," (for which the generic term, sanga, "to say," is sometimes substituted).

I was unable to find any reason for this practice other than that of avoiding the death of the child. It is evident, however, that this explanation does not exhaust the question, although it is entirely possible that the original and deeper meaning has been lost without leaving any trace in the minds of the present generation. [496]

3) During the entire duration of nursing, the mother must 853 not be separated from her child. For the usual circumstances of 933 daily life, this rule is broadly interpreted; but during sexual relations it is strict, and no exceptions or excuses are permitted. Negligence under these circumstances would inevitably bring about the death of the child by ndota as soon as the mother took it back. This rule holds for legitimate relations as much as for illicit ones. Therefore the mother must always keep her child at her breast.

4) If at some point during nursing, the milk no longer flows
953 in sufficient quantity, the mother is given a potion consisting of ●[757] the extract of the bark of the bolóngé tree (which has a fruit con-
[278] taining a very sweet milky sap). Then she eats vegetables called lotélé. (1)

1. The leaves of this plant are also ordinarily eaten as vegetables, but they are consumed especially by those who possess the modern magical practice known as boyaóli.

5) An accident to which the Nkundó attach great importance
[262] is the rejection or vomiting of milk into the mouth of an adult, even if the person affected is the infant's mother. Such a person

598^x 343 Polygamists as well as some monogamists have a kind of shed where they receive their friends, take care of their affairs, eat their meals, etc. (1)

1. Such a shed is called esamba by the Bombwanja, ingɔ́mba by the other tribes. The Beloko, like the Ntɔ́mbɛ́ and Bolɛ́ngɛ́ located between the Congo and the Boloko, say bongɔ́mbo. The Ekonda say ewánga.

[626] A man who is frequently found in the kitchen or who likes to rest there is the butt of ridicule by both men and women. He is called ikɔ́mbelinga (derived from bolinga, "smoke," and kɔ́mba, "to dodge; to turn the head away in order to protect the eyes against smoke").

2. Illness

593^x ●758 A wife is required to nurse her husband if he is ill, together with his other wives if he is polygamous and, in case of serious illness, with the aid of his female relatives (mother, sisters). Even if they are married and living at a distance, they come to take care of a brother or son; it behooves their husbands to be reasonable and not to try and forbid their absence or prevent this exercise of their duty, for otherwise a man runs a great risk of seeing his wife leave him for good, outraged by this demonstration of his lack of affection for her family.

Together the wives and relatives seek medications and prepare the appropriate potions.

When a wife is ill the husband's female relatives usually come to see her, console her, and administer what care they are capable of giving; as a rule they are well disposed toward the wife of their son, brother, etc. The husband, for his part, must seek medications and help his sick wife. I recall a great palaver apropos of this question. During the illness of his wife Efetsɛ́, a certain Bokangɛ́ continuously had relations in his hut with another woman. The matter became public. The guilty husband was

758 boóndo, for having failed to take care of his wife and for having shown complete thoughtlessness and indifference.

If the illness becomes prolonged or serious, neither the hus-
593 band nor his relatives have the leisure to nurse or take care of her.
758 To remedy this situation and at the same time give the woman's 672 parents the satisfaction of being able to help their daughter themselves, the husband sends her to them. He takes her there himself or calls them to come and get her. He communicates the news by sending his ndonga who bears a token payment (ndanga, loákako) such as a knife, a copper ring, etc. This ndanga is a pledge, evidence for the family that their daughter was ill on arrival and did not acquire her infirmity while with them. Without this pledge they would not want to take her; they would prefer to treat her in her husband's home. Or if the husband were to send her home without a ndanga, they would call the ndonga to witness this infraction of the rules. Or the fact that the husband has done this might be considered as a repudiation of his wife, pure and simple. In any case the husband would be in the wrong, and under these conditions the legal responsibility for his wife's death would fall entirely on him (see Chapter IX, Article X).

593 When the wife is cured, her parents send a message to their 758 son-in-law to urge him to come and take his wife back.

Even if they have not been invited by the husband, the wife's parents come to see their daughter when they hear of her illness [268] in order to take her away with them and care for her. She usually follows them, but she is not required to do so since she belongs to her husband. People even cite the names of women who despite the insistence of their families did not want to be cared for at home, but have preferred to die in their husband's arms, so to speak. Among them were Bolűmbű w'îkofo of Bombénga w'ôkenda (Besombó) married to Iembe y'ilongo of Engónjó; Baleko of Nseké married to Eanga éâ Jatá of Nkélengo; Iombe of Bosáá married to Bokűlűmbwá of Iálá; Balengola of Ntómbá (Bombwanja) married to Lompoko of Mbelé; Mpémbé of Bonganda (Bonkoso) married to Imbamba of Bonjoku;

593x Efala of Longa married to Ìfolí of Bokɛ́nyola (Bo̲njo̲ku); Basásɛ of 758 Mbelɛ married to Nke̲ngo̲ of Litɔli.

If the woman went to her family in good health and contracted an infirmity there, her parents are responsible for it. They are obliged to nurse her and to assume all the expenses due to her treatment. After she is cured they send her back with a quantity of nko̲mí for her husband. Usually the matter ends there. If relations between the two families are not very good, however, the husband will claim an indemnity, which varies with the situation and to which he is entitled even if he does not claim it.

This stipulation of the law holds even if the woman has gone to see her mother, father, etc., at the time of an illness or for any other reason.

It does not hold, on the other hand, if the wife has been ordered to go to her parents by her husband, or if she has fled the home shared with her husband because of ill treatment or of serious failings on his part; this point will be explained below in number 3. In such cases the husband is legally responsible for the illness.

Certain situations may arise which are intermediate to the ones discussed. Thus, for example, a wife may make a visit on her own initiative [269] but for her husband's good. Theoretically, he should win the case. Note, finally, that a stay of only twenty-four hours is not considered sufficient to make responsibility for an illness fall on the wife's family.

Colonization has produced an entirely new situation.
178 Colonial law has given the extra wives of polygamists the freedom
595x to go to a mission in order to be instructed in the Christian religion 758 and to contract a monogamous marriage (provided the customary 672 rules governing the dissolution of marriages are observed). Such a 797 woman may fall ill at the mission. If her illness has no troublesome consequences, it does not result in a dispute. But if the illness becomes chronic and in some way detrimental to the abandoned spouse, it may do so.

The polygamists declare that they are free of any responsibility, which they place on the woman's family. But the family has 178 nothing to do with it; it is unjust to bring them into the matter.

595x Since this legislation is intended to combat polygamy, it is natural
● 758 that the polygamous husband be the one who suffers from it.

672 The following is a recent example of this situation: Mbɔ́yɔ́
797 Julienne, sister of Botúna Jean of Balondɔ́, married to a polygamist by the name of Insílo of Bokenyola (Bonjoku), went to Bokuma Mission, where she contracted an incurable illness. (1) Because of her illness she found it impossible to remarry. She therefore left the mission but was no longer accepted by the husband she had lived with so that she had to live in her brother's home. Insílo insisted that her brother reimburse him for the bride price, maintaining that in going to the mission, the woman had divorced him; his real reason, however, [270] was that she had become unfit to fulfill the duties of a wife. Since Mbɔ́yɔ́ did not fall ill in his home, he held her family responsible.

593x 3. Abandonment of the home shared by the couple

586x In the case of serious failings on the part of a husband, a woman's usual weapon is to leave their common home and return to her father's house. If the reason for her flight is serious, it is up to the husband to go and bring her back. She will not return on her own initiative. If he refuses to make the first step, he will be accused as much by public opinion as by his parents-in-law of not loving his wife, and a rupture will become inevitable. It is therefore his duty to go to his wife's parents. They will ask him to explain the situation. The wife, too, will say what she thinks. The parents will settle their difference. Whether or not the ndonga is present will depend on the

1. It was a sort of illness with nervous symptoms. From a scientific viewpoint, it is more than likely that she had this illness before her arrival at the mission, although it was only manifested there. But the natives do not make this distinction, so it is not relevant to our topic.

837 586 When a wife of a polygynist had illicit relations with another man of the same village, this was called Bonsamba. When she had such relations with a man of another village, this was called Isoke. As we have observed, the ordinary wives of the harem often had such relations. When the woman eloped with her bonsamba or isoke, or with whomever it was, she was pursued by her husband or owner, who tried to get her back. If the wife refused, negotiations over the bride price began.

If an agreement was reached or if a pledge was given as guarantee for the payment, the first bond was considered broken, and the woman was considered bound to this second man, even though he had been her bonsamba or isoke.

It might also happen that the first husband was so jealous that he did not want to make any agreement; then he attempted to kill either the guilty wife or her second husband. If the woman became 593 ill at the home of her husband, he went to tell her family and had to 758 give a security to the family.

583 Often the family came to get the wife, in order to be able to care for her better. If, in such a case, the wife [538] died at the home of her family, there were no further difficulties about the bride price, according to their customs. If, however, the bride price had still not been completely paid, the family asked their son-in-law to pay the remainder.

583 178 In recent times, now that the heathen customs have been undermined by the European occupation, we see that the husbands whose wives have gone to their family when sick and have died there, demand the return of the bride price from the family, but this is completely contrary to their old customs. In one case the husband could demand the return of the bride price, namely, if the wife had left while healthy to go to her family and had died there.

562 439 Buying or Trading of Women. The woman was also in many cases an acknowledged object of trade. The great village chiefs, among others Ibuka and Yoma, of whom we shall speak further, carried on a sort of woman trade. With European articles and also native currency, they went to other districts of the Equator [Province] to buy women with them, just like someone who goes to market, even though no public markets where women were sold actually existed.

Yaelima

764 At the village of Tik-ke-Tik in Yaelima territory, we witnessed a similar scene following the death of a young man.

[742] At nightfall his body was wrapped in mats or rattan splints, solidly plaited, tied up, and completely sealed. At dawn the mortuary bundle, attached to a strong branch, was lifted by two men. Instead of taking the village lane, they carried the corpse behind the hut and then through the bush. A few men walking Indian file made up the procession, at the end of which was the mother of the deceased in mourning costume. The path they followed was quite irregular. Largely avoiding the trodden paths, the bearers often retraced their steps and took almost two hours to reach the cemetery, four kilometers from the village.

short to permit a thorough study of their religious life and its attendant customs.

We ascertained that the native, as a rule, acknowledges the existence of a higher spirit. During my stay in the village of Kapanda, Banfumungu tribe, I had the opportunity to question a chief on the subject. M I 776

"Who causes the sun and the moon to rise? Who gave you the fish of the river and the animals of the plain, Matali?"

The chief looked at me for an instant, dumbfounded, and then replied, "Nzambi ve Mundele?" "Was it not Nzambi, White man?"

of seniority (she is then called bosɔ́lɔ́ -- see Chapter III, Article III). The giving of a widow who is in the position described is preferably avoided.

626 Illicit relations between a son and his father's wife are judged with especially great severity if the young man's own mother is still alive. He is reproached for his behavior in terms which are clear and crude: Oôy'ôsanganya mbindo ǐkɛ́ la mbindo y'ǐsâ nyangó, "you unite your stains (impurities) with those of your father and [302] mother"; Outɛ ńk'eki wɛ̌ wǐmáńáká, "you are returning from whence you came." To these expressions is often added ówa lɔ́í ɛ́í olekí liloka, "you will die because of your too great wickedness." To the ●[761] Nkundó this last statement is a kind of curse, and if it is repeated by several persons it will not fail to have its effect. Or, to speak as our people do, if everyone greatly wails over and against this man, he will really die. (1)

1. This attitude of the Nkundó may be one of the reasons why widows are assigned not to the son of the deceased, but to his brother.

If the son in question is not married, especially if he has already reached a relatively advanced age, and if he approaches the wives of his polygamous father, the matter is considered less serious. The latter cannot be too angry, especially when only isolated instances are involved; for other relatives will allow their affection for this young man to speak, since they are aware of his passion and therefore understand his temptations and follies. They would intervene to pacify the father and urge him to prevent the repetition of such occurrences by obtaining a wife for his son. In exceptional cases the family council may even judge the father to be in the wrong because of his harshness toward his son and may allow the latter to take his father's wife away from him (never, however, the first wife, the favorite, or the bolímbu); such was the case we described in

Chapter IX

Death

Since the subject of our study is only Nkundó marriage, we 152 will examine matters relating to death only from this limited stand-595 point. As to the general aspects of the question, the reader will ● 761 find them in our article on the funeral customs of the Nkundó, about to be published in Anthropos.

Article I. Sorrow and Mourning

In the study cited above, a word was said concerning the varying degrees of intensity that may be reached in the sorrow caused by the death of a cherished being.

Of course the suffering does not always exclude a mixture of egoistic elements, such as regret of the financial loss involved in the death of a wife and the obligation of continence and various other prohibitions of widowhood. This is rather natural and does not merit discussion. On the other hand, it would be unjust and contrary to the truth to attribute all the sadness to those base feelings. In general, this sorrow must also be taken as evidence of a true love which is often its primary cause. Exceptions do occur, however, for instance in the case of an old woman who has been inherited by a polygamist.

When we compare the various manifestations of sorrow at the death of a spouse with those observed at the death of a relative, we note certain practices specific to the former case. One might say that at the death of a spouse, the signs of sorrow reach a culminating point [418], as if native law wished to underline the predominance of the relationship created by marriage over the bonds of kinship and thus manifest its agreement with divine law.

Nevertheless it is clear that practice does not always correspond to theory, here any more than elsewhere. We should not be astonished in not finding among the natives a perfect and ideal love 152 ● 761 593 free of all egoism. When even among peoples universally recognized as superior, self-pity during the pain felt on the death of someone beloved is neither rare nor reprehensible, can we be shocked that our natives experience similar regrets? Do we condemn a young widow who, although sincerely and intensely regretting the husband she loved tenderly and whom death has just removed from her affection, thinks at the same time of the unhappy situation in which she and her small children find themselves as a result? And is not the reasonable hope of finding someone who will take care of her and the orphans an effective and legitimate consolation that will help her to endure the trial?

All things considered, it is therefore not at all surprising that our Blacks react that way. And it is quite natural that, in practice, they should suffer more from the death of a father and especially a mother or a child than from the loss of a husband or wife. The situation here is entirely different from that in Europe. And the system of polygamy, with all its consequences, is not exactly discouraging to egoism and favorable to an ascension toward the ideal of a more sublime love.

Therefore we should not be surprised that a wife at the death of her husband laments: ngóy'ǒm ǒkámá óye! ("Mother, my husband, ah!"); but at the death of a child or a mother or father she wails: ngóya ŋǒlélengana óye! ("Mother, I am bereft, ah!"), thus expressing a more intense sorrow. For a father or a mother cannot be replaced, but she will always find someone who will want to marry her. As to a child, between it and its parents there is more of a life in common [419] than between spouses under the system of polygamy. More marks of tenderness are also exchanged between mother and child than between native couples.

764 152 593 Immediately after his wife's death, a husband is surrounded by all the women of the village who come and mistreat him. They vie with each other in smearing him with charcoal smut, soil, and mud, and in rubbing him with the plant called limánsá, which causes a stinging rash comparable to that caused by nettles in Europe. There are no relatives among the women who engage in this

98 recourse to the assistance of a third party who -- for remuneration, 578 of course -- undertook to carry out his project. This task was usually
[679] confided to Batswa, who did not disdain this type of work, which was quite suited to their taste.

The fact that the law gives the husband the right to punish his wife [277] for the type of oratory under discussion meant that a wife had to exercise some discretion in her choice of expressions. Fearing violent reactions, she often spoke the more serious insults softly.

M
Since the European penetration women are more daring. For 178 their husbands fear European justice, which follows principles entirely 578 different from their ancestral law. Thus they complain bitterly of 593 the insolence of their wives: "We have become slaves; the women 562 are now all-powerful. They may do as they please, for we can no longer do anything to them." But as soon as native courts are sufficiently educated and are freed from what an eminent colonial jurist has called "the jurisdiction of palavers" (1), they will no doubt effect a salutary change in this situation.

M
The emancipation of women is one of the factors that have 562 increased the frequency of divorce. For a man who cannot avenge 586 continuous outrages remains dominated by shame, and the presence of the one who is the cause of it must become unbearable in the long run; whence the indifference, antipathy, hate, and the inevitable results of that permanent confusion in the household.

M
Men among whom the feeling of modesty was highly developed 593 hanged themselves out of shame instead of attacking the guilty wife.
● 762 That is what many natives have maintained in talking with me.
577 Nevertheless, I have no knowledge of a present-day example. When [683] this happened, the wife's family no longer took action against their daughter. Nor were they obliged to pay an indemnity, although their child had brought about the death. They simply had to acquit

(1) See A. Sohier, Bulletin des Séances de l'Institut Royal Colonial Belge, Vol. 6, 1935, 1, p. 60 and passim.

593x themselves of the usual and ordinary obligations incumbent upon 577 them on the death of a son-in-law. Should this be taken as a kind ●762 of implied condemnation of suicide? [278]

593^ The wisdom of the elders recommends to youth that they not let anger lead them to brutal acts even where, legally, it is 578 permissible to use force. They do not act in such a way through a 587 policy of adaptation to the present regime. 626 Even before the arrival of the white men, they gave lessons in calm and self-mastery. For serious blows, wounds, and especially homicide could have deplorable consequences legally and even politically (war). They preferred recourse to punishments, such as abstention from food and the refusal of debitum conjugale, which although less violent are not without efficacity. In that way they were also spared the vexation of in-laws, whose pity would be aroused by the wounds and bodily suffering of their child or sister.

578 593x One thing that deserves blows or a good whipping because it is considered a serious failure in the fulfillment of the duties of married life is indifference and negligence in housework. A husband may safely deal forcefully with the situation, although he must first inform the qualified authorities. The following are some examples of such faults: the wife does not give the necessary attention to the kitchen, her children, the cleaning of the hut and court; she neglects her crops, does not go fishing, makes no attempt to obtain salt, etc.; in short, she does not give the required time and care to the tasks incumbent upon her. She herself, her children, and her house remain disgustingly filthy, her fields and banana groves are invaded by weeds and her pantry is devoid of utensils and food, while she wastes her time doing nothing or rather spends it running about the village, going to one woman's house, chatting with another, spending the better part of her day gossiping. The Nkundó does not put up with this sort of behavior, and no one can reproach him. Even other men and the woman's companions condemn [279] such conduct. Often the woman is ridiculed, and on occasion she may [[illegible]] hear unflattering comments such as bŏmot'ŏw'asolŏ, efufa gtɛ́ngamaka, "a gossip, her cloth is to the side," that is, the interminable chatting

769 584 She can also remain in her fiancé's family and there be taken in marriage by one of his kinsmen. If everything favors the continuation of the union, the new husband-to-be pays the bride price, but he need not repeat the engagement payments, which retain their validity. If he belongs to a distant branch of the family, however, the kin of the deceased will not want to give up their property, and the new fiancé himself will have to acquit himself of all the bride-price obligations, beginning with the ikulá.

[763] Sometimes the dying man, in making his last requests, enjoins his family to maintain the alliance. In that case one of his kinsman must marry the woman. If later on a breakup becomes inevitable, the spouses separate. For that matter, if the woman lacks the inclination to remarry in her fiancé's kin group, she will not be forced to do so.

This practice is based on the stipulation of Nkundó law that engaged persons have all the duties and privileges of married couples.

[587] There is nothing among the Nkundó that resembles a levirate. Even in the case we cited of a last will, the obligation derives solely from the sacred nature of that will. [448]

Article IX

The Death of the Woman Before the Payment of the Bride Price

Two situations must be distinguished: 1) The woman dies during the engagement; 2) she dies before the bosongo.

1. Before the walo

As has already been said, engaged persons enjoy all the duties and privileges of a married couple. If the girl dies the fiancé must fulfill all obligations toward the deceased and her family (transporting the corpse, sacrifices, nkumjí). But his obligations do not end there.

Through the payment of the ndanga (and, in practice, already through the ikulá) he is considered responsible for any accident that might befall his fiancée in his home; and he has assumed the 843 837 This law requiring a most strict fidelity lasts until the end of the bokeka for the husband, but until the weaning of the child for the wife. It is especially strict for the period of seclusion (see below, Article III, 3).

The violation of the essential stipulation of this interdict (-fénda bokeka) results either in the death of the woman during pregnancy and especially during seclusion or in the death of the child later on. [477]

A. If the woman dies during this period, the suspicion is placed a priori on her husband. The Nkundó say abfénda wǎlí, "he has transgressed against his wife." Unless he can prove his innocence through public actions, the judgment of a magician, or autopsy[sic].

If the woman has been the victim of a seducer, he is held responsible and must pay a large indemnity equivalent to the bride price that was paid for the deceased. If no other man is involved, the affair has no consequences.

843 163 754 845 853 In the past the combined autopsy and Caesarian section was always performed. It had a dual purpose: to remove the child and to examine the mother. If the operation revealed the existence of a "stomach" (likundó), the deceased was of a noxious (liloka) nature or constitution and therefore caused the death of her child. If the child remained alive, it proved that he was of a magically superior nature and was able to resist the natural evil spells of his mother, which thus turned against their unwitting author. (1)

1. The Nkundó believe that only animals have a "stomach" (likundó). If a human being has one, that is, if his viscera are large, curved, in compartments, in a word, abnormal, that person is an evildoer. He commits evil acts voluntarily or, most frequently, unknowingly. Some men with a likundó can be recognized by the fact that they eat their nails, hair, etc. The Nkundó must certainly have observed relationships between this habit and a deformity of the stomach.

must go to the monkoko for their fight, this being the location of the houses belong- 624
ing to the sons of the nkumu. The penalty for breaking this law is a fine, and if no 689 fine were forthcoming hanging used to be the alternative. If a quarrel arises elsewhere and one party wishes to avoid fighting, he may retire to the mongo and thus be safe. No trees in the mongo may be climbed. There are, however, privileged classes exempt from all such rules, and these embrace a good many people. Thus, the mother [845] of twins, twins, Batwa, mamni, and all members of the molembe and ekopo are exempt from the laws of the mongo. If any of these commit acts which are illegal for those [672] coming under the law, they are not held guilty, but their actions will not be condoned; [626]
they will be considered breaches of good conduct, and will be dealt with informally;
the parties will be quietly reprimanded, and adjured to observe the proprieties of conduct. For outsiders breaking the laws of the mongo, what corresponds to a warrant is necessary. It is necessary to catch the culprit in the act and hale him before the [696]
nkumu. The nkumu himself cannot do this, nor can any of the ekopo; it must be done by one of the molembe, and so if the nkumu sees someone infringing the law he will try to get one of the molembe on the spot in a hurry in order to catch the offender.

In war,[1] it is the molemi e ale who is most active in preparations, but the nkumu 624 will accompany his party to battle, keeping well in the rear, and surrounded by good fighters. He does not wear his mantolo but puts on the informal hat. If an nkumu were 726 captured, he would never be tortured or killed as were other prisoners, unless he specifically sought such a fate. He could be ransomed, and his captors would [727] beseech him to let his people ransom him, but in many cases an nkumu would invite death rather than endure the shame of being yielded up as a prisoner of war.

An nkumu is always addressed by a double clap of the hands, and will not reply to 624 anyone rude enough to speak to him first. In answer to the clap he replies with a word of wisdom expressed in an aphorism or proverb. Such a reply, however, is 576 common to all elders, who have their favourite aphorisms ready for any who pay them special honour. Anything the nkumu says must be answered not by the customary ale boike (even so) which ordinary people use, but with the special word, bingo, which is reserved exclusively for replying to an nkumu, and means the same thing.

When the hour of death approaches, an nkumu is attended by his Batwa. It is a 624 rule that he must not die a natural death, and near the end, while he is still conscious 763
and can still speak, all 'free men' clear out and leave the Batwa pygmies to their task of tying the nkumu very tightly with the fibrous yam vines known as monkiki. [563]
Often this secure lashing in the sitting posture, known as ilima, is sufficient to finish
the nkumu off, but sometimes the work is expedited by twisting his neck.[2] Then it is announced that he is dead, ankiba, this being in contradistinction to the customary phrase ankama awiko used of the death of ordinary people. While the latter means

[1] Owing to the lack of tribal cohesion, warfare was not on any considerable scale. The method of warfare consisted in sending groups of young men to fight first, the elders only joining in when one side began to get the worst of the fray. Victors and vanquished in such fights were designated 'husband' and 'wife' respectively, and members of the one group were free to come and go in the villages of the other, and even to help themselves to food. In future wars 'husband' and 'wife' were supposed to combine against their common foes.

[2] Besides nkumu, elderly and rich men, fathers and mothers of twins, and twins are buried in the ilima or sitting posture, in contradistinction to the normal position which is the recumbent one used for ordinary people and slaves. [769]

763 literally that the deceased has hanged the heart, the former is used of a tree which leans over and falls from a great cut at its base.

624 On the announcement of the death, an expert drummer drums out the news. There will be at least four drums of the type known as lokuku, and a nkuge.[1] The four 766 drums are called by the names, Epanda, having the 'biggest voice', that is a deep 594 bass note, Mongoye, having a higher note, Mongonda, a high pitched note, and Monkoto, 202 having a very high penetrating note. To these four drums others are added; if the nkumu himself did not possess sufficient, they would be borrowed from the surrounding villages, and their notes matched with those of the first three drums, being beaten with them in their turn. Monkoto is beaten simultaneously with Epanda, giving a rhythmic tattoo. When the news of the death has been sent out on Epanda, the funeral drumming commences, as follows:

Mongonda.	Botianganu w'Amba lokolo,
Mongoye.	Ntsala ikita, otongonoko,
Epanda.	Tokund' ilenge molom' o nyama, Ombolekeke mmenge, Lobanga lolenda ntondo, Bikeku bilenda lobola.
Nkuge.	Tobilake nkoi nkonge, Tobilake nkoi nkonge, &c.

The English and the interpretation are as follows:

Mongonda. A scattering of Amba, the snail. (The mother of twins, always called Amba, here gives her name to the snail because of her prolific progeny, which, upon being introduced to the world, scatter, while the mother dies. So the death of the nkumu will cause a scattering of his many wives and children.)

Mongoye. Feathers fall; pick them up. (That is to say, for your arrow shafts, for if you don't, and come back later, the wind will have scattered them and you won't find them. So while the nkumu was alive it was the time for his children to learn his teachings so that when palavers came after his death they would be well acquainted with his wisdom and know how to settle them.)

Epanda. We are burying the ilenge, husband of animals, You have just eaten mmenge, The chin looks up at the ridge pole, The jaw bones look up at the sky. [825] (The ilenge is an animal much prized for its fat meat; the nkumu always gets his share when it is killed, and the skin is made into carrying straps for infants, and into belts. [568] Batwa are prohibited the use of it for any purpose. It is therefore fitting to liken the nkumu to the ilenge. Mmenge (sing. lobenge) is the equivalent of a snack. When a woman brings her cassava from the swamp where it has been soaking for several [264] days, her husband may be too hungry to wait the long hours required to cook it, so to appease his hunger his wife takes a piece or two of the unprepared root, splits [252] it in two, places salt between, wraps it in a lokombe leaf and roasts it in the hot ashes, where it is quickly cooked. So the nkumu just had time to eat a few mmenge; he didn't wait for the big cooking; his life was suddenly cut off.)

Nkuge. Don't pull out the leopard's eyelashes. (That is, while he is alive; now he is dead one can disregard his power.)

[1] A lokuku is a slit gong made from a hollowed log. Its two notes are produced by striking the two lips of the slit. A nkuge is a hollowed log, open at one end, across which is stretched a vellum hide.

Yaelima

764 At the village of Tik-ke-Tik in Yaelima territory, we witnessed a similar scene following the death of a young man.

At nightfall his body was wrapped in mats or rattan splints, solidly plaited, tied up, and completely sealed. At dawn the [482] mortuary bundle, attached to a strong branch, was lifted by two men. Instead of taking the village lane, they carried the corpse behind the hut and then through the bush. A few men walking Indian file made up the procession, at the end of which was the mother of the deceased in mourning costume. The path they followed was quite irregular. Largely avoiding the trodden paths, the bearers often retraced their steps and took almost two hours to reach the cemetery, four kilometers from the village.

We ascertained that the native, as a rule, acknowledges the existence of a higher spirit. During my stay in the village of Kapanda, Banfumungu tribe, I had the opportunity to question a chief on the subject.

"Who causes the sun and the moon to rise? Who gave you the fish of the river and the animals of the plain, Matali?"

The chief looked at me for an instant, dumbfounded, and then replied, "Nzambi ve Mundele?" "Was it not Nzambi, White man?"

"Why, then, do you not call upon Nzambi to protect your crops, favor your fishing, and grant you success in hunting, Matali?" [20]

Night and day, plaintive and monotonous chants commemorate the high deeds of the deceased, his glory, his qualities, his wealth, his power, his whole life. The burial is carried out with great pomp and ends with a general consumption of the whole supply of palm wine, malafu, and masanga [Ed., sugar-cane beer]. T 764 T [273]

The cemeteries are located outside the village. The relatives lay out a few broken utensils on the grave. If the deceased was a hunter of repute, they plant a long staff upon the grave, and the skull of some animal killed by the dead man is attached at the top of it. [27]

During my stay in the territory of the Baboma-Banfumu of Bokala, I was struck by the presence of a tiny hut in the center of Chief Pokei's village. It was about 60 centimeters high, 30 centimeters wide, and 50 centimeters long. I thought at first S 766 845 761

Article II. Property

593x 614 [764] Through marriage, a woman does not become a member of her husband's clan. If for example she is born into the Bofétola clan, she remains all her life bosí Bofétola, "member of the Bofétola clan," and her corpse has to be buried in her native soil. In case of divorce and remarriage, the new husband does not refund the bride price to the former one; he pays the woman's parents, and they reimburse the forsaken husband.

593x 421 All the wife's activity, however, is directed toward the good of her husband and his family, and this is so from the time of the ikulá payment. Her parents have no further rights over their daughter. All the fruits of her labor are her husband's property.

If she finds objects that have no owner, such as, for example, elephant tusks or buried copper rings of which no one claims ownership, they do not belong to her nor to her family, but exclusively to her husband. If he shares with his parents-in-law, he does so out of affection and respect for them. He has no legal obligation to do so, but propriety and cordial relations impose a certain duty on him.

Profits from the sale of the products of her industry (such as foods for market, mats, salt, pots, baskets) belong not to her but to her husband.

Even whatever she acquires during a visit to her parents, everything she finds while she is with her family, the fish she catches, the caterpillars she gathers in the forest there, all that belong exclusively to her husband.

It sometimes happens that a woman infringes on the husband's rights in this respect. If he is kind he will generally let her do as she [577] pleases. Severity on his part would be attributed to a lack of affection toward his wife or a lack of delicacy toward his parents-in-law, and he would even be criticized for being stingy (never unjust!), a more serious criticism than the others from the Nkundó point of view. [263] Dishonest conduct on the part of a wife, however, may give rise to incidents, and even to serious ones. That is what happened in the historic case of Efoloko of Ikengya (Bongíli), who was married to [578] Mpokú of Imomo. She had gone fishing at home and had given all her fish

593x 574 ótswáká liála otswâk'olá, báfókolaka mbók'ɛ̌y'olá la ngom'a nkolé, "If you are married go back to your parents, or you will be taught the way with drums and gongs," that is, "when you are dead." (2)

●[164] [614] [534] 2. A woman is buried in her own native clan. Her corpse is transported there to the accompaniment of drums and horns. The lokolé gong announces her death.

593x 602 A married woman may not evade the duty of helping her relatives under special circumstances (pregnancy, illness, serious accidents, death). This obligation [285] is not limited to her mother and father, but extends to all her relatives; the closer the degree of kinship, the stricter the obligation.

Besides, love of family is sufficiently developed so that there is no danger of the woman forgetting herself too much in this realm. [626] And a husband who would like to prevent her from fulfilling these elementary duties would be much criticized by all and should expect a dissolution of the marriage.

593x 574 342 556 It was said above that a husband builds a hut for his wife. His relatives often assist him in this task. But it also happened -- in the past, for colonization has removed the possibility of it -- that the woman's father wanted to build his daughter's house himself or at least to make the pavement out of clay brought from her native land. This act was a demonstration of wealth and politico-social importance as well as proof of fatherly affection. The husband, for his part, was honored to have married the daughter of such an important man and loved her all the more. Thus a number of women say that "they only cooked on ancestral soil." This soil was brought in baskets across distances up to 50 kilometers by Batswa and by men of the woman's clan or village. Her father could do it because of his great influence and regal rewards (bokóndo, verb kónda) were distributed during a feast (nteke) given for the workers and their relatives after the task was completed. This was done for Bompeli, daughter of Bokombe of Litáli (Bombwanja) married to Bonyeme w'enyuka of the Baséká Mbangó (Bonkoso); for Beluka, daughter of 152 free of all egoism. When even among peoples universally recog-761 nized as superior, self-pity during the pain felt on the death of 593 x someone beloved is neither rare nor reprehensible, can we be shocked that our natives experience similar regrets? Do we condemn a young widow who, although sincerely and intensely regretting the husband she loved tenderly and whom death has just removed from her affection, thinks at the same time of the unhappy situation in which she and her small children find themselves as a result? And is not the reasonable hope of finding someone who will take care of her and the orphans an effective and legitimate consolation that will help her to endure the trial?

All things considered, it is therefore not at all surprising that our Blacks react that way. And it is quite natural that, in practice, they should suffer more from the death of a father and especially a mother or a child than from the loss of a husband or wife. The situation here is entirely different from that in Europe. And the system of polygamy, with all its consequences, is not exactly discouraging to egoism and favorable to an ascension toward the ideal of a more sublime love.

Therefore we should not be surprised that a wife at the death of her husband laments: ngóy'ɔ́m 'ɔ̌kámí óye! ("Mother, my husband, ah!"); but at the death of a child or a mother or father she wails: ngóya njɔ̂lélengana óye! ("Mother, I am bereft, ah!"), thus expressing a more intense sorrow. For a father or a mother cannot be replaced, but she will always find someone who will want to marry her. As to a child, between it and its parents there is more of a life in common [419] than between spouses under the system of polygamy. More marks of tenderness are also exchanged between mother and child than between native couples.

• 764 Immediately after his wife's death, a husband is surrounded by all the women of the village who come and mistreat him. They 152 x vie with each other in smearing him with charcoal smut, soil, and 593 mud, and in rubbing him with the plant called linsánsá, which causes a stinging rash comparable to that caused by nettles in Europe. There are no relatives among the women who engage in this

152 rough behavior, only strangers married to village men (those known 593x as báajâála). This ill treatment is often extended to close relatives of the widower, that is, to those whom the women in ●764 question call bɔ́ome, "potential husbands," never to fathers and higher relatives. (1) The purpose of this practice seems to be to intensify, by physical pain, the sorrow caused by death. In addition, provocatively obscene words, gestures, and movements remind the widower that from then on he must be continent, as described in extenso in the study cited above.

765 Afterwards, relatives dress the widower in a lisɔ́ki, a banana leaf which is torn all over horizontally. For all other mourning garments, as well as for all regulations and prohibitions that apply to all cases, see the detailed study.

The ill treatment described is not inflicted on the widow. It is meted out exclusively to men.

The general rules pertaining to seclusion apply to a widower; in fact they are especially severe for a man. His kinswomen prepare his simple meals. However, if his relations with his father-[587] in-law were excellent, the latter sends a woman [420] to him who will attend to his needs. She often becomes his wife when, after the lifting of mourning, he brings the ibóleóko (Chapter III, Article IV).

During the entire first period of seclusion, he cannot go anywhere, at least ostensibly. If he needs to go out, he must go through the back. If he wants to visit a relative or friend, he must go behind the huts, in the banana grove, even if it is evening. In any case, he may not leave the village. Such was the ancient law, though nowadays it is observed less and less.

Furthermore, he cannot have the slightest contact with any woman who is not a relative. He cannot even shake her hand, greet her out loud, or look at her even in passing.

1. See Chapter V, Article IV, 1, no. 3, and Chapter VI, Article VI.

765 On that occasion the head of the family hands over to the first born of the deceased the bosólό to which he is entitled. As described in Chapter III, Article III, he thus receives one of the widows as his wife. She immediately leaves the group of widows; from then on she is no longer bound by any mourning obligation and goes to live with her new husband. If she loved the deceased very much, however, she asks the heir to leave her alone for a time; and her wishes are always respected.

The seclusion ends in a great feast that closes the period of mourning. It is during this feast that the inheritance, of which the widows also form a part, is divided. We will deal with it in Article V. [424]

Article III. The Burial

● 764 The husband's burial involves no ceremony or special rules differing in any way from those for any other person. However, his kinswomen must "buy the tomb," that is, they must pay a few rings to the women married into the family to obtain permission for the interment. This payment should be compared with those made to obtain dispensations from alimentary prohibitions.

The people buried simultaneously and in the same grave as the body of an influential man are never his widows, but solely his slaves. (1)

1. See Coutumes funeraires (Funeral Customs), Vol. 5, no. 2.

A Nkundό must be buried in the land of his ancestors in the clan cemetery. Since these people operate under a system of exogamy, the corpse of a married woman is naturally transported to the village of her birth in order to be buried there.

Before it is transported the corpse receives the usual care with the accompanying sacrifices. It must be kept in the husband's house for at least one night. And this custom is still observed at present. In the past the corpse remained there for days on end, 764 for it was necessary first to celebrate the farewell feast, and the widower's family had to gather to discuss the matter and collect the valuables needed for the funeral payment (see the article which follows). Only after all that did the young men belonging to the [482] husband's family take the mortal remains upon their shoulders -- wrapped in a mat or enclosed in a coffin, depending on the case.

If possible all the husband's relatives take part in the procession. The pallbearers walk at the head. The men are armed with bows and arrows, knives and sticks, seldom with spears. The women accompany them [425], wailing. The husband and, if necessary, a few relatives carry with them the various objects they will need for the payments. Some men have a lotótsi (an [534] ocarina) (1) or an antelope horn on which they play intermittently. (2)

[201] At the time the corpse is lifted and while passing through villages between their own and their destination, the lokolé is struck with regular and equal blows (-kémya) to announce the arrival of the funeral procession.

The chief personage among those who follow the corpse is 584 not the husband, but the ndonga. He may never be absent at that 764 time. Even if the husband is deceased and the procession is that of a widow who has not remarried, the ndonga must always be in the party. The duty of bringing the corpse of a married woman is above all his.

The ndonga may go ahead of the procession to inform the family of the deceased of her death, and if there is a great distance between the wife's village and the husband's, he may not be able

● 764 [584] to return to join the procession, or may be able to do so only with difficulty.

The act of carrying a corpse to its native clan is not designated by any specific term. The expression is simply tsɔ́ka ilɔ́ka, "to go and return the corpse."

764 431 In one or more places near the entrance to the village, a barrier (bokɔ́ko, lokombɛ́, or loɔ́laka) made of posts and palms is set up. There the relatives of the deceased, armed, wait for the procession of the husband's relatives, who are also armed, and forbid them to continue their march. Before passing, the latter must make a payment. The valuables given are called byɛ̌ko by'ǒkɔ́ko or simply bokɔ́ko (or loɔ́laka). The family of the deceased calls to the procession, "Halt! You will not pass here." The latter reply, "We come to bring [426] you the corpse of your child; we want to break down the barrier. Let us pass; here are [584] the gifts." The ndonga hands over a knife, a brass or copper ring, or some equivalent object (for instance, money, nowadays). Thereupon the members of the deceased's clan move away. The bǎnambɔ́tswá (persons related to both clans) break down the barrier, and the procession passes, headed by the ndonga and the bǎnambɔ́tswá. The husband follows the coffin.

764 579 In the past it was almost always necessary to force a passage through the barrier. The wife's family did not want to open and the husband's family did not want to pay, and so they came to blows. The group bearing the corpse tried to break down the barrier, while their adversaries tried to prevent them from doing so. The arms used in that struggle were chiefly pointed sticks which the members of the two camps threw at each other; more rarely, arrows were used. The specific name for this sort of brawl is ɛkɔ̀bɛ́lá. Certain clans specialize in this sport. Thus between Bofímbo and Lileko, there is a regular battle every time. In such serious cases the barrier is heavily fortified; the posts are thick and hard, and intertwined with thorny creepers (bokau, longolí, wanganjɛ́la, etc.) and thorny shrubs (wɛ̌ngɛ́, etc.). A quantity [125] of venomous biting ants (bafumba, mbɔ́mbá, byɛ̌mbo, etc.) are added. If the brawl becomes serious, the ndonga and the other bǎnambɔ́tswa intervene and impose peace by requiring the husband's clan to pay.

Nevertheless, it may happen that the husband's family, while unable to vanquish their adversaries, persist in spite of everything in their desire not to pay. They run away and return home, abandoning the corpse in the hands of the family of the deceased. But this is a very serious offense. It is therefore considered simply as a breaking of the alliance between the two families. The husband need not bring funeral payments, for they will be refused in any case. Henceforth he can no longer [427] present a bride price to obtain a substitute for the deceased. Furthermore, he loses his rights over his children, whose maternal clan he has disowned, and if the matter is not settled in one way or another, he no longer has the right to the bride prices that will be paid for his daughters. And to add to his troubles, he risks being molested by the spirit of the deceased.

When the husband's party succeeds in opening a passage, the opposing clan hastens to defend the succeeding barrier. In fact, if the procession must pass through several clans or groups related to the wife (her mother's clan, grandfather's clan, grandmother's clan, etc.), each group sets up its own barrier.

If there are no more barriers, the struggle is ended. But in any case the husband must pay the valuables demanded for passing through. When the procession arrives at the village, the question of funeral payments is settled, and these "tolls" are included in the accounting.

In the past a brawl was usually inevitable. And even now they occur more frequently than we would suspect. But the violence has been reduced to a few light wounds. Some clans arrange the matter amicably without resorting to action. But only very seldom do they neglect to put up a barrier. Nevertheless, cases do occur here and there under the pressure of chiefs who favor the penetration of European notions of public peace and tranquility. In these instances the parties involved merely pay regular indemnities at the time of the palaver concerning funeral payments. A great friendship between the two clans involved sometimes favors this more humane type of behavior.

152
[584] When the family of the deceased bars the route to the funeral procession, they are manifesting the anger provoked by the death of one of their members. [428] For they feel anger and resentment, in spite of the fact that the ndonga carries a spear at the head of the procession as a sign that they come as friends, without evil intentions.

This does not mean that the natives attribute the cause of death to the husband and his family. In most cases they are convinced that the latter could not prevent it. Although they express themselves in those terms: lóóomela bǒna (nkǐna, eôto), "you have killed our child (sister, relative)," they do not maintain that the husband's clan has really killed her, but only that she died among them. Under the circumstances do they feign anger to obtain valuables, for example? I do not think so. The Nkundó do not say that they simulate anger; they categorically state that they feel it and that they want to show it in the manner described. We should not be astonished at this since -- as we have noted in the study on the funeral customs of the Nkundó (Les Coutumes funéraires des Nkundó), the emotions of anger and sorrow seem to be intimately related among these peoples.

764 When the funeral procession passes through the last barrier, that which bars the entrance to the village, the husband's clan puts down the body, and it is subsequently lifted up by the family of the deceased, who carry it into the house of the head of the family. They are followed by the ndonga, the bánambótswǎ, the husband, and his relatives. The family of the deceased wail over her. Her kinswomen (bánanyi) show their sorrow-anger by mistreating the clan wives (baǎjǎǎla), by smearing their bodies with mud, dressing them in basáki, and hitting them with stinging plants (bensěnsě). For the deceased is the baǎjǎǎla's "husband," that is, a kinswoman of their husbands. The baǎjǎǎla treat the widower and his relatives in the same way, because "their husband" has died among them.

The corpse is thus deposited in the hut of the head of the family. Each time that kinswomen who are married elsewhere arrive [428] to mourn over the deceased, the baǎjǎǎla forbid them

764 to enter the funeral hut. First they are required to go to the far end of the village, weeping for the deceased, to show their sorrow.

As I have said in the study cited, it often happens that after some time the lamentations slacken and the women keeping watch begin to chat. One day I was present during a quarrel on [578] this subject between the bidnanyí and the baáfáála. The former were reproaching the latter for not weeping any longer: "After all it is your husband," they said. The others replied, "It is your kinswoman; therefore it is up to you to weep. Are your eyes so dry that they no longer contain tears?"

Sometimes the husband and his close relatives do not participate in transferring the body, because they have not yet succeeded in collecting the necessary valuables. Actually it is entirely legitimate for them to stay at home in such a case, in order not to be exposed to endless discussions and the ridicule of the entire region. In other instances the husband's family belongs only to a small clan, and therefore they do not dare to appear in the village of the deceased. They are afraid that they will not be able to defend themselves properly against the ill treatment that would be inflicted upon them by the women married into the clan to which they go. For in fact these women would mistreat them by throwing mud at them or smearing them with it, and by striking their bodies with stinging plants called bandánâ. For they consider that the widower, whom, by extension, they also call their husband, and his close relatives have killed their husbands' kinswoman.

In such cases the corpse is brought by distant relatives of the husband. The nkonga apologizes for the husband to the parents-in-law and tells them that he will come later to settle everything. The clan of the deceased receives the corpse and continues to perform the last tributes to it. If the husband has remained in his own village only out of fear of ill treatment, [430] he often waits only until nightfall and then takes advantage of the darkness to follow his wife's corpse.

The corpse must remain in the head of the family's house for at least one night.

764 Before proceeding with the burial, the two families settle the question of funeral payments, which we are about to examine. A "farewell feast" is given by the clan of the deceased. The interment itself has no special features, so that it will suffice to refer the reader to the study of this subject that has been cited.

766 As we noted in Chapter VII, Article II, a husband can buy the corpse of his favorite. Unless the execution of this intention meets with some obstacle, the corpse is not transported to the favorite's native clan but is buried next to the husband's tomb in his clan cemetery. As a result, all that accompanies the transporting of the corpse is omitted, as is the funeral payment which is compensated for by the purchase of the corpse. The husband or his family only send the wife's relatives the payment that usually accompanies the news of her death.

Article IV. Funeral Payments

764 As we have just said, before the husband proceeds with the transportation of a deceased wife's corpse, he collects the valuables to pay the nkunji. This is the term (derived from the verb kunda, "to bury") that designates the various payments a widower is required to make to the clan of the deceased.

First of all, as soon as the death is known, the ndonga goes to the parents of the deceased and brings them the nsango (news), which consists of a copper ring or a knife. He presents them with these, saying: "Know that your daughter so-and-so has just died."

At every barrier the procession must cross to reach the village of the deceased, the husband must make payment of some object [431] (usually a knife or a ring) in order to obtain free passage. [584] The ndonga always serves as intermediary. These payments are called byɛ̂kɔ by'okâko or simply bokâko, loâlaka (barrier), or, among the Bombwanja, ifakâ yâ ekâlaki, "knife for felling (the barrier)."

The ndonga walks at the head of the funeral procession; he (or another bonambótswâ who takes his place) carries a spear

764 to which a piece of raffia cloth is tied. When the procession has crossed the last barrier, the official witness goes ahead and plants the spear in the roof of the head of the family's hut. Hence the name applied specifically to this spear: itúwansambá (from túwa, "to pierce," and nsambá "roof"). The spear signifies that the widower's family is not coming with evil intentions, but that they are moved by feelings of the greatest friendship -- wɛ̂ka te tɔ́fɔ́yé l'etumba; toɔ̂yá ndé ólotsíhela iláká y'ɔ̌na.

The piece of cloth is a sign of respect for the mother of the deceased, in memory of the pain she suffered in giving birth to her daughter and the care she exercised in her upbringing, and as consolation for the terrible blow that has come to her in the death of her child. She will wear this cloth after the end of mourning. If the mother has died before her daughter, this cloth goes to one of the mother's sisters, aunts, or other relatives, who is in some sense her substitute. It is therefore a payment to the mother's clan.

The spear and the cloth are usually designated by the common name likɔngɔ́ l'etóo, "spear and cloth." A knife, particularly an ingóndá, can be substituted for the cloth, but the name etóo is retained. Nowadays the cloth is no longer given, but a knife which is given the name etóo is always substituted for it. (1) Nevertheless, in memory of [432] the ancient custom, a piece of European cloth is often attached to the end of the spear.

When the corpse has been deposited in the head of the family's hut, the two clans greet each other in the usual fashion. The women continue to weep for some time. The husband's clan [262] go and sit at a little distance. Then the relatives of the deceased [431] instruct their wives to collect the presents to give the widower.

[286] 1. The reason for this substitution is, first of all, the greater value of the knife and, second, the near impossibility of obtaining raffia cloth (see Introduction).

764 These consist of various foods: manioc, bananas, smoked meat
431 or fish, caterpillars, salt, hens, etc., one or several dogs [262] (bompángá) that are alive (mbwá éâ nkunja, "dog with hair") or their value in specie (2 rings or 1 ring and an equivalent knife, which for this purpose is called mbwá éâ baúmbá or éâ bakonga), as well as a knife for killing and cutting up animals called loólola.
The biúnanyi and the baájâála each brings his part. Note that this gift never includes vegetables (bimukɛ́lá).

When everything is collected and considered adequate, the 764 ndonga is called, together with the deceased's own sons, so that 584 they can thus give their opinion and later have a good basis for testimony. As remuneration for his services, the ndonga receives a payment (nyongo) of a bokósa fish or a botómba rat, as well as a bunch of bananas (for which a ring is sometimes substituted). With reference to this subject I should like to recount an interesting part of the negotiations at which I was present one day. The ndonga expressed his dissatisfaction with the fact that he was given only a single bokósa. "It is so little," he said, "in comparison with all the trouble I had to take. I had to settle the matter of the bride price; I had to reconcile man and wife when they quarreled; I had to intervene many times; I always had to run between the two clans; for many years I wore myself out without ever having any rest. And for all that trouble I get such small recompense." I was asked my opinion. I could only express approval of the ndonga's view. One of the relatives [433] of the deceased also considered him to be right: "He was always obliged to come and go between the two families; his voice has become hoarse from his endless interventions in palavers and quarrels; he well deserves that another bokósa be added." Everyone sided with our opinion, and the ndonga was satisfied.

After receiving his present, the ndonga detaches himself from the group. Together with the other banambótswá and any intelligent strangers who may be present and might be able to give an opinion to settle an incidental argument, he sits down between the two opposing clans, a slight distance from each.

764 584 All the payments must pass through the ndonga. He is the one who transmits the desired objects from one group to the other. He intervenes in the disputes that arise in order to settle them and re-establish peace. He explains the various points of view, elucidates some consideration whose significance the other group does not seem to fully comprehend, etc.

As has already been said many times, there can be several ndonga. Legally all of them can intervene personally or through their officially recognized representatives. Thus, several months ago (1933) at Bonjoku, Baémbe, wife of Ikomo of Besombó, was present at a nkunjí discussion. No one paid any attention to her. At one point she threw herself into the discussion by reprimanding the chief ndonga and the families involved, asking them on what basis they were excluding her from this affair. Did not her husband have the right to intervene? Was he not also a ndonga? Since he had gone fishing in the Jwalé, it was impossible for him to come. She could therefore legitimately substitute for him. Then why was [576] she being left out? She was quickly pacified, and the persons involved admitted that she was right and apologized for their forgetfulness and negligence.

764 584 431 The wives of the deceased's clan place the gifts of food at the ndonga's feet. The bokéné (the youngest) of the clan goes and explains to him what they are and for whom [434] the gifts are intended. (1) One portion goes to the bakalé of the deceased, that is, the baśjáála of the husband's clan; another portion goes to the baóme (the husbands), that is, to the widower and his family; a third part is set aside for kinswomen of the deceased who have come from villages into which they are married in order to be present at the funeral.

764 The clan of the deceased first asks the other clan "for news" (ßola sango). The latter reply that one of their members had

1. In the Nkundó hierarchy it is always the youngest who is charged with the execution of all such small tasks, at the behest of the head of the family.

764 married the daughter of the first clan, and she had lived happily with her husband, performed conjugal services for him, and had begotten children for him. Subsequently she fell ill, as they were informed at the time, and now God has taken her away and they have come to bring the corpse back to them. The wife's clan replies: "That is understood, but before we continue to ask each other for news, do accept the present (lionja) which we offer you." Thereupon the ndonga enumerates all that has been collected and passes it to the widower.

The foods thus given are a friendly welcoming gift, therefore they are not counted as a payment nor, furthermore, as part of the nkomí. Only the domestic animals are considered such. They can be eaten on the spot or kept alive. Since the prepared food is a present, it must be eaten on the spot. Theoretically, none of it may be taken home. If it is taken home for some reason or other, however, it is still forbidden to allow anyone to eat of it who was not present at the funeral gathering. As for the raw food, the recipients are free to carry it away if some is left over. 764 431

Disputes may arise on the subject of the dog -- such as one I witnessed one day. The presents offered included the equivalent of the value of a dog in rings rather than a living dog. [435] The head of the widower's family demanded a dog in flesh and blood. The reason he gave was that many of his bánanyí had come to the funeral and, as an expression of his thanks for their condolences, he wanted to give them a dog. As he would not yield, the wife's family had to replace the two rings with the animal demanded. 764 578

Then the ndonga explains to the family of the deceased that he has already brought the nsango, the lilongâ, and the etóo. Nowadays it happens that the spear and the cloth are not given until this time, especially if the families refrain from erecting barriers and fighting. In such cases the payments of passage are made at the same time. If the two settlements are very near each other, the people are even beginning to omit the sending of the nsango; a bosambótswâ goes and confirms the news of the death, which is already expected and which the lokolé will just have announced.

● 764 Then the members of the wife's family, one by one, demand various payments. Every request arouses discussion, for it is fashionable to prolong these palavers. One side and then the other examines the pros and cons. The widower's family acts as if they needed a little urging, for if they did not, the ceremony would no longer resemble a palaver (which it really is) but would seem like a simple payment of no importance.

When the wife's family has enumerated the presents of food that have been offered and accepted and the payments that have already been made, they begin to ask that the other nkunjí valuables be brought. The widower's clan explain their point of view, and a member of the wife's clan immediately begins to beat the gong (lokolé), which is nearby. It is no longer possible to understand a word of what the husband's spokesman is saying. Full of fortitude and an African's patience, the latter continues his discourse. But finally he realizes that he has to stop. He therefore asks that the lokolé be silenced. Naturally, he has no success. The wife's clan dryly replies: "If you want us to stop, bring us a ring." [436] Thus the husband is forced to pay, and when he does the noise of the lokolé stops at once, and the discussion can continue. For this reason that first payment is called lokolé. (1)

1. The pressure exercised to obtain it is called isesenganya yá lokolé. It should be compared with the identical practice at the time of the payment of the bride price (Chapter II, Article V, 3).

Then a young and vigorous relative of the deceased leaves his group. He acts angry, strikes his hands, and defies the widower's clan: "Send one of your men to fight me, for I am furious that you have allowed my kinswoman to die of starvation." He is answered with many protestations: "We are friends; we have no hostile feelings. It is not our fault that our wife is dead." The first speaker repeats his statement and his challenge, and continues to reproach them with the death until he is given a ring called bonkɔ́ta, meaning "starvation."

● 264 Another young member of the clan of the deceased seats himself midway between the two groups. An etáka (a wooden fork) is placed on his neck, and he says: "This is how you would have treated me if my sister had left you. I ran the risk of having to suffer because of her and you. Compensate me for that." And he does not go away until he has received a ring, which for that reason is called etáka. (2)

> 2. This representation only approximates reality, for the young man would not have been treated thus. The wife herself is the one who would be placed under the etáka. But the young man represents the entire clan as a whole.

Subsequently, various payments each consisting of a ring or a knife are demanded with many imitative and symbolic gestures (in the manner described for the two above). They are:

ikɛmɔ (besɔ́ɔnga l'ikɛmɔ), because of the potions that the deceased prepared for her husband.

bantsingɔ́ -- the packages of food that she cooked in ashes for him. [437]

baónda -- the pieces of palm nut she prepared for him. (These pieces are represented by a few little lumps of earth placed on leaves.)

nkɔ́ngi -- the eyelashes she plucked out for him.

bɔkɛngɔ -- because she cut his hair (-kɛnga).

nsili -- the lice she removed from his head. (Note that this payment can be combined with the preceding one and can then consist of a single kɔnga for both.)

bompilo -- the hot baths she heated for him.

mouka -- baskets of fish, because she went fishing for him.

beóngɔ́ -- the litter on which the corpse was transported.

bekɔmbɔ -- the creepers with which the corpse was tied.

betówa (itówɛ́) -- the banana tree trunks on which the corpse rested. (The corpse, in a mat or coffin, is set on two banana tree trunks placed crosswise.)

●364 bikofo -- the heavy branches upon which lay the bed in which the woman died.

lŏngo -- a hoe (real or replaced by a ring) to dig the grave.

ifaká -- a knife (ditto) to dig the grave.

yĕndá -- an axe (ditto) to cut the roots that would be found at the site of the grave. (1)

[781] 1, One day I saw the iron bar given as yĕndá refused by the wife's family because it was the same one they themselves had given to help the husband pay the nkanga (doctor-sorcerer) for his divination (bolíngó) during the wife's illness.

bombémbé wă nyang'éy'ŏna -- a belt for the mother of the deceased, so that she can wear it during mourning.

bosá w'îlɔ́ká -- the head of the corpse, in honor of those who wail over the deceased while sitting near her head, that is, [438] to say, the very close relatives. This is the last and largest payment, consisting of 3 to 5 rings.

All these payments together comprise the nkunji and, with the exception of the nsango, the likangá l'etóo, and the byŏko by'ŏkáko, they are a kind of beóngo. (1) Not all the beóngo are equally large. Therefore, all of them are not always claimed. The smallest ones -- bakamo, bamtsingá, bafodo, nkóngi, bokongo, mili, bompólo, mpaka -- are often omitted.

Even some of the others may be left out. The matter depends not only on the friendliness of feeling between the two groups, but chiefly on the number of children to which the woman in question has given birth. If the woman was sterile, her family is less demanding. But if the deceased had several children, they do not yield, arguing that their daughter was a source of great profit to her husband's clan.

1. See Chapter II, Article V.

In every case at least a few befógo in addition to the 764 bombémbé and the botsá w'ĩlaká are always claimed. The latter payments can never be omitted. The belt is a payment made exclusively to the mother and by rights it goes to the mother's clan.

The higher the amount of these funeral payments, the more
769 the son-in-law is welcome. The alliance is perfect. Therefore,
606 607 not only will the wife's family reciprocate his fine feelings by adding a few more dogs, but in addition the son-in-law will be well received and successful in his application when, after the period of mourning, he brings the sum of the ibólełko in order to obtain a substitute for the deceased. (2) In addition, if the relations with his in-laws have been excellent, he will easily obtain the substitute in advance, so that she can care for him during the entire mourning period.

---

2. See Chapter III, Article IV.

There are severe sanctions against the omission of the 769 689 funeral payments. [439] Neglecting to send the notification gift alone is enough to set these in motion. They are: the breaking off of the affinal relationship; the loss of the children, since the father's offense is equal to a repudiation; and finally molestation of the culprit by the spirit of the deceased. Thus at Bokátola (Bompela) one can find two boys, Botétsí and Ikembá, the children of Bonyongela of Ilángá and Etáka of Bokátola. They have now been incorporated into their mother's clan, because their father did not send a nsango. On stronger grounds the same is true for the whole nkunjí.

Article V. The Social Position of a Widow

In Chapter III, Articles II and IV, we have already noted 768 587 that in the eyes of the Nkundó, the death of the husband does not dissolve a marriage. The union continues, and even after mourning it is not broken ipso facto. Even to have the woman taken and treated as a wife by another man is not enough to end it. As

567 Everywhere there were also abducted women and female
439 slaves; these were simply sold. Furthermore women were bought 562 and sold with women [as payment]. Also women who were inherited and no longer in the hands of their family were sold by their second, third, or other subsequent husband. In all of these cases, the family no longer came into consideration for the bride price. One would have to stretch the point in order to consider the sums paid in these cases as a bride price, and consequently as a native custom which one must respect.

562 Or one should have to assume that such a native woman re-439 mains a "bride" for her whole lifetime. It will be said that the woman consented to her sale by one man to the other.

Often this was indeed the case, but not always by any means, [858] for children and slaves were also sold. Even the consent of the woman did not prevent it from being a sale; her consent was rather an extra transaction that simplified the sale of a human article of trade. It still remains woman trade.

•764 The Inheritance. Upon the death of a polygynist, the burial ceremony was conducted according to the class and rank of the de-567 ceased. One or two or several [538] slaves were killed and buried with the polygynist in the same grave. Sometimes the arms and legs of those male and female slaves were broken, and then they were buried alive in the same grave with the body.

When these slaves still had family, it might happen that the family members, having learned of the unfortunate lot of their relative, would hasten from faraway districts to buy him or her free if it was not yet too late. Several Negroes have told us of those heartbreaking scenes at which they were present as children. The mourn-[765] ing and the lamenting over the dead lasted from a week to a month.

768 The eldest son immediately succeeded his father in position
428 and immediately took one of the wives of his father.

587 The other sons divided among them the lances and knives of their father.

If the deceased had left no son, or if he was still too young, the oldest brother succeeded the deceased. All of the wives had to remain in their own home, except the wife who was immediately taken by the eldest son. They were obliged to await the day of the distribution. This day was put off for from one to four months.

596 614 latter group. Another factor which reminds us of the wife's continuing membership in her original group is the connection, never completely severed, between the groups related by marriage, illustrated by the practice of gifts and counter-gifts which are all part of the bride price and the dowry. [764] When she dies, the wife is buried in the soil of her group. In addition, the group membership of the wife is transferred to the children, although this does not have the same effects in economic and political terms. [611] Matrilineal descent is important in relation to marriage restrictions, certain avoidance practices which are passed on through the wives, and also certain privileges. Quite a large number of persons has settled permanently in the group of their mother or that of their grandmothers.

The decisive factor that makes the term "large family" unsuitable is the "eternal" character of the A-E groups of the Ekonda. However, the subdivisions of the A-groups which live together in a common homestead (see p. 10) may be regarded as large families in the sense used by Thurnwald, Kirchhoff, and Murdock.

Kinship Group

614 121 In the definitions of the term "family" quoted above, we already learned something about Thurnwald's concept of a kinship group, but there is an additional reference to the technical term "kinship group" ["Sippe"]" (p. 17 f.) (24):

24. Menschliche Gesellschaft, Vol. 4.

"...A kinship group is defined as a clan (q. v.) which is not politically independent. Usually the loss of independence is caused by the distribution of the people of the clan among the various settlements. A kinship group is held together by the conciousness of being descended from the same ancestors and by their common cult of the ancestors. The kinship group is of special importance for the regulation of marriage (q. v.). -- A kinship group may be divided into kinship subgroups (large

303 sides of this square and held in place by a binding of twisted 285 raffia fibers. The sides are then plaited by the simplest method, that is, with the horizontal band weaving in and out of the vertical thongs. As all of these molds always have approximately the M same height and diameter, the ngula cones are both similar in 303 shape and quite constant in weight. The natives use them a great deal as trade goods. In some regions the ngula cone has become [436] a veritable currency, with a standard value from one tribe to M another. [170] A market is organized regularly when steamers [439] call at Mushie, and there the people of the interior exchange the products of their industries for the imported objects brought by the Blacks who work for the Whites. Ngula cones are among the principal items of trade and bring a very high price. In the Oshwe region, the old chief Kua Kua was a great ngula trader. He came by regularly with four or five of his wives, bringing various products from the region between the Kasai and the Lukenie to exchange for the ngula made in the Lokoro region.

D Throughout the central Congo regions, the ngula used for 303 trade has the shape of an elongated truncated cone. Among the Basongo-Meno and farther east, on the other hand, ngula most often is shaped in a ball. The native of these regions often uses it to decorate his pottery and wooden objects and to dye the fibers of cloth used for decoration. He keeps it in cosmetic boxes carved from takula wood and usually decorated with very artistic designs. He also uses it to color his hair. [Ed., a passage from the middle of page 170 to the last paragraph, page 171, is omitted.]

M [171] Aside from ngula, the native sometimes smears his 302 body with a type of white clay quite frequently found in the river 789 beds. [172] The native calls it mpembe. Its use is far from being as widespread as that of ngula, and we believe that the native associates it with magic power rather than ornamentation.
Mpembe is used chiefly by the peoples of the Congo-Kasai, Lake
Leopold II, and Lukenie regions, up to the region of the Batitu.

M We never saw a native smear his whole body with it. The [765] few women in mourning that we saw were covered with a grayish-yellow mud and not with mpembe. We believe, moreover, that the use of mpembe is reserved to the chief, his wives, and perhaps

606 the act of procreation on the part of one of them. Perhaps this idea is latent in the native mind, or at least is at the basis of this rule. The fact that this hypothesis applies only to the wife's mother-in-law [mother?] does not weaken it; for in native eyes [291] the other instances are entirely without importance. (1)

1. See, for example, Chapter II, Article X, and Chapter V, Articles II and III.

606 292 Another regulation pertaining to the mother-in-law requires that she -- and all the women who are given the same title in current usage -- may appear in her son-in-law's village only when dressed in a boleleke. A boleleke is a banana leaf, either green or dried, which has been torn in several places perpendicularly to the large ● [765] central rib, and constitutes the first and principal sign of mourning. Moreover, Batswa women must also dress in this manner before entering a Baotó settlement. The following reason is given for the rule in the second instance: a Botswá woman's dress consists of a lolímba, a belt of small braided ropes about 10 centimeters long. Although in ordinary positions the lolímba provides fairly good protection, it is not considered adequate to really stop all indiscreet looks. And it is popularly believed that if a Bootó sees a Botswá woman's genital organs, she will die. Might we conclude from this last explanation that there is a fundamental connection between the reasons that necessitate the wearing of a boleleke in these three instances? Or is the mother-in-law to imitate a Botswá woman and thus show a certain subordination to her son-in-law?

2. Female relatives

607 837 As long as they are free, that is, as long as no bride-price payment has been made for them, a woman's sisters or cousins are considered by her husband as his wives, and he calls them so (baálí). This term is applied only to relatives of a generation below that of the true wife or to members of the same generation who are younger than she and with whom marriage [292] is permitted. It is therefore never

The co-wives adapt fairly well to this preferential system. Nevertheless, there is a good deal of backbiting on account of it. It may also happen that one or another of the wives is jealous to the point of being unable to bear it. [347] The signs of her rancor [546] multiply, and a divorce results in the end.

The nkɔ́ndɛ́ does not have to go into mourning for anyone ● [765] other than her husband. Even then she does not remove her clothing. But she does not have to abide by mourning regulations either for her parents or her own children.

Like the other wives, the favorite is passed on through inheri- [587] tance. But she cannot be taken as a bosɔ́lɔ́ by anyone except an elder brother of the deceased.

595x 192 Nkɔ́ndɛ́ is the specific term by which a favorite is designated. Its etymology is unknown to me. The word is used everywhere, although the Injɔ́lɔ́ often say lokílo (whose etymology is equally obscure). Another less common (older?) term known to the Bonkoso, Bongili, Wángatá, and Bakáala is bongilí or bongijí (1). In addition to the term ikundaka, already cited, there is also the word ebɛ́lɛ́kɛ́, a generic term meaning "preference, predilection" or, when applied to a child or a slave, "an object one does not want to dispose of." The favorite is also called ɛ́fɔ́kɛ́tɛ́mɛ́, "untouchable," because other men may not have relations with her.

1. The Ekonda call the favorite bokɔ́lo. The Elanga of Losanganya say bofilí, a name borne by certain women among the Nkundɔ́ between Jwalɛ́ and Boloko. Might this also be an old name?

152 593x 764 rough behavior, only strangers married to village men (those known as bɔ́afɔ̂ɔ́la). This ill treatment is often extended to close relatives of the widower, that is, to those whom the women in question call bɔ́ome, "potential husbands," never to fathers and higher relatives. (1) The purpose of this practice seems to be to intensify, by physical pain, the sorrow caused by death. In addition, provocatively obscene words, gestures, and movements remind the widower that from then on he must be continent, as described in extenso in the study cited above.

● 765 Afterwards, relatives dress the widower in a lisɔ́ki, a banana leaf which is torn all over horizontally. For all other mourning garments, as well as for all regulations and prohibitions that apply to all cases, see the detailed study.

The ill treatment described is not inflicted on the widow. It is meted out exclusively to men.

The general rules pertaining to seclusion apply to a widower; in fact they are especially severe for a man. His kinswomen prepare his simple meals. However, if his relations with his father-in-law were excellent, the latter sends a woman [420] to him [587] who will attend to his needs. She often becomes his wife when, after the lifting of mourning, he brings the ibɔ́leɔ́ko (Chapter III, Article IV).

During the entire first period of seclusion, he cannot go anywhere, at least ostensibly. If he needs to go out, he must go through the back. If he wants to visit a relative or friend, he must go behind the huts, in the banana grove, even if it is evening. In any case, he may not leave the village. Such was the ancient law, though nowadays it is observed less and less.

Furthermore, he cannot have the slightest contact with any woman who is not a relative. He cannot even shake her hand, greet her out loud, or look at her even in passing.

595x She does no work in the farm or kitchen. She always has an ebísa to wait on her. If her family has no member they can let her have, she will borrow an ebísa from a distant relative or a friend.

A nkɔ́ndɛ́ does not travel on foot; she is carried in a hammock [412] (hunting net). Her husband accompanies her on foot, however. But [558] this was done only for a true nkɔ́ndɛ́ of a rich man, and the custom is disappearing today.

A favorite may not leave her husband, even to go and see her parents. In the past some men were so jealous of their favorites [574] that they would not allow them to satisfy even their most private needs unless they themselves or some sentinel (usually a botswá) stood watch. A man could not even go into the vicinity of her hut, which is built just behind the husband's shed. For although the husband is sometimes tolerant of the passions of his other wives, he always shows [152] an intransigeant jealousy [346] in relation to his favorite. He never travels without having her accompany him.

The favorite has the honor of performing small personal serv- [585] ices for her husband; she cuts his hair, helps him in the removal of body hair, scratches his pustules from ringworm or prickly heat, anoints him with oil, paints him with ngóla, and, in a word, performs all the tasks connected with his appearance and hygiene.

595x Out of love for his favorite, her husband can buy her corpse •766 for the price of a slave (in kind or in money). By doing so he obtains the right to have it buried beside his own while those of the other wives must be buried with their native clans. That is why in some regions a husband calls his favorite his ikundaka (from kunda "to bury"). Nevertheless, if her husband dies before she does, his heirs may not trouble themselves about his wishes and no longer require that the favorite be buried in their cemetery. That is what happened to Bongóla of Bongíli, whose husband Ikilinganya of Bongangɛ́ (Boóndé) had paid the price of two slaves for this right. When the husband has [224] killed large game, the favorite, like the bomátsa, has the right to receive her personal predetermined portion (boando). Her part is the neck or a chop, which in her absence, goes to the sons or their wives. The other wives do not have the same right; each one obtains only an ordinary piece (liondo).

Before proceeding with the burial, the two families settle 764 the question of funeral payments, which we are about to examine. A "farewell feast" is given by the clan of the deceased. The interment itself has no special features, so that it will suffice to refer the reader to the study of this subject that has been cited.

As we noted in Chapter VII, Article II, a husband can 766 buy the corpse of his favorite. Unless the execution of this intention meets with some obstacle, the corpse is not transported to the favorite's native clan but is buried next to the husband's tomb in his clan cemetery. As a result, all that accompanies the transporting of the corpse is omitted, as is the funeral payment which is compensated for by the purchase of the corpse. The husband or his family only send the wife's relatives the payment that usually accompanies the news of her death.

Article IV. Funeral Payments

764 As we have just said, before the husband proceeds with the transportation of a deceased wife's corpse, he collects the valuables to pay the nkunjí. This is the term (derived from the verb kunda, "to bury") that designates the various payments a widower is required to make to the clan of the deceased.

First of all, as soon as the death is known, the ndonga goes to the parents of the deceased and brings them the nsango (news), which consists of a copper ring or a knife. He presents them with these, saying: "Know that your daughter so-and-so, has just died."

At every barrier the procession must cross to reach the village of the deceased, the husband must make payment of some object [431] (usually a knife or a ring) in order to obtain free passage. [594] The ndonga always serves as intermediary. These payments are called byföŋ by'ökáko or simply lokáko, lokiaka (barrier), or, among the Bombwanja, ifaká yí ekálaki, "knife for felling (the barrier)."

The ndonga walks at the head of the funeral procession; he (or another bonambótswá who takes his place) carries a spear

Attention should be drawn to the danger of an increase in abortions for a new reason, namely the shame of giving birth outside of wedlock. As we have seen in Chapter I, Part II, Article IV, 3, premarital pregnancies have existed since time immemorial without resulting either in remorse or in palavers. Through the teaching of Christian morality, the feeling of shame must sooner or later be extended to this phenomenon. In explaining the evil of fornication, care should therefore be taken to insist on the fact that transgressing the Fifth Commandment by abortion is a far greater evil.

Voluntary abortion is not considered a moral error by the Nkundó. (2) In their eyes an imperfectly formed fetus, not viable, is not yet a man. It is only a human being in the process of formation, in potentia. Hence the custom of burying the aborted child in the [468] hut or quite near it. Thus the spirit responsible for the pregnancy will see that it is respected and repeat its benevolent action. (1)

1. Others explain this custom by saying that the fetus already has a soul which remains near the tiny body and will take the first opportunity to re-enter the mother's body.

But if it is voluntary an abortion is always a wrong against family and society, for it deprives the family of a member on whom must go to the mwdale for their fight, this being the location of the houses belonging to the sons of the nkumu. The penalty for breaking this law is a fine, and if no fine were forthcoming hanging used to be the alternative. If a quarrel arises elsewhere and one party wishes to avoid fighting, he may retire to the nsaga and thus be safe. No trees in the nsaga may be climbed. There are, however, privileged classes exempt from all such rules, and these embrace a good many people. Thus, the mother of twins, twins, Batwa, nsami, and all members of the mokonda and elopo are exempt from the laws of the nsaga. If any of these commit acts which are illegal for those coming under the law, they are not held guilty, but their actions will not be condoned; they will be considered breaches of good conduct, and will be dealt with informally; the parties will be quietly reprimanded, and adjured to observe the proprieties of conduct. For outsiders breaking the laws of the nsaga, what corresponds to a warrant is necessary. It is necessary to catch the culprit in the act and hale him before the nkumu. The nkumu himself cannot do this, nor can any of the elopo; it must be done by one of the mokonda, and so if the nkumu sees someone infringing the law he will try to get one of the mokonda on the spot in a hurry in order to catch the offender. 624 689 [645] [672] [624] [694]

In war,[1] it is the nsiosi e ole who is most active in preparations, but the nkumu will accompany his party to battle, keeping well in the rear, and surrounded by good fighters. He does not wear his nsanda but puts on the informal hat. If an nkumu were captured, he would never be tortured or killed as were other prisoners, unless he specifically sought such a fate. He could be ransomed, and his captors would beseech him to let his people ransom him, but in many cases an nkumu would invite death rather than endure the shame of being yielded up as a prisoner of war. 624 726 [727]

An nkumu is always addressed by a double clap of the hands, and will not reply to anyone rude enough to speak to him first. In answer to the clap he replies with a word of wisdom expressed in an aphorism or proverb. Such a reply, however, is common to all elders, who have their favourite aphorisms ready for any who pay them special honour. Anything the nkumu says must be answered not by the customary ale bolo (even so) which ordinary people use, but with the special word, binga, which is reserved exclusively for replying to an nkumu, and means the same thing. 624 576

When the hour of death approaches, an nkumu is attended by his Batwa. It is a rule that he must not die a natural death, and near the end, while he is still conscious and can still speak, all 'free men' clear out and leave the Batwa pygmies to their task of tying the nkumu very tightly with the fibrous yam vines known as nsekiki. Often this severe lashing in the sitting posture, known as iliau, is sufficient to finish the nkumu off, but sometimes the work is expedited by twisting his neck.[2] Then it is announced that he is dead, asiliea, this being in contradistinction to the customary phrase awkwa ankulo used of the death of ordinary people. While the latter means 624 763 [563]

[1] Owing to the lack of tribal cohesion, warfare was not on any considerable scale. The method of warfare consisted in sending groups of young men to fight first, the elders only joining in when one side began to get the worst of the fray. Victors and vanquished in such fights were designated 'husband' and 'wife' respectively, and members of the one group were free to come and go in the villages of the other, and even to help themselves to food. In future wars 'husband' and 'wife' were supposed to combine against their common foe.

[2] Besides nkumu, elderly and rich men, fathers and mothers of twins, and twins are buried in the iliau or sitting posture, in contradistinction to the recumbent position which is the customary one used for ordinary people and slaves. [764]

825 literally that the deceased has hanged the heart, the former is used of a tree which leans over and falls from a great cut at its base.

629 On the announcement of the death, an expert drummer drums out the news. 766 There will be at least four drums of the type known as lokole, and a nsogo.[1] The four 594 drums are called by the names, Ejende, having the 'biggest voice', that is a deep 202 bass note, Mongye, having a higher note, Mongende, a high pitched note, and Mandate, having a very high penetrating note. To these four drums others are added; if the nkumu himself did not possess sufficient, they would be borrowed from the surrounding villages, and their notes matched with those of the first three drums, being beaten with them in their turn. Mandate is beaten simultaneously with Ejende, giving a rhythmic tattoo. When the news of the death has been sent out on Ejende, the funeral drumming commences, as follows:

Mongende.	Botiangama w'Amba lokolo,
Mongye.	Nsala ikim, onsngonoko,
Ejende.	Tokund' ilenge mokom' o nyama,
	Ondodokoko amange,
	Lobanga lokenda mondo,
	Bikeko lokenda lokolo.
Nsogo.	Tokilako nkoi nkonge,
	Tokilako nkoi nkonge, &c.

The English and the interpretation are as follows:

Mongende. A scattering of Amba, the snail. (The mother of twins, always called Amba, here gives her name to the snail because of her prolific progeny, which, upon being introduced to the world, scatter, while the mother dies. So the death of the nkumu will cause a scattering of his many wives and children.)

Mongye. Feathers fall; pick them up. (That is to say, for your arrow shafts, for if you don't, and come back later, the wind will have scattered them and you won't find them. So while the nkumu was alive it was the time for his children to learn his teachings so that when palavers came after his death they would be well acquainted with his wisdom and know how to settle them.)

Ejende. We are burying the ilenge, husband of animals, You have just eaten amange, The chin looks up at the ridge pole, The jaw bones look up at the sky. [825] (The ilenge is an animal much prized for its fat meat; the nkumu always gets his share when it is killed, and the skin is made into carrying straps for infants, and into belts. [563] Batwa are prohibited the use of it for any purpose. It is therefore fitting to liken the nkumu to the ilenge. Amange (sing. lilange) is the equivalent of a snack. When a woman brings her cassava from the swamp where it has been soaking for several [264] days, her husband may be too hungry to wait the long hours required to cook it, [252] so to appease his hunger his wife takes a piece or two of the unprepared root, splits it in two, places salt between, wraps it in a lolondo leaf and roasts it in the hot ashes, where it is quickly cooked. So the nkumu just had time to eat a few amange; he didn't wait for the big cooking; his life was suddenly cut off.)

Nsogo. Don't pull out the leopard's eyelashes. (That is, while he is alive; now he is dead one can disregard his power.)

[1] A lokole is a slit gong made from a hollowed log; its two notes are produced by striking the two lips of the slit. A nsogo is a hollowed log, open at one end, across which is stretched a [illegible] hide.

This funeral drumming is kept up for a long time, off and on for days, and is very 624 stirring in its rhythm. While it is going on, the elders congregate in an elonga. They 766 fast and have nothing to do with their wives during this time. The elaje is mourning, and the [illegible] may be likewise mourning, but for the others it is a time of rejoicing, [533] and also of the relaxing of moral restraints. It is an occasion for dancing by both Batwa and 'freemen', the former regarding this as a time for special rejoicing, [535] for the nkumu was their master and now he is dead they are no longer under restraint.
They are free to take any of their master's goods and even to snatch blankets off the [563] corpse. Men and women do not dance together; the women, taking some of their husbands' weapons, go off in one direction, and the men, arrayed in finery, dance at the other end of the village.

While the nkumu is still unburied and the drumming is going on, the [illegible] look for a successor among the elaje. Often this man will, as we have seen, have already been designated. The [illegible], Batwa, and others in the village make up a party, and attired in war finery go off with their weapons as though after a man they wished to kill. As they go they sing:

[illegible] [539]
[illegible]
Hawk, thou hast destroyed the nest,
Where art thou going to sleep?

Before catching the real successor they catch one or another in fun, singing this song. The man of course refuses to be nkumu, and the point of the song is that because of his refusal the elaje no longer fulfils its function of supplying the [illegible] with nkumu and therefore ceases to be of any use to them. If this man by refusing thus destroys the family nest, where will they sleep?

Finally, after this fun, the real successor is caught, his face daubed with black, and [307]
the group sing:

[illegible] [539]
The cunning animal is hiding, reveal the tortoise.

Thus the new nkumu, like a cunning animal, is hiding, but when discovered, like the tortoise, he will not try to run away. The whole group conducts the new nkumu to the [illegible] and sits all night guarding him. Earlier on the day of the actual interment of the dead nkumu, the new one is installed with ceremonies as already described.

On the day the nkumu dies his people scatter to other villages to look for slaves 766 for the executions on the day of the burial. Slave-owners or husbands of unwanted wives ask quietly how much money there is for the man or woman, accept the agreed 567 amount, and tell the buyers to go quietly and catch the slave or wife before anything 762 is suspected and an escape is made. In this connection we may note two classes of 582 wives, bojiko and [illegible]. A third class, [illegible], acquired by the payment of a very small bride price, was not nearly as common formerly as at present and may be passed by. A bojiko was a slave wife acquired by capture in war or stolen. If loved by her husband she will take her place practically on an equality with the members of the village, but she may be killed, for she is her husband's possession, 'his money' is the native expression. An [illegible] is a wife for whom a very high bride price has been paid, obliging her family to give wives to the other family in perpetuity, supplying 766 a successor to replace a deceased woman, and thus maintaining the balance between 587 the two families. Such wives were seldom killed, for they had relatives who cared for them and would object, and who had the power to do so by refusing to 782 fulfil their obligations and by retaining the bride price already received. The group 562 of men and women gathered together for execution thus comprised males and bapika women from the 'free' group (bato, as applied to all men and women not Batwa), and Batwa men and women whose owners had consented to their death. It sometimes happened that a man, seeing a woman among this group who took his fancy, might obtain her by paying for her in money or substituting one of his own slaves.

In some cases the executioner, bonsala, was chosen from among the family of the 766 dead nkumu, in others he was selected from among the whole group of people over 782 which the nkumu held sway. The man having been chosen, the knife is brought out of the house where it has been kept by some elder. This, a blade some sixteen [412] inches in length, two-edged, decorated by alternating longitudinal lines of polished and blackened steel and inserted in a wooden handle, is sharpened on one edge, carefully wrapped in a plantain leaf, and laid away for use on the following day.

At dawn the prisoners are taken to the water and washed to clean them, inland towns accomplishing this purpose by dragging them up and down the village in the dew-drenched grass tied by a liana. The prisoners then are arranged in a V shape, the open end nearest the spot where the nkumu's body is sitting in state. Low seats are made by resting a stick in the forks of two perpendicular ones, and this cross bar is straddled by the victim. His hands are tied behind his back and his head tied to a sapling securely fixed at one end in the ground, the other bent down sufficiently to allow for tying the head with considerable tension on the rope. When all is thus arranged an expert drummer begins to pound out a rhythmic beat, and the ceremony of handing over the knife takes place.

The executioner of the day is dressed in finery but no camwood powder is evident, for it is a time of mourning and not of rejoicing. He wears a hat with many feathers, a vine encircles his waist, and bracelets of the same his arms. Then the man who last occupied the position of executioner comes forward. An elder has already brought the knife wrapped in its leaf and also a heap of ash on a leaf, both of which are placed on the ground. The old executioner picks up the knife while the new one faces him. The former demonstrates with gestures how he used to go about his work, the motions, the attitudes, the fine arts of the task. Even though the executioner of the day may have had previous experience, this part of the ceremony must be gone [516] through. Then, holding the knife aloft, the instructor raises his right leg at right angles to his body, bends it at the knee so that the shin hangs perpendicularly, and the new executioner passes underneath it, returning the same way. He now faces the old executioner, who lays the knife in his own hands, arms outstretched and palms open, the handle resting in his right palm, the blade in his left. The new man, facing his instructor, places his outstretched and open palms on the shoulders of the other, draws his hands down his arms, finally coming to the knife, which, because of its position is thus received, handle in the left hand, blade in the right. Releasing his right-hand grasp of the blade, he stoops, sprinkles the blade with some of the ash, then rubs his right hand in the dirt to remove all slippery sweat. Then still grasping the knife with his left hand, with his free right hand he drains a gourd of palm wine to gain courage, hits the nearest victim on the head with the empty gourd, then transfers the knife to his right hand. He is now ready for his work which he proceeds to do methodically, sustained by the heady wine and the rhythm of the drum. When he had finished one of the lines, a pause would be made to bring out the body for burial. Just before this is done an armed band rushes down the path, returns, goes up in the other direction, then returns; this is said by some to ward off any spirits which might be about. The nkumu is now brought out by the Batwa slaves.[1] His grave, a circular hole with a crypt in one side of it, its entrance facing west, had been previously prepared. Few people in the Bongindo villages knew or had seen the actual burying place of an nkumu. While the corpse was carried to the grave followed by a crowd, the executioner finished his work. Those who stayed behind took the bodies of the decapitated men and women and divided them among all the participants of the funeral who would subsequently devour everything. [illegible]

Accompanying the funeral procession to the grave were the ndil, one or more men or women who were destined to accompany the nkumu to his grave and to the other world beyond. At the burial of an nkumu witnessed in 1930 at which the semblances of some of the old rites were carried out, a party of armed men contested the right of the procession to approach the grave, there was a mock battle for a few minutes between two bands of the funeral party, and then the procession gained right of way. At the grave-side the legs and sometimes the arms of one ndil were broken by heavy clubs to prevent him from escaping. Then seated on the ground the body of the nkumu would be placed on the knees of this one, whose arms would be placed round the nkumu and securely fastened by driving a peg right through both wrists. Sometimes two ndil were thus used. If the number of victims was sufficient, others would be buried alive too, being placed in the grave in the recumbent supine position, with the corpse on top of them, its weight being sufficient, with the earth filling in the grave, to prevent escape. [illegible] The nkumu was now ready for burial and was placed in the crypt, facing west.[2] The relations of the nkumu approach, they pluck the leaves and stem of a juicy bush known as [illegible] and chewing it, expectorate ceremonially on the body while they address it in language somewhat as follows: [illegible] 'You are going to leave us now, we are mourning, for you were a good and wise man, your discernment in matters of justice was without parallel, &c. . . . we wish that you may be happy where you go, have many wives, beget many children, lack not for meat. But don't take with you our power to beget children, leave us also some of this wisdom of yours, for what you were, we would be.' This prayer over, the [illegible] would be slipped off the head of the corpse and replaced by the informal hat, all done so dexterously that the bare head was not seen. The entrance to the [illegible]

[1] The body was supposed to have remained in state for seven to nine days, but actually it was buried privately soon after death, a dummy being set up with the [illegible] on its head, and the succeeding ceremonies being conducted with only the dummy in the place of the actual body. The inland villages however did allow the body to remain unburied for the long period, the widows being forced to keep watch in the same house. The Bongindo buried their nkumu generally in their houses or the spot where they had been enthroned to rest, burying the dummy at some other spot farther off.

[illegible]

[2] All burials have particular regard to this east-west position, those buried in the recumbent position having the feet to the west. The native explanation is that this allows the spirit of the departed to follow the path of the sinking sun.

764 crypt would then be braced by stakes in order to leave it as a hollow chamber, and 764 the hole leading down to it filled in with earth.

For a month or two after the burial the festivities and orgies continued. Women 764 would be hanged to create some diversion, but those hanged were not eaten. Decapi-762 tations would continue. According to the informants only slaves brought in from a distance would have to be tied to prevent their escape. The slave members of the 567 household of the dead nkumu would await their turn stoically, content to die that [152] they might accompany their master in his journey to the land of spirits. This may be true but scarcely seems possible. Still another diversion in the funeral orgies was killing in the manner known as [illegible]. If some man who had a slave did not wish him to be hanged or beheaded, he might give him for this other method. As the weeks slipped by, such a one, his life having apparently been spared, would suppose that all was safe and that there was little chance of his being taken, and, thus emboldened, would, instead of keeping at a safe distance, join the crowd to watch a beheading. His death would be prearranged. At the moment of beheading a victim, someone would drive a spear into the unsuspecting man, the whole crowd then using spears and knives to stab and slash until he fell. Some might be tortured to death by being buried up to the neck and left thus exposed to the hot sun without food or water until death intervened, but this was not a common practice at such funerals.

768 The termination of the dead nkumu's affairs took place when the division of the inheritance was made, a long and complicated process.

178 Such were the old days before European penetration. The advent of the white man half a century ago was the beginning of the end. The ceremonies had to be 624 given up, though reluctantly. Occasionally now goats are beheaded in place of human victims, and many of the younger generation find that, even so, the sight is more than they can endure, and they seek refuge elsewhere. Nkumu are not anxious for the honours. They find little or no respect paid to them by the government officials and this is a distinct obstacle to their obtaining honours from their own people. When the nkumu resident in the village adjacent to the mission station died, one of the Natives was asked who would be next. The reply was that probably no one would appear as a successor. Asked why, he answered, 'There are too many trousers.' He meant that too many were adopting the ways of the white man to [623] make the inauguration of another nkumu a success. In his one useful function, that of judge, the paramount chief now takes his place, cases tried must be recorded by a clerk of the court, and fines paid into the treasury of the chieftaincy. With such a state of affairs the old ways drop into desuetude, and the younger generation grow up knowing less of the ways of their fathers as the years pass.

837 ceremony. If the husband is kindly disposed toward them, he gives back to his relative the valuables the latter has paid, and the incident is closed. [201]

That is what happened some time ago to Imfio, of Bokenyola (Bonjoku). (1) In the harem of his maternal uncle, Efonja Is'Ôfuwa, who was originally from Bonjoku but had been integrated into the Bongale, he had noticed a certain Mbilifeyenga, originally from Bosfe, and "his heart was rent asunder," as the Nkundó say. Through the agency of his older first cousins Mpetsf éâ Lingomo, ye sent Efonja a bompfogé of 6 rings, asking him to be kind enough to allow him to cohabit with this woman. His request was well received. But after a certain number of years their passion cooled, and Imfio wished to contract a proper marriage to give himself posterity. He therefore parted from Mbilé, who went back to her husband. The latter returned the 6 rings to Imfio, because he did not want to enrich himself at the expense of a relative.

587 The marriage of a bosfió is a special form of the inheritance of women.

760 The term bosfió is used everywhere. The Injóló also use a synonym, njémó, an incorrect term derived from the verb émola, "to make [someone] get up." Thus they say émoja bóna njémó, "to give the child (son, daughter) a bosfió. (2) Among the Boloko and their

2. The Elanga tribes in the Losanganya region also use this expression.

Elingé the term bomiọf is used as well as bosfió.

of a father -- that is, those who have precedence, whether men or women -- gather with the sister's son to proceed with the ceremony. As always, each person yields his right to speak out of mutual respect. Finally, the eldest again has the floor [302]; it may be the deceased's father, brother, or paternal aunt (isfmoto). This individual who is in charge, makes a short speech appropriate to the occasion, and then gives one of the widows to the first-born of the children (nafonf). He takes the latter's preferences into account, having made sure of them in advance. The widow is given to him with the statement: "We have wrested for you the bośfló which your father has left you," tôkokumela bośfló bĺkf inê okotsfsfĺfsá. The actual meaning of kuma is "to seize by pulling toward oneself, to pull up," and includes the idea of strength. The word is primarily used in such expressions as kuma bafio, "to pull up weeds," kuma nsálá, "to pull out feathers," etc. But it is also employed whenever anything is taken or pulled forcefully toward oneself, as in kuma mbgembo, "to pull a chikwangue out of a heap."

The bośfló is always given to the first-born, regardless of sex, to the exclusion of the other children. If the eldest is a girl, she passes the bośfló on to her brother, first-born among the boys. This is a real seniority right, and it must be bought, or rather paid for, by the brother by giving his sister a present which most frequently consists of hens, money, small useful objects, or often a quantity of beer. The same rule applies if the eldest yields his right to a younger brother because the latter is passionately in love with her or -- nowadays -- because he does not want to take a second wife.

3. See "Les Coutumes funeraires des Nkundo" [The Funeral Customs of the Nkundó] (in press, Anthropos). The Elíngá perform this ceremony only a few days after the burial; the Boangi do so even before it. The Injoló are beginning to imitate the Elíngá.

[illegible]
[illegible]
[illegible]

In addition a bosólɔ́ is also given to the bɔ́nankána. Only the eldest son of the sister whose bride price was used by the deceased may claim this right. If the bride price of the nephew's mother was not involved in the establishment of the harem which is to be divided, he is only entitled to a bosólɔ́ who is not someone else's nkita, that is, who was acquired by means of riches procured through the deceased's own efforts. If the deceased obtained wives with the bride prices of two sisters, both of whom have left sons, only the eldest son of the eldest sister has this right. (1) [203]

> 1. It may happen that one of the sons of the deceased is disinherited because of the rights of the bɔ́nankána. If that happens and the latter at least has a wife or can obtain the necessary valuables in his father's clan, he is supposed to yield the woman to his unfortunate cousin. This is a duty imposed by the love of family (lifóka), and he may not evade it.

The practice of handing over a bosólɔ́ to relatives other than the son or daughter of the deceased seems to be an extension of a right originally reserved for his child.

The desires of the person entitled to the bosólɔ́ are taken into account when she is handed over. However, the eldest son can never obtain his father's favorite; only an elder brother may inherit her.

It is thus possible for a son to receive his own mother as bosólɔ́, but only if there are no other widows and if he has no way of obtaining a wife. Naturally, he may not marry her. She is given to him so that when she remarries he will receive the amount of the bride price which will be repaid.

If the deceased leaves no harem but does leave a good deal of other wealth, the bosólɔ́ consists of some object of great value. This practice would seem to indicate that the word bosólɔ́ is applied to a woman only by an extension of its basic and original meaning, "inheritance by right of seniority."

587 As soon as the bonfíló is assigned to the person entitled to her, she leaves the group of widows and goes to the home of her new husband. From then on she may cohabit with him, since from that moment the pair are absolved from the observance of the regulations and prohibitions of mourning. Because of her affection for her deceased husband and her sorrow, the woman sometimes begs her new husband to be patient and wait a while. Her wishes are respected, for a refusal to acquiesce would be a very serious offense, which could lead to an immediate rupture of the relationship.

The woman chosen as bonfíló may refuse the husband for whom she is intended, though such cases are rare and in the past were even unknown. The following instance [204] goes back to 1922: Mpia of Mbenja "acquired" Bóngongo of Ilóngó as wife for his eldest son, Bompelé. But the young man did not want her. So as not to waste his money, the father incorporated the woman into his harem. When the old man died, Bóngongo was given to this same Bompelé as a bonfíló. This time it was she who did not want him, and, to make matters worse, all the other widows also refused. Subsequently, a second cousin of Bompelé named Bosáfijó wanted to marry Bóngongo. But out of spite, Bompelé did not want to yield her to him except against the payment of a bride price.

Even if the woman makes no objection -- and she generally does not -- and accepts the new husband without loving him, either out of indifference, or to be able to come out of seclusion, or for any other reason, she may always find a way to leave him, if she wishes, for another close relative whom she prefers. This fact indicates that, although theoretically the union of the bonfíló is supposed to be more stable than a simple marriage by inheritance, in practice it is not; and it does not attain the degree of permanence characteristic of a marriage by nkomiló. The reason is probably to be found in the fact that the union with a bonfíló and the ordinary form of marriage by inheritance are fundamentally identical, and the rights of the family play a great role in both of them. The following is a recent case history: Ilongó, daughter of Itsiáfio of Bonganga (Bokoté) and widow [illegible] of Bolifiafia of Bongili was assigned as bonfíló to her husband's eldest son, named Boonge. Later she claimed that she did not love Boonge but [illegible] that she wanted to become the wife of his brother Ekamba. Ekamba

584 did not object. But very soon she broke this union as well. This time 586 the chief decided she was going too far and to please Boongo, who 601 had settled with his mother's clan of which he also was a member, he sentenced her to several weeks in prison. All sensible people approved of the chief's attitude. In spite of the suppression of such excesses, a suppression which is necessary, the woman's freedom is protected.

[illegible] We have already indicated that from a moral point of view the 584 marriage of a bosóló may be considered on the same level as the in-587 heritance of any woman if she remains among the close kin of the deceased. The only difference is that such a union is somewhat more difficult to break.

Article IV. The Replacement or Substitution

586 When a marriage is broken, instead of completing the divorce
587 by restitution of the bride price, the woman's family often has recourse to the practice of replacing the divorcée by one of her relatives (such as a sister, cousin, or niece). The act of replacement, as well as the woman substituted, is called bankitsɛ. (1) This name is plural noun derived from kita, "to become," kitana, "to replace, to succeed." The singular would be linkitsɛ, but it is never applied to this situation.

The substitute usually does not object to the social obligation that falls upon her, unless she feels an unusual repugnance toward the husband. In that case an attempt is made to find someone else in the family. A family may go so far as to take one of its members away from her husband in order to substitute her for the divorcée, especially if no other substitute is to be found and if they care more about the marriage that has been broken than about her union.

The Nkundó give the following justifications for the practice of substitution:

1. The Ekonda say nkitsɛ.

Chapter VIII

Divorce

586x In Nkundó law there are two ways of breaking up a marriage, divorce and death. We will discuss these in two separate chapters.

In divorce a marriage is dissolved either through a reimbursement of the bride price or the substitution of another wife.

●[86] In the case of death, on the other hand, there is no bride price reimbursement; the wife's death ipso facto dissolves the marriage. The husband's death, on the contrary, does not dissolve it; it is continued with the widow until her own death or until divorce. (1)

(1) This statement is to be understood in accordance with the explanation given in Chapter III, Article IX.

Article I. Reasons for Divorce

The Nkundó believe that a marriage can be dissolved. This cannot be done freely at the desire of the contracting parties but must conform to a procedure an essential component of which is the participation of the ndonga. It cannot be dissolved because of trivialities, but only for serious reasons, or at least reasons that appear serious to the natives.

The valid reasons for divorce can be reduced to the practical impossibility of the couple's continuing to live together, such as, 1) serious and repeated failures to fulfill conjugal duties, and especially any incorrigible tendency to adultery; 2) an incompatibility of temperaments which results in disputes, quarrels, and rows; 3) a grave and incurable illness. /377/

The first two causes inevitably lead to divorce. In the case of the third, a distinction must be made between a husband's illness and his wife's.

If the husband is ill and his wife abandons him for that reason, the divorce becomes complete when she remarries.

In every case at least a few beéngo in addition to the

764 606 607 The higher the amount of these funeral payments, the more the son-in-law is welcome. The alliance is perfect. Therefore, not only will the wife's family reciprocate his fine feelings by adding a few more dogs, but in addition the son-in-law will be well received and successful in his application when, after the period of mourning, he brings the sum of the ibóleóko in order to obtain a substitute for the deceased. (2) In addition, if the relations with his in-laws have been excellent, he will easily obtain the substitute in advance, so that she can care for him during the entire mourning period.

764 689 There are severe sanctions against the omission of the funeral payments. [439] Neglecting to send the notification gift alone is enough to set these in motion. They are: the breaking off of the affinal relationship; the loss of the children, since the father's offense is equal to a repudiation; and finally molestation of the culprit by the spirit of the deceased. Thus at Bokátola (Bompela) one can find two boys, Botétsí and Ikembá, the children of Bonyongela of Ilángá and Etáka of Bokátola. They have now been incorporated into their mother's clan, because their father did not send a nsango. On stronger grounds the same is true for the whole nkunjí.

Article V. The Social Position of a Widow

768 587 In Chapter III, Articles II and IV, we have already noted that in the eyes of the Nkundó, the death of the husband does not disolve a marriage. The union continues, and even after mourning it is not broken ipso facto. Even to have the woman taken and treated as a wife by another man is not enough to end it. As

2. See Chapter III, Article IV.

768 long as there has been no restitution of the bride price, the widow 587 continues to "belong" to the heirs of the deceased and to be their wife in the sense described in the chapter cited above, Article IX. The various forms in which this marriage can be continued post mortem have been described in Chapter III, Article II.

There we also saw that nothing prevents the widow from remarrying outside the inheriting family and therefore from becoming involved in a really new and different union. On the other hand, nothing obliges her to do so. She is entirely free. The only exception -- if this instance can be called an exception -- is a widow who is the object of a will, and a bosóló (Chapter III, Article II, in fine, and Article III). As to the latter, it is even difficult to consider her remarriage to the eldest son of the deceased as a limitation on her freedom. For although according to law it is obligatory, in practice it is voluntary and accompanied by guarantees of freedom that are adequate for ordinary cases. Indeed, it is known that she agrees [440] to this union. And she can always resort to divorce if later the heir disappoints her or if the continuation of the union becomes morally impossible.

It would be useless and tedious to repeat all that we have said on this subject in Chapter III. Let us simply reiterate that the distribution of widows should not be understood as a distribution of persons, depriving them of the freedom to be directed by their wills and their hearts, but rather as a distribution of the bride-price claims which they represent. The legal freedom to remarry remains as complete as it is when they are unmarried. This freedom may be subject to influences and even to real attacks, whose seriousness varies with the circumstances, but these are matters of fact and not of law.

If the widow considers herself -- or is considered -- too old for remarriage, or even if she desires to remain continent in faithfulness to her deceased husband, she may continue to reside with the clan of the deceased, instead of returning to her own family. The heirs usually do not oppose such an action and respect her wishes. If she has children or grandchildren there is no question about it; they are glad to keep their aged mother or grandmother near them.

Article VI. The Economic Position of a Widow

As long as her seclusion lasts, a widow continues to live 736 with the family of her deceased husband. She supplies herself with 768 food from the crops she has grown. The tools her husband has given her remain in her hands, and she makes use of them as soon as she can. As to the various utensils which must be destroyed, they are replaced by others lent her by the family of the deceased, for she may no longer use those which served her in her husband's lifetime.

In order to better express the magnitude of their mourning, the Nkundó often refrain [441] from using the products of the farms established by the deceased. Therefore, instead of continuing to cultivate the existing crops of manioc and vegetables, the widow prefers to seek provisions in the fields of the close relatives of the deceased. Or a man who has already chosen her may place his fields at her disposal. If neither of these sources is available and she wishes to observe the rule rigorously, she must purchase what she needs in this realm.

As we have seen in Chapter VI, Article II, a widow has no
736 claim to the fruits of her labors. Neither the money she has earned 768 and which is intended for the common needs of the household, nor 421 the crops she has set up, nor the fish she has caught, nor the caterpillars she has gathered in the forest belong to her. Everything goes to the heirs. Her property is limited to objects she may have received as her personal share in her daughter's bride price, or as some other payment belonging exclusively to the mother.

If the widow remains in the family of the deceased, however, her fields, tools, etc., are left to her, for under those conditions there is no reason to take them away from her. But if she [781] remarries elsewhere, the heirs are pitiless. A Nkundó does not want the family wealth to be scattered or squandered in any way. The law says lokutu líkéfó lóólsw înyemó, "our patrimony can not be alienated."

In point of fact the widow is treated more favorably, at 736 least in the best instances. If her relations with the family have 781 been good, they will not refuse her some small object that she

736 may wish to keep. In exemplary unions she is allowed to keep
● 768 the mats she has woven with her own hands, and the goods she received from her husband -- fabrics, beads, hens, even goats and dogs, and even sometimes what she has acquired through joint efforts with her husband (crops, livestock) -- are divided equally. The division is usually carried out with a generous attitude toward the widow, and if there is only one object of a kind the tendency is to let her have it. [442] Such conduct springs from pure generosity, for -- as has already been said -- the woman has absolutely no claim. In the past it followed only upon extraordinarily happy unions, and particularly in consideration of the relationship between the two families and the affection of one of the immediate heirs for the widow.

At the present time the influence of the missions is increasing
736 the number of instances of generosity toward the widow and starting 768 an inclination to make it a general rule. Thus good Christian 797 families -- if they are not thwarted by their pagan relatives -- leave the widow those objects she personally used, such as clothing, utensils, a trunk, and even a sewing machine.

Article VII. Economic Effects of Death

1. Bride price and dowry

768 The death of one of the spouses dissolves a marriage only 586 from a certain point of view and only as a union between two specific individuals. A marriage is absolutely broken only by the death of both spouses (or by divorce).

Unlike divorce death does not bring about any repayment either of the bride price or of the dowry (nkgmf). When the wife dies, all these payments remain in the hands of the respective parties. When a husband dies, the widow continues to belong to the heirs; she is part of the inheritance. The children belong to the father and his family; no new payment for them is necessary.

● 768 583x Therefore there is a very great difference between the consequences of divorce and of death. In divorce the bride price must be considered more or less like a deposit. In case of death, on the contrary, it remains permanently in the hands of those who have acquired it. This difference weakens the theory that maintains that the bride price is only a guarantee; rather, it tends to favor the theory that it is a compensation for the loss experienced by a clan when it gives one of its members in marriage. In case of divorce the clan's loss [443] is nullified, since the woman returns to her family or -- as is the usual outcome -- remarries and becomes the object of a new bride-price payment. The death of a woman, on the other hand, makes the clan's loss permanent rather than bringing an end to it. This does not mean that the bride price does not constitute a guarantee; in reality it is one. But this guarantee is an effect of the bride price, not the reason for its existence -- which is something altogether different.

2. Inheritance from the husband

768 428 178 Since we are not dealing with Nkundó property laws, the question of inheritance is not, strictly speaking, within the realm of our study. Nevertheless, we cannot refrain from saying a word about it, since the study of marriage must naturally contain a chapter on children. Thus we shall examine the question from that particular angle. What interests us here is knowing what rights children have over their father's inheritance. We have already dealt with the position of the widow in the preceding article.

The inheritance from the deceased includes three parts:

1) The bride-price valuables, that is, everything that is used chiefly to obtain a wife: copper and brass rings, iron objects, widows and daughters insofar as they represent bride-price valuables.

2) Domestic animals: goats, dogs, hens, ducks.

3) Real property: fruit trees, fields and crops, hunting enclosures, fishing places; and personal property: nets, hunting snares, bows and arrows, shields.

The bride-price valuables become the common property of the close relatives. Each one receives his share of the inheritance.

168 The widows are awarded to the brothers, uncles, and nephews
421 (bánankáná) of the deceased, in accordance with their position in 17 the group hierarchy and their respective rights, [444] which may derive from financial assistance lent to the deceased so that he could obtain one of his wives, or from the application of the nkita system. Rings (bakonga) and iron objects (bifeko) are distributed in the same manner. Similarly, unmarried daughters are assigned to various relatives -- that is, the "fathers" who preside at the division of the inheritance discuss and specify which persons have the right to receive the bride-prices that will later be paid for them. Of the sons only the eldest receives a wife or a certain amount of bride-price valuables as bonálo. (1)

1. Chapter III, Article III.

That is the traditional rule. Nowadays a far-reaching change has already taken place. The sons of the deceased are no longer excluded from the distribution. They are given either a wife, or a sufficient quantity of rings, or the right to the bride price of a sister or a cousin, if it is possible. For the rest see Chapter II, Article IV, 3 and Article XI, 3, 13, and Chapter IV, Article II.

The domestic animals go to the bánanyí, who take them home to their husbands and they are thus included in the amount of the dowry. A few goats, however, might be given to one of the men in the kin group who needs them to complete the payment of a bride price.

As to the other property (real or personal), they pass directly to the sons. The first born receives the lion's share and the most precious items, but the younger sons are not excluded in the distribution.

It should be noted that a will may affect this distribution by assigning a specific object to a given son, or by excluding one of the heirs with whom the deceased has had a serious quarrel. Such a will is always executed, because the Nkundó fear the vengeance of the deceased, who causes anyone guilty of an 76f 42f 77f infraction to follow him in death. It is obeyed even if [443] it is manifestly unfair. They fear reprisal by the deceased, such as that which is thought to have happened after the death of Iloko is'Ekekele of Lofelf. He had killed his own brother, Mpfinda éâ ekonzakele, [682] because the latter had tasted freshly brewed beer instead of leaving that honor to him -- an action which constituted an extremely serious offense. But since the punishment was out of all proportion to the act, the whole family united against the murderer, who was obliged to flee. At his death he disinherited all his brothers in favor of his sons. This will, considered unreasonable and unfair, was not respected; Iloko's only brother, Bendélé wâ Wilima, took Bonyengô, the favorite, for himself. But he soon died, and his death was attributed to Iloko's vengeance. Several years ago the family met to finally settle the matter of the inheritance. The largest portion was set aside for Iloko's sons, but one part was awarded to other relatives who were not named in the excluding clause, which referred only to the Bandélé Bandengâ, that is, to Iloko's own brothers.

Sons are never disinherited. If one of them behaves very badly toward his father, when the latter dies he refuses him his benediction (bekako w'ôlôsâ) and curses him bekako wâ ta yo).

3. Inheritance from the wife

58f 42f As we have seen in Chapter VI, Article II, a wife has no rights of ownership over the fruits of her own labors or of the couple's joint efforts. Consequently, her family can make no claims as regards inheritance; there is nothing to inherit.

Although all the fruits of the wife's activities belong to the husband, most men do not require that their rights be rigidly respected. They leave a part, or the whole, to the family of the [444] deceased, as is done in the case of a widow. (1) After the feast at the end of mourning, the two clans make an inventory of the property in question. Usually whatever products of her work the woman has left are divided equally between the two clans. Some [illegible] men are generous enough to renounce all of it. If the deceased had an [illegible], or if the parents-in-law give their son-in-law a substitute, the possessions fall to her. She even inherits the fields (cultures) that have been set up by her kinswoman, to the extent that they have not been destroyed. Under other circumstances the cultivated lands (plantations) are never left to the family of the deceased.

1. See the previous article.

The only items to which a woman is entitled strictly speaking are the various portions of the bride price and similar payments awarded to her by Nkundó law: goats and spiral beads and the mother's gifts as part of the bride price; the cloth and belt given at a funeral. At a wife's death these possessions pass to her clan, if she has not previously given them to her relatives. In no case may they be appropriated by the husband.

Finally, when a wife dies she may leave a tool (knife, hoe, etc.) to her daughter. This custom is observed particularly by very active women in order to inculcate their daughters with the love [illegible] of work. Such an object often becomes an heirloom, transmitted from mother to daughter for several generations. It is called [illegible] (from [illegible], "to leave to"; see the Latin relinquere) or, among the Bombwanja, [illegible]. These terms are also applied to other objects included in the inheritance when these are considered separately (altogether they are called [illegible], "patrimony," "property," or [illegible], "inheritance"). Such a [illegible] can never be appropriated by a husband. (461)

Article VIII

Death of the Fiancé Before the Payment of the Bride Price

[illegible] Here we shall deal with the situation resulting from the death of a husband during the engagement, after the payment of the [illegible] or the [illegible] but before the walo. The procedure for dissolving an engagement may already lead us to suppose that death also breaks it without any special difficulties. And in fact, if the fiancé dies the woman is free. Therefore she may go home, and the family of the deceased is reimbursed for the payments that have been made.

763 589 She can also remain in her fiancé's family and there be taken in marriage by one of his kinsmen. If everything favors the continuation of the union, the new husband-to-be pays the bride price, but he need not repeat the engagement payments, which retain their validity. If he belongs to a distant branch of the family, however, the kin of the deceased will not want to give up their property, and the new fiancé himself will have to acquit himself of all the bride-price obligations, beginning with the ikulɔ́.

[762] Sometimes the dying man, in making his last requests, enjoins his family to maintain the alliance. In that case one of his kinsmen must marry the woman. If later on a breakup becomes inevitable, the spouses separate. For that matter, if the woman lacks the inclination to remarry in her fiancé's kin group, she will not be forced to do so.

This practice is based on the stipulation of Nkundó law that engaged persons have all the duties and privileges of married couples.

[589] There is nothing among the Nkundó that resembles a levirate. Even in the case we cited of a last will, the obligation derives solely from the sacred nature of that will. [448]

Article IX

The Death of the Woman Before the Payment of the Bride Price

Two situations must be distinguished: 1) The woman dies during the engagement; 2) she dies before the bosóngo.

1. Before the walo

As has already been said, engaged persons enjoy all the duties and privileges of a married couple. If the girl dies the fiancé must fulfill all obligations toward the deceased and her family (transporting the corpse, sacrifices, nkunjí). But his obligations do not end there.

Through the payment of the nkanga (and, in practice, already through the ikulɔ́) he is considered responsible for any accident that might befall his fiancée in his home; and he has assumed the

584 obligation of completing the union by subsequent payments.

The consequence of this fact is that if the fiancée dies before he has fulfilled his obligations, he is forced to pay a large indemnity (mbɛ́laka) to his parents-in-law, who have been disappointed and deprived of their rights. The amount of this payment varies. Usually it is about equal to what ordinarily would have been paid as the walo, whence comes the expression used in these cases: ónga ilɛ́kɔ́ (ikɔmbɛ among the Injɔ́lɔ́ and the Boángɛ́). "to pay the bride price for the corpse."

Sometimes the woman's family is less demanding. This is especially true if they are very fond of their son-in-law and know that he is wealthy and generous enough to considerably increase the amount of the nkunjɛ́, the ibóledko, and the bride price for a substitute. The principle of the indemnity is secure, but its external form is altered and made less humiliating.

In other cases the woman's family raises the amount to be paid as indemnity, either out of greed or because they are not pleased with the union or even opposed to it (this happened rarely in the past but has become more frequent nowadays). [448] Under such circumstances, up to 100 and 150 rings are demanded, as in the following instance which occurred quite recently. Ilumbé of Mpámá (Bofodé) took Lokoká of Bongíli wă Ndongó for his wife. He paid 10 rings as ilalá-ndanga. When some time later he brought 40 rings for the walo, his father-in-law considered them insufficient (and he was entirely right). The small amount of valuables showed the son-in-law's poverty and foreshadowed his insolvency, so Lokoká's family was not greatly pleased with the marriage. Consequently, they refused to accept the rings, which therefore remained on deposit with the ndonga. After two years of cohabitation, Lokoká died (July 16, 1933). The family of the deceased demanded 100 rings. Ilumbé could not invoke any excuse or attenuating circumstance. For if he had wanted to fulfill his obligations, he could have done so, as the interval was long enough, and if he knew he did not have the means, he should have given up the woman.

In the past the widower and his family sometimes refused to pay, with the result that the parties took up arms. The right of war was involved. For when the hostilities ended, the culprit was required to indemnify all the families on his side for any member who was killed or wounded. Therefore he ran the risk of seeing all his property confiscated and being sold as a slave if they did not suffice. He found it was wiser simply to submit to normal sanctions rather than run such serious risks.

The situation with which we are dealing in this article may involve further complications if the woman has been living with her own family, or if she belongs to another man whose bride price has not yet been refunded. But it is preferable to deal with these complications in separate articles.

586 3. Before the bonkoko

If the woman dies before the bonkoko is paid, the widower is not required to pay an indemnity. However, he must complete the bride price by handing over "the slave." [430]

If he does not do so: (1) the alliance is broken ipso facto, and therefore he cannot bring the ilifiedjo and does not receive a substitute; 2) the family of the deceased is entitled to one of the daughters if there are any, or to one of the boys if there are none. This is a compensation for the loss of the bonkoko.

Naturally, the woman's family can in practice refrain from claiming their rights. Thus, they may do so out of regard for their son-in-law who is influential, generous, and well disposed toward them, in anticipation of greater financial and social benefits. The similar remarks made throughout this study have already [571] familiarized us with the "broad-mindedness" of these peoples.

It might be observed that this situation is in no way different from the preceding one, since the woman's family is indemnified in either case. But, first of all, if the woman has left no children, the situation is not at all identical. Secondly, even if the financial aspect of the two situations is the same, the legal aspect is entirely different. The taking of a child and the refusal to accept the ilifiedjo are not considered as compensation. The

● [illegible] Nkundó categorically state that the situation now under discussion does not result in the payment of an indemnity.

This observation again brings out the basic difference between jesaf and bonkogo, which we have already discussed in Chapter II, Article IX, 2 and Article XII, 5, and suggests that the walo constitutes the marriage agreement, whereas the bonkogo is the substitution of a person for the one that is lost to the clan through the marriage of one of their members.

Article X

A Woman's Death at the Home of Her Own Family

761 591 672 We have already drawn the reader's attention several times to the fact that a husband is responsible for his wife because, in accordance with the clan agreement between the families, she "belongs" to him. [451] The consequence of this stipulation of Nkundó law is that the husband assumes all risks relating to the wife; hence he must take upon himself all the damages resulting from her death. There are exceptions to this general rule, however, under the following two circumstances:

1) If the wife dies while at the home of her own family.

2) If the wife dies after having left her own husband for another.

In this article we will examine the first of these two possible situations, leaving the second one for the next article.

If a wife dies while at her own family's home, an exception is made if certain conditions are fulfilled. There are several situations possible:

1) The wife returns to her family because she is exasperated with the unfair treatment she receives from her husband. He may not be fulfilling his duties toward her, may be mistreating her unjustly, etc., as we have seen in Chapter VI, Article III. The situation becomes unbearable. In that case the husband is clearly in the wrong, and the wife has the right to seek a little peace in her parents' home. Under such conditions, if she dies before the

[illegible] husband has come to take her back through arranging a palaver by 672 means of a [illegible], he has no right to complain. He himself
593 brought on such difficulties by his unfair way of behaving. He is obliged to make the funeral payments. Because of the strained relations between him and his father-in-law, the affinal relationship is broken. That is why he will ordinarily refuse to pay the [illegible], at least when he has had no children by this woman. If he omits the payment even though there are progeny, the children are taken from him by their mother's family.

This situation seldom arose in the past. Young and impetuous husbands were almost nonexistent. The old men kept the women for themselves. Age and experience with life had made them more settled, calmer, more reasonable, so they did not throw themselves into adventures [432] whose outcome were necessarily to their disadvantage. Since today men marry considerably younger, such situations can arise more easily; although, on the other hand, a permanent dissolution of the marriage occurs most frequently before the possible development described.

D) The wife leaves her husband without just reason and, having returned to her family, dies there. In the past such a situation was quite rare (Chapter VIII, Article II, 1, A). If no war occurred before the death of the fugitive (a war automatically terminated the affair), the husband had every right to reimbursement or to a substitution of another wife for the deceased. The situation is therefore identical to the case that follows. But there is no longer any question of sending back the corpse, and if the husband wants to break the alliance permanently he does not even need to pay the [illegible].

Nowadays this situation has become far more common. It presents no special difficulty; the ancient custom continues to be observed.

It is almost trifling to mention that the matter of total or [illegible] partial reimbursement of the bride price can be handled through

sent the notification gift and even added dogs to it, because he was interested in keeping the affinal relationship. The corpse was not sent since the woman had died of an infectious disease and the body was decomposing rapidly so that contagion was feared. [illegible] presented the widower with his youngest daughter [illegible] as a substitute. But since she was quite young, [illegible] did not want her. He was satisfied with an indemnity because -- after all -- he too wanted to remain on good terms with his father-in-law. The latter sent him 20 rings as an [illegible] (slave), and thus the matter was closed. [453]

3) The wife has returned to her family on her own initiative in order to visit her parents, nurse them, or to participate in her family's communal fishing, to get her supply of edible caterpillars, or for any other reason. In such a case the responsibility passes from the husband to the parents. The family must notify the husband of the death (always, of course, through the [illegible]). When the husband receives the news he accuses his parents-in-law, saying: [illegible] [illegible], "You have killed my wife." He demands that the corpse be sent to him so that he can wash it, adorn it in an appropriate manner, and mourn for the deceased. Subsequently he sends the corpse back with the [illegible] and demands that another wife be substituted for the deceased or, if none is available, that the bride price be returned to him. As long as his father-in-law does not fulfill his obligations, the husband will not bring the funeral payments. Moreover, if the family of the deceased is recalcitrant or too slow, he will practice [illegible], that is, he will hold one of his kinswomen who is married into the clan of the deceased in order to obtain her bride price. In this way he will obtain the valuables to which he is entitled, the two bride prices balance one another and the matter is settled permanently. In that case he naturally retains all his rights over his children.

This solution applies on even stronger grounds if the wife's family themselves have called her home.

If the wife falls ill in her parents' home, it may happen that her husband wants to care for her himself. He will demand

761 a pledge (ndanga) from his father-in-law to the effect that the 672 illness started in his home. If he neglects to take this precaution 595 and his wife dies, he has no legal means to claim indemnification.

4) A solution identical to the one described above is applied even if a wife goes to her parents for her husband's personal benefit in order to get him something he needs, such as beer for a [434] feast, valuables with which to settle a palaver, etc. It holds true even if the husband has sent her expressly for this purpose.

This situation easily gives rise to violent disputes, however. The wife's family tries to reject the husband's claims by objecting that it is he himself who sent his wife, or at least that she came to them solely for his sake. Nevertheless, in the end the husband is the one who is right and who wins the case. (1)

1. A stay of twenty-four hours is not considered sufficient to place the civil responsibility for an illness, nor therefore for death, on the wife's family.

5) The wife goes home ill. As we have seen in Chapter VI, Article III, 2, the parents are not willing to nurse their daughter unless their son-in-law -- always through the ndanga -- gives them a ndanga in testimony of the fact that she was ill when she left him. The husband thus recognizes his responsibility for all possible consequences of the illness. Consequently, he can make no claims in case of death.

Since the civil responsibility for the death falls to the husband, the latter is notified by the ndanga, but the family does not send him a notification ring. The ndanga for the illness takes the place of this payment. The widower asks that the corpse be brought to him so that he can perform the last rites, and this request is always granted. There is nothing special about the rest of the procedure; everything takes place as if the wife had died in her husband's home.

6) The wife is repudiated by her husband. In the past this happened only if the woman behaved very badly and showed herself to be incorrigible. As we have seen in Chapter VIII, Article II, 1, no. 2, the husband did not send her back to her family'; he 586 fastened her to a fork (etôka) until he was reimbursed. Sometimes 672 the ndonga intervened to free her, but by doing so he took upon 595 himself the responsibility of making restitution of the bride price. In this last [443] instance, if the wife died in the home of her family, the husband was entitled to reimbursement just as he would be in case of a divorce. Thus we come back to the situation described under 2) and 3), the forms varying according to whether or not the widower wanted to continue the affinal relationship.

[illegible] Nowadays the situation has changed entirely. The colonial administration no longer permits the use of the etôka. Consequently, a man who wants to get rid of his incorrigible wife acts in such a way that she will leave him of her own free will. And the situation is again that described in 2).

If the husband has sent his wife away himself by placing her in the hands of the ndonga, his parents-in-law will refuse him an indemnity or any restitution of the bride price and often will not even accept the nkunɛ. They answer his demands by telling him that he should not have repudiated the wife whom he freely chose for himself. Thus most men resort to the procedure described in the next paragraph. There are circumstances, however, under which this mode of action is more difficult; this is so especially in the case of monogamists, since its execution requires several weeks, sometimes several months. In the interim the wife does as she pleases and neglects her husband, so that the latter practically finds himself a bachelor.

781 Evangelization has added a second difficulty. Catholic 586 marriage is indissoluble. Catechumens and Christians who wish to 672 marry must therefore be careful. Before admitting them to re-
595 ligious marriage, we require that at least the walo be paid. But the young men know the temperament and value of their fiancées only through experience. In almost every case therefore they have this experience at home before the walo, in accordance with their ancestral custom. Then, if one of the two parties is pagan (which happens very often), the disciplinary rules of the Catholic missions in the Congo require that they spend a minimum of six months

797 preparing at a mission station or catechumenate [456]. During 584 the experimental period, the engaged pair sometimes find faults
672 in each other which lead them to foresee a married life filled with 586 difficulties and resulting in a breakup. Therefore it is preferable that they carry out the required measures before marriage. The woman is usually the source of the difficulties. The female sex has hardly been touched by evangelization, chiefly because pagan parents, who do not oppose the Christianization and education of their boys, take their revenge on the girls. What they fear particularly is the girls' opposition to premature marriages or their flight to the centers. For those people, therefore, it is almost impossible to get round the difficulty in such a way. As the situation is not provided for in traditional law and, furthermore, most of the natives who hold power are clearly indifferent, if not hostile, to evangelization and the stability of Christian marriage, these special circumstances are not taken into account in any way, to the great detriment of the young people who are thus caught between their consciences and their temporal interests (which in this instance have strong repercussions on their moral life). The attitude of almost all the chiefs and judges in this matter is not contrary to ancestral law -- since the situation was unknown -- but it is certainly opposed to the spirit of that law.

7) The couple go to the home of the wife's family together.
672 Illness and death that come unexpectedly during such a visit are 584 imputed solely to the husband, who retains all the risks except,
586 of course, if the husband returns home but his wife does not follow him, remaining with her parents. Indeed in such a case we fall back on the solution described in 2).

8) Here we come back to the possibility indicated at the end of Article IX, 1, namely that of the wife who dies in her [457] family's home before the walo is paid. If the husband is in the wrong (see under 1), 5), and 7)), the solution given in the article in question retains all its validity; the husband's "responsibility" remains intact. In the other instances it is reduced but not taken away. Actually, two laws are in conflict. On the one hand, there is the "responsibility" of the husband who has not fully acquired

672
595
himself of his obligations, and, on the other, the "responsibility" of the woman who did not remain with her husband. To draw a comparison from the realm of accounting, there are two sides, debit and credit. But the latter lies chiefly on the side of the woman's family, for at the time of death the woman is not yet a wife in the full sense of the word. Consequently, the husband must pay an indemnity. But the fact that his fiancée died at home with her family is for him an extenuating circumstance as a result of which the indemnity is reduced, so that he need only pay about a half, that is, around 25 to 35 rings.

Conclusions

The explanations given may seem a little wordy. Nevertheless, it was useful to indicate all the diversity of possible situations in order to deduce the rule and to grasp the basis of the system from actual facts. Everything considered, it would thus appear that the husband assumes all risks with regard to his wife, and that he must bear all the damages resulting from her loss. She really belongs to him and not to her family in spite of any impression one may have that on the contrary the woman belongs more to her parents than to her husband. For even in the instances where she dies in her parents' home, having gone there for a justifiable reason, her death is considered an injustice toward her husband, since a wife's place is in the conjugal home. Such is the general rule. Exceptionally, in special instances defined by law, a woman's parents reassume the risks for her, that is, they again become responsible for her. [454]

Article XI

672
Here we will consider what happens if a woman who has left her husband and gone to another man dies in the home of the latter before the restitution of the bride price to the former. Two situations may arise:

● 761

1) The walo may have been paid by the second husband, but restitution to the first husband may not yet have been made. The latter is entitled to reimbursement of the bride price just as he would be if the woman had not died (Chapter VIII, Article III), whereas the rules given in the preceding article are applicable to the new husband.

2) The walo may not yet have been paid; in that case the second husband must conform to the rules given in Article IV, 1 and Article X, 6). The first husband must recover the valuables to which he is entitled in accordance with the rules indicated in Chapter VIII, Article III.

Here are two recent instances.

[illegible] yā [illegible], daughter of [illegible] of [illegible] of [illegible] ([illegible]), was married to [illegible] of [illegible] ([illegible], [illegible]). One day she went to [illegible] to be baptized by the Protestant missionary. On her way back she was detained by [illegible] of [illegible] ([illegible]), who wanted to marry her. He gave [illegible] an [illegible]. Shortly thereafter [illegible] died. [illegible] was obliged to pay a large indemnity, equalling the entire bride price, to [illegible]'s father, who in turn had to reimburse [illegible].

[illegible], daughter of [illegible] of [illegible] ([illegible]) was married to [illegible] of [illegible]. She left him for [illegible] of [illegible], who paid the [illegible]. One day when [illegible] was returning from a trip, [illegible] ran to meet him in order to bid him welcome. But in her haste she struck the root of a shrub, stumbled, and fell. Her fall must have caused internal injuries, for she was forced to remain in bed and died shortly thereafter. [illegible] was obliged [650] to pay an indemnity of 30 rings plus two slaves, or a total of 80 rings, to [illegible], who in turn reimbursed the first husband.

This case is comparable to that of a wife's death which occurs in her husband's home but is caused by another man -- who either had daily relations with her or caused a pregnancy which resulted in her death. The responsibility in either case falls upon the lover, who must indemnify the husband. The indemnity is always very large, equalling the amount of a bride price or more. (1)

1. See Chapter I, Part II, Article V, 1, and Chapter VI, Article VII, 4.

586 672 178 Colonization has given rise to a new legal situation which is not provided for in Nkundó traditional law. If a woman takes advantage of the freedom permitted her by colonial legislation and goes to a mission to obtain instruction and make a monogamous marriage, and then contracts an illness from which she dies (at the mission, in the hospital, or even in the home of her family -- a question of place which has no legal importance), we find ourselves confronted by an entirely new situation. The husband no longer considers the woman his wife since she has left him, even though theoretically she continues to retain that status. On the other hand, she has not gone back to her family or gone to live with another man.

Polygamous husbands want to throw the "responsibility" back upon the woman's parents. But actually they have no part in the events, and it is unfair to involve them in the situation.

What should one think of this situation? In the preceding article we have seen that the husband assumes all risks in relation to the wife. Certain exceptions to this rule [460], which we have explained, have been formulated in Nkundó law; but outside of them, the law retains its dominion, since the exceptions are narrowly defined. Thus it applies to the situation with which we are dealing, and consequently the damages must remain on the husband's account.

Moreover, this interpretation is to be encouraged for the following reason:

The purpose of the legislation involved is to protect freedom in this matter of capital importance and to favor monogamy and the gradual abandonment of polygamy. Polygamists -- as a group -- must perforce suffer from it in one way or another. It is inconceivable that a struggle against an abuse would not affect the persons guilty of it.

Such cases are still very rare, but their frequency may increase with the progress of evangelization.

586 673 682 In terminating this discussion we must make one point that is related to both of the last two articles. The cause of death has no

768 672 682 legal importance. The solutions given are the same whether the cause of death be organic or criminal. If the latter is the case, however, the murderer must pay an indemnity, which is given to the person who has been wronged, whether it be the woman's husband or her family; in any case he thus satisfies the requirements of justice.

A woman may be murdered while she is visiting one of her husband's kinswomen in accordance with her husband's wishes. In that case the sister-in-law's husband bears the responsibility. He must indemnify the victim's husband, and he himself is entitled to indemnification by the murderer. To simplify this procedure, the murderer can make his payment directly to the widower; justice is still safeguarded. But in no case does the indemnity go to the victim's father, for legally and economically it belongs to the husband, not to the father, who is indemnified through the funeral payments. [461]

Conclusions

586 768 1) A marital union is broken by death only for the person who dies. For the one who remains alive, the dissolution is completed only after other procedures. If the husband dies the widow remains the wife of the heirs and is free only after restitution of the bride price has been made. At the death of the wife the husband can marry a substitute.

586 587 768 A widow's remarriage without restitution of the bride price (and therefore without a new bride price), or that of a widower with a substitute, is considered a continuation of a pre-existing union which has not been dissolved. This continuation is not absolute, however. Actually, it is perfect only in the case of the husband's death, in which case his kin group inherits all his rights and therefore also the rights to the wives he has acquired by means of his capital. On the other hand, if a widower is to continue the relationship after his wife's death, he must pay another bride price.

The difference between the two instances is due to the connection of the bride price with the "ownership" of a woman; she remains subject to it and as a result becomes legally the spouse

768 of her husband's heirs after his death. Only her own death takes 581 all power away from the bride price, which then becomes a purely 587 material value.

That is why the Nkundó expression "continuation of marriage" is ambiguous. For a widower the marriage continues from the standpoint of ties between families. But from the legal point of view there is a new marriage, since he pays a new bride price for the substitute, and there is therefore an entirely new contract. Only for a widow does the marriage really continue, as long as there is no divorce between her and the deceased husband's heirs. The agreement retains all its validity in her person, whereas the husband's obligations are transferred to the heirs. There is only a change of the persons subject to the agreement, which is therefore in no way annulled. The question here is a substitution in the role of husband. [462]

The preceding should be understood as relating to the financial agreement or bride-price contract as we have explained in Chapter III, Article IX. For the conjugal pact or consent agreement is annulled by death, since an heir as well as a widow must interpose new acts in order effectively to become man and wife. What the Nkundó call the continuation of marriage is therefore only the continuation of the bride-price agreement between the families, and not of the conjugal pact between individuals.

It would be desirable to have a moralist thoroughly examine the philosophico-theological validity of the continuation of this marriage after the death of one of the parties. Personally I think that for the widow, and on condition that nothing else opposes it, it is valid. For consent is expressed by the man through the payment of the bokoli and by the woman through the act of accompanying the man as his wife.

2) From the economic standpoint, death does not change
768 the situation that existed during life. The various bride-price valuables remain in the hands of the respective parties. The difference between the consequences of death and those of divorce are therefore very clearly delineated, as was indicated in the Conclusion of Chapter VIII, Article III.

3) These legal and financial rules confirm the conclusion drawn in Chapter VI, Article II and those that follow, that a wife belongs to her husband legally as well as in fact, even though she does not leave her clan. [illegible]

4) They also support the conclusion of Chapter II, Article IX, 5, that for the marriage agreement the walo is the essential element among the various bride-price payments.

5) Finally, they demonstrate the legal priority of the conjugal union above the clan and family society in spite of facts that can often be observed which would appear to contradict this statement.

Chapter X

Children

[illegible] A study of marriage would be incomplete without a chapter on the subject of children. Their procreation and education constitute the finis operis, the natural result of the married state, a state which for man, as a reasonable being, is the only legitimate form of carrying out the propagation of his species, the specific objective of sexual life.

This subject could be expanded more extensively than is possible here. We will pass in silence over a number of interesting facts related to it which fall outside the limits set for this work. For example, we will exclude the question of adoption, since it does not deal with children in connection with marriage, but only within the general rubric of family and society.

Even within these limits this chapter alone would comprise an entire volume were it treated with the fullness it merits. We must therefore confine ourselves to generalities and discuss only those particular situations which are most frequent and common.

As to the order of discussion to be followed in this chapter, and after a few preliminary notes (Article I), we will examine in succession:

Article II. Conception and pregnancy
Article III. Childbirth

567 439 562 Everywhere there were also abducted women and female slaves; these were simply sold. Furthermore women were bought and sold with women [as payment]. Also women who were inherited and no longer in the hands of their family were sold by their second, third, or other subsequent husband. In all of these cases, the family no longer came into consideration for the bride price. One would have to stretch the point in order to consider the sums paid in these cases as a bride price, and consequently as a native custom which one must respect.

562 439 Or one should have to assume that such a native woman remains a "bride" for her whole lifetime. It will be said that the woman consented to her sale by one man to the other.

[563] Often this was indeed the case, but not always by any means, for children and slaves were also sold. Even the consent of the woman did not prevent it from being a sale; her consent was rather an extra transaction that simplified the sale of a human article of trade. It still remains woman trade.

764 567 The Inheritance. Upon the death of a polygynist, the burial ceremony was conducted according to the class and rank of the deceased. One or two or several [538] slaves were killed and buried with the polygynist in the same grave. Sometimes the arms and legs of these male and female slaves were broken, and then they were buried alive in the same grave with the body.

[768] When these slaves still had family, it might happen that the family members, having learned of the unfortunate lot of their relative, would hasten from faraway districts to buy him or her free if it was not yet too late. Several Negroes have told us of those heart-breaking scenes at which they were present as children. The mourning and the lamenting over the dead lasted from a week to a month.

•768 428 587 The eldest son immediately succeeded his father in position and immediately took one of the wives of his father.

The other sons divided among them the houses and wives of their father.

If the deceased had left no son, or if he was still too young, the eldest brother succeeded the deceased. All of the wives had to remain in their own home, except the wife who was immediately taken by the eldest son. They were obliged to await the day of the distribution. This day was put off for from one to four months.

581 593 587 Meanwhile, these wives were subjected to a certain discipline. They were called bitoko, which we translate here as "widow." During this time they were allowed to speak with the relatives of the deceased, but they had to remain at home; it was not permitted for anyone to take these wives.

When the time came for the distribution, the one in charge, namely, the son or the brother of the deceased, called together the heirs and parties concerned. On the day of the distribution, in the morning before dawn, the bitoko left their dwelling place and went to the man with whom they had already come to an agreement, so that by daybreak all the huts of the bitoko stood empty. Each of the wives of the polygynist usually has her own hut. At the appointed hour, the meeting was announced by the usual beating of the tomtom. The wives, the heirs, and all parties concerned then came together.

If there were many wives to distribute, the order of distribution was as follows: in the first place the brothers of the deceased received their share; in the second [340] place came the sons; and in the third place, the grandsons, that is, the sons of the daughters who received their share from the Nkita of their mother. If at this time the wife did not want to go with the man for whom she was designated, she was sold to another. Sometimes the family of the wife was not satisfied with that, and if they could, they gave the bride price back in order thereby to free their daughter or sister. Such a wife then came back to her family, where, however, she was again married in return for another bride price. The family acted thus to prevent its daughter or sister from simply being sold. When the grandsons were still too young, their share of the Nkita of their mother went to their uncle, the son of the deceased. The latter had then to provide a wife for them later, which he usually never did without making a great deal of trouble. If the daughters had no sons who could inherit their Nkita, they received some of the father's personal property as inheritance: goats, dogs, lances, knives, pots, etc. If the deceased had left a daughter but no sons or brothers, the daughter had to supervise the distribution of the inheritance.

Our civilized idea that the wife, the mother of the family, is the first heir, is thus not taken into consideration there. Indeed, the wife, the mother herself, is inherited if she is not too old.

764 corpse would then be buried by men in order to leave it as a hollow chamber, and 763 the hole leading down to it filled in with earth.

For a month or two after the burial the festivities and orgies continued. Women 764 would be hanged to create some diversion, but those hanged were not many. Decapi-762 tations would continue. According to the informants only slaves brought in from a distance would have to be tied to prevent their escape. The slave members of the 567 household of the dead nkumu would await their turn stoically, content to die that [152] they might accompany their master in his journey to the land of spirits. This may be true but scarcely seems probable. Still another diversion in the funeral orgies was killing in the manner known as [illegible]. If some man who had a slave did not wish him to be hanged or beheaded, he might give him for this other method. As the weeks slipped by, such a one, his life having apparently been spared, would suppose that all was safe and that there was little chance of his being taken, and, thus emboldened, would, instead of keeping at a safe distance, join the crowd to watch a beheading. His death would be prearranged. At the moment of beheading a victim, someone would drive a spear into the unsuspecting man, the whole crowd then using spears and knives to stab and slash until he fell. Some might be tortured to death by being buried up to the neck and left thus exposed to the hot sun without food or water until death intervened, but this was not a common practice at such funerals.

626 Such were the old days before European penetration. The advent of the white man half a century ago was the beginning of the end. The ceremonies had to be given up, though reluctantly. Occasionally now goats are beheaded in place of human victims, and many of the younger generation feel that, even so, the sight is more than they can endure, and they seek refuge elsewhere. Nkumu are not anxious for the honours. They find little or no respect paid to them by the government officials and this is a distinct obstacle to their obtaining honours from their own people. When the nkumu resident in the village adjacent to the mission station died, one of the Natives was asked who would be next. The reply was that probably no one would appear as a successor. Asked why, he answered, 'There are too many trousers.' He meant that too many were adopting the ways of the white man to

614 He represents the A-group in the council of elders of the village and of the other large units. Since no members of the group [672] are considered capable of conducting affairs, all the legal transactions which they undertake are treated as though they had been sanctioned by the patriarch. To a large extent the members of the group may represent one another. In the absence of the elder, a younger member may act as the representative of the [623] group at council meetings. When the senior member dies, his function will be taken over by the next oldest member of the group.

614 621 An A-group will split up only through internal conflicts which cannot be bridged or through a large population increase. The newly-formed A-groups continue to maintain a close relationship which, at first, is much closer than among the B-groups whose A-groups have split much earlier. In the higher ranks cohesion after the split diminishes only gradually; thus many gradations develop in the feeling of cohesion. These gradations could not be even approximately reproduced in a diagram with any degree of exactitude. There is no formula by which the split takes place, as there is, for example, among the Tallensi (13) where it is determined by a certain number of generations. 614 Theoretically the A-groups are "eternal." The A-groups are 596 subdivided into small families. Within the polygynous families 595 nuclear families (Familienkerne) (14) have a [illegible] independent position economically. Each wife has her own house. A husband's wives and the wives of his sons have their houses within the same homestead. As the master of the homestead, the father has an open shelter where the men spend their time and [361] hold their meetings. Upon the death of the master of the

614 To sum up the characteristic features of the A-groups: Membership determined by male descent; unity of legal power, especially insofar as landed property and inheritance law is concerned the senior has full power; succession by simple seniority; theoretically unlimited existence of the group. The A-groups consist of small families who live together in homesteads under one father in each case.

Groups of Rank B

614 797 There is usually a friendly, neighborly relationship between the A-groups which form part of a B-group. People assist each other to a large extent, and there is joint consultation on most matters. Group B has only one [illegible] ilóki, "master of the hidden power," the priest of the kinship group, who is consulted by all the members of the group. He functions during the magical preparations for the hunt; he is consulted before any important undertaking. During the leave-taking ceremony after a burial, he converses with the deceased, and people turn to him when the ancestors have appeared to them in their dreams to transmit their desires, orders, or other information to the living. He protects the people of his group from the ill will, [illegible], of the dead and the living. The priest of the kinship group is used as the criterion [134] to determine which group of homogeneous A-groups represents a B-group. The priest of the kinship group is descended from a certain one of the related A-groups.

616 554 There is a difference in rank among the A-groups of a B-group -- one group will be regarded as older -- but this is

844 are not too rare. (?)

2. Ease in delivery is called bosfojá; difficulty is called bonsombo.

A husband asks his mother-in-law to come and help her daughter. Other kinswomen of the husband or the wife do not refuse [482] their services either. Among them there is always one who is more expert in these matters and who acts as a midwife (mbótsa).

The delivery takes place in the banana grove behind the hut; there is light and air there. In the house it would be more difficult.

The husband cannot be present at this event. His presence would make it difficult and painful. The further away he is, the better. The prohibition is not rigid, however; if there is no one to help his wife (as in the case of an unexpected delivery in the forest, etc.), he will have no hesitation whatsoever in helping her with all the power and skill at his command.

To facilitate the arrival of the child, the midwife gives (278) the wife a potion to drink "in order to make slippery" (botá wĩ bonéli), and administers a douche containing bofmo bark.

If the pains continue for several days and all medication is 845 without results, it is assumed that some evil spell (liloka) is at work. To neutralize it the woman in labor is "blessed" (-saka). For that purpose her family and that of her husband each bring a stalk of the bokaaló plant (bosífoga). Two kinswomen, each with the stalk of her respective clan, squeeze out the sap with which they smear the woman's abdomen. After that the delivery takes place in a normal fashion.

845 The nkanga (doctor-magician) only intervenes when a woman 756 has already had several miscarriages or when all her children die. 847 If he is consulted he invariably attributes such misfortunes to the action of spirits of the deceased, who may be appeased by offerings and the promise that a manifestation of their will be heeded with respect to the naming of the child. Usually he adds that a few elementary prohibitions must be observed until the child is weaned.

Article V. Name Giving

Naming does not occur on any predetermined date. It is 553 not delayed without a special reason. No feast or ceremony accompanies the event. The father simply puts colored powder on the child's forehead as a sign of joy.

It is the father's right to choose a name for his child. Sometimes he asks for the family's opinion. Preferably he gives names of his relatives, deceased or living, or sometimes his own. But it is proper to respect the mother's feelings also. Failure to take them into account could provoke the woman to cause an abortion in order to punish him for being so willful as to neglect her family.

[845] A painful childbirth, like the repeated death of preceding [769] children, is often attributed to the rancor of a dead person who is discontented. In such a situation the Nkundó await the verdict [787] of a dream, or they have recourse to the judgment of a nkanga (doctor-magician) in order to be able to satisfy the irascible dead.

If the situation recurs too often, the calamity is attributed 553 to a rivalry between dead persons who are fighting over which of 551 their respective names should be given to the newborn; the envious loser kills the child. In order to avoid such mean vengeance and make everyone content while satisfying none, the father gives the child a neutral name or a Botswa name, such as Botswá, Sáka, Ěfâlína (nameless), Botsilá (lack of success, bad luck), Litáli (dead without known cause), etc. If the child has already received a name, but for one reason or another the inauspicious fury of a ghost is feared, it is always possible to change from that name to another.

Children are usually given the names of relatives of the same sex. Exceptions are sometimes made, however, if one of the sexes is not sufficiently represented among the progeny, in which case the bearer of the name can always change it later, and he almost always does. Nevertheless, there are [500] no specifically male or female names, except for those that consist of the relative form of a verb, such as Ósâsuka, "the coquette," Óyêmengo, "she who comes with plenty," Ófénji, "she who excels." Finally, certain names are sometimes used for either sex.

● 771 In matters of religion the Nkundó recognize the existence of a Supreme Being: Njakomba or Mbombiandá, creator and ruler of all that exists. They do not worship him in any way, however; all their religious practices are addressed to guardian and ancestral spirits. (2)

2. On the subject of the religious conceptions of the Nkundó, see a detailed study by Father Boelaert, M.S.C., in Hooger Leven, 1934, pp. 1612 and 1636, and 1935, pp. 12 and 60.

197 The language of the Nkundó is beautiful, harmonious, flexible, and rich. It has all the qualities needed to become a literary language and is admirably suited to the requirements of teaching. Furthermore, its various dialects are spoken over a considerably large territory, in fact over one of the largest language areas [13] of the Congo. 777 234 In addition to the religious and devotional books of the Catholic missions, a fairly large collection of various academic textbooks is available in this language, thanks primarily to the zeal of the Protestant missionaries. The latter have also published a complete translation of the Bible. Several vocabularies and small grammars have been compiled, and in recent years a large dictionary and an expanded grammar have been added to these, both compiled by A. and L. Ruskin of the Bongandanga Mission. For several years the Protestant mission at Bolenge has been publishing a native magazine, and the Catholic mission is pushing ahead with preparations to publish one also.

164 Father Shebesta's book, Vollblutneger und Halbzwerge, includes a chapter on the Nkundó in which the author gives a good general description of this people. Nevertheless, some of the details given must be accepted with reservations.

121 The general information given above is enough to give the reader a superficial knowledge of the Nkundó.

The purpose of this work is to give a more extensive account of their institutions pertaining to marriage.

As we have previously stated, we are considering only a portion of this people. All our statements cover only the fraction we have delimited. The family institutions of other Nkundó groups are not accounted for, as they are less known to us and we do not want 847 [484] already more "civilized," such as the neighborhood of Coquilhatville and the Losanganya region.

847 846 Attention should be drawn to the danger of an increase in abortions for a new reason, namely the shame of giving birth outside of wedlock. As we have seen in Chapter I, Part II, Article IV, 3, premarital pregnancies have existed since time immemorial without resulting either in remorse or in palavers. Through the teaching of Christian morality, the feeling of shame must sooner or later be extended to this phenomenon. In explaining the evil of fornication, care should therefore be taken to insist on the fact that transgressing the Fifth Commandment by abortion is a far greater evil.

847 845 Voluntary abortion is not considered a moral error by the Nkundó. (1) In their eyes an imperfectly formed fetus, not viable,

1. An attitude which also exists in Europe at the present time, according to [illegible] in Kultuurleven, Vol. 6, no. 1, p. 23 (1935), and the brochure by Prof. D. Schockaert quoted there.

is not yet a man. It is only a human being in the process of formation, in potentia. Hence the custom of burying the aborted child in the [440] hut or quite near it. Thus the spirit responsible for the pregnancy will see that it is respected and repeat its benevolent action. (1)

847 [illegible] [778]

1. Others explain this custom by saying that the fetus already has a soul which remains near the tiny body and will take the first opportunity to re-enter the mother's body.

But if it is voluntary an abortion is always a wrong against family and society, for it deprives the family of a member on whom

[19] Since the chief goal of our expedition was to study the practices and customs connected with the material and everyday life of the native, as well as to gather objects for our collection, our stay among the various tribes was too short to permit a thorough study of their religious life and its attendant customs.

We ascertained that the native, as a rule, acknowledges the existence of a higher spirit. During my stay in the village of Kapanda, Banfumongo tribe, I had the opportunity to question a chief on the subject.

"Who causes the sun and the moon to rise? Who gave you the fish of the river and the animals of the plain, Matali?"

The chief looked at me for an instant, dumbfounded, and then replied, "Nzambi ve Mundele?" "Was it not Nzambi, White man?"

"Why, then, do you not call upon Nzambi to protect your crops, favor your fishing, and grant you success in hunting, Matali?" [20]

"Would he want to help us, Mundele?"

"Why not?"

"Is he not exclusively good?" Metali continued.

"If he is so good, should he not listen to you, Metali?"

"Are not misfortunes caused by the ndoki (spirits), Mundele?"

"But is not Nzambi sufficiently powerful to ward off those ndoki, Metali?"

"Are not the ndoki sent against those who have done evil to others? Would Nzambi still be good if he were to ward off the ndoki, who punish the evil-doers? Ye Mundele, ye! Nzambi is good, he does only good, why call upon him?"

This bit of conversation sums up the native's conception of the supreme being. One calls upon him to explain what one cannot understand, but there is no cult devoted to him. Everything that is good for the society and whose source or origin is not known comes from him.

778

Aside from this spirit, the various tribes believe that there is a multitude of other spirits, some stronger than others, who are all very much concerned with the natives. They are all good in the sense that what is obtained from them is always beneficial to someone, although sometimes it is quite harmful to someone else. For this reason the native has created nkisi [Ed., fetish] and ndoki.

791

The fetisher is supposed to be able to communicate with these spirits. He keeps from them, according to native belief, the secrets of which plants help in healing and who has killed someone. He can obtain from them the punishment of a thief, because such punishment is beneficial to the one robbed. Through their intervention he can assure good fishing, guarantee rich hunting, facilitate childbirth, heal the sick, etc., or, on the other hand, make any enterprise fail.

778

The native believes that success of any kind is granted by these spirits. He attempts, therefore, to secure their good graces as much as possible. Before hunting, fishing, childbirth, etc., he goes to the fetisher. For a fairly high fee, the latter calls upon the spirits and hands over the appropriate nkisi. If the results do not conform to his expectations, the native blames [21] neither the fetisher nor the nkisi, but a ndoki more powerful than the nkisi involved. [Ed., a passage is omitted here.]

The intervention of the okisi or ndoki is only a temporary one. Once an undertaking has been successfully carried out, the native has no further use for the object given to him by the fetisher to insure success. On the next occasion he will go back to the fetisher and ask for a new okisi, which he would always like to be more powerful than the ndoki. Unfortunately the fetisher cannot find such an all-powerful okisi. A spirit that he has invoked with success for years, whose power seems inexhaustible, will one day fail him. Five, ten, fifteen times success has followed the invocation, and then, there it is, an enterprise under the same auspices fails miserably. A new okisi, more powerful, has become ndoki, and the native returns to the fetisher and demands that he do better, always better! With the exception of certain figurines carved in wood and used as hunting fetishes, the physical representation of okisi consists of an assortment of the finally, that sexual relations are strictly forbidden to them during menstruation (-bona or êna nsongé, literally "to be ill from" or "to see the moon," and other similar expressions). The reason given is that a woman in that difficult condition should be spared all additional annoyance.

1. Elimá

776
● The Nkundó attribute the procreation of children sometimes to God (Njakomba) and sometimes to spirits (elimá, pl. bilimá). God forms (-hoga) the children in the mother's womb, but at the same time the bilimá provide the men among the progeny. (1)

[161]

1. Contrary to what is reported by Father Lemaeghe (Congo, 1922, Vol. 1, p. 363) concerning the Ekonda, the tribes that I have known never address prayers for children to God, although they attribute the gift of children to Him. This matter does not concern God (Njakomba or Mbombiânda) directly, but rather a particular elimá.

Sterility, which is a common phenomenon here, is not imputed to sorcery but is considered an innate flaw. Natives usually claim that God refuses them children.

There is no point in trying to make the natives resolve this apparent contradiction; they would not succeed. They simply state the two points. I say "apparent contradiction," for as the Nkundó admit that the bilimá are subject to Njakomba, the contradiction is not real, and the two propositions can be [470] reconciled by explaining the intervention of the spirits as an operation which is dependent on divine action: they are secondary, intermediary causes, although our natives do not make this philosophical analysis.

To explain all the beliefs pertaining to spirits would be to go outside the framework of this study. Nevertheless, we cannot leave out those details which closely touch on our subject.

776 825 There is a large number of diverse spirits, and almost every village has several in its territory. Each one has its own habitat in some singular place or object which stimulates the imagination: enormous trees, oval hollows which form ponds of a sort (efímbo, pl. befímbo), steep slopes, extraordinary pieces of limonite, whirlpools in streams and rivers, etc.

776 842 The Nkundó pray to the bilímá in order to obtain children. For that purpose they make offerings of food and money. To test someone's feelings toward it, an elímá may come to him in the evening or at night in the guise of a known person and ask for some small present. Unhappy is he who shows himself to be stingy; he will be deprived of the object of his desire, or his child will be premature or born sickly or deformed.

783 842 776 In addition to taking a generally friendly attitude toward the spirit, another means of ensuring his intervention is open to a woman. She can procure some kaolin (pembe) at the spirit's habitat (a efímbo, preferably). In the evening she mixes it with some plants. She smears her abdomen with this mixture, known as isaá. [843] She continues the treatment throughout her pregnancy; it has the property of removing everything in her which is of such a nature that it might oppose the spirit (ikáfola lokako jwá bilíma bíle ndá likundó).

776 842 Certain water spirits are known for their generosity, for instance Itómbáolombé or Ekótalombé of Mpaká, [471] who is considered to be a female being. She goes on distant voyages to seek a supply of children. On her return she appears to someone and communicates the news to him so that he may spread it. But she orders all women who desire her favors to observe some form of abstinence. Sometimes she sings to amuse or calm the children. On that day mothers must not use songs to pacify their little ones or to put them to sleep and can use only soft words for that purpose. Otherwise the child would die, for to do so would be to disregard the old elímá's kindness.

[781] women receive other signs: an unexpected obstacle in the form of a stone, a stump, a root, the capture of a tree frog which comes and jumps onto the shoulder, etc

A spirit loves and protects only a child he himself has given. He abhors and hates to the death the living gifts of his fellow spirits. If there are several bilímá in the vicinity of a single village, however, the Nkundó explain the absence of the usual rivalries by considering them as related; one is the husband, another the wife, others the children; that is why they do not oppose each other.

847 Thus an elímá is hostile to any fetus not of his creation. Nevertheless, his spiteful action only begins at the end of several weeks, and even then the pregnancy must have gone far enough to be visible (ifumi jíbela infimbé) Does it take time for him to obtain evidence that the fruit in question is undoubtedly his own gift?

In any case the consequence of this belief is that a woman who has been pregnant for several months cannot long [472] reside in foreign parts, and one who, after conception, has accompanied a husband who has gone to work elsewhere, returns to her village to complete the last period of pregnancy and to deliver.

However, there is an antidote (osengé) against this murder-
[751] ous action of the spirits. It may be obtained from a person who knows the recipe (this person is not the nkanga or "doctor"). The protective compound is wrapped in a bit of cloth and, by means of a thread of fibers from the lokúlá creeper, is tied in the middle of a rope braided with the fibers of the ilolonyafondé bush, which the threatened woman ties around her hips. (1)

1. These data on the subject of the elímá is diametrically opposed to the ideas of Father Schebesta (Vollblutneger und Halbzwerge, p. 241, and W. Schmidt, Der Ursprung der Gottesidee, Vol. 4, p. 322), based on the word of his interpreter, Bern. Bongonga of Bofiama (Bombwanja) (now deceased), who was

2. The beginnings of pregnancy

The first months following the cessation of menstruation are called bofigwa. The oral expression is -figwa ɓimi (ɓimi meaning "fetus")

A woman who has just conceived no longer has any success in looking for caterpillars or in fishing (by scooping, whether with bolɔ́ngɔ hooks or drugs, called lisole). She is unable to catch anything while the efforts of her companions are fruitful. That is because the bofigwa is wɛ́kɛ, that is, a cause for a lack of success (bɛ́mɔnɔ ɓa wɛ́kɛ ɓiléko). Note that this word may be derived from the verb éka, "to place an obstacle."

The husband of a woman in this condition is no better off. His wife's wɛ́kɛ is communicated to him as well as to all those of his relatives who [472] live in the same village or, as the natives say, ɓáá mpeká ɔmɔ́kɔ́tá, "one who eats from the same pot," and ɓáá ndáko ɔmɔ́kɔ́tá, "one who lives in the same house." Friends are not harmed, even if they live in the same settlement as the pregnant woman, nor are relatives living elsewhere.

The wɛ́kɛ brings misfortune to anyone tainted with it. Thus if he goes hunting, he will return empty handed; if he participates in a war he will be wounded. Furthermore, if there is a leopard in the vicinity he will choose to kill that man. An elephant will detect his presence and try to kill him. A snake will bite him more readily than another. At market he will be charged more for everything.

This burdensome situation continues during the entire period of pregnancy, hence until the birth of the child.

2. The beginnings of pregnancy

The first months following the cessation of menstruation are called [illegible]. The oral expression is [illegible] ([illegible] meaning "fever")

A woman who has just conceived no longer has any success in looking for caterpillars or in fishing (by scooping, whether with [illegible] baskets or drags, called [illegible]). She is unable to catch anything while the efforts of her companions are fruitful. That is because the [illegible] is welo, that is, a cause for a lack of success ([illegible]). Note that this word may be derived from the verb [illegible], "to place an obstacle."

The husband of a woman in this condition is no better off. His wife's welo is communicated to him as well as to all those of his relatives who [473] live in the same village or, as the natives say, [illegible], "one who eats from the same pot," and [illegible], "one who lives in the same house." Friends are not harmed, even if they live in the same settlement as the pregnant woman, nor are relatives living elsewhere.

The welo brings misfortune to anyone tainted with it. Thus if he goes hunting, he will return empty handed; if he participates in a war he will be wounded. Furthermore, if there is a leopard in the vicinity he will choose to kill that man. An elephant will detect his presence and try to kill him. A snake will bite him more readily than another. At market he will be charged more for everything.

This burdensome situation continues during the entire period of pregnancy, hence until the birth of the child.

[illegible] The Nkundó know an antidote ([illegible] or [illegible]), however, a means of getting rid of such annoying obstacles. Of the three known processes the last is especially common at present.

[illegible] 1) The husband (or any person to whom the wèkò is attached and who wants to be rid of it) picks up a [illegible] chilopod, naturally by means of a leaf, encloses it in a large leaf which he binds with a thin creeper, and makes a small package of it, as one makes a package of meat, fish, etc. He gives this package to his wife, who thinks it contains food and opens it without any suspicion. But when she sees the detested arthropod, she throws it far from her with cries of disgust, while her husband says to her, "You are the one who remains with the wèkò." As a result he himself is freed from it.

2) A second means is to take the pregnant woman by the arm when an opportunity presents itself and to say to her: "May the wèkò remain attached to you."

[illegible] 3) The woman prepares some [illegible] (cassava leaves [474] salted and dipped in palm oil). The two spouses eat it together contrary to the usual practice. But the husband arranges matters in such a way that his wife gets the last mouthful and keeps the leaf which serves as a plate and represents the wèkò. Then the husband says to her, "Keep the wèkò for yourself."

The wèkò cannot be detached from the woman, for she is the [illegible] wèkò, "the owner of the wèkò," the one who is the basis for it. For her it continues until the child is on the point of being born ([illegible], literally "he has come to the end of his growth," or [illegible], "has turned to one side"), and thus, in practice, until the birth of the child.

[illegible] If a first wife dies at the beginning of her first pregnancy, a caesarian operation must be performed on her. The fetus is removed (it is still no more than an embryo -- [illegible] or [illegible], literally "an egg," or [illegible], literally "blood") so that it can be buried behind the hut. An omission of this practice would result in the death through pregnancy of the deceased's husband's other wives or of the women he will subsequently marry.

our opinion, they are guardian figurines for children, carved before their birth and preserved until they reach marriageable age.

M 791 824 Some fetishers manage to gain quite a reputation, and their services are purchased for a very high fee. They are familiar with the properties of certain plants, and they keep this knowledge secret and exploit it as much as possible. It would be wrong to believe that the fetisher's practices are all based on mystification.

M 278 695 Ebandia, the high chief of the Mosengere, knew the secret of certain poisons. He knew effective remedies for certain kinds of festering wounds; he proportioned the quantity of poison at ordeals so as to make its action violent or slow, and he was familiar with an antidote which cancelled out the effects of the poison.

M 278 695 684 A few hours before our arrival at Penge, Ebandia had subjected [23] one of his wives to trial by poison, on the mere suspicion that she might have gone too far with a native during a slightly prolonged stay in the forest. Ebandia accused her of adultery, prepared the beverage, and compelled the poor woman to prove her innocence by taking the poison. The unfortunate creature rebelled. A quarrel arose, and the village natives, when informed of the matter, protested against it, to no avail, however. The old tyrant carried out the ordeal. He had been notified of our impending arrival, and after allowing the unfortunate woman to suffer horribly for nearly two hours, he gave her the antidote. Five hours later, all the effects of the poison were gone. [Ed., the text is not translated from the last paragraph, page 23, to the second paragraph, page 26.]

T 764 [26] In general the natives have a kind of cult of the dead. In the Bateke-Banfumu region, the corpse is wrapped in fabrics. The more important the deceased person is, the larger the bundle. His whole wealth in fabrics goes with him to the grave. Prior

S 224 778 of false bamboo, two or three arrowheads, and a small bow had been stuck in this paste. At the foot of the stake the natives had piled a whole series of antelope and buffalo skulls. These remains alone were vaguely reminiscent of the hunting fetish of the Kasai region.

M S 224 778 It is possible that this very simple form of the nkisi of the hunt is also the earliest and that it is closest to ancestral custom, since the primitive shelters of the neighboring peoples and the huts characteristic of the Bateke-Banfumu tribes are actually a mere elaboration of the custom followed by the parental branch of these peoples, a custom which called for the skull of the largest animal killed during the hunt to be dedicated to the guardian spirits of the hunt and to be placed at the foot of the physical representation of these spirits.

M 224 778 In the region of Oshwe and Bumbuli we found no trace of this custom. Each village, however, possessed its hunting fetish. The one in the Yaelima village of Yanga is among the most interesting. A tall shrub stands near a group of four huts located slightly apart from the principal area of the settlement. Two forked stakes, 1.20 meters apart, stand close by, and a straight stick lies on the ground, which may be placed on the forks. A small piece of a calabash hangs by two lianas, one of which is tied to the tree, the other to one of the forked stakes. The calabash contains substances with magic power: a mixture of mpembe and black earth, forming a muddy paste. Before leaving on a communal hunt, each hunter who owns a net must walk by this fetish. The head of one of his arrows or of his spear is dipped in the small calabash, and part of the mud that sticks to it [81] is spread on the nets. Upon returning from the hunt, a piece of flesh from one of the animals killed is hung on the crossbar lying on the two forked stakes. The custom of depositing skulls does not seem to be known in the region.

The hunting fetish of the Bokala in the village of Yoshomo Monene stands in the center of the native settlement. It consists of two forked stakes which may be joined by a crossbar, exactly like the framework of the Yaelima hunting fetish. The tall shrub is replaced by an herbaceous plant with thick leaves. The calabash containing the magic substances lies on the ground between the 224 778 plant and one of the stakes. The customs and ceremonies observed before leaving for the communal hunt are identical to those we have just described.

224 As to the relations between the fetisher, the hunting fetish, and the individual hunter, we will ignore them, having been unable to obtain any information on this subject in these regions.

Throughout the region we visited, large-scale hunting is done communally. As a rule, all the men participate, including young men from the age of 15. [Ed., the text is not translated from the last paragraph, page 81, to the second paragraph, page 83.]

[83] The catch of the communal hunt is shared among all the families in the village, with the chief and the dignitaries having special rights.

224 622 Individual hunting does not entail any distribution, except when a buffalo, leopard, or elephant is involved. [293] The tail of the buffalo goes to the native chief, who uses it as a fly-chaser and a badge of rank. [281] The skin of the leopard is reserved for the chief, who makes it into a skirt which he displays ostentatiously at important festivities and public dances. The trunk and tusks of the elephant go to the chief while the bristles go in [778] [301] part to the hunters and [84] in part to the local dignitaries, who use them to make necklaces.

M 301 857 Children are usually overloaded with gaudy ornaments: white feathers stuck in the hair, necklaces and belts of glass beads, and small bells attached to the belt. In our opinion, however, these objects are not primarily intended to adorn the child, but to protect it. There is no doubt that the mother sticks the feathers in her child's hair and attaches small bells to his belt in order to find him more easily if he gets lost in the fields or in the bush. As soon as the child is old enough to find his own way and return to the village alone, bells and feathers are given up permanently. [185]

M 301 171 According to their ornaments, the peoples of the Stanley Pool-Kole region are divided into five groups.

845 [202] The event is announced by the usual signal, but the signal is doubled or, if the children are of different sexes, the signal for each sex is given once. It is followed by the dance beat: two [535] or three long and two short.

The next day the father's relatives go outside the village, 845 preferably to a crossroads. On each side they plant a stalk of 778 lokőkólőkő. All around the stalk they spread a little heap of small branches and various leaves called jǔké. It is a sign and a place of benediction and good fortune. Each passer-by stops, picks two leaves, places one on each pile, spits on it, and says swá.(2) Then they clap hands and twice sing out, yelí yeye. Such behavior brings the benediction of the twins upon a person's journey, his undertakings, his marriage. The umbilical cord as well as the placenta and membrane are buried under the heap.

845 302 [386] Every morning the mother and father draw two stripes with kaolin on the middle of their foreheads and on their arms, above and below the elbow. They do the same to the twins. (3) They continue doing so until the child is weaned. If after that time one of the children falls ill, they begin again treating him in this manner until he is cured, taking care not to omit his brother, lest he too fall ill. For while these designs are signs of joy, they are [751] above all a prophylactic measure against children's fever (ikűtswáki), [502] called wǎsanyi when it occurs in twins or in a child following them, and manifests itself chiefly by tumors of the head and face.

845 551 Twins are invariably called Mbőyő and Bokétu, names given to the first born and the second respectively, whatever their sex. The Bombwanja (like the Ekonda) use the names Mbőő and Mpia, respectively. The mother takes the name of Ǎmbǎ.

where the Nkundó gather for magical practices, oracles, etc.), she also sings and dances in honor of the spirit, so that he will favor her

Foods forbidden to twins are the mushrooms called bilingoi shoulder The mother also attaches a bell to it. Their hair is often [301] adorned with two feathers from the tail of a gray parrot (nkoso) and two feathers from a white hen. [504]

845 The greeting to parents of twins and their reply must always

583 607 used by her father, Nkamba ɛ́y'ontole of Bofɛ́tola (Bonjoku), to pay a supplement for his wife Bekombe. On this account the latter became her daughter's nkita. The double bride price served to obtain the wife Lintamba for Ifolí y'onguma, Bekombe's brother and Mbɛ́lá's uncle, and Lintamba thus belonged to both mother and daughter, but the two did not fight about the matter.

One person can have two or more nkita, especially if her bride price is so large that it can be used to obtain several wives. Such is the case of Mputú (Sofia) of the Basɛ́ká Mbangɔ́ of Bonganda (Bonkoso). Her first husband, Mpɛ́nda of Lofelí, paid 40 rings and a slave. With this sum Mputú's uncle, [172] Mbangɔ́ ɛ́y'akoso (who had settled with the Elángá l'Imomo, his mother's clan), paid the bride price for Bonjɔ́lɔ́ of Nkɛ́lengo. (1) In the meantime, Mpɛ́nda was killed in a fight with his brother, Iloko. Mputú married Elɔ́ngola, Mpɛ́nda's nephew, but then he died after two or three years of marriage. She was then married to Lokonga of Lɔ̌ngá (Nkɔ́le), whose life was not much longer, and finally to Bakutu (Boniface) of Bombɛ́nga w'ɔ̌kenda (Besombɔ́, Bombwanja), who paid a considerable bride price. A part of this bride price was a compensation to the family of the last husband, and another portion was used by Mbangɔ́ to acquire as wife, Bongelí of Ekúkola. By means of the bride price paid by Lokonga, Mbangɔ́ (Joseph), a first cousin of Mputú, obtained the wife Bolɛ́já (who came from the Ionda). Lastly, Bakutu gave Bonjɛ́kyá (Christophe) of Losɛ́linga, a distant cousin of Mputú, the necessary bride price to marry Embongámbembe of Lɔ̌ngá, who on this account also became the nkita of Mputú, though not in the strict sense of the term. Mputú thus has four nkita, although not all of them are living.

● [782] [727] 1. During a war against the Nkɛ́lengo, this woman had been captured by the Elángá, who wanted to sacrifice her to the ikwɛí at a feast which terminated the mourning. But Mbangɔ́ begged the notables to let her live because he loved her very much and wanted to marry her.

[531] 1. She bore the name of Mbálaka (meaning indemnity), because her father had solemnly proclaimed (-békya) and publicly promised that he intended, one day, to place himself in the position of having to pay an indemnity because of his daughter, as proof of his love. Indeed
● [782] when Mbálaka was married, he killed one of his wives, cut her into pieces, and sent the "meat" to his son-in-law as "the first hen" that his wife would pre-
[682] pare for him. But he did not have to pay
[614] the indemnity because the victim's clan was too weak to attempt a war; they did not dare to make a claim and, in order to avoid even greater misfortunes, they resigned themselves to this revolting ignominy.

Article V

Relations Between the Husband and His Wife's Family

606 As has already been said, kinship by marriage is called likiló, 607 and relatives by marriage are called bokiló, bakiló. Mbótsoló is a term of respect for very close relatives by marriage (father-in-law, mother-in-law, sometimes brother-in-law or sister-in-law). When there is a considerable age difference between two affinal relatives, the elder one sometimes calls the younger bokilówalé. This happens most frequently when the son-in-law is so young that he can still be considered a child. This term can even be used by an elder brother

Note,

842 833 [843] finally, that sexual relations are strictly forbidden to them during menstruation (-kona or éna nsóngé, literally "to be ill from" or "to see the moon," and other similar expressions). The reason given is that a woman in that difficult condition should be spared all additional annoyance.

1. Elímá

842 776 The Nkundó attribute the procreation of children sometimes to God (Njakomba) and sometimes to spirits (elímá, pl. bilímá). God forms (-ánga) the children in the mother's womb, but at the same time the bilímá provide the men among the progeny. (1)

● [182] 1. Contrary to what is reported by Father Lestaeghe (Congo, 1922, Vol. 1, p. 363) concerning the Ekonda, the tribes that I have known never address prayers for children to God, although they attribute the gift of children to Him. This matter does not concern God (Njakomba or Mbombiándá) directly, but rather a particular elímá.

Sterility, which is a common phenomenon here, is not imputed to sorcery but is considered an innate flaw. Natives usually claim that God refuses them children.

There is no point in trying to make the natives resolve this apparent contradiction; they would not succeed. They simply state the two points. I say "apparent contradiction," for as the Nkundó admit that the bilímá are subject to Njakomba, the contradiction is not real, and the two propositions can be [470] reconciled by explaining the intervention of the spirits as an operation which is dependent on divine action: they are secondary, intermediary causes, although our natives do not make this philosophical analysis.

To explain all the beliefs pertaining to spirits would be to go outside the framework of this study. Nevertheless, we cannot leave out those details which closely touch on our subject.

This funeral drumming is kept up for a long time, off and on for days, and is very 624 stirring in its rhythm. While it is going on, the elders congregate in an ebanga. They 766 fast and have nothing to do with their wives during this time. The ekopo is mourning, and the molembe may be likewise mourning, but for the others it is a time of rejoicing, [533] and also of the relaxing of moral restraints. It is an occasion for dancing by both Batwa and 'freemen', the former regarding this as a time for special rejoicing, [535] for the nkumu was their master and now he is dead they are no longer under restraint.
They are free to take any of their master's goods and even to snatch blankets off the [563] corpse. Men and women do not dance together; the women, taking some of their husbands' weapons, go off in one direction, and the men, arrayed in finery, dance at the other end of the village.

While the nkumu is still unburied and the drumming is going on, the molembe look for a successor among the ekopo. Often this man will, as we have seen, have already been designated. The molembe, Batwa, and others in the village make up a party, and attired in war finery go off with their weapons as though after a man they wished to kill. As they go they sing: [539]

Nkombe w'oopiita elimbo
We elale we nko?
Hawk, thou hast destroyed the nest,
Where art thou going to sleep?

Before catching the real successor they catch one or another in fun, singing this song. The man of course refuses to be nkumu, and the point of the song is that because of his refusal the ekope no longer fulfils its function of supplying the molembe with nkumu and therefore ceases to be of any use to them. If this man by refusing thus destroys the family nest, where will they sleep?

Finally, after this fun, the real successor is caught, his face daubed with black, and [303]
the group sing: [539]

Bela lusu-oo, lusola nkulu.
The cunning animal is hiding, reveal the tortoise.

Thus the new nkumu, like a cunning animal, is hiding, but when discovered, like the tortoise, he will not try to run away. The whole group conducts the new nkumu to the ipana and sits all night guarding him. Earlier on the day of the actual interment of the dead nkumu, the new one is installed with ceremonies as already described.

On the day the nkumu dies his people scatter to other villages to look for slaves 766 for the executions on the day of the burial. Slave-owners or husbands of unwanted wives ask quietly how much money there is for the man or woman, accept the agreed 567 amount, and tell the buyers to go quietly and catch the slave or wife before anything 762 is suspected and an escape is made. In this connexion we may note two classes of 562 wives, bopika and iboto. A third class, boamba, acquired by the payment of a very small bride price, was not nearly as common formerly as at present and may be passed by. A bopika was a slave wife acquired by capture in war or stolen. If loved by her husband she will take her place practically on an equality with the members of the village, but she may be killed, for she is her husband's possession, 'his money' is the native expression. An iboto is a wife for whom a very high bride price has been paid, obliging her family to give wives to the other family in perpetuity, supplying 766 a successor to replace a deceased woman, and thus maintaining the balance between 567 the two families. Such wives were seldom killed, for they had relatives who cared for them and would object, and who had the power to do so by refusing to ● 792 fulfil their obligations and by retaining the bride price already received. The group 562 of men and women gathered together for execution thus comprised males and bopika women from the 'free' group (baoto, as applied to all men and women not Batwa), and Batwa men and women whose owners had consented to their death. It sometimes happened that a man, seeing a woman among this group who took his fancy, might obtain her by paying for her in money or substituting one of his own slaves.

766 In some cases the executioner, bomembe, was chosen from among the family of the dead nkumu, in others he was selected from among the whole group of people over 792 which the nkumu held sway. The man having been chosen, the knife is brought out of the house where it has been kept by some elder. This, a blade some sixteen [412] inches in length, two-edged, decorated by alternating longitudinal lines of polished and blackened steel and inserted in a wooden handle, is sharpened on one edge, carefully wrapped in a plantain leaf, and laid away for use on the following day.

At dawn the prisoners are taken to the water and washed to clean them, inland towns accomplishing this purpose by dragging them up and down the village in the dew-drenched grass tied by a liana. The prisoners then are arranged in a V shape, the apex nearest the spot where the nkumu's body is sitting in state. Low seats are made by resting a stick in the forks of two perpendicular ones, and this cross bar is straddled by the victim. His hands are tied behind his back and his head tied to a sapling securely fixed at one end in the ground, the other bent down sufficiently to allow for tying the head with considerable tension on the rope. When all is thus arranged an expert drummer begins to pound out a rhythmic beat, and the ceremony of handing over the knife takes place.

The executioner of the day is dressed in finery but no camwood powder is evident, for it is a time of mourning and not of rejoicing. He wears a hat with many feathers, a vine encircles his waist, and bracelets of the same his arms. Then the man who last occupied the position of executioner comes forward. An elder has already brought the knife wrapped in its leaf and also a heap of ash on a leaf, both of which are placed on the ground. The old executioner picks up the knife while the new one faces him.
The former demonstrates with gestures how he used to go about his work, the motions, the attitudes, the fine arts of the task. Even though the executioner of the day may have had previous experience, this part of the ceremony must be gone [516] through. Then, holding the knife aloft, the instructor raises his right leg at right angles to his body, bends it at the knee so that the shin hangs perpendicularly, and the new executioner passes underneath it, returning the same way. He now faces the old executioner, who lays the knife in his own hands, arms outstretched and palms open, the handle resting in his right palm, the blade in his left. The new man, facing his instructor, places his outstretched and open palms on the shoulders of the other, draws his hands down his arms, finally coming to the knife, which, because of its position is thus received, handle in the left hand, blade in the right. Releasing his right-hand grasp of the blade, he stoops, sprinkles the blade with some of the ash, then rubs his right hand in the dirt to remove all slippery sweat. Then still grasping the knife with his left hand, with his free right hand he drains a gourd of 782 palm wine to gain courage, hits the nearest victim on the head with the empty gourd, 766 then transfers the knife to his right hand. He is now ready for his work which he proceeds to do methodically, sustained by the heady wine and the rhythm of the drum. When he had finished one of the lines, a pause would be made to bring out the body for burial. Just before this is done an armed band rushes down the path, returns, goes up in the other direction, then returns; this is said by some to ward off any spirits which might be about. The nkumu is now brought out by the Batwa slaves.[1] His grave, a circular hole with a crypt in one side of it, its entrance facing west, had been previously prepared. Few people in the Bonginda villages knew or had seen the actual burying place of an nkumu. While the corpse was carried to the grave followed by a crowd, the executioner finished his work. Those who stayed behind took the bodies of the decapitated men and women and divided [266] them among all the participants of the funeral who would subsequently devour everything.

Accompanying the funeral procession to the grave were the ndeli, one or more men or women who were destined to accompany the nkumu to his grave and to the other world beyond. At the burial of an nkumu witnessed in 1930 at which the semblances of some of the old rites were carried out, a party of armed men contested the right of the procession to approach the grave, there was a mock battle for a few minutes between two bands of the funeral party, and then the procession gained right of way. At the grave-side the legs and sometimes the arms of one ndeli were broken by heavy clubs to prevent him from escaping. Then seated on the ground the body of the nkumu would be placed on the knees of this one, whose arms would be placed round the nkumu and securely fastened by driving a peg right through both wrists. Sometimes two ndeli were thus used. If the number of victims was sufficient, [516] others would be buried alive too, being placed in the grave in the recumbent monsepa position, with the corpse on top of them, its weight being sufficient, with the earth filling in the grave, to prevent escape. The nkumu was now ready for burial and was placed in the crypt, facing west.[2] The relatives of the nkumu approach, they pluck [824] the leaves and stem of a juicy bush known as mokako and chewing it, expectorate ceremonially on the body while they address it in language somewhat as follows: 'You are going to leave us now, we are mourning, for you were a good and wise man, your discernment in matters of justice was without parallel, &c. . . . we wish that you may be happy where you go, have many wives, beget many children, lack not for meat. But don't take with you our power to beget children, leave us also some of this wisdom of yours, for what you were, we would be.' This prayer over, the montolo would be slipped off the head of the corpse and replaced by the informal hat, all done so dexterously that the bare head was not seen. The entrance to the [184]

[1] The body was supposed to have remained in state for seven to nine days, but actually it was buried privately soon after death, a dummy being set up with the montolo on its head, and the succeeding ceremonies being conducted with only the dummy in the place of the actual body. The inland villages however did allow the body to remain unburied for the long period, the wives being forced to keep watch in the same house. The Bonginda buried their nkumu generally in their houses at the spot where they had been accustomed to rest, burying the dummy at some other spot farther off.

[2] All burials have particular regard to this east-west position, those buried in the recumbent position having the feet to the west. The native explanation is that this allows the spirit of the departed to follow the path of the sinking sun. [823]

766 crypt would then be barred by mats in order to leave it as a hollow chamber, and 782 the hole leading down to it filled in with earth.

For a month or two after the burial the festivities and orgies continued. Women 766 would be hanged to create some diversion, but those hanged were not eaten. Decapi-782 tations would continue. According to the informants only slaves brought in from a distance would have to be tied to prevent their escape. The slave members of the 567 household of the dead nkumu would await their turn stoically, content to die that [152] they might accompany their master in his journey to the land of spirits. This may be true but scarcely seems possible. Still another diversion in the funeral orgies was killing in the manner known as esumbu. If some man who had a slave did not wish him to be hanged or beheaded, he might give him for this other method. As the weeks slipped by, such a one, his life having apparently been spared, would suppose that all was safe and that there was little chance of his being taken, and, thus emboldened, would, instead of keeping at a safe distance, join the crowd to watch a beheading. His death would be prearranged. At the moment of beheading a victim, someone would drive a spear into the unsuspecting man, the whole crowd then using spears and knives to stab and slash until he fell. Some might be tortured to death by being buried up to the neck and left thus exposed to the hot sun without food or water until death intervened, but this was not a common practice at such funerals.

768 The termination of the dead nkumu's affairs took place when the division of the inheritance was made, a long and complicated process.

178 Such were the old days before European penetration. The advent of the white 624 man half a century ago was the beginning of the end. The ceremonies had to be given up, though reluctantly. Occasionally now goats are beheaded in place of human victims, and many of the younger generation find that, even so, the sight is more than they can endure, and they seek refuge elsewhere. Nkumu are not anxious for the honours. They find little or no respect paid to them by the government officials and this is a distinct obstacle to their obtaining honour from their own people. When the nkumu resident in the village adjacent to the mission station died, one of the Natives was asked who would be next. The reply was that probably no one would appear as a successor. Asked why, he answered, 'There are too many trousers.' He meant that too many were adopting the ways of the white man to
of judge, the paramount chief now takes his place, cases tried must be recorded by a clerk of the court, and fines paid into the treasury of the chieftaincy. With such a state of affairs the old ways drop into desuetude, and the younger generation grow up knowing less of the ways of their fathers as the years pass.

614 621 202 624 It is the task of the messengers to transmit all important messages to the other groups in accordance with a precise plan; this is particularly true regarding the invitations to the meetings of the village council with the nkúmú. At the same time they inform the other groups as to the program of the meeting. The first messenger calls on the messenger of the other community; the old men are gathered at the latter's house in order to receive and to discuss the message. The messenger of this community, in turn, departs for the next in line. As a result of this practice the messenger and his home became one of the centers of social life.

621 614 361 623 The same uniformity is found in community II. Here we can also see the engangala, the meeting place of the village Isangi and of its branch villages. The meeting place is an open space in which stands a short tree with a broad crown. The representatives of the several villages gather in the shade of this tree since one of the open men's houses could not accommodate all of them. The senior of the nuclear kinship groups Mpia (No. 14), Nsambi (No. 15), and Liengo (No. 16) has his house on this spot which is situated on the border of the territory belonging to these three groups. The elder of Mpia, however, is the messenger for the hamlet of Boyeke; he may of course be identical with the "elder on the engangala."

614 621 Cohesion within the third settlement community was also so strong that it employs only one messenger. The kinship subgroup Nsambɔ́sɛ́lɛ́ which is concentrated in this hamlet is said to consist of the descendants of an illegitimate child of the daughter of the village founder (see Diagram 1). As is the case in many other villages, it is therefore entrusted with the office of the ●[782] [624] botɛ́ni, who carries out the sacrifice of human beings and animals on the proper occasions.

614 621 624 202 The three communities just described are relatively homogeneous groups; the three following ones are quite heterogeneous. The two groups of hamlet IV belong to the kinship subgroups Iyolo and Mbo. In contrast to the kinship subgroups Lovendo and Besilo, they regard themselves as sufficiently different from

776 There is a large number of diverse spirits, and almost 823 every village has several in its territory Each one has its own habitat in some singular place or object which stimulates the imagination: enormous trees, oval hollows which form ponds of a sort (jémbo, pl. baémbo), steep slopes, extraordinary pieces of limonite, whirlpools in streams and rivers, etc

776 The Nkundó pray to the bilímá in order to obtain children.
842 For that purpose they make offerings of food and money. To test someone's feelings toward it, an elímá may come to him in the evening or at night in the guise of a known person and ask for some small present. Unhappy is he who shows himself to be stingy; he will be deprived of the object of his desire, or his child will be premature or born sickly or deformed.

783 In addition to taking a generally friendly attitude toward 842 the spirit, another means of ensuring his intervention is open to a 776 woman. She can procure some kaolin (gongo) at the spirit's habitat (a jémbo, preferably). In the evening she mixes it with some plants. She smears her abdomen with this mixture, known [843] as isaá. She continues the treatment throughout her pregnancy; it has the property of removing everything in her which is of such a nature that it might oppose the spirit (ákékola lokeko jwǎ bilíma lǒle ndá likundú).

Certain water spirits are known for their generosity, for 776 instance Itúmbálombé or Ekótalombé of Mpakú, [471] who is 842 considered to be a female being. She goes on distant voyages to seek a supply of children. On her return she appears to someone and communicates the news to him so that he may spread it. But she orders all women who desire her favors to observe some form of abstinence. Sometimes she sings to amuse or calm the children On that day mothers must not use songs to pacify their little ones or to put them to sleep and can use only soft words for that purpose. Otherwise the child would die, for to do so would be to disregard the old elímá's kindness.

Sometimes the spirits give signs of their blessing. A woman
[787] who is bathing on the shore just at the time a cargo arrives there will soon see her most intimate wish fulfilled From forest spirits

843 a woman's mother proceeded with the ceremony in the absence of the husband and his family. The latter were furious. They revealed the matter so that if anything should happen later to the mother or the child the law would be on their side. In that way the husband could evade responsibility and place the blame on his wife and her family so that they would have to pay an indemnity.

The pregnant woman does not remove the paint for three or [302] four weeks after the ceremony. Nowadays the use of paint having [178] disappeared except for certain occasions and among older persons, it is left on for only one night. In addition the surface smeared has been reduced to a line in the middle of the head or even one single spot.

●[783] During this ceremony the Bombwanja have a public confession [837] (etato) of the lovers. But since the Bokótś wait until after delivery, we will deal with it later on.

On the night following the ceremony described, the couple [833] [476] "fasten the fetus" through their carnal union. Were they to omit this act, the child would die before birth.

For subsequent pregnancies the fastening of the fetus is no longer preceded by the same formalities.

The couple continue to have relations during the entire [833] period of pregnancy "in order to open an easy passage for the child." 843 On the other hand, they must strictly observe marital fidelity. 837 Nevertheless, a polygamist may have relations with his other wives.

In addition to this essential art, the interdict also includes a secondary part; the couple may not even commit acts even very remotely related to procreation. Thus they may not:

1) Touch in any way whatsoever -- even to shaking their hands -- persons with whom they have had adulterous relations; such persons must therefore be avoided.

2) Sit next to such persons.

3) Look at them.

4) Enter a house or apartment where they are.

5) Eat "from the same pot."

6) Lie in another couple's bed.

7) Other persons may no longer sleep in the bed of the couple bound by the bokeka.

853 quantity of leaves, which he puts in his little basket called ilámbá.
757 If a leaf falls in the course of this operation, he must stop and throw away all that he has picked up to that point. The massage cannot take place on that day for it would cause the child to die falling and withering like a leaf. The father must start all over again the next day.

There are always two masseuses: one of the husband's kinswoman and one of the wife's. (1) They crush the leaves in

1. The Injóló sometimes permit a man to perform the massage.

[743] the same single mortar (eoka). The mother meanwhile must make her public confession, of which we will speak again in a moment. When the substances intended for rubbing have been prepared, the two masseuses begin their operation, which must be quite painful. The husband's relative takes care of the right breast, the wife's concentrates on [494] the left. (1)

1. This is a natural arrangement for our people; the term used to indicate "husband" (bóme) is undoubtedly etymologically related to the one denoting "the right" (elóme), and there is some likelihood that the same is true for wǎlɛ́ (wife) and iɛ́li (left).

They energetically massage the breasts from the top to the bottom with the mixture. After a few minutes they test the milk by letting a few drops run out onto a burning fragment of pottery. If the reaction is normal the mother begins to nurse. If on the other hand, the milk curdles and solidifies (baɛ̌le báonda) like rubber, it is a sign that it is of bad quality because of the presence of an internal boil in the breast, called ǐtsɛ́. In that case the knowledge and skill of a woman expert is called upon. The latter rubs the leaves of a creeper between her hands in order to extract

853 the sap, which she then mixes with water. The resulting liquid is 757 oily and foams like soap. She places a few drops on a piece of banana leaf and makes a sachet of it. She holds this against the breast for a certain time until the boil, similar to a blood clot or a piece of liver, leaves the breast and enters the sachet. She then shows it to those present. From then on the mother can nurse her child without fear; her milk has become healthy and normal.

2) The mother's public confession must include the names
837 of all the men with whom she has had carnal relations since the 853 child's conception. Other groups, such as the Injóló, extend this 684 obligation even to instances preceding that moment but which 783 have not been declared at a previous occasion. The confession is public. The masseuse related to the husband begins to crush the leaves to be used in rubbing the breast; as she moves the pestle and says to the mother, "Name a man." The mother replies by giving a name. The masseuse says nyongo, "indemnity." Then all those present say yengô, yengô, yengô, "absolved" Then it is the other masseuse's turn, and she interrogates the mother in the same way. The process continues till all the names have been cited. If [495] the mother cites the name of a man who is a close relative of her husband and who therefore does not need to pay an indemnity, the masseuse does not reply nyongo. Instead a member of the husband's clan makes the gesture signifying

The indemnity that must be paid by those who are obligated to do so consists of a hen and a bunch of bananas (or their cash value) which are to be given to the masseuses, who will then divide them. Were the accused to refuse, the husband would demand a regular indemnity from him after the end of the seclusion.

The Bombwanja have this confession at the time of the [184] fastening of the fetus. A few old women married into the clan carry out the interrogation. The kernel of the fruit of the palm is thrown by means of a knife.

837 Note, finally, that the confession is restricted to married 783 women. It is never expected of a young unmarried mother. Therefore 853 it would seem to be a practice connected with marriage (a social institution) and not with childbirth (a physiological phenomenon).

This confession is called etato or lotato, from the verb [192] -tata, "to confess," (for which the generic term, sanga, "to say," is sometimes substituted).

I was unable to find any reason for this practice other than that of avoiding the death of the child. It is evident, however, that this explanation does not exhaust the question, although it is entirely possible that the original and deeper meaning has been lost without leaving any trace in the minds of the present generation. [496]

3) During the entire duration of nursing, the mother must 853 not be separated from her child. For the usual circumstances of 933 daily life, this rule is broadly interpreted; but during sexual relations it is strict, and no exceptions or excuses are permitted. Negligence under these circumstances would inevitably bring about the death of the child by ndota as soon as the mother took it back. This rule holds for legitimate relations as much as for illicit ones. Therefore the mother must always keep her child at her breast.

4) If at some point during nursing, the milk no longer flows
953 in sufficient quantity, the mother is given a potion consisting of [757] the extract of the bark of the bolóngé tree (which has a fruit con-[278] taining a very sweet milky sap). Then she eats vegetables called lotélé. (1)

1. The leaves of this plant are also ordinarily eaten as vegetables, but they are consumed especially by those who possess the modern magical practice known as boyaóli.

5) An accident to which the Nkundó attach great importance
[262] is the rejection or vomiting of milk into the mouth of an adult, even if the person affected is the infant's mother. Such a person

1. See Chapter VI, Article VI.

[606] same question may be raised with respect to another strict rule of decorum which forbids a man to look his mother-in-law in the face. (2)

2. For details concerning this custom, see Chapter VI, Article V, 1.

It can readily be answered in the affirmative. (3)

3. Nevertheless, see Chapter X, Article II, 3.

784 516 The rule of decorum which forbids a man to sit down on a seat where a woman is seated who is not his wife seems to me also to be dictated by sexual modesty. On the other hand, stepping over the seat under such circumstances has nothing whatever to do with this feeling. The purpose of this practice is to enable the person seated (regardless of sex) to avoid the evil repercussions of a charm or magic spell in his or her possession. (4)

4. Contrary to the explanation given by Jadot in Blancs et Noirs au Congo Belge (Whites and Blacks in the Belgian Congo], p. 90.

291 834 Is the native ashamed to show his nakedness? Let us beware of answering this question in general terms. In order to have an idea of the situation which is sufficiently clear and precise, various cases and circumstances must be taken into account.

1) First of all it can be stated that in the normal course of daily living the Nkundó, men as well as women, do all they can to hide their genital organs. That is to say that basically they are

535 far the most inventive tribe. All the dances have two distinguishable parts: the dance strictly speaking and the finale or ikóeyo. The latter consists of acrobatic exhibitions or a theatrical performance. It varies with each performance and sometimes goes beyond the limits of decency, especially in certain scenes of the women's dances. Here everything depends on the attitude of the actors and spectators.

535 786 [533] The words sung are usually proper. Passages that may be less so occur only exceptionally. The exclamations of some of the male or female dancers, but mostly those of the audience when the intensity of the performance reaches a climax, are somewhat less innocent. Thus this climax [62] is the weak spot morally speaking. This is true especially of the dances performed by the women who, led on by their passion and encouraged by the cheering and applause of the spectators, make provocative movements (bitékó, bembónjo). A European will see nothing wrong, but the native knows the gestures and their meaning. The spectators then applaud with even greater enthusiasm, either because of sexual feelings or out of aesthetic enjoyment, for to them these movements are beautiful. All the artistic dances for women which are the fashion at the present time contain a similar phase of exaggerated excitement. It is therefore understandable that in the past the elders strictly forbade children and adolescents to attend these dances.

[586] After what has just been said, no one will be astonished to hear that these great dances are often the cause of adultery and divorce. And to a limited extent the same can be said for the men's dances, for masculine beauty is exhibited in an enticing manner.

533 535 The rhythmic motions which sometimes accompany singing during drinking parties cannot really be called dances; nothing shocking is implied by them and the words of the songs are seldom improper. Salacious songs are rarely sung in the course of daily living, but they are never omitted from funeral ceremonies.

535 [177 831] Up to now we have spoken of artistic dances, which are always very popular. They were -- and are -- reserved for certain special occasions. For ordinary circumstances the Nkundó have a few little entertaining dances which have nothing at all in common with the dance as such. They are more like games. The lyrics of the songs lǒngo -- a hoe (real or replaced by a ring) to dig the grave.

ifaká -- a knife (ditto) to dig the grave.

yǎndá -- an axe (ditto) to cut the roots that would be found at the site of the grave. (1)

● [787] 1. One day I saw the iron bar given as yǎndá refused by the wife's family because it was the same one they themselves had given to help the husband pay the nkanga (doctor-sorcerer) for his divination (bolíngó) during the wife's illness.

botsá w'ǐláká -- the head of the corpse, in honor of those who wail over the deceased while sitting near her head, that is, [438] to say, the very close relatives. This is the last and largest payment, consisting of 3 to 5 rings.

All these payments together comprise the nkunjí and, with the exception of the nsango, the likongá l'etóo, and the byěko by'ǒkáko, they are a kind of beéngo. (1) Not all the beéngo are equally large. Therefore, all of them are not always claimed. The smallest ones -- bakemo, bantsingá, baóndo, nkóngi, bokengo, nsili, bompúlo, mpuka -- are often omitted.

Even some of the others may be left out. The matter depends not only on the friendliness of feeling between the two groups, but chiefly on the number of children to which the woman in question has given birth. If the woman was sterile, her family is less demanding. But if the deceased had several children, they do not yield, arguing that their daughter was a source of great profit to her husband's clan.

Article VI. The Economic Position of a Widow

736 768 As long as her seclusion lasts, a widow continues to live with the family of her deceased husband. She supplies herself with food from the crops she has grown. The tools her husband has given her remain in her hands, and she makes use of them as soon as she can. As to the various utensils which must be destroyed, they are replaced by others lent her by the family of the deceased, for she may no longer use those which served her in her husband's lifetime.

In order to better express the magnitude of their mourning, the Nkundó often refrain [441] from using the products of the farms established by the deceased. Therefore, instead of continuing to cultivate the existing crops of manioc and vegetables, the widow prefers to seek provisions in the fields of the close relatives of the deceased. Or a man who has already chosen her may place his fields at her disposal. If neither of these sources is available and she wishes to observe the rule rigorously, she must purchase what she needs in this realm.

736 768 421 As we have seen in Chapter VI, Article II, a widow has no claim to the fruits of her labors. Neither the money she has earned and which is intended for the common needs of the household, nor the crops she has set up, nor the fish she has caught, nor the caterpillars she has gathered in the forest belong to her. Everything goes to the heirs. Her property is limited to objects she may have received as her personal share in her daughter's bride price, or as some other payment belonging exclusively to the mother.

If the widow remains in the family of the deceased, however, her fields, tools, etc., are left to her, for under those conditions there is no reason to take them away from her. But if she ● [787] remarries elsewhere, the heirs are pitiless. A Nkundó does not want the family wealth to be scattered or squandered in any way. The law says lokutu lǒkísó lőfótsw'înyamó, "our patrimony cañ not be alienated."

736 768 In point of fact the widow is treated more favorably, at least in the best instances. If her relations with the family have been good, they will not refuse her some small object that she

776 823 There is a large number of diverse spirits, and almost every village has several in its territory Each one has its own habitat in some singular place or object which stimulates the imagination: enormous trees, oval hollows which form ponds of a sort (jěmbo, pl. baémbo), steep slopes, extraordinary pieces of limonite, whirlpools in streams and rivers, etc

776 842 The Nkundó pray to the bilímá in order to obtain children. For that purpose they make offerings of food and money. To test someone's feelings toward it, an elímá may come to him in the evening or at night in the guise of a known person and ask for some small present. Unhappy is he who shows himself to be stingy; he will be deprived of the object of his desire, or his child will be premature or born sickly or deformed.

783 842 776 In addition to taking a generally friendly attitude toward the spirit, another means of ensuring his intervention is open to a woman. She can procure some kaolin (eongo) at the spirit's habitat (a jěmbo, preferably). In the evening she mixes it with some plants. She smears her abdomen with this mixture, known as isaá. [843] She continues the treatment throughout her pregnancy; it has the property of removing everything in her which is of such a nature that it might oppose the spirit (ákékola lokeko jwǎ bilíma lǒle ndá likundú).

776 842 Certain water spirits are known for their generosity, for instance Itúmbálombé or Ekótalombé of Mpakú, [471] who is considered to be a female being. She goes on distant voyages to seek a supply of children. On her return she appears to someone and communicates the news to him so that he may spread it. But she orders all women who desire her favors to observe some form of abstinence. Sometimes she sings to amuse or calm the children On that day mothers must not use songs to pacify their little ones or to put them to sleep and can use only soft words for that purpose. Otherwise the child would die, for to do so would be to disregard the old elímá's kindness.

842
● [797] women receive other signs: an unexpected obstacle in the form of a stone, a stump, a root, the capture of a tree frog which comes and jumps onto the shoulder, etc

A spirit loves and protects only a child he himself has given. He abhors and hates to the death the living gifts of his fellow spirits. If there are several bilímá in the vicinity of a single village, however, the Nkundó explain the absence of the usual rivalries by considering them as related; one is the husband, another the wife, others the children; that is why they do not oppose each other.

Thus an elímá is hostile to any fetus not of his creation. Nevertheless, his spiteful action only begins at the end of several weeks, and even then the pregnancy must have gone far enough to be visible (jěmi jôkela isómbá) Does it take time for him to obtain evidence that the fruit in question is undoubtedly his own gift?

In any case the consequence of this belief is that a woman who has been pregnant for several months cannot long [472] reside in foreign parts, and one who, after conception, has accompanied a husband who has gone to work elsewhere, returns to her village to complete the last period of pregnancy and to deliver,

[751] However, there is an antidote (nsengó) against this murderous action of the spirits. It may be obtained from a person who knows the recipe (this person is not the nkanga or "doctor"). The protective compound is wrapped in a bit of cloth and, by means of a thread of fibers from the lokósá creeper, is tied in the middle of a rope braided with the fibers of the ikuluyaéndé bush, which the threatened woman ties around her hips. (1)

[115]
1. These data on the subject of the elímá is diametrically opposed to the ideas of Father Schebesta (Vollblutneger und Halbzwerge, p. 241, and W. Schmidt, Der Ursprung der Gottesidee, Vol. 4, p. 322), based on the word of his interpreter, . Bern. . Bongonga of Boúlama (Bombwanja) (now deceased), who was

Article V. Name Giving

553 Naming does not occur on any predetermined date. It is not delayed without a special reason. No feast or ceremony accompanies the event. The father simply puts colored powder on the child's forehead as a sign of joy.

It is the father's right to choose a name for his child. Sometimes he asks for the family's opinion. Preferably he gives names of his relatives, deceased or living, or sometimes his own. But it is proper to respect the mother's feelings also. Failure to take them into account could provoke the woman to cause an abortion in order to punish him for being so willful as to neglect her family.

[845] [769] [787] A painful childbirth, like the repeated death of preceding children, is often attributed to the rancor of a dead person who is discontented. In such a situation the Nkundó await the verdict of a dream, or they have recourse to the judgment of a nkanga (doctor-magician) in order to be able to satisfy the irascible dead.

553 551 If the situation recurs too often, the calamity is attributed to a rivalry between dead persons who are fighting over which of their respective names should be given to the newborn; the envious loser kills the child. In order to avoid such mean vengeance and make everyone content while satisfying none, the father gives the child a neutral name or a Botswa name, such as Bo̱tswá, Sáka, Ěfâlǐna (nameless), Botsilá (lack of success, bad luck), Litúli (dead without known cause), etc. If the child has already received a name, but for one reason or another the inauspicious fury of a ghost is feared, it is always possible to change from that name to another.

Children are usually given the names of relatives of the same sex. Exceptions are sometimes made, however, if one of the sexes is not sufficiently represented among the progeny, in which case the bearer of the name can always change it later, and he almost always does. Nevertheless, there are [500] no specifically male or female names, except for those that consist of the relative form of a verb, such as Ósâsuka, "the coquette," "Óyê̱me̱ngo̱, "she who comes with plenty," Ófénji, "she who excels." Finally, certain names are sometimes used for either sex.

596 invading groups of kinsfolk there was always one who was considered as the family head, and this man could claim the title of momene mokonda, the owner of the land. Round this man the rest of the members of the family group clustered, and he had the general direction of their affairs. He could scarcely be termed a chief, having a paternal oversight rather than exercising any wide authority demanding organizing ability and political astuteness. The succession of momene mokonda runs collaterally through younger brothers in the first place; hence if a first-born male happens to hold that position, the succession among his younger brothers is in the order of their birth. When these have all died the succession passes to the next generation. If all the males of a group die, it is possible for a daughter's son to leave his father's side in order to assume the position of momene mokonda on his mother's side.

A momene mokonda can delegate his duties as head to another member of the family, who is then termed molomi o ehe, the husband of the settlement. For such a privilege payment is generally made to the momene mokonda. Round these momene mokonda and their immediate kinsmen others gathered, forming, it may be, another section of the same settlement, known then as an etuka, or, if numerous, another settlement.[1]

624 [693] The momene mokonda (or molomi o ehe) hears and judges cases that come to him, aided always by a group of elders, and directs the activities of the settlement. However, this does not entirely satisfy the Tumba; they want an nkumu also. The nkumu is chosen, not by the whole settlement, but by a single village, or it may be even one etuka of a village. If the villages of a settlement were without an nkumu it would generally, but not necessarily, be the etuka of the momene mokonda which would lead off by seeking one out. The group desiring an nkumu are known as the molembe, and they look about for a man of the same tribe but not of the same settlement or village, an outsider. He must be a man of some wealth, for actually he will buy his right of authority and pay heavily for it. If the man who is approached accepts, he is known from then on until his accession as Nkema Akuke, the term nkumu not being used until he is finally invested with the insignia of office, the montolo, or hat of special design. Nkema Akuke's family is known as the ekopo, or nnango. This man, [556] once having accepted the invitation to become nkumu, sets about amassing wealth in the form of wives and brass rods. He may be years about it, but he does not thereby forfeit his right to the office, nor apparently weary those who extended the invitation. Should Nkema Akuke die before he is installed as nkumu, or should he wish to withdraw from the honour bestowed upon him, the succession passes to another member of his ekopo. The succession would normally pass to the eldest male of the ekopo, ● [787] but many circumstances may interfere to give it to another member of the family. A dream dreamed by a male of the ekopo to the effect that he should be the nkumu is sufficient to give him the right of succession over the eldest male. When asked [689] whether it was common to lie about such a dream having occurred, in order to gain the right of succession, those questioned received the suggestion with emphatic negatives, for this is no time to lie; any man so doing would be sure to die, and the fear of death would deter him from such baseness.

[1] Where practical, the invested chiefs set up by the Belgian Colonial Government are men chosen because of their right to be known as momene mokonda or molomi o ehe. Often, however, the settlements are so small and lacking in cohesion that it has been necessary to set up chiefs arbitrarily over chieftaincies very much larger than were their own hereditary spheres of influence.

fear of death would deter him from such baseness. Another sign of the chosen 624
successor is some untoward experience, such, for example, as finding cowrie shells (worn by nkumu) in a trap in the forest or a net that had been put out to catch fish.

Nkema Akuke, whether the first of his line or a man succeeding in the office, bears [293] the emblems of his rank. He wears an ilelembe (a branch of a special bush) stuck into his belt on the right side and hanging downwards. The special hat, montolo, worn [292] by nkumu is not yet his to wear, but he wears an ordinary skin hat known as lopope, which is the mark of any elder. This hat may be ornamented with feathers if so desired.

When Nkema Akuke decides that he has acquired sufficient wealth to enable him [302] properly to claim the right of being made an nkumu, he begins his preparatory arrangements.
Mbili, a mixture of charcoal with some sticky substance, is smeared over his body with plantain leaves. All ornamented clothing is discarded and a single cloth [292] woven from raffia, and known as molele, is worn. He refuses to sit on the benches usually used and instead sits on the bare earth. All this is explained as an attempt on the [516] part of the man about to be raised to the office of nkumu to be different from others, a man apart, separate, peculiar, not partaking in the ordinary interests and affairs of his fellow men.

Nkema Akuke now leaves his own village accompanied by all his wives and [533] children, and also by a singer, nyemba, who is paid to sing his praises, and by several male Batwa (pygmies), up to half a dozen in number, known as ntotii because of their 563 duty of blowing gourds and producing sounds which indicate praise of the great 534]
man. This party makes the round of villages wherever relatives are found, and the announcement is made that Nkema Akuke is about to become an nkumu. This 624 pilgrimage accomplished, a 'doctor' (nkanga) is visited by the aspirant to office, 791 who seeks by magic to discover whether it is the propitious time for the ceremony of installation. The whole company retires to the private enclosure at the rear of the 787 house belonging to the nkanga chosen, this being the place where he performs his wonders. The nkanga resorts to mingo, that particular branch of magic which has to do with reasons for strange and unaccountable phenomena.[1] Nkema Akuke now seeks some sign as confirmation of his determination to claim his office at this time.
Some native pepper may be wrapped in a leaf or merely covered by it, and left within sight of all, and upon being opened it may be found to have turned into salt, or perhaps it may be some earth that is thus turned to salt. Or a cock may be placed upon Nkema Akuke's head and covered with a basket and thus left for some time. Upon removing the basket it may be discovered that an egg has been laid. All such tests, 624
if successful, will be regarded as indications that it really is time for Nkema Akuke
to assume the office of nkumu, but if the test fails he will usually go ahead with his plans anyhow, fearing the shame that would come to him should he go back to his home after having made the triumphant round of his relatives' homes. However, should he act thus, and he most certainly will, he knows that his days are numbered,

---

[1] If a man's fields do not produce and he cannot understand why, he will resort to mingo. If it is suspected, for example, that the trouble is caused by someone making 'medicine', an arrow shaft is put into a small hole in the ground, and at each name mentioned, the arrow can be pulled out if the person is innocent, but remains stuck fast in the hole at the mention of the guilty name.

624 and that he may have no more than a month or perhaps a year in which to live and will surely die speedily.

The special objects attaching to the office of nkumu, among these the hat, montolo, and stool, mbata, are at the same time subject to similar magical arts to determine whether they may be produced for the new nkumu's use. They are not present, being in the possession of the molembe which will appoint him, but are mentioned by name. Apart from the montolo, no further ceremony is required to identify these objects with their future owner.

[302] The mingo ended, the Nkema Akuke smears black mbili all over his body again, 624 before the rites begin to determine which of his wives is to be known as Nsono, 787 the one who will be closest to her husband throughout his days. For this, magic formulae (bienzako, sing. eenzako) are used. All the wives sit round in a circle and the nkanga places some irritant such as ground pepper in the eyes of all the women. The wife whose eyes stream most and whose discomfort is also accompanied by a violent [827] shaking of the body is known to be Nsono. Here again, lying is believed to be out of the question, for the shaking of the body is something that is supposed to be impossible of simulation, the real being easily distinguished by all from the false. Nsono is now stripped of all clothing and her body smeared by the nkanga with yellow clay on one side, and with white on the other. A belt of leaves is put round her waist 624 and a small bit of cloth between the legs with each end attached to the belt. Near by 789 a gourd with 'medicine' in it has been standing ready for the next step in the ceremonies, and this is now smeared with white clay, a parrot's feather stuck in the neck, and handed to Nsono, who receives it in one hand. Into the other hand is put a section of plantain stalk, into one end of which has been stuck a parrot's feather. A third feather is placed in her mouth so that she cannot speak, greet anyone, or eat. She is now tied with a cord which is held by one of the young men attending Nkema Akuke. At this point of the procedure the nkanga states his price [791 for his work, which will be in the neighbourhood of one hundred brass rods, worth 435] to-day about fifty francs, but formerly double that amount. The future nkumu, accompanied as before, leaves for the village of the molembe. Nsono starts off at a tremendous pace, for she is now imbued with a sort of frenzied strength, and for this reason has been tied up and put in charge of a strong young man, otherwise she would be off so fast that no one could catch her, and would go into the forest, where she would live for days unseen.

624 In the village of the molembe the party all sit in an ebanga belonging to one of the elders. This is the place where the Tumba men really live—their houses are just [343 sleeping and cooking establishments, but the ebanga, having a roof for shade and no walls, is the place where the men congregate and spend their leisure time. It is also 342] the site of the village smithy, which takes up one end. Here, then, Nkema Akuke and his party sit for a day and a night, and neither he nor Nsono may eat food or drink [262] wine during this period. Games are played by the molembe—mock battles, dances, and songs chiefly of battle, and before the first streaks of dawn appear the group in the [517] ebanga begins to march up and down the village singing.

M 303 sides of this square and held in place by a binding of twisted 285 raffia fibers. The sides are then plaited by the simplest method, that is, with the horizontal band weaving in and out of the vertical thongs. As all of these molds always have approximately the same height and diameter, the ngula cones are both similar in M 303 shape and quite constant in weight. The natives use them a great deal as trade goods. In some regions the ngula cone has become [436] a veritable currency, with a standard value from one tribe to another. [170] A market is organized regularly when steamers M [439] call at Mushie, and there the people of the interior exchange the products of their industries for the imported objects brought by the Blacks who work for the Whites. Ngula cones are among the principal items of trade and bring a very high price. In the Oshwe region, the old chief Kua Kua was a great ngula trader. He came by regularly with four or five of his wives, bringing various products from the region between the Kasai and the Lukenie to exchange for the ngula made in the Lokoro region.

D 303 Throughout the central Congo regions, the ngula used for trade has the shape of an elongated truncated cone. Among the Basongo-Meno and farther east, on the other hand, ngula most often is shaped in a ball. The native of these regions often uses it to decorate his pottery and wooden objects and to dye the fibers of cloth used for decoration. He keeps it in cosmetic boxes carved from takula wood and usually decorated with very artistic designs. He also uses it to color his hair. [Ed., a passage from the middle of page 170 to the last paragraph, page 171, is omitted.]

M 302 ●789 [171] Aside from ngula, the native sometimes smears his body with a type of white clay quite frequently found in the river beds. [172] The native calls it mpembe. Its use is far from being as widespread as that of ngula, and we believe that the native associates it with magic power rather than ornamentation. Mpembe is used chiefly by the peoples of the Congo-Kasai, Lake Leopold II, and Lukenie regions, up to the region of the Batitu.

M [765] We never saw a native smear his whole body with it. The few women in mourning that we saw were covered with a grayish-yellow mud and not with mpembe. We believe, moreover, that the use of mpembe is reserved to the chief, his wives, and perhaps

M 302 0789 dignitaries and their families, but it was impossible for us to prove the accuracy of our hypothesis. When questioned about this, the natives always confined themselves to uncertain and evasive replies. The native chief rarely appears at a large gathering without having his face and sometimes his arms and chest covered with lines drawn with mpembe. At all official receptions, the chief, a few dignitaries, and sometimes some of the chiefs' wives had a more or less symmetrical rectangle drawn with mpembe around the eyes.

M 304 302 We observed the following artificial deformations in the course of our journey:

1) depilation;
2) filing of the teeth;
3) tattooing by incision;
4) circumcision.

M 302 Depilation is practiced by all the peoples of the regions visited. The native plucks out every last hair on his body. Where the hair cannot be plucked, it is shaved with great care. For the parts of the body that are hard to reach, men and women help one another. Eyebrows and eyelashes are both plucked, while beards and mustaches, on the other hand, are cared for with great pride. It is very unusual to see a full beard. We ran across only one such case. The happy possessor of this beautiful [173] beard was as proud of it as he could be, and Natali, chief of the Banfumu of Kwamouth, was heartbroken to have only a few hairs on his chin while one of his dignitaries was endowed with such a fine beard.

T 302 Among the Bateke-Banfumu peoples, up to the Ipanga, the natives frequently shave the base of their scalp all around the head. Their headdress looks like a very symmetrical calotte.

M 302 Among the Yaelima we encountered men whose heads were completely shaved except for one strip just above the nape of the neck. A similar custom must have prevailed among the Bateke and Banfumu, but the unshaved part was broader.

Among the Yaelima and up to the region of the Bankutshu north of Bena Dibele, the natives shave their hair in such a way 595x The bomɛ́tsa takes her task to heart, for her husband's glory is her own as well. The bomɛ́tsa is conscious of her role in spite of the presence of a favorite, for it is less that of a wife in the sexual sense of the word than of a wife who is mother of the family. It is of a higher order than the roles of the other wives; it is more serious, more unselfish, and based on a deeper love and a more deliberate will. According to the native point of view, it is rightly the source of a legitimate pride; it is an honor, while the position of the favorite is closer to an object of vanity. Therefore the bomɛ́tsa likes to show her importance.

It may seem strange to us that the bomɛ́tsa puts her heart into working to increase the number of women in the harem. But this is altogether natural for the Nkundɔ́. The growth of the harem is a source of glory, and she has been brought up to this attitude since her youth. After the first ardor, her affection becomes more serious. She becomes a perfect matron in the Roman manner. Although she continues her relations with her husband and takes care of her children, she is chiefly occupied with her duties as mistress of the whole family. Her husband loves her with a deeper and more reasoned emotion than he shows toward his other wives. Without cease he shows his consideration and attachment for her. If she is sterile it is very likely that he will give her a child belonging to his family or born of a wife who has left him, so that she can bring it up as if it were her own.

595x
592 The bomɛ́tsa's house is located at the right end of the row of wive's huts. She deserves this location because of her function as bomɔ́ngɔ́ loɛ́njɛ́, "owner, mistress of the polygamist's compound. The Nkundɔ́ say: ɛ́bɛ́la loɛ́njɛ́, "she stretches, or extends, her husband's group of dwellings in order to enlarge it."

595x A polygamous husband undertakes nothing of importance without first consulting the bomɛ́tsa (be it the creation of a bolɛ́mbɔ́ or a nkɔ́ndɛ́, or the acquisition of new wives, etc.). He respects her and treats her with deference, as if she were his mother, our people say.

● [789] The bomɛ́tsa is the only one of all the polygamist's wives who plays a part in the acceptance of the Nkundɔ́ offensive and defensive

595x [724] When a piece of game is divided, the bomɛ́tsa is entitled to the lintɛ́la (the lower portion of the breast), which would go to the man's mother (or his father's or his elder brother's wife) were he a bachelor.

In the bomɛ́tsa's absence, her place is taken by her ebísa (see below, Article IV) or by the wife who follows her in seniority. At her death, the same rules govern her succession.

The name bomɛ́tsa is probably derived from the root mɛ́tsa, "to begin." She is the one who founds the family. Sometimes she is also called ikɔ́kɔ́yɔ́njemba, literally "bachelor's love." The Bombwanja say itɔ́kɔ́yɔ́njemba (the Ekondà, nkɛ́mukolo).

In addition to the bomɛ́tsa, reference is sometimes made to [344] bomɛ́tsa w'ìɛ́li, or "bomɛ́tsa of the left." The bomɛ́tsa in the strict sense of the term is contrasted to the latter as bomɛ́tsa w'ìlɔ́me ("of the right"). The bomɛ́tsa of the left is a polygamist's second wife. She is given this name because her house is at the left end of [592] the loɛ́njɛ́. She has no special rights or duties, however, unless the actual bomɛ́tsa delegates to her the task of looking after her end of the compound. If the harem is large, the husband may set aside [224] for her a special portion of the game, called itɔ́mbantɛ́ta, or nape of the neck. In her absence it goes to the eldest daughter.

Article II. The Favorite

595λ 556 All polygamists of any importance have a favorite wife, or nkɔ́ndɛ́. But only the rich and the notables have a true nkɔ́ndɛ́. The minor polygamists, of course, imitate the others (nkɔ́ndɛ́ ɛ́ɛ̂ weɔ́lɛ́ or ɛ́ɛ̂ itsiɔ́, "without great importance"), but they do so without

Magic Practices Pertaining to Divorce

586x ●789 It seems to me not without interest to devote a few lines to the magic practices prevalent among our peoples and used on the occasion of divorce. We are not speaking of love philters; strictly speaking they would not be appropriate here. (1) We will therefore limit ourselves to giving a general idea of the practices used to prevent a wife from leaving her husband, to avenge a divorce, or to make a fugitive return.

As we shall see, these objectives often become intertwined.

1) The trinity iké̱táki-itó̱ko̱-ntómbá is considered by the natives as three related practices. We see it more as three forms of a single practice.

[177] All three originated with the Ntómbá of Lake Tumba and were introduced to the Nkundó -- directly or indirectly -- by certain Ekonda tribes living between the two peoples. This introduction took place in modern times. The practices were unknown here before colonization. Even at the present time they have not spread everywhere; they have not yet crossed the Momboyo. The chronological order of their introduction is first iké̱táki, second itókó, third ntómbá.

The animating spirit of these practices is the leopard. Their primary purpose is to call back an unfaithful wife and, if she obstinately refuses, to kill her or her seducer. Secondarily, they also serve to cause the death of any enemy whatever, especially in reprisal.

The three practices differ with respect to their manufacture and method of use. We cannot go into all the relevant details, for they are outside the framework of this study. [416] It is sufficient to say that the owner of the charm to whose powers he resorts first calls the woman by blowing into an antelope horn,

586x especially very early in the morning at the crowing of the cock. (1)

> 1. The natives also use this means to call their children who long ago left for the "lowlands" and whose return they ardently desire.

If the one who is called does not return, the charm will take revenge either on her or on her lover, depending on the desire of the person operating it. Another intervention on his part is then required, however, and it varies according to the form used. Note that according to the native view it is impossible for the wife not to hear the call, no matter how far away she may be. If she does not return, it is because she is being obstinate and deserves to be punished.

The spirit of vengeance alone is involved in:

586x 2) The ngondé̜. This charm comes from the Coquilhatville
754 region or even further away. The word ngondé̜ is the Lolíngá form [237] of the Lonkundó word nkondé, which means "gavial." The teeth of this reptile actually play a part in its composition. It is used to punish any thief by death. Therefore it has been declared effective against anyone who tries to seduce the wife of another. It will cause the culprit's feet to swell and to open with pus. Like the above practices, this one has not yet crossed Momboyo.

Such usages like many others have therefore been recently 832 introduced. Before the arrival of Europeans in these parts, only 177 love philters were known. However, it is easily understandable that the Nkundó gladly and confidently received these new practices which are so useful -- in their opinion -- and operate in a domain of capital importance for which colonization has deprived them of their ancient sanctions and means of prevention. [417]

846 of a dried banana leaf. Three knots are tied in it. The helper holds it in one hand and with the other cuts off the first knot, which she carries away with her. The mother keeps her end in her hand and presents the other to her husband. She receives the knife from the hands of the helper and cuts between the two knots so that each spouse carries away his end. Each time the parties involved say, "We have cut the bofófó; we are separating; go away."
Having thus bid each other farewell, each fastens his end to the roof of the seclusion hut.

This ceremony ends the period of seclusion and puts an end 846 to the ekelɛ́ prohibitions. From then on the couple may have sexual 837 relations together, the helper can resume her usual life, and adultery on the part of the father can no longer harm the child or the mother. Note, however, that the child's immunity to the father's misconduct implies one condition: the father must not take it on his knees the day he commits adultery. By the following day the effects of his act have been nullified. A woman can discover her husband's infidelity through his refusal to take the child. Often she makes use of this means to obtain a confirmation of her suspicions.
Some men abstain from all misconduct solely to guard against any such possibility. Adultery may have a harmful influence on the child even after it is weaned if it has a weak constitution.
[491] All this seems to indicate that the reaction is considered to be physical and direct rather than a sanction based on religion or superstition.

846 Nkundó therapeutics include an antidote, however; it is 789 called bondandota (from ndota "an illness caused by the infraction of prohibitions of a sexual nature"). It consists of a potion made [278] from the sap of an aroid bearing the same name, which is mixed with the sap of the libúlúkakó plant. If for some reason or other the couple have been away from each other for a fairly long time, they sit or stand face to face and take the child on their knees, which touch each other, and each one makes the child drink the potion twice, once from each hand, making sure to turn its face toward him [or her]. Usually the couple also drink some of the brew, though it is intended primarily for the child. Without these precautions the relations between the pair and the father's 846 taking the child would cause the child's death. The same precau- 789 tion is also in order if the husband goes on a trip before the child's birth and does not return till after the delivery

We have just seen that the harmful effects of the father's 846 misconduct on his child's life is effectuated through the father's 837 act of taking the child on his knees. Thus the Nkundó speak of baóngó b'âbé, "a father's bad knees," to indicate his reprehensible [826] conduct, and they say that the bondandota potion is administered to the child so that it will not die because of the father's bad knees. (1)

> 1. The expression baóngó b'âbé is also used when an undertaking which requires continence is unsuccessful. (See Article II, 3).

When a child has painful and persistent diarrhea, it is often 753 interpreted as the effect of the father's infidelity. As soon as they 454 become aware of it, the couple separate for some time, and the father no longer touches the child. [492]

Contrary to what one reads on this subject about other peo- 837 ples of the Congo, Nkundó couples do not have to remain continent 834 beyond the period of seclusion. The separation ceremony gives the 789 husband back the freedom of action he had before his wife's pregnancy. For the wife the bokeka remains strict with respect to illicit relations until the child is weaned However she, too, may regain her freedom by having recourse to an antidote, the ingredients of which she purchases from a person who holds the secret. The ingredients are placed in a small antelope horn which is then stopped [824] up by means of bolaká (resin from the Symphonia gabonensis). The interested party wears it about her loins on a string or a bead belt or, preferably, on a special creeper. This amulet protects the child's life from the harmful influence of the mother's acts of adultery, but it does so only on condition that she does not separate herself from the child, as we will explain further on. This procedure

834 escape criticism. She is compared to a goat, who does not have
● 789 a regular and steady husband: álómya bóna lontaa, "she nurses her child as a goat does." (1)

1. The opposite of lómya lontaa, -- if it is used to show the contrast -- is lómya lontómbá.

When the separation ceremony is ended, the mother is 846 adorned with all her ornaments and goes out to walk in a procession through the village. The child is carried by an older sister, a niece, etc. He is taken around the village, bánangya bǒna l'olóló Small presents are offered him everywhere -- an arrow, a small knife, a hairpin, etc There is no feast, however; if that honor were accorded him he would die of it (for when someone dies, there is always a feast of farewell in his honor). [493]

Article IV. Nursing

853 During the first few days after birth an infant does not suck the milk of its mother, since it is "too hot." He is fed by a third person, preferably a relative.

On the third day the following occurs:

853 1) The mother's breasts are massaged (-kulola baéle). For 757 this purpose the Nkundó use leaves of the bǔte creeper and the lilongyá plant (Adenostemma viscosum Forst.), a green leaf from a banana tree called nselenge, several pieces of peeled sugar cane, the tips of the dried leaves of any banana tree, and sometimes other plants are added as well. All the ingredients are crushed, then boiled, and white sand and a bit of red paint are mixed in with them. The mixture is called ndengó. It is prepared by the women who are in charge of massaging the breasts. The bǔte leaves, however, must be picked by the father. He goes to the forest early in the morning and first shakes the creeper so that all leaves that are not firmly attached will fall off. Then he climbs it and picks the desired

845 from the others. They thus rank with the great notables of the past. [sic]

When the children grow up and become self-sufficient, all 845 the special regulations lose their force and they become like 554 everybody else. Nothing distinguishes them from the rest in marriage, death, etc. No preference is shown for or against them. But their descendants will again produce twins.

Thus the Nkundó consider twins as extraordinary children, 845 but they do not carry this view to extremes. They are pleased to receive two children at a time, although they believe that under such circumstances the pregnancy and delivery are more dangerous for the mother. That is why she is called boyéngwá since, despite the seriousness of the situation, she did not die. This epithet is also applied to the father and to the twins, probably for the same reason as well as because of their immunity with respect to prohibitions. If the twins are of different sexes, however, the mother is not as likely to be called boyéngwá, since she is likoka, "harmful." (1)

1. See above, Article II, 3.

845 It is apparent from the above description that twins are 789 considered to be somewhat tainted with magic. The existence of 754 this belief is confirmed by the prohibition against throwing anything (stone, palm kernel, etc.) onto their hut, the same prohibition applying to anyone who possesses a charm or practices sorcery or protective magic. In addition they possess a certain innate ability to cast a spell over the activities (hunting, fishing) of others. That is why persons who are afraid of being harmed by them smear themselves with kaolin in the same way as do such children and their parents. [505]

The Nkundó have had cases of triplets, but they are ex- 845 tremely rare. The youngest of the three is called Yěndembe, or Yěndende, or Yělele. The only special practice with reference to the youngest one is that he can never be ordered to do any work, be sent to carry a message, run any errand, etc., áfótswé ntómo.

"Why not?"

"Is he not exclusively good?" Matali continued.

"If he is so good, should he not listen to you, Matali?"

"Are not misfortunes caused by the ndoki (spirits), Mundele?"

"But is not Nzambi sufficiently powerful to ward off these ndoki, Matali?"

"Are not the ndoki sent against those who have done evil to others? Would Nzambi still be good if he were to ward off the ndoki, who punish the evil-doers? Ve Mundele, ve! Nzambi is good, he does only good, why call upon him?"

This bit of conversation sums up the native's conception of the supreme being. One calls upon him to explain what one cannot understand, but there is no cult devoted to him. Everything that is good for the society and whose source or origin is not known comes from him.

178 Aside from this spirit, the various tribes believe that there is a multitude of other spirits, some stronger than others, who are all very much concerned with the natives. They are all good in the sense that what is obtained from them is always beneficial to someone, although sometimes it is quite harmful to someone else. For this reason the native has created nkisi [Ed., fetish] and ndoki.

791 The fetisher is supposed to be able to communicate with these spirits. He keeps from them, according to native belief, the secrets of which plants help in healing and who has killed someone. He can obtain from them the punishment of a thief, because such punishment is beneficial to the one robbed. Through their intervention he can assure good fishing, guarantee rich hunting, facilitate childbirth, heal the sick, etc., or, on the other hand, make any enterprise fail.

778 The native believes that success of any kind is granted by these spirits. He attempts, therefore, to secure their good graces as much as possible. Before hunting, fishing, childbirth, etc., he goes to the fetisher. For a fairly high fee, the latter calls upon the spirits and hands over the appropriate nkisi. If the results do not conform to his expectations, the native blames [21] neither the fetisher nor the nkisi, but a ndoki more powerful than the nkisi invoked. [Ed., a passage is omitted here.]

The intervention of the nkisi or ndoki is only a temporary one. Once an undertaking has been successfully carried out, the native has no further use for the object given to him by the fetisher to insure success. On the next occasion he will go back to the fetisher and ask for a new nkisi, which he would always like to be more powerful than the ndoki. Unfortunately the fetisher cannot find such an all-powerful nkisi. A spirit that he has invoked with success for years, whose power seems inexhaustible, will one day fail him. Five, ten, fifteen times success has followed the invocation, and then, there it is, an enterprise under the same auspices fails miserably. A new nkisi, more powerful, has become ndoki, and the native returns to the fetisher and demands that he do better, always better! With the exception of certain figurines carved in wood and used as hunting fetishes, the physical representation of nkisi consists of an assortment of the

It is from this magic treasure that the fetisher takes a pinch or two which he wraps carefully in a little bag and hands over to those who resort T [778] to him. As for the human figurines so often found in the huts of the Bateke and Banfumu, we do not believe that they are fetishes. In our opinion, they are guardian figurines for children, carved before their birth and preserved until they reach marriageable age.

M 791 824 Some fetishers manage to gain quite a reputation, and their services are purchased for a very high fee. They are familiar with the properties of certain plants, and they keep this knowledge secret and exploit it as much as possible. It would be wrong to believe that the fetisher's practices are all based on mystification.

M 278 695 Ebandia, the high chief of the Mosengere, knew the secret of certain poisons. He knew effective remedies for certain kinds of festering wounds; he proportioned the quantity of poison at ordeals so as to make its action violent or slow, and he was familiar with an antidote which cancelled out the effects of the poison.

M 278 695 684 A few hours before our arrival at Penge, Ebandia had subjected [23] one of his wives to trial by poison, on the mere suspicion that she might have gone too far with a native during a slightly prolonged stay in the forest. Ebandia accused her of adultery, prepared the beverage, and compelled the poor woman to prove her innocence by taking the poison. The unfortunate creature rebelled. A quarrel arose, and the village natives, when informed of the matter, protested against it, to no avail, however. The old tyrant carried out the ordeal. He had been notified of our impending arrival, and after allowing the unfortunate woman to suffer horribly for nearly two hours, he gave her the antidote. Five hours later, all the effects of the poison were gone. [Ed., the text is not translated from the last paragraph, page 23, to the second paragraph, page 26.]

T 764 [26] In general the natives have a kind of cult of the dead. In the Bateke-Banfumu region, the corpse is wrapped in fabrics. The more important the deceased person is, the larger the bundle. His whole wealth in fabrics goes with him to the grave. Prior

000 the same rights as the other children of the polygynist.

595 The polygynist always sought to increase the number of his
556 wives, for his prestige rose and his fortune increased in that manner.
593 If anyone in civilized lands seeks to enlarge his fortune, this is done, people say, in order to insure the future of his children. The native thinks little about that; his primary idea is to enjoy himself and to surpass others in prestige and esteem. As far as the future of his children is concerned, there are polygynists who possess twenty or thirty wives or even more, and sometimes they have only one or two children. Also it is little in keeping with their notions to care for the future; he who is still alive tomorrow must take care of 595 tomorrow then, so they reason. On the contrary, instead of caring for his children, the polygynist often took great trouble to obtain a 593 wife for his son. The son, however, was not yet the owner of his 584 wife; it was, so to speak, only a loan. Not until after the death of 606 his father did he become owner. In some districts, when the father had obtained a wife for his son, he first kept this wife for some time for himself. Only after a few months did he give her to his son. In 595 other districts, when the wife was pregnant by the son, he was obliged
593 to send her for a few days to his father. He was not allowed to bear
606 the honor of fatherhood alone; his father must share that with him.
842 The father reserved for himself the honor of naming all of the chil-
551 dren of his children. In some areas of the Congo, morals were so 835 low and common that the father even kept his own daughters in his harem. This did not occur in Equatorial Africa, but there was a custom that was not much better. The magician was sometimes 583 consulted about the bride price which the father tried to get for his ●791 daughter, or the brother for his sister.

The magician then gave them the advice that they themselves should first have relations with their own daughter or sister. This custom existed almost everywhere in Equatorial Africa.

[535] Bride Price. In general, the daughter was given in 583 marriage upon payment of a bride price. The father had little choice of the future husband of his daughter. The one who guaranteed the most goods in payment was certain to get her. Since, in most cases, the little daughter had not yet arrived at the years of maturity, there was naturally no question of her consent. The bride price was not paid all at once, but gradually during the years while the daughter grew up. Since the daughter was given without her consent fear of death would deter him from such baseness. Another sign of the chosen 624 successor is some untoward experience, such, for example, as finding cowrie shells (worn by nkumu) in a trap in the forest or a net that had been put out to catch fish.

Nkema Akuke, whether the first of his line or a man succeeding in the office, bears [293]
the emblems of his rank. He wears an ilelembe (a branch of a special bush) stuck into his belt on the right side and hanging downwards. The special hat, montolo, worn [292] by nkumu is not yet his to wear, but he wears an ordinary skin hat known as lopope, which is the mark of any elder. This hat may be ornamented with feathers if so desired.

When Nkema Akuke decides that he has acquired sufficient wealth to enable him [302] properly to claim the right of being made an nkumu, he begins his preparatory arrangements. Mbili, a mixture of charcoal with some sticky substance, is smeared over his body with plantain leaves. All ornamented clothing is discarded and a single cloth [292] woven from raffia, and known as molele, is worn. He refuses to sit on the benches usually used and instead sits on the bare earth. All this is explained as an attempt on the [516] part of the man about to be raised to the office of nkumu to be different from others, a man apart, separate, peculiar, not partaking in the ordinary interests and affairs of his fellow men.

Nkema Akuke now leaves his own village accompanied by all his wives and [533] children, and also by a singer, nyemba, who is paid to sing his praises, and by several male Batwa (pygmies), up to half a dozen in number, known as ntotii because of their [563]
duty of blowing gourds and producing sounds which indicate praise of the great [534] man. This party makes the round of villages wherever relatives are found, and the announcement is made that Nkema Akuke is about to become an nkumu. This 624 pilgrimage accomplished, a 'doctor' (nkanga) is visited by the aspirant to office, 791 who seeks by magic to discover whether it is the propitious time for the ceremony of installation. The whole company retires to the private enclosure at the rear of the 787 house belonging to the nkanga chosen, this being the place where he performs his wonders. The nkanga resorts to nningo, that particular branch of magic which has to do with reasons for strange and unaccountable phenomena.[1] Nkema Akuke now seeks some sign as confirmation of his determination to claim his office at this time. Some native pepper may be wrapped in a leaf or merely covered by it, and left within sight of all, and upon being opened it may be found to have turned into salt, or perhaps it may be some earth that is thus turned to salt. Or a cock may be placed upon Nkema Akuke's head and covered with a basket and thus left for some time. Upon removing the basket it may be discovered that an egg has been laid. All such tests, 624 if successful, will be regarded as indications that it really is time for Nkema Akuke to assume the office of nkumu, but if the test fails he will usually go ahead with his plans anyhow, fearing the shame that would come to him should he go back to his home after having made the triumphant round of his relatives' homes. However, should he act thus, and he most certainly will, he knows that his days are numbered,

[1] If a man's fields do not produce and he cannot understand why, he will resort to nningo. If it is suspected, for example, that the trouble is caused by someone making 'medicine', an arrow shaft is put into a small hole in the ground, and at each name mentioned, the arrow can be pulled out if the person is innocent, but remains stuck fast in the hole at the mention of the guilty name.

624 and that he may have no more than a month or perhaps a year in which to live and will surely die speedily.

The special objects attaching to the office of nkumu, among these the hat, montolo, and stool, mbata, are at the same time subject to similar magical arts to determine whether they may be produced for the new nkumu's use. They are not present, being in the possession of the molembe which will appoint him, but are mentioned by name. Apart from the montolo, no further ceremony is required to identify these [302] objects with their future owner.

The mingo ended, the Nkema Akuke smears black mbili all over his body again, 624 before the rites begin to determine which of his wives is to be known as Nsono, 787 the one who will be closest to her husband throughout his days. For this, magic formulae (bienzako, sing. eenzako) are used. All the wives sit round in a circle and the nkanga places some irritant such as ground pepper in the eyes of all the women. The wife whose eyes stream most and whose discomfort is also accompanied by a violent [827] shaking of the body is known to be Nsono. Here again, lying is believed to be out of the question, for the shaking of the body is something that is supposed to be impossible of simulation, the real being easily distinguished by all from the false. Nsono is now stripped of all clothing and her body smeared by the nkanga with yellow clay on one side, and with white on the other. A belt of leaves is put round her waist 624 and a small bit of cloth between the legs with each end attached to the belt. Near by 789 a gourd with 'medicine' in it has been standing ready for the next step in the ceremonies, and this is now smeared with white clay, a parrot's feather stuck in the neck, and handed to Nsono, who receives it in one hand. Into the other hand is put a section of plantain stalk, into one end of which has been stuck a parrot's feather. A third feather is placed in her mouth so that she cannot speak, greet anyone, or eat. She is now tied with a cord which is held by one of the young men attending Nkema Akuke. At this point of the procedure the nkanga states his price ● [791 for his work, which will be in the neighbourhood of one hundred brass rods, worth 435] to-day about fifty francs, but formerly double that amount. The future nkumu, accompanied as before, leaves for the village of the molembe. Nsono starts off at a tremendous pace, for she is now imbued with a sort of frenzied strength, and for this reason has been tied up and put in charge of a strong young man, otherwise she would be off so fast that no one could catch her, and would go into the forest, where she would live for days unseen.

624 In the village of the molembe the party all sit in an ehanga belonging to one of the elders. This is the place where the Tumba men really live—their houses are just [343 sleeping and cooking establishments, but the ehanga, having a roof for shade and no walls, is the place where the men congregate and spend their leisure time. It is also 342] the site of the village smithy, which takes up one end. Here, then, Nkema Akuke and [262] his party sit for a day and a night, and neither he nor Nsono may eat food or drink wine during this period. Games are played by the molembe—mock battles, dances, and [517 songs chiefly of battle, and before the first streaks of dawn appear the group in the ehanga begins to march up and down the village singing.

At dawn the whole party, accompanied by a large crowd, make their way to a place in the bush where there is an elevation of some sort. Here Nkema Akuke climbs up and takes his stand, accompanied by Nsono. Now the molembe choose the Bilepo

614 596 592 [768] homestead, it is deserted by the inhabitants. On the new dwelling site the sons each build their own shelter. In contrast to the groups of the type A-E, the group living within a homestead is finite: its existence ends with the father's death. Only a man whose father (in the European meaning of the term) has died may have a shelter. Thus the homestead community is interposed between the A-group and the small family.

To sum up the characteristic features of the A-groups:

614 Membership determined by male descent; unity of legal power, especially insofar as landed property and inheritance law is concerned the senior has full power; succession by simple seniority; theoretically unlimited existence of the group. The A-groups consist of small families who live together in homesteads under one father in each case.

Groups of Rank B

614 293 There is usually a friendly, neighborly relationship between the A-groups which form part of a B-group. People assist each other to a large extent, and there is joint consultation on most matters. Group B has only one Nkúmú ilọki, "master of the hidden power," the priest of the kinship group, who is consulted by all the members of the group. He functions during the magical preparations for the hunt; he is consulted before any important undertaking. During the leave-taking ceremony after a burial, he converses with the deceased, and people turn to him when the ancestors have appeared to them in their dreams to transmit their desires, orders, or other information to the living. He protects the people of his group from the ill will, ndọki, of the dead and the living. The priest of the kinship group is used as the criterion [194] to determine which group of homogeneous A-groups represents a B-group. The priest of the kinship group is descended from a certain one of the related A-groups.

614 554 There is a difference in rank among the A-groups of a B-group -- one group will be regarded as older -- but this is

583x unjust in itself, it certainly becomes so if it is considered a penalty 584 inflicted for the rupture. For the indemnity is restricted to the man,
174 whether or not he is in the wrong. Furthermore, to accept an indemnity 177 even when the engagement is broken because of the woman tends to favor frauds and real swindles on the part of the woman and her parents, in short a kind of traffic in women.

It is also evident that the rich (polygamists) suffer much less [585] from the innovation than do monogamous men, especially those who ●[794] adopt monogamy as a principle and more especially the Christians, who do not condone divorce. Thus I am of the opinion that the desire to defend polygamy against the doctrine of the missionaries is not entirely unrelated to the transformation of this custom.

000 All these considerations show that the question is highly complex and that it would be better if the ancient custom were restored.

If the breaking of the engagement is due to wrongs, the new custom could perhaps be tolerated, though it is not without serious dangers, but the indemnity should be imposed exclusively on the party at fault. Furthermore, the wrongs would have to be serious, and on the other hand, the indemnity would have to be, not in the nature of a forfeit, but of a payment of damages commensurate with the extent of the damage suffered and the seriousness of the wrong. And here those cases should especially be considered where the breaking of the engagement is accompanied by proceedings of a vexatious and insulting nature. And though it is a very delicate task to evaluate all these elements, we must not forget to take them into account.

It seems to me that the ancient law must still be maintained when the engagement is broken simply because of a change of feelings for which neither party is to blame, if such a case occurs. For it is better not to innovate than to innovate too fast. [129]

Article IV. Walo -- Bombuluku

589x The walo or bombuluku is the bulk of the bride price paid for a marriage. Between the payment of the ndanga and that of the walo, 146 614 umbilical cord was not buried; how dare you boast? You are but a stranger." Therefore this custom constitutes a sort of matriculation into the family. If anyone wants to be entirely certain of a Nkundó's clan, he has only to look for the place where his umbilical cord was buried.

5) The end of seclusion is marked by a few ceremonies.

846 302 A. A meal. Early in the morning of the day set, the husband goes and cuts a bunch of fruit of the palm tree, and the helper goes and picks manioc leaves (nowadays leaves and fruit collected the day before are sometimes used). The helper crushes all of this to make a dish of food. While she cooks it over the fire, she shaves a little hair off the mother, plucks out one eyebrow, and cuts one of her nails. Then she does the same to the child. The helper moves away, and the father comes in. His wife subjects him to the same treatment, and he reciprocates, doing the same to the child. The rubbish is simply thrown away without any ceremony. This practice has no special name; the Nkundó say: bɔ́yaténa bekengo, bɔ́yakenga, "They shave each other's heads."

846 When the vegetables are ready, all the women of the village are gathered together. A little pit is dug in front of the hut. A large leaf is placed in it to serve as a dish, and the vegetables are poured into it. The mother, the helper, and all those assembled eat. Except for a few small boys no representatives of the stronger sex are present. When the meal is completed, [490] the leaf that served as a plate and those that served as spoons are buried in the pit. Today the more advanced of the population use a European plate and spoons. The meal and the vegetables eaten are called losanganya, "reunion," because the entire village is united in partaking of them, or lofanjola, "dispersion," because it is the prelude to the end of the bokeka.

B. Then follows the ceremony of separation (-téna bofofó, or, among the Injɔ́lɔ́, bokɛ́kɛ́lɛ́kɛ́. (1) The bofofó is the mid-rib

1. The expression and the ceremony designated by it are used whenever an important matter, such as a trial, etc., is to be terminated.

771 In matters of religion the Nkundó recognize the existence of a Supreme Being: Njakomba or Mbombiɛndɛ, creator and ruler of all that exists. They do not worship him in any way, however; all their religious practices are addressed to guardian and ancestral spirits. (2)

> 2. On the subject of the religious conceptions of the Nkundó, see a detailed study by Father Boelaert, M.S.C., in Hooger Leven, 1934, pp. 1612 and 1636, and 1935, pp. 12 and 60.

197 The language of the Nkundó is beautiful, harmonious, flexible, and rich. It has all the qualities needed to become a literary language and is admirably suited to the requirements of teaching. Furthermore, its various dialects are spoken over a considerably large territory, in fact over one of the largest language areas [13] of the Congo. 797 214 In addition to the religious and devotional books of the Catholic missions, a fairly large collection of various academic textbooks is available in this language, thanks primarily to the zeal of the Protestant missionaries. The latter have also published a complete translation of the Bible. Several vocabularies and small grammars have been compiled, and in recent years a large dictionary and an expanded grammar have been added to these, both compiled by A. and L. Ruskin of the Bongandanga Mission. For several years the Protestant mission at Bolenge has been publishing a native magazine, and the Catholic mission is pushing ahead with preparations to publish one also.

114 Father Shebesta's book, Vollblutneger und Halbzwerge, includes a chapter on the Nkundó in which the author gives a good general description of this people. Nevertheless, some of the details given must be accepted with reservations.

121 The general information given above is enough to give the reader a superficial knowledge of the Nkundó.

The purpose of this work is to give a more extensive account of their institutions pertaining to marriage.

As we have previously stated, we are considering only a portion of this people. All our statements cover only the fraction we have delimited. The family institutions of other Nkundó groups are not accounted for, as they are less known to us and we do not want 593x 586x everything. But they only succeed if they have no sons old enough to defend their mother. Differences in behavior are due to the character of the persons involved. (1)

1. See Chapter VIII, Article I.

797 595 159 Only religion can bring about a radical change in this domain. We are still far from our goal, but a few serious Christians have already begun to adapt to the requirements of a higher morality and to deal with their wives in conformity with the sanctity of marriage though he or she may be ill. Yet it is more difficult for them to do this than for the others, since this same morality forbids [39] polygamy and all other means of satisfying passion.

An admirable case is that of Bekau Marie, daughter of Esalɛ D'Iɛmbo (Bonkoso). Her husband, Bokombeembe Pierre of Mbalɛ, suffered from leprosy for many years. He could no more perform the sexual act than do any real work. His wife therefore had to support herself with the help of her son. In spite of her freedom, her separation from her native village, and the ill feelings borne her by her husband's family, she did not want to leave him but decided that she would continue to devote herself to him. (1)

1. Her action is due only in part to Christian influence. That is why this case belongs here to the exclusion of some others I could describe, which are due solely to the influence of Christian morality upon the souls of the individuals.

593x 578 If there is a dispute between her family and her husband, it is hard to know in advance which side the wife will take. Similarly, if difficulties arise between the husband's family and his wife, he can take either his wife's side or that of his relatives. It is all a matter of individual temperament. Some people spontaneously lend support to their families; others on the contrary take sides with their wives. A woman or a man who without good reason habitually takes

595x only consider the marriages of adult individuals through the nkumbó, 586x that is to say, unions that are truly and perfectly voluntary on both sides. Finally, we should exclude those wives of polygamists who prefer monogamy and have taken advantage of an opportunity to break their unions in order to enter into a marriage contract with a bachelor. It seems to me that when these reasonable considerations and restrictions are taken into account, the figures established will not argue against the stability of Nkundó marriages to the extent that one might have thought at first. Or at least that is my impression, derived from the many cases that have come to my attention and that it has been my duty to investigate thoroughly in the course of my ministry as a priest.

The 112 marriages recorded in our last two books at Flandria can be broken down as follows (1): 18 widows, (2) 6 inherited wives, [47] 1 replacement, 3 cases of women who had broken marriages entered into before puberty, 29 wives of polygamists, 18 divorced wives of monogamous men, and 37 first marriages. If we exclude the replacement, the marriages of children and of former wives of polygamists, but include widows and women who are inherited, we arrive at 37 + 18 + 6 = 61 persons for whom their present marriage is still their first, as against 18 clear-cut cases of divorce.

Nevertheless, it should be noted that these figures are based on [717] only a tiny minority of the population and on that part which, from our point of view, may be considered the best, because these people are willing to submit to the yoke of Christian morality. In addition these people are in their prime, and it is impossible to say whether later on they will persevere in these good inclinations. But in any case these instances show that faithfulness to a promise can, and in fact does, exist among the Nkundó.

595x Without a doubt one of the most beautiful aspects of love in 837 general, and marital love in particular, is conjugal faithfulness. As will be shown in detail in Chapter VI, Article VII, 2, the Nkundó do

1. I am excluding the 14 Batswa cases.

2. As against widows who are inherited.

585x The husband has a second reason for making the walo large: by this means he can bind his wife and his in-laws more closely to him. For the larger the walo, the more difficult it would be to reimburse the husband and therefore to break the marriage. Thus a man will pay a larger amount for a woman he cares for particularly. For their part, his parents-in-law will say: "We must remain on good terms with our son-in-law, for he is generous and wealthy." And if there is a palaver in the household and their daughter wants to leave -- or actually leaves -- her husband, they will be all the more inclined to do everything in their power to smooth out the differences and make her return to her husband's house. They will say, "We have collected so many valuables from him, how would we find the means of reimbursing him?"

587 If a daughter remarries, her parents can demand not only the amount required to reimburse her first husband, but also a supplement for themselves. It is not considered proper to ask too much, however; 10 or 15 rings are usually enough. It follows that a woman's bride price rises with the number of husbands she has had.

583x The chief reason for the amount of the walo being reduced has always been, and still is, the payment of the bosóngo (see Article IX) at the same time with, or immediately after, the walo. It explains the low walo payments in cases 21, 25, 27 and 38b in the list which follows. Nowadays there may be new reasons. Among Christians; for example, a brother may want to help his widowed sister so that she will not have too long to wait before remarrying; or orphans born somewhere in a distant center may have been more or less abandoned by their families (as in case 17). To give some idea of the walo amounts,

428 587 581 Because of all these obvious differences, the Nkundɔ́ tend to consider this second type of union nonmarital. It resembles actual marriage only externally; in the final analysis, the difference is fundamental, since it has none of the specific properties of a marriage. Therefore such a union is not a marriage, but a continuous concubinage.

A man who cohabits in this manner with a woman for whom others have paid the bride price is often the object of humiliating allusions. He is treated as nkolasangɔ́, "inheritance taker" (that is, of inherited women). If a woman involved in the type of union described quarrels with one who has been "bought" in the regular manner, the latter will sometimes clap her hands (-foma losáka) to indicate her superiority. That is why such a woman is sometimes called wálɛ ɔâ fomalosáka in contrast to the other. [195]

Present-day circumstances make all this even more clearly apparent. ●[797] Nowadays, even pagan natives almost everywhere are aware of the intransigence of the Catholic Church on the question of the indissolubility of a marriage which has been effected through the religious ceremony. For this reason the "masters" of a woman who is legally theirs but who is actually living with another man in the manner described, will not permit her to enter into a religious marriage with this man unless he pays the bride price.

Therefore we may consider the type of union described above a concubinage which does not satisfy the moral conditions for a true marital union. As to the first type of marriage by inheritance, namely a union with a close relative of the deceased, the question is more complicated; but it is my opinion that such a marriage is valid from the moral standpoint. I hope, however, that in order to attain greater certainty on this point, others will re-examine the case in the light of the various aspects of the solution that have been presented.

The following historic case pertaining to individuals whose genealogy appears below will illustrate the preceding discussion:

586x
587 is only one royal power and dignity which continues to exist through the various individuals invested with it) or as in law when, in spite of a change in the identity of the debtor, there is no novation. (1) [207]

1. We will return to this question in Article IX.

Because of the way the Nkundɔ view this substitution, the bankitsɛ occupies the same rank in the harem as the woman she is replacing, and she is handed over to the husband by the same ndonga who participated in arranging the initial agreement.

What evaluation should be placed on this union by substitution from the standpoint of natural law? Does it bear the taint of a real vice or does it not? The right of civil powers to break a marriage legitimately contracted is debated. (1) Let us assume that this right exists and, furthermore, that the woman being substituted really consents. Her view, as well as the view of everyone around her, is that this is a matter of submitting to a family duty imposed by the laws which govern her people. One may wonder whether this requirement can be defended before basic principles of the law in general and in the light of morality. In any case the unanimous opinion of the natives that this substitution constitutes the continuation of a marriage through another person is certainly false. It is undoubtedly the result of an insufficient analysis, which leads them to lose sight of the crux of the problem by focusing primarily on the involvement of the clan in the marital union (see Article IX).

1. At the present time the affirmative opinion has almost been abandoned by Catholic philosophers, jurists, and moralists.

Whatever the case may be, it is possible to say without fear that in the great majority of cases a native woman submits to this law because she considers her submission an obligation which, for the good of her family, she is not permitted to escape.

● [197] Moreover, the younger generation is beginning to oppose this practice. For example, here with the Sisters there is a young daughter

586x of Boɔ́mbo, named Ngongo, who was given to Bokungɔ́ of Bongíli as a 587 replacement for her sister Ilumbɛ́ when she was a very small child.
797 Since she was not yet nubile she continued to live with her parents. When they became Christians, Ngongo was also baptized. On the other hand, [208] Longɔ́la, a son of Bokungɔ́, had become a catechumen and, after coming to the school, was baptized. His father yielded Ngongo to him as his future wife. Ngongo (who was now about seventeen) wanted nothing to do with this marriage. It was not that she refused to have Longɔ́la as her husband; she did not want to be married simply as a bankitsɔ́. She insisted on a marriage by bride price, in spite of the difficulties involved in the procedure, which was doubly useless and, for the Nkundɔ́, stupid.

587 There is a second form of substitution: replacement after death.
583x When a man has lost his wife and both he and the parents of the deceased want to maintain their alliance, he brings them 20 to 25 rings through the medium of the ndonga for the purpose of obtaining a new wife. This payment is called ibɔ́leɔ́ko, a term derived from -bɔ́l, "to beat" (for instance the clay in the ground) and eɔ́ko, "the site of a house." The Injɔ́lɔ́ designate it by a different name which however has the same meaning. It is sangɔ́lɛ́kojí, "the inheritance of a dwelling site."

The procedure is as follows: When the widower has fulfilled all his funerary obligations and, at the end of his second visit to his parents-in-law, he is about to take leave of them, they ask him:

"Well, you're leaving. What are you planning to do now?"

He answers, "I loved your daughter very much. She is dead, and I have buried her. I have fulfilled all my duties. I have always lived on good terms with you, and I would like to continue our relationship. But first I must consult my family. Then we will see." That is how he expresses his wish to continue being their son-in-law. After asking his relatives' opinion, he returns to his father-in-law with the ibɔ́leɔ́ko. "Here, I bring you the ibɔ́leɔ́ko; I come to beat the house site; give me a wife." The father-in-law will have already chosen the daughter, sister, or other relative who is to replace the deceased and has already privately mentioned her to his son-in-law.

If the woman went to her family in good health and contracted an infirmity there, her parents are responsible for it. They are obliged to nurse her and to assume all the expenses due to her treatment. After she is cured they send her back with a quantity of nkomé for her husband. Usually the matter ends there. If relations between the two families are not very good, however, the husband will claim an indemnity, which varies with the situation and to which he is entitled even if he does not claim it.

This stipulation of the law holds even if the woman has gone to see her mother, father, etc., at the time of an illness or for any other reason.

It does not hold, on the other hand, if the wife has been ordered to go to her parents by her husband, or if she has fled the home shared with her husband because of ill treatment or of serious failings on his part; this point will be explained below in number 3. In such cases the husband is legally responsible for the illness.

Certain situations may arise which are intermediate to the ones discussed. Thus, for example, a wife may make a visit on her own initiative [269] but for her husband's good. Theoretically, he should win the case. Note, finally, that a stay of only twenty-four hours is not considered sufficient to make responsibility for an illness fall on the wife's family.

Colonization has produced an entirely new situation. 178 595* 758 672 797 Colonial law has given the extra wives of polygamists the freedom to go to a mission in order to be instructed in the Christian religion and to contract a monogamous marriage (provided the customary rules governing the dissolution of marriages are observed). Such a woman may fall ill at the mission. If her illness has no troublesome consequences, it does not result in a dispute. But if the illness becomes chronic and in some way detrimental to the abandoned spouse, it may do so.

The polygamists declare that they are free of any responsibility, which they place on the woman's family. But the family has 178 nothing to do with it; it is unjust to bring them into the matter.

595x Since this legislation is intended to combat polygamy, it is natural 758 that the polygamous husband be the one who suffers from it.

672 The following is a recent example of this situation: Mbóyó ●797 Julienne, sister of Botúna Jean of Balondó, married to a polygamist by the name of Insilo of Bokenyola (Bonjoku), went to Bokuma Mission, where she contracted an incurable illness. (1) Because of her illness she found it impossible to remarry. She therefore left the mission but was no longer accepted by the husband she had lived with so that she had to live in her brother's home. Insílo insisted that her brother reimburse him for the bride price, maintaining that in going to the mission, the woman had divorced him; his real reason, however, [270] was that she had become unfit to fulfill the duties of a wife. Since Mbóyó did not fall ill in his home, he held her family responsible.

593x 3. Abandonment of the home shared by the couple

586x In the case of serious failings on the part of a husband, a woman's usual weapon is to leave their common home and return to her father's house. If the reason for her flight is serious, it is up to the husband to go and bring her back. She will not return on her own initiative. If he refuses to make the first step, he will be accused as much by public opinion as by his parents-in-law of not loving his wife, and a rupture will become inevitable. It is therefore his duty to go to his wife's parents. They will ask him to explain the situation. The wife, too, will say what she thinks. The parents will settle their difference. Whether or not the ndonga is present will depend on the

1. It was a sort of illness with nervous symptoms. From a scientific viewpoint, it is more than likely that she had this illness before her arrival at the mission, although it was only manifested there. But the natives do not make this distinction, so it is not relevant to our topic.

595x arrangements for a regular marriage with a lover, or they leave the polygamist under the protection of the Whites to go to a center or a mission.

1. A preference for monogamy

595x 797 We will not deal with daughters of Christian parents under this heading, in order not to falsify the problem, which we are discussing from the psychological, not the religious point of view.

1) Women who oppose being handed over in marriage to a man who is already married are rare. It is possible that such a refusal is due to one of the following causes: the desire to be bolɔ́mbɔ́ (or éfɔ́tswâála), (1) a natural desire for complete freedom, an antipathy for the suitor, or an abnormal constitution. Such cases must be [363] eliminated, since they prove nothing for or against the question raised.

But there are other instances where marriage is clearly postponed for the sake of entering into a monogamous union. Yet, under present circumstances, the desire to embrace the Christian religion is almost never absent. I have known several cases of adult single women who came to the mission to be married there while preparing for baptism. Most of them did not have the courage to persevere, however.

A greater number remain with their parents even if they want to be admitted to the Church. The life of single women at the mission is not exactly the easiest, either from the material viewpoint or as regards freedom. For even a sincere desire to participate in a monogamous union does not exclude human weakness or constitute a certificate of saintliness. These girls remain subject to the impulsiveness of their passions. It is quite true that even at the mission they can find the means to satisfy it, for it is impossible to watch over them to such a point that they would be unable to escape. But precisely because of this surveillance, which is close in spite of everything, they cannot freely let themselves go. While at home no one pays any 595x 797 attention to their deviations, at the mission the discovery of any misconduct results at least in a reprimand, which is always disagreeable, and often in a fairly long postponement of the baptism they ardently desire. Therefore these women usually prefer to circumvent the difficulty by waiting until a young man who is Christian or a catechumen asks for them in marriage.

595x 2) Most girls do not oppose polygamy. Education and traditional custom do not lose their power in a few years. Besides, the girls are often not really aware of the exact situation at the time they are asked for in marriage. Later, [364] when polygamous life no longer satisfies them, they try to arrange a marriage with a bachelor.

[797] In a number of cases the decisive reason is the desire to become Catholic. In others, religion does not enter into consideration. Only those can be examined here, for the value of the first group is greatly reduced by the presence of the religious motive.

If a woman leaves her husband because of personal antipathy to him or certain of her co-wives, and not because of any opposition to the system of polygamy, she takes the easiest and most direct way out by going to another polygamist, who has the means for repaying her bride price. This occurrence is more frequent than the preceding ones. Therefore we can make a division between the two possible situations and conclude that a preference for monogamy is present when a woman leaves a polygamist to marry a bachelor.

3) Other women take advantage of the freedom that colonization has produced by going to live with a bachelor in one of the centers. There may be a variety of motives behind such an action: a desire for luxury, a desire to be united to a man whom they love but who does not have the necessary wealth to marry them in the usual fashion, or a real desire for a monogamous union. (1) Today the last reason is rather rare.

1. At the present time the flight toward the centers has already become difficult, 595x but it is still possible. Everything depends on the degree of surveillance of the authorities. In large settlements their task is not always easy.

595x 797 4) A woman who abandons her polygamous husband and asks to be admitted to a mission may be motivated either by an aversion to polygamy or by a religious reason. First of all, we must make a distinction here between Catholic and Protestant missions. For if the woman goes to a Protestant mission, it is possible that only the first motive is involved. [365] For the Protestant mission accepts wives of polygamists for baptism without requiring them to break with the custom. Only the husband is excluded. (1) Therefore, they do not leave him when they become Christian but continue participating in the life of the harem as before. Thus, if any of them go to the Protestant mission all the same, we can conclude that they do so solely out of a preference for monogamy. But I do not know whether such cases actually occur, or in what proportion. It is to be hoped that a Protestant missionary will examine this exceedingly interesting question.

With reference to the Catholic missions, one or the other of the two motives may be involved. Usually both are present in the same person, for the Catholic religion does not permit polygamy either on the part of man or woman. According to the colonial law of the Congo, a woman has the right to break a polygamous union for the sake of a monogamous one. The polygamist's wife who asks to live at the mission wants to become Catholic and at the same time to contract a monogamous marriage. She has both objectives in mind. Persons of this sort must therefore be excluded from our discussion. As a matter of

1. I am speaking only of the specific region with which we are dealing in this study. Therefore, generalizations should not be made from these statements.

595^x fact, women who do not wish to become Catholic take the paths [717] described in 2) and 3).

5) There are even women who prevent their husbands from becoming polygamous. If he loves them a great deal, he will yield in the end, even if personally he would very much like to build a harem for himself. This was done by Mputɔ̃ (recently deceased, February 3, 1933), wife of Bofɛ̃nda, chief of Ekɔ̃kola. Bofɛ̃nda was rich and tried more than once to acquire other wives. He even took them home and paid the bride prices -- for example, for Ilo̲a of Bongíli. But Mputɔ̃ made life unbearable for them and thus forced them to leave. She absolutely wanted to keep her husband, [366] to whom she had given two boys and three girls, for herself alone.

We can therefore conclude that among a minority of Nkundɔ̃ women there exists a real preference for monogamy, even if we leave out of consideration all those who may be impelled by religious reasons. But most of them are in no way opposed to polygamy.

2. A preference for polygamy

Most Nkundɔ̃ women like polygamy and prefer it to monogamy. They make fun of a impɔ̃mbonjemba and are proud of the large number of wives in their husbands' harems.

Their indifference or aversion to monogamy can be explained on the basis of habit or atavism. But what is the basis for their marked preference for polygamy despite all its disadvantages? I asked this question of a number of polygamists' wives. Naturally, they first invoked the custom, (1) except for those who had known me for a long time. But the serious reason they gave was the greater comfort of life in a harem.

736 may wish to keep. In exemplary unions she is allowed to keep 768 the mats she has woven with her own hands, and the goods she received from her husband -- fabrics, beads, hens, even goats and dogs, and even sometimes what she has acquired through joint efforts with her husband (crops, livestock) -- are divided equally. The division is usually carried out with a generous attitude toward the widow, and if there is only one object of a kind the tendency is to let her have it. [442] Such conduct springs from pure generosity, for -- as has already been said -- the woman has absolutely no claim. In the past it followed only upon extraordinarily happy unions, and particularly in consideration of the relationship between the two families and the affection of one of the immediate heirs for the widow.

At the present time the influence of the missions is increasing
736 the number of instances of generosity toward the widow and starting
768 an inclination to make it a general rule. Thus good Christian 797 families -- if they are not thwarted by their pagan relatives -- leave the widow those objects she personally used, such as clothing, utensils, a trunk, and even a sewing machine.

Article VII. Economic Effects of Death

1. Bride price and dowry

768 The death of one of the spouses dissolves a marriage only 583x from a certain point of view and only as a union between two specific individuals. A marriage is absolutely broken only by the death of both spouses (or by divorce).

Unlike divorce death does not bring about any repayment either of the bride price or of the dowry (nkọmí). When the wife dies, all these payments remain in the hands of the respective parties. When a husband dies, the widow continues to belong to the heirs; she is part of the inheritance. The children belong to the father and his family; no new payment for them is necessary.

768 fastened her to a fork (etɔ́ka) until he was reimbursed. Sometimes 672 the ndonga intervened to free her, but by doing so he took upon 593* himself the responsibility of making restitution of the bride price. In this last [465] instance, if the wife died in the home of her family, the husband was entitled to reimbursement just as he would be in case of a divorce. Thus we come back to the situation described under 2) and 3), the forms varying according to whether or not the widower wanted to continue the affinal relationship.

[178] Nowadays the situation has changed entirely. The colonial administration no longer permits the use of the etɔ́ka. Consequently, a man who wants to get rid of his incorrigible wife acts in such a way that she will leave him of her own free will. And the situation is again that described in 2).

If the husband has sent his wife away himself by placing her in the hands of the ndonga, his parents-in-law will refuse him an indemnity or any restitution of the bride price and often will not even accept the nkunjɛ́. They answer his demands by telling him that he should not have repudiated the wife whom he freely chose for himself. Thus most men resort to the procedure described in the next paragraph. There are circumstances, however, under which this mode of action is more difficult; this is so especially in the case of monogamists, since its execution requires several weeks, sometimes several months. In the interim the wife does as she pleases and neglects her husband, so that the latter practically finds himself a bachelor.

791 Evangelization has added a second difficulty. Catholic
768 marriage is indissoluble. Catechumens and Christians who wish to 672 marry must therefore be careful. Before admitting them to religious marriage, we require that at least the walo be paid. But 593* the young men know the temperament and value of their fiancées only through experience. In almost every case therefore they have this experience at home before the walo, in accordance with their ancestral custom. Then, if one of the two parties is pagan (which happens very often), the disciplinary rules of the Catholic missions in the Congo require that they spend a minimum of six months

768 the experimental period, the engaged pair sometimes find faults
672 in each other which lead them to foresee a married life filled with 595 difficulties and resulting in a breakup. Therefore it is preferable that they carry out the required measures before marriage. The woman is usually the source of the difficulties. The female sex has hardly been touched by evangelization, chiefly because pagan parents, who do not oppose the Christianization and education of their boys, take their revenge on the girls. What they fear particularly is the girls' opposition to premature marriages or their flight to the centers. For those people, therefore, it is almost impossible to get round the difficulty in such a way. As the situation is not provided for in traditional law and, furthermore, most of the natives who hold power are clearly indifferent, if not hostile, to evangelization and the stability of Christian marriage, these special circumstances are not taken into account in any way, to the great detriment of the young people who are thus caught between their consciences and their temporal interests (which in this instance have strong repercussions on their moral life). The attitude of almost all the chiefs and judges in this matter is not contrary to ancestral law -- since the situation was unknown -- but it is certainly opposed to the spirit of that law.

7) The couple go to the home of the wife's family together.
672 Illness and death that come unexpectedly during such a visit are 768 imputed solely to the husband, who retains all the risks except,
595 of course, if the husband returns home but his wife does not follow him, remaining with her parents. Indeed in such a case we fall back on the solution described in 2).

8) Here we come back to the possibility indicated at the end of Article IX, 1, namely that of the wife who dies in her [457] family's home before the walo is paid. If the husband is in the wrong (see under 1), 5), and 7), the solution given in the article in question retains all its validity; the husband's "responsibility" remains intact. In the other instances it is reduced but not taken away. Actually, two laws are in conflict. On the one hand, there is the "responsibility" of the husband who has not fully acquitted

768 Colonization has given rise to a new legal situation which is 672 not provided for in Nkundó traditional law. If a woman takes ad-
178 vantage of the freedom permitted her by colonial legislation and goes to a mission to obtain instruction and make a monogamous marriage, and then contracts an illness from which she dies (at the mission, in the hospital, or even in the home of her family -- a question of place which has no legal importance), we find ourselves confronted by an entirely new situation. The husband no longer considers the woman his wife since she has left him, even though theoretically she continues to retain that status. On the other hand, she has not gone back to her family or gone to live with another man.

Polygamous husbands want to throw the "responsibility" back upon the woman's parents. But actually they have no part in the events, and it is unfair to involve them in the situation.

They do not bring the mission into the matter. As a matter
[197] of fact, the mission performs a service to the woman and to society as a whole in trying to elevate it morally and culturally.

What should one think of this situation? In the preceding article we have seen that the husband assumes all risks in relation to the wife. Certain exceptions to this rule [460], which we have explained, have been formulated in Nkundó law; but outside of them, the law retains its dominion, since the exceptions are narrowly defined. Thus it applies to the situation with which we are dealing, and consequently the damages must remain on the husband's account.

Moreover, this interpretation is to be encouraged for the following reason:

The purpose of the legislation involved is to protect freedom in this matter of capital importance and to favor monogamy and the gradual abandonment of polygamy. Polygamists -- as a group -- must perforce suffer from it in one way or another. It is inconceivable that a struggle against an abuse would not affect the persons guilty of it.

Such cases are still very rare, but their frequency may in-768 crease with the progress of evangelization.

672 In terminating this discussion we must make one point that 682 is related to both of the last two articles. The cause of death has no

202 198 Bansele nsele ba nkanga. "The one always screaming who is followed into the high grass, the strong branch, the districts go along with the priest (Father).

1. The missionary is seen here as a witch doctor (bansele nsele ba nkanga is a general lokole name for the Negro witch doctor), who, like the Negro doctor, is looked upon as a doctor and a priest.

2. Bofala boki ndaki lisako nda lokombe [sic]. The priest, because he is always seeking converts everywhere, is here compared with an antelope which, when it is followed, runs around and around in the high grass.

3. Etafe bolo. The missionary is here compared with a strong branch. He is strong because he is influential and highly regarded by the Negroes.

4. Benanga bekendaka la mpere. The districts all go along with the Father (priest). They all follow his instructions.

The nkombo of the Protestant Anglican missionary is as follows: Bofanga sembola bonanga boso nkenda l'Inglese.

"The fishing net is spread out; the country goes along with the Englishman."

In the same way as the fishing net cordons off a part of the river and everything is caught in it, so all the people go along with the Englishman. The Protestant Anglican missionary was in this district ●[N] before the arrival of the Catholic missionary, so this nkombo refers, of course, to this period. Since the arrival of the Catholic missionary, the situation has changed completely in this district.

These few examples give an indication of the difficulty in understanding the lokole language.

352 322 In addition, the Negro makes a few chairs, the most important of which is the lyeko la mpaka, the chair for the elder, a three-legged affair with two props under it, topped with a piece out of the umbrella tree; into this the elder can throw himself as lazily as he wishes.

Then there is the so-called ebonga, a little stool chopped out of a block of wood with the native axe. This is finished off attractively with an esumwa, a small paring chisel, and the seat is decorated around the edge with studs which have been bought in some factory or other.

THE NKUMU OF THE TUMBA

RITUAL CHIEFTAINSHIP ON THE MIDDLE CONGO

H. D. BROWN

101 THE tribes living round Lake Tumba, a lake some thirty-five miles long by twelve wide lying north of Lake Leopold II (approximately 0° 30′ south latitude, [133] and 18° east longitude) and draining into the Congo River at the confluence of the Ubangi, lack cohesion and show a considerable variety of custom and language.
But they are known collectively as Tumba, the Government adaptation of the Native term Ntomba. Most of them are found to the east of the lake, the whole group numbering perhaps little more than forty to fifty thousand at the present time, though [797] there is evidence that the last twenty years have seen a great decrease in population.
European occupation of this area goes back barely fifty years, Protestant missions having been established for about the same length of time. The first mission post [177] was established at Ikoko on the north-east shore of the lake, one of the villages of a group known as Bonginda. In pursuing this investigation particular attention has been given to the practices of this group, but mention is occasionally made where considerable differences have been found elsewhere.

105 The Tumba are agricultural, hunting, and fishing people. Their country is flat
13 and swampy with dense forests, and there are many watercourses flowing into Lake Tumba. There are occasional small, less swampy plains, and one such area, more open, with quite wide stretches of prairie, is a haunt of buffalo. The forests are fairly wel supplied with game, and the swamps, streams, and lakes with fish. A heavy rainfall and no distinct dry season make agriculture reasonably easy and famine unknown. Every family has its plantation of manioc, the staple diet, which is supplemented by plantains and bananas. The people make their own tools, formerly smelting their own iron for this purpose, are fairly skilful at making dug-out canoes, engage in weaving raffia and making mats out of split cane, and are efficient at pottery production.

624 The role of the nkumu in the socio-religious activities of the community is one of the most interesting features of Tumba life. As a result of European contact the 101 ceremonies connected with the nkumu are rapidly disappearing, but it has been 178 possible to collect considerable information from the older men and women among whom the details are still vividly remembered.[1] The following report refers to the period previous to European occupation and control, a time within the memory of a large number of people, but already sufficiently remote to become a matter of hearsay before the lapse of many more years.

596 An understanding of the place of the nkumu among the Tumba requires a glance [173] at the tribal organization. According to the people themselves, they migrated westward, and coming into these parts chose land for themselves. Among the several

[1] In My Children of the Forest, New York, 1924, pp. 48–51, Andrew F. Hensey has briefly outlined some of the items of interest observed among the nkumu of the district adjacent to that of the present study. These more detailed notes are, however, timely if a record is to be preserved that approximates to accuracy.

178 We can add to that also a large number of black women who became 583 the famous "housekeepers" of the Europeans. Although payment for these women was usually given to their owners, they were still withdrawn from the family life and the native customs. Finally, the Christian women, who now live in Christian marriage, must also be mentioned.

In addition, the price of wives and the bride price have [544] undergone great changes, primarily in those districts where the natives came into more immediate contact with Europeans. Before the arrival of the Europeans, their main medium of payment was the woman herself; a woman was paid for with a woman. Now it is forbidden to use women as currency. Therefore the natives have raised the price in the payment of bakonga and mitako.

178 In some districts close to the European centers, the natives
583 have brought the price for wives and the bride price to a height 435 never before known. For one wife they ask several nkesi.

A nkesi is 10,000 mitako. Such a sum is much too high in relation to their means. In a village there are, for instance, 50 women; for one woman, 40,000 to 50,000 mitako are asked, while at present in the whole village together the sum of 50,000 mitako is no more to be found. Therefore to oblige someone to pay two or three nkesi is usually to make it impossible for him to pay, or rather to make it necessary for him to pay with women, which is nothing else than encouraging woman trade, which then occurs.

802 A remark should also be made here about the nomenclature
177 of the numerals. Nkesi is not a word of the Equatorial peoples; it was brought in from elsewhere with the Europeans. Their amounts were as follows:

10 was jum or bonkama;

100 was nkoto; and with the arrival of the Whites and foreign population came

1,000 nkesi.

The present numerical value is: 10, jum; 100, bonkama; 1,000, nkoto; and 10,000, nkesi. Some very old Negroes, however, still say bonkama for 10.

This is the probable origin of the great rise in price of wives, [583] especially in the area of Coquilhatville.

178 439 583 When the first Europeans arrived at Leopoldville and Brazzaville, it was not long before European materials and other articles also came to Coquilhatville to the hands of the great village chiefs who carried on trade on the rivers, primarily in slaves and ivory. The village chiefs, Yoma from the village of Boyeka, Ibuka of Boyere, Yamba of [545] Eala, Nkake of Bokele, etc., carried these European articles up the Tshuapa and Ikelemba rivers, and they bought slaves and wives with them.

Returning home again, they bought wives from their own district and paid for them with the slaves and women whom they themselves had bought cheaply with the European articles. For one woman of their district they paid three or four women. The arrival 802 of the Whites and foreign Blacks acquainted them with the number nkesi which, however, in their definition was only 1,000 and which they formerly called 10 nkoto or 10 times 100.

178 583 It was not long before the Europeans had to concern themselves with hearing disputes over the wives. In the Black land such a thing is unavoidable. Whenever the Blacks came to the Whites with their disputes, they dared not or would not say, "I paid for this woman with three women, but they said, "I paid for this woman with three nkesi," that is, 3 times 1,000 mitako. Meanwhile, the nkoto and nkesi acquired their value of 1,000 and 10,000. The statement, however, that a woman was paid for with nkesi was retained, through the error of the Whites or through the greed of the polygynists or both. Indeed, later some women were paid for with nkesi, namely, when the prevalent currency in the Congo was the mitako. It was also no wonder, for the polygynists had a monopoly on the wives, and it was to their advantage to raise the price.

Therefore, if the native of Coquilhatville says now that his father or his uncle paid for that woman with three or four nkesi, this generally means that the wife was paid for with three or four women. The price of the women in Wangata, near Coquilhatville, was formerly no higher than in the other areas. Many women were paid for with only five bakonga, for instance, in Bokala, near Bamania, a village which belonged to the village chief Yoma of Boyeka.

178 583 435 It should also be noted that the nkesi which have been paid in recent years in Wangata have been paid not in mitako or in

825 There is a large number of diverse spirits, and almost every village has several in its territory Each one has its own habitat in some singular place or object which stimulates the imagination: enormous trees, oval hollows which form ponds of a sort (jémbo, pl. baémbo), steep slopes, extraordinary pieces of limonite, whirlpools in streams and rivers, etc

776
842 The Nkundó pray to the bilímá in order to obtain children. For that purpose they make offerings of food and money. To test someone's feelings toward it, an elímá may come to him in the evening or at night in the guise of a known person and ask for some small present. Unhappy is he who shows himself to be stingy; he will be deprived of the object of his desire, or his child will be premature or born sickly or deformed.

783
842
776 In addition to taking a generally friendly attitude toward the spirit, another means of ensuring his intervention is open to a woman. She can procure some kaolin (congo) at the spirit's habitat (a jémbo, preferably). In the evening she mixes it with some plants. She smears her abdomen with this mixture, known as isá. [843] She continues the treatment throughout her pregnancy; it has the property of removing everything in her which is of such a nature that it might oppose the spirit (ákékola lokeko jwá bilíma ílie ndá likundú).

776
842 Certain water spirits are known for their generosity, for instance Itúmbálombé or Ekótalombé of Mpakú, [471] who is considered to be a female being. She goes on distant voyages to seek a supply of children. On her return she appears to someone and communicates the news to him so that he may spread it. But she orders all women who desire her favors to observe some form of abstinence. Sometimes she sings to amuse or calm the children. On that day mothers must not use songs to pacify their little ones or to put them to sleep and can use only soft words for that purpose. Otherwise the child would die, for to do so would be to disregard the old elímá's kindness.

palm wine to gain courage, hits the nearest victim on the head with the empty gourd, 766 then transfers the knife to his right hand. He is now ready for his work which he proceeds to do methodically, sustained by the heady wine and the rhythm of the drum. When he had finished one of the lines, a pause would be made to bring out the body for burial. Just before this is done an armed band rushes down the path, returns, goes up in the other direction, then returns; this is said by some to ward off any spirits which might be about. The nkumu is now brought out by the Batwa slaves.[1] His grave, a circular hole with a crypt in one side of it, its entrance facing west, had been previously prepared. Few people in the Bonginda villages knew or had seen the actual burying place of an nkumu. While the corpse was carried to the grave followed by a crowd, the executioner finished his work. Those who stayed behind took the bodies of the decapitated men and women and divided [24] them among all the participants of the funeral who would subsequently devour everything.

Accompanying the funeral procession to the grave were the ndeli, one or more men or women who were destined to accompany the nkumu to his grave and to the other world beyond. At the burial of an nkumu witnessed in 1930 at which the semblances of some of the old rites were carried out, a party of armed men contested the right of the procession to approach the grave, there was a mock battle for a few minutes between two bands of the funeral party, and then the procession gained right of way. At the grave-side the legs and sometimes the arms of one ndeli were broken by heavy clubs to prevent him from escaping. Then seated on the ground the body of the nkumu would be placed on the knees of this one, whose arms would be placed round the nkumu and securely fastened by driving a peg right through both wrists. Sometimes two ndeli were thus used. If the number of victims was sufficient, [514] others would be buried alive too, being placed in the grave in the recumbent supine position, with the corpse on top of them, its weight being sufficient, with the earth filling in the grave, to prevent escape. The nkumu was now ready for burial and was placed in the crypt, facing west.[2] The relatives of the nkumu approach, they pluck [824] the leaves and stem of a juicy bush known as nkeke and chewing it, expectorate ceremonially on the body while they address it in language somewhat as follows: 'You are going to leave us now, we are mourning, for you were a good and wise man, your discernment in matters of justice was without parallel, &c. . . . we wish that you may be happy where you go, have many wives, beget many children, lack not for meat. But don't take with you our power to beget children, leave us also some of this wisdom of yours, for what you were, we would be.' This prayer over, the [illegible] would be slipped off the head of the corpse and replaced by the informal hat, all done so dexterously that the bare head was not seen. The entrance to the [184]

[1] The body was supposed to have remained in state for seven to nine days, but actually it was buried privately soon after death, a dummy being set up with the [illegible] on its head, and the succeeding ceremonies being conducted with only the dummy in the place of the actual body. The inland villages however did allow the body to remain unburied for the long period, the wives being forced to keep watch in the same house. The Bonginda buried their nkumu generally in their houses at the spot where they had been accustomed to sit, burying the dummy at some other spot farther off.

M 778 of the most disparate and incongruous objects, [22] white, black, or red clay, ngula /Ed., redwood powder/, chicken feet, heads, beaks, claws, and feathers, shells, palm nuts, etc., all mixed together in a large pot or in an old worn basket. It is from this magic treasure that the fetisher takes a pinch or two which he wraps carefully in a little bag and hands over to those who resort to him. T [778] As for the human figurines so often found in the huts of the Bateke and Banfumu, we do not believe that they are fetishes. In our opinion, they are guardian figurines for children, carved before their birth and preserved until they reach marriageable age.

M 791 ● 824 Some fetishers manage to gain quite a reputation, and their services are purchased for a very high fee. They are familiar with the properties of certain plants, and they keep this knowledge secret and exploit it as much as possible. It would be wrong to believe that the fetisher's practices are all based on mystification.

M 278 695 Ebandia, the high chief of the Mosengere, knew the secret of certain poisons. He knew effective remedies for certain kinds of festering wounds; he proportioned the quantity of poison at ordeals so as to make its action violent or slow, and he was familiar with an antidote which cancelled out the effects of the poison.

M 278 695 684 A few hours before our arrival at Penge, Ebandia had subjected [23] one of his wives to trial by poison, on the mere suspicion that she might have gone too far with a native during a slightly prolonged stay in the forest. Ebandia accused her of adultery, prepared the beverage, and compelled the poor woman to prove her innocence by taking the poison. The unfortunate creature rebelled. A quarrel arose, and the village natives, when informed of the matter, protested against it, to no avail, however. The old tyrant carried out the ordeal. He had been notified of our impending arrival, and after allowing the unfortunate woman to suffer horribly for nearly two hours, he gave her the antidote. Five hours later, all the effects of the poison were gone. [Ed., the text is not translated from the last paragraph, page 23, to the second paragraph, page 26.]

T 764 [26] In general the natives have a kind of cult of the dead. In the Bateke-Banfumu region, the corpse is wrapped in fabrics. The more important the deceased person is, the larger the bundle. His whole wealth in fabrics goes with him to the grave. Prior 291/184 The nkɛ́sɛ́ is unknown beyond the Jwalɛ́ and the Luilaka. In that region the women tie a string (or a belt of beads) around themselves and attach a second piece of cloth to it.

291 Thus the male garment is a rudimentary sort of shorts, open on the sides, while female dress is much more open. In general the efufa is an appropriate protection of one's modesty, but it is inadequate in certain positions. (2)

[611] [196] 2. It may be interesting to note that etɔ́o nsamɛ́nyɛ́, or just plain etɔ́o, which is the term for a man's garment, also indicates the male line of descent, while the female line is often designated by the term nkɛ́sɛ́ (sometimes by the word jwɔ̌moto derived from bɔ̌moto, "woman"). Let us add that lonkundɔ́ jwǎ nkɛ́sɛ́ means "pure, flawless Lonkundo, not corrupted by foreign influences." This expression should be compared with the following phrases: langue maternel, moedertaal, "mother tongue," etc.

291 177 At present the nkɛ́sɛ́ is no longer worn except by a few elderly inhabitants of villages far from the main communication lines. Everywhere else the ancient mode of dress has been replaced by materials imported from Europe. The women wear at least a sangatɛ́mbo, a kind of short skirt which falls from their loins at least to the middle of their thighs if not further. Middle-aged men in the interior have simply changed the material of their garment but not its form. The younger ones, on the contrary, have frankly adopted the European mode of dress.

291 581 ● [124] [837] A married woman is not allowed to enter the village of her relatives by marriage (bakilɔ́) or appear before them [54] without supplementing her usual attire with one or more beleleke (banana leaves cut into fringes). The term bakilɔ́ must be understood as it is meant by the Nkundɔ́; it excludes those with whom the wife may sometimes perform the sexual act and who are called "husbands" broadly speaking.

834 178 It goes without saying that the feeling of sexual modesty and its various manifestations among these people are being transformed by two different currents. On the one hand, their moral laxity is increased by their contact with all sorts of other peoples, by a greater freedom, by the partial emancipation of women, and by the attraction of the large centers and their luxury. On the other hand, there is the preaching of Christian morality, although its effects are still very slight and certainly do not counterbalance the influences mentioned above.

Article II. Preparation for Sexual Life

1. The Woman's preparation

833

When a girl wishes to indulge in pleasures of the flesh, she prepares her sexual organs in advance. The preparation itself consists of "opening the way" (lifola mbɔ́ka). This operation, which is repeated several times, is performed in hiding, preferably in the forest. The girl may or may not have companions with her who share her intentions. Each girl operates on herself. In order to gradually enlarge the organ, a girl uses progressively thicker shoots of the ● [824] bosɛ́ɛ́nga or bokaakɔ́ plant (Costus afer), making sure first to remove the tip. Later these shoots are replaced by the lombɔ́lɛ́ fruit of the bosɔ̌ombɔ́ plant (Aframomum) or, more infrequently, by a young manioc tuber.

This is the general practice; exceptions are few or nonexistent. It is followed because the girls want the event to which they aspire to occur without difficulty (bálota báfɔ́v'ɔ̌keela).

833 515 In addition to this basic preparation, girls [65] also wash the private parts of their bodies. This is a cleanliness measure which they continue to practice save in exceptional cases for the rest of their lives. According to my informants, the native woman -- as a very general rule -- stresses this cleanliness as much for herself as for the sake of not repelling her husband or lover. When a girl begins to practice this personal hygiene, it is a sign that she wants to begin her sexual life.

832 in which they are manufactured, and consequently in the way they [824] are used. The most common ingredients are certain leaves mixed with red rouge (ngóla) and a sort of lichen which forms red slabs on the bark of certain species found in the forest; the whole thing is [825] carefully wrapped in a small fur (especially the skin of the small feline iyei).

The charm is hidden under a slat of the bed where the desired one takes her nightly rest. Because this is done an ardent love for the owner of the charm will grow in her heart. Or it may be placed somewhere in a hut; then the desired woman is called in, the owner of the charm takes her arm, and the efóndé immediately "turns her heart." Or, still without the woman's knowledge, the charm is thrown into the fire where she cooks. If she begins to sneeze when she returns home, this is a sign that the smoke charged with mysterious emanations from the philter has pepetrated through her nostrils all the way to her heart and filled it with ardent love for the Adonis in question.

The efóndé is considered an ikóko, that is, a subjugation. Efóndé ákóka bǎmato, "the efóndé masters women, has power over [824] them." The substance which prevents the efóndé from being efficacious is the bokai, a kind of sour vegetable. [102] The owner of the philter must abstain from eating it. For the bekai cause vomiting and if he ate any the woman would in the same manner eject her love and thus make the boté ineffective.

2. Bontálá

Contrary to the efóndé, the bontálá is a love philter which is not available to everyone; it is a charm only for dancers of the iyaya. This does not mean that all the artists who perform this dance have it, but they alone are acquainted with it. The material basis of the bontálá, as of most Nkundó beté, are the leaves of certain plants.

The efficacy of the bontálá is infallible. It acts not only on the beloved one, but also on any woman who involuntarily or on purpose fulfills the condition necessary to its operation. That is, as soon as a woman's head touches the arm of the possessor of the bontálá, her heart is moved in his favor; should she be married, her love for her

583ˣ 431 to leave her husband and he, in revenge, were to lay hands on her mother or on one of the other wives of the clan. (1) [148]

1. See Chapter VI, Article VII, 4, (1), and Chapter VIII, Article II, 1.

● [824] 7) Lombẹ̌: a wide shoulder strap made of fur or braided bẹkombẹ reeds (Calamus sp.), though valuables of equal worth (one knife or a konga) may be given. Nowadays this boéngo consists of 2 or 3 rings; it goes to the mother in compensation for the wearying burden of carrying and nursing her daughter. (1)

1. Note that when a mother-in-law brings a child into the world, her son-in-law sends her a shoulder strap of liengé otterskin or a konga of equivalent value. He does not repeat this gift at each birth, however.

[854] 8) Betótswá byǎ nkwá: leaves of the bonkongé bush used to remove, wipe off, and carry away (tóta) a child's excrement. This boéngo consists of a ring and goes to the mother as compensation for her performance of these tasks. In the absence of the mother, it is claimed by another of the father's wives or by a female relative of the mother.

[224] 9) The bojánga, "hunting net," is demanded in many villages for no special reason. Certain clans, however, scoffed at by others because they have few members, officially ask a man belonging to one of the latter and wishing to marry one of their daughters to bring a net, saying: "You make fun of us because we have no people; bring us a hunting net to surround and enclose us, since we are not many." Thus the village of Boyela of the Bakáala, never gives one of its members in marriage without this boéngo.

[184] 10) Wěngé w'ǎẹ́kẹ́: a boéngo which is not known everywhere but which is customary in certain groups, for example among the Bakáala. One of the woman's relatives takes a piece of a young thorny trunk of the wěngé tree. Having scraped one end of it, he holds this

595* 554 On the day set aside for establishing the position of the bolɔ́mbɔ́, there is a great feast. All the clans and neighboring villages that have been invited gather at the home of the polygamist in question. He presents the woman to them and addresses the gathering: "Here is the woman whom I want to make my bolɔ́mbɔ́, as I have already announced to you. Today I am making public the decision I already made a long time ago. Be it known to all that no man may touch her, or he will be severely punished." Then two women (in rare instances, two men) hold the woman, and the husband unfastens her belt and rips off all her clothing. Then the assistants tie a rope or a belt of mpangá (striped antelope) skin around her, and to it they attach various furs. From that day [292] until her death she may no longer wear the clothing (bitɔ́o) of other women; she must always [350] be dressed in furs. Hence her name, bolɔ́mbɔ́ wa bíkɔ́tɔ́, "bolɔ́mbɔ́ with furs." Then her husband gives her pots of palm oil with which she will have to cover herself. Two men approach her; they are chosen among the handsomest in the village (1) (married or single) and are

[609] 1. They are then (sic) relatives of the husband. Nkundó law dictates that no stranger shall perform a function of the slightest importance -- not even that of silencing a gathering. According to their saying, bofaya áfɔtɛlɛ lokáanga, "a stranger does not cut up a guinea hen."

[301] richly adorned with furs, belts of mpangá, beads, raffia fabrics with jagged edges, copper rings on their ankles, etc. Stepping [351] in rhythm, they lead her to the house intended for her which is ● [524] surrounded by a fence of bɔfɛko posts (Ricinodendron africanum) held together with palms. This hut with its fence is called ilɛkɛ.

There the bolɔ́mbɔ́ will reside for months and years (up to three or more, they say). She is secluded there, so to speak, [514] and may not go out. If she needs to go to the banana groves for her personal needs, she covers and surrounds herself with a mat so that no one will see her.

846 to be able to nurse the child together." This does not mean that 833 from then on they may have regular sexual relations, for these are not permitted until after the end of seclusion. But if they were to omit the act at this time, they would have to abstain from it until the child is weaned. The Nkundó say that the act is performed "only a little." For many it becomes masturbation; others withdraw before obtaining the effect of the act. In no case may the act reach its natural climax. The reason for this practice is unknown to me. Perhaps it is done in order not to molest the woman while she is in a painful condition.

The next day the ashes in the hearth of the seclusion hut
846 are swept out, and the fire becomes "ordinary"; anyone may use it and eat food prepared on it.

4) The umbilical cord is dried on the bolíkó (a tray or shelf) and then buried at the foot of a young banana tree planted for that purpose, preferably under a bo̲nko̲ní tree if possible. The ashes and sweepings from the seclusion hut are thrown there. The banana tree is called nkíndá. (1) Its fruit may be eaten only by the child's [153] grandfather and grandmother. If another person eats it, he will be punished with a headache of a nervous type.

The umbilical cord is always buried in the father's native
846 soil. People who are far from home (laborers for the Whites, etc.)
614 preserve the umbilical cords of their children with great care in order to take them back [489] when they return to their village, or send them back when a favorable opportunity arises. The Nkundó hold to this usage tenaciously, because a person whose umbilical cord is not buried in the lands of his paternal clan has no authority in the group. The person involved would meet with the following objection: ntákokúndela lokolé, ntákokundela lo̲ko̲kí, óyakúmya ngámo? olě nk'eyâya, "The lokolé was not beaten for you, your [824] 1. This is a generic term used for any banana tree planted for a special purpose (a magical practice, a game, etc.).

846 taking the child would cause the child's death. The same precaution 789 is also in order if the husband goes on a trip before the child's birth and does not return till after the delivery

We have just seen that the harmful effects of the father's 846 misconduct on his child's life is effectuated through the father's 837 act of taking the child on his knees. Thus the Nkundó speak of baóngó b'âbé, "a father's bad knees," to indicate his reprehensible
[826] conduct, and they say that the bondandota potion is administered to the child so that it will not die because of the father's bad
knees. (1)

1. The expression baóngó b'âbé is also used when an undertaking which requires continence is unsuccessful. (See Article II, 3).

When a child has painful and persistent diarrhea, it is often 753 interpreted as the effect of the father's infidelity. As soon as they 854 become aware of it, the couple separate for some time, and the father no longer touches the child. [492]

Contrary to what one reads on this subject about other peoples 837 of the Congo, Nkundó couples do not have to remain continent
834 beyond the period of seclusion. The separation ceremony gives the 789 husband back the freedom of action he had before his wife's pregnancy.
For the wife the bokeka remains strict with respect to illicit relations until the child is weaned However she, too, may regain
her freedom by having recourse to an antidote, the ingredients of which she purchases from a person who holds the secret. The ingredients are placed in a small antelope horn which is then stopped [824] up by means of bolakɛ́ (resin from the S[illegible]mphonia gabonensis). The interested party wears it about her loins [illegible] a string or a bead belt or, preferably, on a special creeper. This amulet protects the child's life from the harmful influence of the mother's acts of adultery, but it does so only on condition that she does not separate herself from the child, as we will explain further on. This procedure

862 does not really stop nursing till it is about two years old, and sometimes two and a half if it has a weak constitution.

Weaning is not accompanied by any ceremony or feast. In order to break the child's habit, the mother smears her nipples with the sap of the liféte fruit (a kind of small sweet pimento or [824] eggplant) or with a pimento-pepper extract (imbénga). Sometimes she leaves the child with some relative (daughter, sister, etc.) for a time [498] while she lives elsewhere.

As we have seen above, after weaning, the ekelé-bokeka period comes to an end for the mother, and her infidelities no longer have repercussions on the life of her child.

[853] 8) If the mother dies while the infant is still being nursed, [563] the task of nursing is turned over to some woman who is disposed to undertake it even a Bo̱tswa, and there always is one. After the child is weaned the woman is suitably recompensed. The use of [235] goat's milk is unknown.

854 751 9) Young children frequently suffer convulsions. This illness is thought to be caused by hawks, and for that reason it is called [153] mpulú (bird). The Nkundó try to prevent it by hanging an amulet around children's necks; it is usually the clavicular triangle of a hen's carcass. In addition they know a remedy whose purpose is to strengthen the nerves: the child is laid on a mat stretched out anywhere on the roof of the hut. An eyewash (bo̱ló̱í) is prepared from the sap of leaves from the litóyansombo bush and extract of mbó̱lé (fruit of the bosoombó̱). Using a leaf shaped into a horn, a few drops are put into the child's eyes. Then the father or some other relative pulls out the mat from under the child and lifts it several times, shouting: tá tá tá.

856 10) No special importance is attached to teething. But a child whose upper teeth come in before the lower ones (a defect called ingondo) is considered abnormal. Therefore he is forbidden to eat the first fruits of hunting or fishing in an enclosure (mpao), lest the latter lose their productivity.

845 In other respects he is not differentiated from the other two. Greetings are not tripled in the case of triplets.

A child born directly after twins is called Wuteji (from utela, "to repeat"). He is in no way different from other children.

Article VII. Circumcision

304 Circumcision is generally practiced. It does not have to be performed at any particular age. It is usually done during childhood before the tenth year. The more timorous put it off until puberty or even later. Special customs of individual clans sometimes set a time. Thus, a man of the village of Besombó is not allowed to be circumcised until he has killed an animal at the hunt. On the other hand, the season during which circimcisions are performed is specified: they must take place during the period when the water level is low.

The operation may be performed by any man who is expert at it. It is carried out behind the huts. No one but the boys being operated on and their fathers are present. The boys stand in a group somewhat apart from the proceedings but place themselves so that with their eyes they can follow the treatment to which their companion is being subjected. The patient squats. One of the elderly assistants places his hands over the boy's eyes so that he cannot see what is happening. The person performing the operation has already dug a small pit to catch the blood. He pulls the foreskin, ties it with a string, and then uses ashes to trace the line which must be followed by the empúto knife that is used on such occasions. When the blood has stopped flowing, he chews some bondóngó
● [824] pepper (Aframomum . . .) or, preferably, [506] a caudal fin of [825] the ngolo fish and then spits it onto the wound. The resulting sensation is very painful. But the patient shows that he is brave; for if he cries he is mocked by his companions.

As long as the wound is not healed, the boy must not use [262] manioc leaves (bangánju) or manioc bread in the preparation of bosombó or loóto. Nor may he eat the skin, head, or tail of fish.

While the wound is healing, the boy who has been circumcised is cared for, washed, etc., by his mother or, if he has reached 202 so-and-so has died. Hours before his actual death, people everywhere know that a certain person is on his deathbed and that his death is imminent.

[100] If the witch doctor is up to his tricks of duping the silly Negro, people everywhere around know just what nonsense he is performing at what moment.

The White announces his morning and midday orders by means of the lokole and tells his workers when they may cease work for the day by the same means.

In the mornings and evenings and in the case of wet weather, the lokole carries especially far, but in the full sun it is not so effective.

202
534 The lokole is a large block of wood which is split down the middle for almost the whole of its length, and the inside part is carefully hollowed out. The lokole has the shape of an extra long, open mussel shell although, in general, the outside edges are flattened out.

322 The making of lokole is the trade of a certain person, and some Negroes are well-known for the lokole they have made.

Only four kinds of wood are suitable for the making of a lokole. [324] These are (1) Bokungu; (2) Likoso; (3) Bolondo; and (4) Isi. The last is the most excellent kind of wood and the one used by the Mongo [386] Negro to manufacture his "ngula" (red dye) with which he smears his body for even the least important event that occurs in his village. The Isi is probably a species of redwood. The Mongo Negro makes 322 five different lokole: (1) Ingonga, small in shape; (2) lokole ja losali, 534 medium size; (3) bongungu, large lokole. These three are all like the one described above. They are struck with sticks (bosolu) from the "momambo" tree (umbrella tree). (4) Bonkuka is the large, high lokole that is struck with two sticks to the ends of which are attached several balls of caoutchouc. The sound of these lokole carries for the greatest distance. (5) Ngomo is the large, oblong, upright dance lokole. This lokole is simply a large, oblong piece of wood, completely hollowed out, decorated a little, about 1.25 meters high, and covered at the top with a piece of dried antelope or leopard skin. It is struck with the fingers and the palm of the hand. This lokole is the well-known tom-tom, still used by the Negroes on the steamboats to announce their arrival in the villages along the river.

202 And now something about lokole language.

198 The beat of the lokole varies, and it is by this means that the Negroes [101] understand the different words. The tempo varies also.

no compulsion. If one of the contracting parties fails to fulfil its pledges in this matter 224
of giving part of the kill, or in anything else, the aggrieved party may call the council 624 together. This consists not only of members of the [illegible] and [illegible], but of all 596 elders of the village or villages connected with this particular one. The party judged in the wrong, whether [illegible] or [illegible], will be fined, the injured party receiving its 621 share, and both parties will be charged to live together harmoniously and observe their contracts.

The power of the nkumu was apparently limited, and did not supersede that of 624 the [illegible]. When trials came up, the aggrieved party might go either to the 695 [illegible] or to the nkumu. If it was necessary to call the village elders together about it, both these authorities were present at the hearing. First the young men of the group were allowed to give their verdict, then the old men, after that [illegible] (or the [illegible]), and finally the nkumu was given the privilege of the last word. He would comment on the opinions of each of the judges, criticizing one young man, commending another, and then giving his own verdict, at which the group would assent by saying, 'Even so, grandfather'. The whole group of judges would then fix the fines, a double portion of which went to the nkumu.

The actual manual labour which an nkumu may do excludes anything endangering 624 life or limb, or requiring agility and speed. He may clear the bush for his gardens:
this is a man's work. He may take part in the building of his houses, but may do no high work, and, among the inland groups, it is the work of the Batwa to put the [563] roof on for him. The nkumu may also prepare pitfalls for catching game, but cannot engage in any other type of hunting or do any fishing. Digging a grave is prohibited, for, as we shall see, everything pertaining to death must be ignored by the nkumu.

Other rules affecting the daily life of the nkumu may be roughly divided into three:
those affecting his person, those having to do with his food, and social regulations.

One of the great points of observance in the first class of regulations is the impor- 624 tance of the [illegible]. The nkumu must on no account be seen during daylight hours 242 with an uncovered head. If he wishes relief from the cumbersome [illegible] he may take it off in the darkness of his house and put on an ordinary hat made of skins, and when night falls he may walk where he will bareheaded if he so desires. The skin hat, known as [illegible], may be made from two animals only, in the case of an [524] nkumu, one being the [illegible], a species of antelope with light-coloured hair, and the other the [illegible], an animal resembling a beaver. The skin of the [illegible] may be used by anyone, but the [illegible] is reserved for the nkumu only with one exception. The skin [859] of the [illegible] may also be used for the carrying strap for infants known as [illegible], which is worn over one shoulder in bandolier fashion. For the nkumu the skin of the [illegible] is limited to the informal hat, [illegible], and for making into the [illegible], a pouch used for carrying small objects and worn like a sporran. As a corollary to the importance of the [illegible] may be noted the importance attached to the head of the nkumu, which must never be seen uncovered in daylight.

The Bonginda nkumu never wash in the daytime, but may wash at night with hot 624 water. The inland nkumu never wash. Even the Bonginda nkumu never wash their 515 heads, and no nkumu ever cuts his hair. If the nkumu becomes too greatly inconvenienced, one of his wives may delouse his head, but only within the privacy of the [141]
house, by the light that enters the rear opening.

624 An nkumu can never walk alone, but must always be accompanied by others, and on no occasion whatsoever may he run. Even though he never washes, if he is out [771] in the rain and sees everybody else hurrying for shelter, he will not quicken his pace. [513] His movements must be slow and deliberate. The nkumu never sleeps alone; waking and sleeping he is attended by someone. But apart from this he is free to go where he wishes. The nkumu is not indiscriminate, as others may be, in his private habits, but [514] must use his own latrine at all times, and if travelling must have his own latrine in each place where he stays. The inland nkumu frequently take advantage of this custom [516] by hiding their accumulated brass rods at the bottom of a freshly dug latrine. Such hidden wealth will be acquired by an inheritor at the decease of the nkumu.

In speaking of himself the nkumu never refers to himself by his title but always by his own name.

624 The couch upon which the nkumu sits or reclines during the daytime may not be shared indiscriminately with others, but those permitted to sit upon it at the same 362 time as the nkumu are mami, women, and Batwa. The reservation of this couch for [562 the use of the nkumu is not surprising, but the exceptions are. One explanation given was that women and Batwa are not bato ba ase, persons in particular; they do not 565] count for anything in the social life of the community; they are not really 'people'. Another explanation was that they do not pay fines, this being tantamount to saying [572] that they are exempt from laws and therefore cannot break laws even by doing what would be for others an illegal act. The stool of the nkumu, however, has closer restrictions in the manner of its use. Besides the nkumu only two others may sit upon it, Nsese and Mpoge. It is always carried by one of his wives, though not necessarily by any special one.

624 The restrictions concerning the food of the nkumu are many. He may eat food only in his own house, or, if on a journey, in one given over for his use. He may not 262 enter another house to partake of food even if invited to do so. Likewise the nkumu may not eat in the forest, or eat or drink anywhere along the road when on a journey, but must wait until he arrives at a village and has a house at his disposal in order to partake of food and drink. He never 'sleeps with hunger'; even if a wife or child should die causing him great sorrow he must partake of food before going to sleep. [765] The Bonginda nkumu must never go into mourning, and death must be ignored by them, but the inland nkumu are permitted to mourn. All food carried to an nkumu must be covered, this rule even applying to water. Food must not be placed in a basket with high sides (ekele), but in a shallow one (mpale), and no food that has been kept overnight in a pot may be eaten by him: swelling of the abdomen will result. Various foods are taboo, among these all fast-moving snakes, though slow- [824] moving ones may be eaten; light-coloured palm-nuts may not be eaten, and a variety of yam known as nsekiki is shunned, for it is with the tough stems of the nsekiki that the dying body of the nkumu will be bound to ensure the sitting posture necessary for burial.

624 Among regulations roughly classed as social, we have already covered several in references above, and have referred to the nkumu in council. It may be added here that [623] he is expected to agree with the majority of the councillors and not fall out with them. The rules affecting the nkumu ... are accompanied by severe penalties. There [681] must not be any fighting; if anger is aroused to the point of blows the antagonists grasping the knife with his left hand, with his free right hand he drains a gourd of palm wine to gain courage, hits the nearest victim on the head with the empty gourd, then transfers the knife to his right hand. He is now ready for his work which he proceeds to do methodically, sustained by the heady wine and the rhythm of the drum. When he had finished one of the lines, a pause would be made to bring out the body for burial. Just before this is done an armed band rushes down the path, returns, goes up in the other direction, then returns; this is said by some to ward off any spirits which might be about. The nkumu is now brought out by the Batwa slaves.[1] His grave, a circular hole with a crypt in one side of it, its entrance facing west, had been previously prepared. Few people in the Bongiinda villages knew or had seen the actual burying place of an nkumu. While the corpse was carried to the grave followed by a crowd, the executioner finished his work. Those who stayed behind took the bodies of the decapitated men and women and divided them among all the participants of the funeral who would subsequently devour everything. 782 766 [201]

Accompanying the funeral procession to the grave were the ndeli, one or more men or women who were destined to accompany the nkumu to his grave and to the other world beyond. At the burial of an nkumu witnessed in 1930 at which the semblances of some of the old rites were carried out, a party of armed men contested the right of the procession to approach the grave, there was a mock battle for a few minutes between two bands of the funeral party, and then the procession gained right of way. At the grave-side the legs and sometimes the arms of one ndeli were broken by heavy clubs to prevent him from escaping. Then seated on the ground the body of the nkumu would be placed on the knees of this one, whose arms would be placed round the nkumu and securely fastened by driving a peg right through both wrists. Sometimes two ndeli were thus used. If the number of victims was sufficient, others would be buried alive too, being placed in the grave in the recumbent mosojo position, with the corpse on top of them, its weight being sufficient, with the earth filling in the grave, to prevent escape. The nkumu was now ready for burial and was placed in the crypt, facing west.[2] The relatives of the nkumu approach, they pluck the leaves and stem of a juicy bush known as mokako and chewing it, expectorate ceremonially on the body while they address it in language somewhat as follows: 'You are going to leave us now, we are mourning, for you were a good and wise man, your discernment in matters of justice was without parallel, &c. . . . we wish that you may be happy where you go, have many wives, beget many children, lack not for meat. But don't take with you our power to beget children, leave us also some of this wisdom of yours, for what you were, we would be.' This prayer over, the nsumb would be slipped off the head of the corpse and replaced by the informal hat, all done so dexterously that the bare head was not seen. The entrance to the [514] [824] [184]

[1] The body was supposed to have remained in state for seven to nine days, but actually it was buried privately soon after death, a dummy being set up with the nsumb on its head, and the succeeding ceremonies being conducted with only the dummy in the place of the actual body. The inland villages however did allow the body to remain unburied for the long period, the wives being forced to keep watch in the same house. The Bongiinda buried their nkumu generally in their houses at the spot where they had been accustomed to rest, burying the dummy at some other spot farther off.

619 9. The Bongale. Three large villages belonging to this group are to be found in the territory under discussion. In order of their size they are: Bongale wă Botóló (among the Lifumba, between the Bosómbé, Loilíma and Safsi rivers), Bongale wă Ilinga (among the Bakɛ́afa, near Ikɛ́ngɛ́), and Bongale wă Bonongɛ (among the Bonkoso, near Bempumba). [569] The difference between their rules of exogamy and those of the other tribes confirms the view that the Bongale are not true Nkundó. (2)

2. See Chapter V, Article III. There are several other small Bongale groups, but I do not know whether they are related to those mentioned above. Among them are those living near Bonyeka (Busira) among the Boɛ́ngi (Bokɛ́la, Boɛ́njola). They may be descended from different ancestors who all bore the name Ngale. The same name may indicate an identical origin, but it may also be derived from different individuals whose names were the same. This statement is generally applicable.

The tribes living between the Jwalɛ́ and the Boloko, with whom the Boléngé and the Ntɔ́mbá between the Congo and the Boloko are sometimes classified, are grouped under the general name of Iléngé by the Boɛ́ngɛ́, Injɔ́lɔ́, and Eléngé. (3)

[114] 3. The Bokele tribe listed on the above-mentioned map does not exist. Could this error be due to the incorrect extension of the name of a Boloki village near Bokɛ́ma which is called Bokɛ́lɛ?

The Nkundó-Mɔ́ngɔ came from the north or the northeast. (4)

[825] 4. The following note may be of interest: The stories and songs of the Nkundó indicate a

[825] recollection of an animal of the leopard family which they call bokonga. Their description of it corresponds to the lion. Some soldiers and other expatriates, who were also young people, shown representations of a lion immediately identified it with their bokonga.

The groups under discussion here lived for a time on the banks of the Luwo (Maringa) and the [11] upper Ikelemba, (1) then under pressure from other Mongo tribes, they crossed the Tshuapa-Ruki. They evicted the Ekonda and settled in their present location. This exodus must have taken place a fairly long time ago; it is impossible to determine the date and difficult to make any estimates. In any case it must have occurred 150 to 200 years ago.

241 These peoples are primarily farmers; they grow chiefly bananas, manioc, yams, colocasia [taro], sweet potatoes, sugar cane, and various vegetables and condiments. The food crops they grow, together with what they gather and the Elaeis palm trees provide them with a continuous and abundant food supply, as long as elephants do [131] not interfere. Their domestic animals include chickens, goats, and 224 dogs. (2) Hunting is a pleasant change of activity rather than an [173] 1. It appears that between the Ikelemba and its tributary the Losflifa, there is still a bonkom tree called w'amenga (of bald heads) under which, according to tradition, the ancestors held their councils. Nearby there is a bosffi whose fruits never ripen.

[171] 2. Ducks have been introduced fairly recently, but they were known long before colonial times. They came from the south. Sheep have been introduced only in the last few decades, and they are found only in a few villages on the river banks in the lowlands.

92 in which they are manufactured, and consequently in the way they [824] are used. The most common ingredients are certain leaves mixed with red rouge (ngôla) and a sort of lichen which forms red slabs on the bark of certain species found in the forest; the whole thing is [825] carefully wrapped in a small fur (especially the skin of the small feline iyali).

The charm is hidden under a slat of the bed where the desired one takes her nightly rest. Because this is done an ardent love for the owner of the charm will grow in her heart. Or it may be placed somewhere in a hut; then the desired woman is called in, the owner of the charm takes her arm, and the efɔndɔ immediately "turns her heart." Or, still without the woman's knowledge, the charm is thrown into the fire where she cooks. If she begins to sneeze when she returns home, this is a sign that the smoke charged with mysterious emanations from the philter has pepetrated through her nostrils all the way to her heart and filled it with ardent love for the Adonis in question.

The efɔndɔ is considered an ikɔ́kɔ, that is, a subjugation. Efɔndɔ ɛkɔka bâmato, "the efɔndɔ masters women, has power over [824] them." The substance which prevents the efɔndɔ from being efficacious is the bekai, a kind of sour vegetable. [102] The owner of the philter must abstain from eating it. For the bekai cause vomiting and if he ate any the woman would in the same manner eject her love and thus make the bɔtɛ ineffective.

2. Bonɛfɛ

Contrary to the efɔndɔ, the bonɛfɛ, is a love philter which is not available to everyone; it is a charm only for dancers of the iyaya. This does not mean that all the artists who perform this dance have it, but they alone are acquainted with it. The material basis of the bonɛfɛ, as of most Nkundɔ bɔtɛ, are the leaves of certain plants.

The efficacy of the bonɛfɛ is infallible. It acts not only on the beloved one, but also on any woman who involuntarily or on purpose fulfills the condition necessary to its operation. That is, as soon as a woman's head touches the arm of the possessor of the bonɛfɛ, her heart is moved in his favor; should she be married, her love for her

614 621 The Bongangɛ are divided as follows:

1) Bongangɛ, in the narrow sense of the term (Basɛ́kɛ Inanɔ́, B. Bolakɛ, B. Bongɛ́ngɛ́, B. Bandɔ́wɛ, B. Lokɔ́kɔ́myɛ)

2) Bongangɛ of Bakoyɔ́, or Bolíma

3) Bongangɛ of Mbɔ́mbɛ́ or Basɛ́kɛ Botɛ́na

Thus Lotɔ́lɛ, Bakoyɔ́, and Mbɔ́mbɛ́ each have an Etɔ́o group and a Bongangɛ group. The Bongangɛ, in the narrow sense of the term, have in addition a "slave" group named Batsína, a part of which is located with the Bosɛnjo. A foreign clan is settled with the Etɔ́o of Lotɔ́lɛ; they are the Bofalambɔ́ka, descendant of a man named Ekonda (Imbolo) and his sister who was married to Mbete, a slave from Bompɛ́ngɛ (Wɛ́ngatɛ) who was freed by his master.

Many villages have foreign groups living with them such as descendants of slaves (ekwɛ́la), or others (Ekonda, Bombwanja, groups related by marriage called likilo, mpɛ́mɛ or bowɛ́lɛ́, and mbɛ́solɛ, (1) etc.). [249]

[609] 1. Mpɛ́mɛ or bowɛ́lɛ́ are any foreigners who were formerly invited by the group patriarch to remain with him in order to carry out certain tasks, especially metal-working. Mbɛ́solɛ is the term applied to a child born to a woman out of wedlock [596] (Chapter I, Part 2, Article IV, 3). Such [829] children are also called nkio y'ɔ̃ɔ́me, "the husband's flying dogs," because they are not his own children but are attached to their mother's husband in the fashion of these animals, who attach themselves to trees when they sleep.

614 592 If we add the descendants of relatives who have married into other more or less remote groupings, the prohibition against marriage on account of kinship applies to a good many people. In accordance with the law of exogamy, such a kin group may be widely dispersed geographically, and it is understandable that it is not always easy to

593 to which she devotes her time, sitting on a couch or a log, so oc-
578 cupies her attention that she is no longer aware that her narrow 834 garment is no longer in its proper modest position, and the gossip is therefore exposed to shame and ridicule.

593 In addition to giving his wife a good whipping, the husband also brings out his vocabulary of invective and sarcasm. The woman 578 does not run the risk of complaining, for she knows in advance that she will be placed in the wrong. Nevertheless, the discreet husband will not go too far. The elders suggest that the young people moderate the violence of their expressions. For, they say, "a woman is more sensitive to it than a man; she might go and hang herself [825] in the forest," lĭkinya ǎyakõma lěí la nsõnyi, "lĭkinya (the ant) will hang herself one day out of an excess of shame" (this is a reference to the way this insect bites into a blade of grass or some other object and dies rather than let go). "And above all," they say, "do not extend your insults to your wives' parents, for they could urge their daughters to leave you."

With respect to adultery, the punishments prescribed in Nkundó law will be examined below in Article VIII.

It is apparent from the preceding description that the Nkundó attach relatively little importance to the outpourings of loquacious eloquence characteristic of the weaker sex as long as they do not go beyond limits or degenerate into outrageous and ignominious insults. The elders teach youth to be calm in the face of these demonstrations of the declamatory art at which most Negresses are as adept as our fishwives at home.

[562] They say that a woman is like an elephant: bŏmoto ale é njoku. There is nothing to be done about her. It is futile [280] to try and speak gently to her; she does not even listen. To impose silence on her is impossible. To try and calm her, make her listen to reason, is a waste of effort. It is the same with an elephant: He [825] can perhaps be chased away with cries and noise, but he will destroy the crops nonetheless.

The fact that a woman readily opens her mouth is not considered a sign that she does not love her husband. The Nkundó even

664 [192] payment rightly owed, and in the absence of an adequate translation, "indemnity" is still the least inaccurate. (1)

One point remains to be noted. The two forms of punishment, violence and indemnity, may not be combined, and this principle is applied in all situations (2). Should this prohibition be construed as an implicit condemnation of violent measures? Or have we here the use of a system of settlement? It is difficult to settle this question, and actually the two explanations overlap at least in part.

694 512 It is not without interest to note that, in order to justify sanctions against the accomplice, the Nkundó invoke his frequently dominant role in adultery. Actually they reason that a woman is weak by nature; her emotions predominate, she is easily led and resists enticement only with difficulty. A man on the other hand is more reasonable, better able to control himself. Sanctions enacted and applied against the wife alone would not only leave out the punishment of one of the two culprits, but they would also be inadequate for the preservation of social order, since the woman remains exposed to succumbing out of weakness in spite of the penalties. The severity of Nkundó law with regard to the corporal punishment of the wife, which exists in spite of these considerations, are explained in terms of the woman's sensitive nature and of the power her husband has over her which he lacks in relation to her accomplice.

●[625] 1. The words used for "reward" are bokɔ́ndo, which is a reward for an unusual service, like the capture of a leopard or another "royal" animal (nyam'ě'ekofo, such as a python, an eagle, etc.) or a beautiful dance, and mbuseji, which is a reward for small services.

2. For example, see also Chapter VIII, Article III, 1.

764 [584] to return to join the procession, or may be able to do so only with difficulty.

The act of carrying a corpse to its native clan is not designated by any specific term. The expression is simply tsɛ́ka ilâka, "to go and return the corpse."

764 431 In one or more places near the entrance to the village, a barrier (bokâko, lokombɛ́, or loɛ́laka) made of posts and palms is set up. There the relatives of the deceased, armed, wait for the procession of the husband's relatives, who are also armed, and forbid them to continue their march. Before passing, the latter must make a payment. The valuables given are called byɛ̂ko by'ôkâko or simply bokâko (or loɛ́laka). The family of the deceased calls to the procession, "Halt! You will not pass here." The latter reply, "We come to bring [426] you the corpse of your child; we want to break down the barrier. Let us pass; here are [584] the gifts." The ndonga hands over a knife, a brass or copper ring, or some equivalent object (for instance, money, nowadays). Thereupon the members of the deceased's clan move away. The bɛ́nambótswá (persons related to both clans) break down the barrier, and the procession passes, headed by the ndonga and the bɛ́nambótswá. The husband follows the coffin.

764 579 In the past it was almost always necessary to force a passage through the barrier. The wife's family did not want to open and the husband's family did not want to pay, and so they came to blows. The group bearing the corpse tried to break down the barrier, while their adversaries tried to prevent them from doing so. The arms used in that struggle were chiefly pointed sticks which the members of the two camps threw at each other; more rarely, arrows were used. The specific name for this sort of brawl is gbɛhɛ́lá. Certain clans specialize in this sport. Thus between Bofmbo and Lileko, there is a regular battle every time. In such serious cases the barrier is heavily fortified; the posts are thick and hard, and intertwined with thorny creepers (bokau, longolɛ́, wanganjɛ́la, etc.) and thorny shrubs (wɛ̂ngɛ́, etc.). A quantity ●[125] of venomous biting ants (bafumba, mbómbá, byɛ̂mbo, etc.) are added. If the brawl becomes serious, the ndonga and the other bɛ́nambótswa intervene and impose peace by requiring the husband's clan to pay.

843 177 The Nkundó know an antidote (nsengó or losenjó), however, a means of getting rid of such annoying obstacles. Of the three known processes the last is especially common at present.

● [125] 1) The husband (or any person to whom the wekɛ́ is attached and who wants to be rid of it) picks up a nkɔ̂ngolí chilopod, naturally by means of a leaf, encloses it in a large leaf which he binds with a thin creeper, and makes a small package of it, as one makes a package of meat, fish, etc. He gives this package to his wife, who thinks it contains food and opens it without any suspicion. But when she sees the detested arthropod, she throws it far from her with cries of disgust, while her husband says to her, "You are the one who remains with the wɛ̌kɛ́." As a result he himself is freed from it.

2) A second means is to take the pregnant woman by the nose when an opportunity presents itself and to say to her: "May the wɛ̌kɛ́ remain attached to you."

[152] [264] 3) The woman prepares some imbɔ́ndɔ́ (manioc leaves [474] salted and dipped in palm oil). The two spouses eat it together contrary to the usual practice. But the husband arranges matters in such a way that his wife gets the last mouthful and keeps the leaf which serves as a plate and represents the wɛ̌kɛ́. Then the husband says to her, "Keep the wɛ̌kɛ́ for yourself."

The wɛ̌kɛ́ cannot be detached from the woman, for she is the bomɔ́ngo wɛ̌kɛ́, "the owner of the wɛ̌kɛ́," the one who is the basis for it. For her it continues until the child is on the point of being born (elaká ó jɔ̌mi jɔ̌ónda, literally "he has come to the end of his growth," or jɔ̌ɔ́kama, "has turned to one side"), and thus, in practice, until the birth of the child.

[152] If a first wife dies at the beginning of her first pregnancy, a cesarian operation must be performed on her. The fetus is removed (it is still no more than an embryo -- ilɔ́ngɛ́lá or bokelé, literally "an egg," or ilɔ́ngɔ́, literally "blood") so that it can be buried behind the hut. An omission of this practice would result in the death through pregnancy of the deceased's husband's other wives or of the women he will subsequently marry.

3. The period of prohibitions

843 When a pregnancy is far advanced -- about two or three months before delivery (a period which has now been reduced to one or two weeks) -- the Nkundó proceed with the "preservation of the fetus" (báomba jémi, "they preserve the fetus," or báaka jémi, "they fasten the fetus"). The period called bokeka or bokeko begins at that moment and does not end until after childbirth. The oral expression is lémba bokeka, "to bind the period of sexual prohibitions." (1) This term also extends to all special prohibitions (bikilá) resulting from this condition. [475]

[566] [502] For the first pregnancy the period begins with the following ceremony: The woman's mother smears her daughter's head and all of her body with a red paint called ngóla. This paint, usually used as make-up, is used here as a mark of affection and given to honor and congratulate the future mother on this happy occasion. When the ngóla is somewhat hardened, the mother smears her daughter's hair with it and rolls the hair into little balls, using an iron bosóngó, which is the instrument usually used for hairdressing. Then she gives her daughter a hen and some bananas to eat. From then on the pregnant woman may no longer eat hens, for the consumption of this bird (which the Nkundó place in the same category as ducks) and its eggs would stop the normal development of the fetus. The ceremony is called fla bongata (eleku among the Bombwanja), "to smear with red paint in little balls." ● [825]

The woman's father and the husband's kin feel strongly about being present at this ceremony, for it is considered very important. I know of an intense palaver which occurred because

[834] 1. The expression lémba lǔmbá is also used. A similar period of sexual prohibitions called by the same name still exists for, among other things, circumcision, the construction of a hunting enclosure, and the setting of elephant traps.

843 3) They must not climb up on the roof (they are not forbidden to climb a palm tree in order to cut off nuts).

4) They must not eat animals killed by a carnivore (leopard,
843 84 crocodile, etc.), or the child would die a sudden and unnatural
262 death like the victims of such wild beasts. [480]

● 825 5) They must abstain from animals such as porcupines, anteaters, certain birds, crocodiles, and gavials, (1) who are in the habit of living in the hollows of trees or in dens. The delivery would be very painful if they ate them, for the child would roll up and crouch in the mother's womb. Fish that find shelter in passageways do not produce such consequences and are therefore eaten.

6) They must not eat turtles (2). A very difficult birth is feared, for the turtle withdraws into its shell and encloses its anal extremities as in a vise, and the child would do the same. ✓

7) They must not eat the head of a monkey. The child would be born with deep-set eyes resembling the monkey's.

8) They must not eat the large antelope known as mbuli, because it has a long neck and flabby flesh, and the child would acquire the same defects.

The results of bokeka and the obligations resulting from it

Article VII. Circumcision

Circumcision is generally practiced. It does not have to 304 be performed at any particular age. It is usually done during childhood before the tenth year. The more timorous put it off until puberty or even later. Special customs of individual clans sometimes set a time. Thus, a man of the village of Besombó is not allowed to be circumcised until he has killed an animal at the hunt. On the other hand, the season during which circimcisions are performed is specified: they must take place during the period when the water level is low.

The operation may be performed by any man who is expert at it. It is carried out behind the huts. No one but the boys being operated on and their fathers are present. The boys stand in a group somewhat apart from the proceedings but place themselves so that with their eyes they can follow the treatment to which their companion is being subjected. The patient squats. One of the elderly assistants places his hands over the boy's eyes so that he cannot see what is happening. The person performing the operation has already dug a small pit to catch the blood. He pulls the foreskin, ties it with a string, and then uses ashes to trace the line which must be followed by the empúte knife that is used on such occasions. When the blood has stopped flowing, he chews some bondóngó
[824] pepper (Aframomum . . . .) or, preferably, [506] a caudal fin of [825] the ngolo fish and then spits it onto the wound. The resulting sensation is very painful. But the patient shows that he is brave; for if he cries he is mocked by his companions.

As long as the wound is not healed, the boy must not use [261] manioc leaves (bangánju) or manioc bread in the preparation of bosombó or lokóto. Nor may he eat the skin, head, or tail of fish.

While the wound is healing, the boy who has been circumcised is cared for, washed, etc., by his mother or, if he has reached

763 literally that the deceased has hanged the heart, the former is used of a tree which leans over and falls from a great cut at its base.

624 On the announcement of the death, an expert drummer drums out the news. There will be at least four drums of the type known as lokulu, and a nange.[1] The four 766 drums are called by the names, Epunda, having the 'biggest voice', that is a deep 594 bass note, Mongoye, having a higher note, Mongonda, a high pitched note, and Monkoto,
202 having a very high penetrating note. To these four drums others are added; if the nkumu himself did not possess sufficient, they would be borrowed from the surrounding villages, and their notes matched with those of the first three drums, being beaten with them in their turn. Monkoto is beaten simultaneously with Epunda, giving a rhythmic tattoo. When the news of the death has been sent out on Epunda, the funeral drumming commences, as follows:

539 Mongonda. Botianganu w'Amba lokolo,
Mongoye. Ntsala ikita, otongonoko,
Epunda. Tokund' ibenge molom' o nyama,
Ombolekeke mmenge,
Lobanga lolenda ntondo,
Bikeku bilenda lobola.
Nange. Tobilake nkoi nkonge,
Tobilake nkoi nkonge, &c.

The English and the interpretation are as follows:

Mongonda. A scattering of Amba, the snail. (The mother of twins, always called Amba, here gives her name to the snail because of her prolific progeny, which, upon being introduced to the world, scatter, while the mother dies. So the death of the nkumu will cause a scattering of his many wives and children.)

Mongoye. Feathers fall; pick them up. (That is to say, for your arrow shafts, for if you don't, and come back later, the wind will have scattered them and you won't find them. So while the nkumu was alive it was the time for his children to learn his teachings so that when palavers came after his death they would be well acquainted with his wisdom and know how to settle them.)

Epunda. We are burying the ibenge, husband of animals, You have just eaten mmenge, The chin looks up at the ridge pole, The jaw bones look up at the sky.
[825] (The ibenge is an animal much prized for its fat meat; the nkumu always gets his share when it is killed, and the skin is made into carrying straps for infants, and into belts.
[568] Batwa are prohibited the use of it for any purpose. It is therefore fitting to liken the nkumu to the ibenge. Mmenge (sing. lobenge) is the equivalent of a snack. When a woman brings her cassava from the swamp where it has been soaking for several [264] days, her husband may be too hungry to wait the long hours required to cook it, so to appease his hunger his wife takes a piece or two of the unprepared root, splits [252] it in two, places salt between, wraps it in a lokombe leaf and roasts it in the hot ashes, where it is quickly cooked. So the nkumu just had time to eat a few mmenge; he didn't wait for the big cooking; his life was suddenly cut off.)

Nange. Don't pull out the leopard's eyelashes. (That is, while he is alive; now he is dead one can disregard his power.)

symptoms is a weakness of the lower limbs. Instances are cited of individuals who were unable to resist their passions and were punished in this manner. Apparently only the woman dies. As soon as her family discovers that she is stricken, the guilty woman denounces her accomplice. The latter is held responsible and is required to pay a heavy indemnity, which may amount to several dozen copper rings.

835 751 Here as in many other situations the Nkundó have found a way to avoid the danger. There is an antidote (mengó), and it is water (bàsi bale mengó éà bombilé). Thus those who are unable to control their aroused passions during the day, satisfy it in a shallow stream.

837 753 The fear of bombilé has been greatly shaken [93] by colonization. If we are to believe the natives, foreign soldiers are responsible for this change also. But the behavior of the latter could not completely destroy the ancient feeling, probably due to a natural shame which makes them seek darkness and privacy for acts of this sort.

833 [575] [842] After intercourse a native woman usually gives herself a douche. She does so for the sake of cleanliness. It often happens, however, that she does not wait long enough before doing so, and thus she neutralizes the effect of the intercourse. This is chiefly a matter of carelessness. Nevertheless, under certain circumstances she may use this means to prevent conception. (1)

1. See Chapter X, Article I, 2.

833 126 According to my informants, some women have constitutional abnormalities which repel men. As everything readily becomes public, such flaws are quickly known after marriage, though not quite as readily beforehand. Actually love can -- and often does -- cause them to be overlooked. But after the first ardor has cooled, such a situation may become a threat to the stability of a marriage. When quarrels 833 826 become somewhat violent, the women recall these flaws, to the great shame of the person who suffers from them. The same is true of the weakness of some of the men which, like an excess of sexual activity, can cause difficulties in a household.

2. Rape

839 Rape in the true sense of the word -- that is, the abuse of a woman by the use of violence -- is most unusual among the Nkundó. If a woman does not consent, the angry seducer leaves her, often insulting her to the best of his ability. I know of only one case of rape, which occurred some time ago and caused much consternation in the region. Banɛngɛ, the daughter of Iloko [94] Is Ɛ́fekele of Lofelɛ (Bongɛli), was at that time living with her mother's clan the Bonyeka (Bonkoso). She had not yet fully attained physical maturity (her breasts were still very small). One day she went into the forest and did not return in the evening. The family was alarmed, and her father and her uncle Mpɛ́nda ɛ́a Nkotonkale went to look for her. Finding traces of fresh blood, they followed them till they found Banɛngɛ's corpse buried in the nsusulu. She had died of hemorrhage; her sex organs, torn, showed the unmistakable signs of rape. People had their suspicions, but it has never been possible to prove the identity of the criminal. If there had been proof, he would not have escaped the mortal vengeance of the unfortunate victim's parents.

All the data I have been able to collect indicates that other instances must undoubtedly have occurred.

3. Incomplete acts

832 Here we are speaking of what moralists call actus impudicitiae, that is, acts whose nature physically leads to sexual pleasure.

Obscene bodily contacts between persons of opposite sex are preparatory acts which excite; even touching the breasts, the abdomen, and taking a person by the arms are included in this category.

593x 606 578 We should add that in some households, difficulties arise rather easily during the visits of parents or parents-in-law, because of the sensibilities, incompatibility of character, or discontent of one party who may consider the other guilty of discourtesy, lack of delicacy, disrespect, or stinginess toward the visiting parents. The same is true for the rearing of children. [273]

4. Punishments

593x 578 Nkundó law permits a husband to inflict corporeal punishment (bikɛ́njwɛ̂, sing. ekɛ́njwɛ̂) on his wife, its nature varying with the seriousness of the case. Obviously these sanctions, expressly permitted by law, cannot give rise to claims on the woman's part [576] or result in the obligation to pay a bofɔndɔ. [Editor's note: Unless, of course, the husband -- acting in excess of his rights -- is more violent than the occasion warrants for under such conditions, the wife, supported by her family, attacks the husband, who is then [684] forced to acknowledge the harm he has done and make reparation by means of a bofɔndɔ.] If she is hurt she may claim a supplementary payment called liombo (from the verb bomba) or "bandage" (for the wound); it consists of 5 rings or more, depending on the situation. ● [826] The loss or breaking of a tooth is considered a serious injury. For this is a real injury to the woman and, in the case of front teeth, to her beauty. (1) Of course, as explained above, the wife will first have run home, and it is there that the dispute is examined.

593x 578 684 For the sake of a clearer understanding, let us go into a few details concerning the penal stipulations of Nkundó law in relation to the life of a married couple.

Usually, in a simple domestic quarrel, the couple does no more than tell each other some home truths, seasoning their speeches

846 taking the child would cause the child's death. The same precau-787 tion is also in order if the husband goes on a trip before the child's birth and does not return till after the delivery

We have just seen that the harmful effects of the father's 846 misconduct on his child's life is effectuated through the father's 837 act of taking the child on his knees. Thus the Nkundó speak of bańgó b'âbé, "a father's bad knees," to indicate his reprehensible
● [846] conduct, and they say that the bondandota potion is administered to the child so that it will not die because of the father's bad
knees. (1)

1. The expression bańgó b'âbé is also used when an undertaking which requires continence is unsuccessful. (See Article II, 3).

When a child has painful and persistent diarrhea, it is often 753 interpreted as the effect of the father's infidelity. As soon as they 854 become aware of it, the couple separate for some time, and the father no longer touches the child. [492]

Contrary to what one reads on this subject about other peo-
837 ples of the Congo, Nkundó couples do not have to remain continent
834 beyond the period of seclusion. The separation ceremony gives the 787 husband back the freedom of action he had before his wife's pregnancy. For the wife the boleka remains strict with respect to illicit relations until the child is weaned. However she, too, may regain her freedom by having recourse to an antidote, the ingredients of which she purchases from a person who holds the secret. The ingredients are placed in a small antelope horn which is then stopped [824] up by means of bolakó (resin from the Symphonia gabonensis). The interested party wears it about her loins on a string or a bead belt or, preferably, on a special creeper. This amulet protects the child's life from the harmful influence of the mother's acts of adultery, but it does so only on condition that she does not separate herself from the child, as we will explain further on. This procedure

624 and that he may have no more than a month or perhaps a year in which to live and will surely die speedily.

The special objects attaching to the office of nkumu, among these the hat, mantoh, and stool, ekiata, are at the same time subject to similar magical arts to determine whether they may be produced for the new nkumu's use. They are not present, being in the possession of the molendo which will appoint him, but are mentioned by name. Apart from the mantoh, no further ceremony is required to identify these objects with their future owner.

[302] The etingo ended, the Nkomo Akolo smears black ntsili all over his body again, 624 before the rites begin to determine which of his wives is to be known as Nsona, 787 the one who will be closest to her husband throughout his days. For this, magic formulae (bisanko, sing. esanko) are used. All the wives sit round in a circle and the nkanga places some irritant such as ground pepper in the eyes of all the women. The wife whose eyes stream most and whose discomfort is also accompanied by a violent shaking of the body is known to be Nsona. Here again, lying is believed to be out [827] of the question, for the shaking of the body is something that is supposed to be impossible of simulation, the real being easily distinguished by all from the false. Nsona is now stripped of all clothing and her body smeared by the nkanga with yellow clay on one side, and with white on the other. A belt of leaves is put round her waist 624 and a small bit of cloth between the legs with each end attached to the belt. Near by 784 a gourd with 'medicine' in it has been standing ready for the next step in the ceremonies, and this is now smeared with white clay, a parrot's feather stuck in the neck, and handed to Nsona, who receives it in one hand. Into the other hand is put a section of plantain stalk, into one end of which has been stuck a parrot's feather. A third feather is placed in her mouth so that she cannot speak, greet anyone, or eat. She is now tied with a cord which is held by one of the young men attending Nkomo Akolo. At this point of the procedure the nkanga states his price [79] for his work, which will be in the neighbourhood of one hundred brass rods, worth 430 to-day about fifty francs, but formerly double that amount. The future nkumu, accompanied as before, leaves for the village of the molendo. Nsona starts off at a tremendous pace, for she is now imbued with a sort of frenzied strength, and for this reason has been tied up and put in charge of a strong young man, otherwise she would be off so fast that no one could catch her, and would go into the forest, where she would live for days unseen.

624 In the village of the molendo the party all sit in an etanda belonging to one of the elders. This is the place where the Tumba men really live—their houses are just [362] sleeping and cooking establishments, but the etanda, having a roof for shade and no walls, is the place where the men congregate and spend their leisure time. It is also 362 the site of the village smithy, which takes up one end. Here, then, Nkomo Akolo and his party sit for a day and a night, and neither he nor Nsona may eat food or drink wine during this period. Games are played by the molendo—mock battles, dances, and [577] songs chiefly of battle, and before the first streaks of dawn appear the group in the etanda begins to march up and down the village singing.

At dawn the whole party, accompanied by a large crowd, make their way to a place in the bush where there is an elevation of some sort. Here Nkomo Akolo climbs up and takes his stand, accompanied by Nsona. Now the molendo choose the Bilopo

593* 834 arises but rarely. Furthermore, if a daughter is required to perform similar duties for her father, she will undertake this obligation only [593] with the lament: njôy'ôôna ɛkɛ 'm wimɔkɛ, "I have come to see where I had my origin." Any woman who has been in that position will later know no oath more sacred than this one: la bɔtakɛ wà faíɛ bɔkɛ 'm wɔ̀ɔkɛ la mpaka, "by my father's nakedness which I saw when he was old."

834 291 Thus we can draw the conclusion that the Nkundɔ are offended by nakedness and as a rule do not tolerate it. The exceptions do not invalidate this generalization; on the contrary, they tend to support it. -

2. Speech. Obscenities and propriety.

521 831 In general the Nkundɔ see nothing wrong with using obscene expressions. They only describe them as "bad" if they become indecent.

195 If a conversation touches on matters of sex, they may wonder whether a particular topic is necessary, interesting, or entertaining; they will not ask themselves whether it is moral. For it will be apparent throughout this study they have no concept of morality strictly speaking.

The Nkundɔ possesses a varied and extensive list of obscene words -- nor is he alone in this respect. [58] We are not compiling a dictionary, and therefore we will not list them. What interests us are the circumstances that make these words indecent and under which a proper use of them impossible. The circumstances provide us with a criterion of the degree of obscenity of a word or expression. Let us say at once that we include in this category not only terms applied to organs and phenomena which are of a sexual nature strictly speaking, but also words pertaining to certain anatomical parts or physiological functions such as, for example, excretion, hair and tattooing found on private parts, and the female garment called efufa. We [194] should also point out that some tribes will consider expressions obscene which do not shock others at all.

521 which do not shock others at all. (1) 831
195

1. These comments are applicable also to peoples in other parts of the world.

[559] The general rule of decorum among the Nkundó permits the use of such terms only among equals. Their use when speaking to inferiors is tolerated but not approved of. The use of obscenities when speaking to any strangers meets with definite disapproval. Among persons of different sexes the prohibition is particularly strict.

Nevertheless, the use of these expressions is judged less severely if they are uttered in a moment of anger or as a reprimand, even in the presence of a member of the opposite sex.

Exclamations of anger, vexation, and sorrow are often nothing but obscenities (2). No one is shocked by them in such situations.

2. See "Les Coutumes Funéraires" [Funeral Customs], No. 1, to be published in Anthropos.

Some elderly or more modest persons do not make use of them, however; if the habit of using a particular expression is thoroughly ingrained, they may make a slight change in its pronunciation (as is common for some of our "swear words").

195 To circumvent the difficulties caused by the need to use certain words frequently, [58] euphemisms are coined to take their 831
519
516
place. Thus the Nkundó say: ntswá lokako w'âkuna, "I am going behind the house," to indicate that they are going to urinate, and ntswá ikondó, "I am going for small pieces of firewood," or ntswá ôténa lokásá, "I am going to pick a leaf," meaning that they are going to the toilet. On the way they say: ñkúa lolá, "I am leaving the path" or "I am going to the forest." A husband is permitted to use accurate terminology when speaking to his wife, but it is considered very improper for her to do so in speaking to him.

574 When someone is satisfying a natural need, others keep a distance away from him; they will not even speak to him. Moreover, the person would not reply even if he were called. A woman will not

574 576 even answer her husband, but he may indicate his presence by coughing lightly.

574 576 578 831 Any infraction of these rules is considered a grave insult. A person offended in this manner may seek revenge by violent means, either personally or through the medium of his son, brother, etc. According to native justice he will always be in the right, even if the quarrel becomes bloody. The simple act of uttering obscenities while passing in front of a house in which there is someone who is entitled to the speaker's respect may result in reprisals by the latter. (1)

1. See Jadot, Blancs et Noirs au Congo belge [Whites and Blacks in the Belgian Congo], p. 90.

578 834 Crude language is especially reprehensible and wounding if it contains allusions to incest or other reflections on a relative whom the speaker wants to insult. And it must be admitted that such expressions may go beyond the limits (for example: coi cum patre, matre, fratre, sorore, etc.). In connection with this topic it should be noted that reference is always made to a relative of the opposite sex to that of the person who is directly or indirectly being addressed. Furthermore, licentious talk and the use of indecorous language are more severely condemned when they take place in the presence of [554] women and old people [66] or are said by a slave in front of his master, by a Botswa in front of a Boto (1).

1. See Introduction, footnote 2, p. 4.

578 684 834 If a man catches anyone uttering obscenities in front of his wife, especially if they are addressed to her personally, he can start action in adultery proceedings. If the woman refuses to listen to the seducer, she will not answer him, or sometimes, annoyed at the insult, she may retort by insulting his mother. She can complain, but generally she does not do so. Is she ashamed, or is she afraid that the tempter might make public some excess in her conduct which he has discovered? In any case a woman is more sensitive than a man to the 535 for the most inventive tribe. All the dances have two distinguishable parts: the dance strictly speaking and the finale or ilefeyo. The latter consists of acrobatic exhibitions or a theatrical performance. It varies with each performance and sometimes goes beyond the limits of decency, especially in certain scenes of the women's dances. Here everything depends on the attitude of the actors and spectators.

535 786 [853] The words sung are usually proper. Passages that may be less so occur only exceptionally. The exclamations of some of the male or female dancers, but mostly those of the audience when the intensity of the performance reaches a climax, are somewhat less innocent. Thus this climax [illegible] is the weak spot morally speaking. This is true especially of the dances performed by the women who, led on by their passion and encouraged by the cheering and applause of the spectators, make provocative movements ([illegible], [illegible]). A European will see nothing wrong, but the native knows the gestures and their meaning. The spectators then applaud with even greater enthusiasm, either because of sexual feelings or out of aesthetic enjoyment, for to them these movements are beautiful. All the artistic dances for women which are the fashion at the present time contain a similar phase of exaggerated excitement. It is therefore understandable that in the past the elders strictly forbade children and adolescents to attend these dances.

[586] After what has just been said, no one will be astonished to hear that these great dances are often the cause of adultery and divorce. And to a limited extent the same can be said for the men's dances, for masculine beauty is exhibited in an enticing manner.

535 535 The rhythmic motions which sometimes accompany singing during drinking parties cannot really be called dances; nothing shocking is implied by them and the words of the songs are seldom improper. Salacious songs are rarely sung in the course of daily living, but they are never omitted from funeral ceremonies.

535 [illegible] Up to now we have spoken of artistic dances, which are always very popular. They were -- and are -- reserved for certain special occasions. For ordinary circumstances the Nkundó have a few little entertaining dances which have nothing at all in common with the dance as such. They are more like games. The lyrics of the songs

837 may be ribald, but this occurs rather rarely. However, at the present time, they are often actually obscene -- especially since "European-style" dancing has been introduced, and more particularly in the centers, small and large, and among those who have come under [63] its influence. This kind of dancing for amusement is chiefly practiced by young people.

To the credit of morality it should be noted that mixed dancing is unknown to strictly native ways. It occurs in the centers (in the form of the mixed bofenya or the balinga, grotesque imitations of European dances) but is spreading -- and rapidly -- to the villages of the interior. The second variety especially raises havoc, for it has a deleterious influence on morality. It has been the cause of a number of cases of adultery, divorce, palavers, and quarrels, and has been forbidden by certain chiefs and headmen, who would like to be able to severely punish anyone who dances it.

Conclusion

837 The data presented in the foregoing section forces us to conclude that sexual modesty does exist among the Nkundó. The wearing of clothing, the various prohibitions, the attitude of the older and wiser members of the community show that they experience this feeling. It is the same here as elsewhere. In certain areas it is even carried to an extreme. The exceptions should be attributed to individual deviations; and because of the reactions they provoke, they even provide conclusive evidence. The general laxity which may be observed on some special occasions does not provide material for a serious objection against the existence of modesty. Yet it is difficult to determine the reason for such an attitude which seems to contradict the rest of our data. Should it be interpreted as a yielding to human weakness, or seen as a weakening of public morality? Or is it not rather because these special circumstances make an unfavorable interpretation of such actions impossible? An allusion made in public, in a group, [64] does not have the same significance as that same allusion may have between two people, where it implies a suspicious intimacy.

304/ and "modern" fashions, as well as some ancient ones, take this into 832 account. In the next paragraph, moreover, we will note ananalogous phenomenon.

Both of the explanations given can be defended, since each has its value. But it seems to me preferable not to oppose them but rather to bring them together, as they probably are in the thinking of the native.

It should also be noted that a man never performs the operation of making a sexual tattoo on a woman, although a woman may indeed operate on a man. And finally it should be mentioned that the
● [851] specific terms designating these tattoos are considered as obscenities.

The practice of tattooing is decreasing at the present time.
[178] Many boys are already without tattoos. But very few girls lack them; among them the fad has not disappeared. Some even have themselves tattooed without the knowledge of their parents and in spite of their opposition. Among the Blacks, as everywhere in the world, fashion is deeply rooted because it is natural. But the designs of the tattoos are now becoming smaller. It seems to me that this change is due, not to a reaction against tattooing as such, but rather to a modification of the style. For tattooing is a real fashion, and like all fashions it is subject to change and development. Nowadays there is a tendency to imitate the designs of other peoples of the Congo. Elsewhere, as among the Injɔ́lɔ́, for example, an internal evolution may be observed, although it is occurring under foreign influence. The evolution is taking place chiefly in the face motifs, while those of the body are beginning to be omitted. But the sexual tattoos do not seem to be disappearing. [69]

4. Bead Belts

291/ From an early age the Nkundó child is adorned with a belt of 301/ trading beads. Before the coming of the Europeans this decoration
832 made its appearance only towards puberty and was restricted to girls. Nowadays, many men also adorn themselves in this manner. And since it is now easier to obtain the beads, women are no longer with a single string but wear several in assorted colors. They add smaller ones below the knee.

291/ 301/ 832 According to what I have been told, this type of ornament may also have a sexual significance. Normally -- and this statement is applicable only to the present time -- the beads are entirely covered by clothing and are visible only on a few occasions. If a large number of strings (as many as six, eight, or ten) or very many beads are worn, attention may be attracted to them because there will be a bulge in the clothing worn over them. Their sound will reveal their presence during a race or a dance. And according to my informants, that is enough to awaken passion. Making an allusion to the beads and especially touching them deliberately is considered as an invitation. For her part, a woman sometimes rubs them together in her fingers so that they will make their characteristic noise and thus attract a man's attention and arouse his interest.

The preceding does not mean that simply the wearing of the beads is necessarily intended for a bad purpose. Not only must such an intention be excluded in the case of serious persons, especially if they are elderly and content themselves with wearing a single string, seldom a second one to support the first. But there is also the possibility that a young Black beauty may adorn herself with ten or more [832] strands out of sheer vanity, so that the whole world may see that she has so many. [70]

Furthermore, it has been shown that attention to appearance is not necessarily directed to another person. Though that may be generally true, many people like to dress for the pleasure of being well dressed, and girls who never dream of an adventure may still enjoy wearing pretty undergarments. This desire for adornment for its own sake can, no doubt, explain the belts, as well as other embellishments on more than one Nkundó woman.

We should add that those who adhere to the theory that the tattoos have an immediate sexual influence could apply such a theory here as well.

302 831 5. Depilation

All Nkundó of both sexes practice depilation of the genital organs and even the armpits. The natives believe that the hair growing

302 under the arms is related to sexuality and give it the same name as 831 they use for their pubic hair.

A person removes his or her own hair, or it is removed by a friend of the same sex. Formerly, the hairs were simply pulled out. Nowadays, many people shave with a [illegible]. Moreover the practice tends to be confined to the hair connected with sexuality, but in the past everything was removed: eyebrows, eyelashes, mustaches, beards.

For the Nkundó hair removal is a form of beauty care. Their 302 explanation must be accepted, though the term "beauty care" must be broadly defined so that it will include also the depilation of parts of the body that are always hidden. This last form however, might have some relation to the tattoos; it makes tattooing easier and its effect more obvious. [71]

Article III. Prostitution

The dictionary defines prostitution as follows: "a trade which 548 consists in providing one's body for the pleasures of the public in exchange for money." In addition to this limited sense, the most important aspect of which is "in exchange for money," the word also has several broader meanings.

Prostitution is found in the world in various forms: 1) the kept woman, 2) the brothel, 3) the professional streetwalker, 4) the occasional streetwalker, 5) the married woman who has a steady relationship with a lover who pays her, 6) the woman who is the concubine of a number of men in succession and who is paid by each of them. We will examine the forms under which this misconduct has occurred and occurs among the Nkundó.

The first question we should ask is whether a Nkundó woman gave herself to a man for profit before the European occupation. It is true that a woman often accepted remuneration but, as we have already said, it is very difficult to determine whether she did so for gain or simply to be reassured of her lover's affection. Knowing the mentality of the Nkundó woman of today, we must admit that her greed sometimes brings her to acts of venal love. One or another of them has no doubt given her body in order to possess various 592 husband will change to revulsion, and she will leave him to be with her charmer.

Part 3

The Search for a Wife

594 When a young man old enough to marry believes he has the means to do so, he goes out to seek a wife. Naturally, he knows a number of girls, and as a rule he has no trouble finding one who suits him. The courtship is quite simple. As everywhere there are meet- [93/] ings, visits, chats, and jokes; but there is no romanticism or sentimentality, for they are absolutely unknown to these peoples. Since they are in a hurry [103] to reach the objective of their relationship, namely conjugal life, -- and their progress toward this goal is facilitated by usages and customs -- there remains little time for poetry.

There is no specific term for courtship itself. The Nkundó simply speak of "talking with a woman," sanja bómoto, "looking for a woman," asa bómoto. The girl who is its object is referred to as bombéyó (or boamóló among the Injólé).

First, the young man addresses his proposals to the girl: "Ilánga ikokolé (ikokumbéle) la wǎlí", "I want to take you for wife." She shows her agreement by saying, "Ilolanga wě ng'ökó", "I love you also," or more frequently, "elaká ö wě", "as you wish," jía ö liké, "it's up to you," or something of this sort. (1)

[95/96]

1. Note that for the Nkundó these expressions have quite a different significance than would appear from the words. They express a real agreement and an explicit and personal consent. In fact it is considered improper for a woman to use a more direct expression.

595 97/ The lovers exchange gifts. The girl gives food which her mother has provided, or which she has been able to procure herself.

595 [illegible] 5) The desire to increase the number of children is one of the reasons most frequently given; it is the chief, and sometimes the only, one cited by ethnographers. There is no question that it has a great deal of validity, for the Nkundó like to have many children. It is one of the things on which they pride themselves as well as a powerful means for reinforcing a social position (and we are thus led back to the first reason cited).

The question of knowing whether polygamy actually does favor the birth rate is irrelevant here, even if the results of a comparison were clearly against this system and were it proved that "the more wives a polygamist has, the fewer children he has." For the Nkundó never make this statistical computation. He sees only the principle: several women give more children than one. And for them, that is the gist of the matter. Furthermore, the interest of the people as a whole does not appear on the [57] horizon of the Nkundó's thoughts and feelings: they think only of themselves, and in their egoism, they consider only their own interests.

595 591 6) To all these reasons given by the Nkundó to justify the practice of polygamy, we must add a sixth, which they never mention, sexuality. Without colonization it would have been difficult for us to make this statement. [374] But the new state of affairs shows several flaws in our people's arguments. We have already pointed out some of them. Furthermore, all the reasons mentioned up to now do not suffice to account for the existence of polygamy. They do not explain why in the past the old men wanted to keep all the women to themselves, or why a given individual becomes a polygamist. It is a fact that for more than one man some of these alleged reasons have been involved. It is also known that several natives have acquired fortunes by European work (as clerks, salesmen, traders, etc.) in order to be able to establish a harem, though there could have been no motive of vanity or gain in social influence. On the basis of my knowledge of circumstances, persons, and places, I am convinced that even for some natives living in their villages, the primary purpose was clearly sexual. I am acquainted with more than one such case.

595* 53) And it is not difficult to understand this fact. For indeed polygamy constitutes a legitimate and easy means by which a man may enjoy several women without being bothered by palavers, difficulties, etc. The mentality of many men who care little about moral laws as well as the tendency of a disordered instinct to multiply its objects only confirm this observation. Often one sees men who were monogamists at first begin by taking a second wife out of passion. Then gradually their passion becomes greater rather than appeased, and so a harem is built up progressively.

595* 178 The changes introduced by colonization in the economic life of this people have not resulted in a decrease of polygamy. In the absence of exact figures we must be satisfied with simple visual observations, but in certain regions one has the impression that the harems have become smaller but, on the other hand, that the number of polygamists has increased, and therefore [375] the desire for polygamy, that is, its affective cause, has [651] not diminished. Nor does the extra tax frighten or stop the polygamists. The great means for changing the Nkundó attitude in this realm will always be the action of the missions and the penetration of Christian ethics, seconded by a government attitude favoring monogamy. (1)

[648] 1. The favorable attitude of the colonial government toward monogamy is expressed chiefly in the permission given to a polygamist's extra wives to abandon their husband in order to contract a monogamous union, preferably in a mission, under the supervision of missionaries.

[177] Another means, undoubtedly secondary but still important, is the example of European couples. The Blacks are imitative, and native women envy the lot of the white woman, so that European households are propaganda for monogamy when they behave well.

From Leopoldville to Kole the peoples know and practice tattooing. This varies, however, from one region to another in motif and design, the symmetry of application, its extensiveness, and the manner of execution.

Among the Bateke and Banfumungu, we noted two distinct tattooings: that of the men and that of the women. [188]

For the men, the face is covered with striated, parallel lines, irregular, slightly concave, shallow, and covering the cheeks from the temples to near the chin. For the women, there is no facial tattooing, but the abdominal region is symmetrically covered with small lines or elongated dots in relief, placed side by side and covering the whole region extending from the pit of the stomach to the lower abdomen.

Prior to our [Ed., European] penetration of the region, a young girl was tattooed before puberty, according to the information we obtained. There was a twofold reason for this: to satisfy

[text continues on p. 147]

304 132 [177 291] personal vanity, and to excite the male. At the present time only the latter reason accounts for the practice in the region where our influence has been effective. The introduction of European fabrics, the expansion of the economy and the progress of civilization have led the women to clothe themselves and to hide and screen a large part of the body from indiscreet glances. [189] The small primitive loincloth has given way to a toga of variable length, which hides from the public eye that part [Fig. 112 appears here] of the body which is covered with tattoos. In

[291 301 304 142]

Fig. 115. Elegant Lady of the Bokala-Tselima Region. Tattoos, Bracelets, and Necklaces.

304 133 such cases, the woman can no longer display her tattoos for the sake of vanity. [Figs. 113 and 114 appear here] If, despite this, some of them continue to have themselves tattooed just like the old matrons, it is because they hope to attract a man, to please him, and to be able to participate sooner in the pleasures of intimate life. When questioned on this subject, the natives are very definite. The men maintain that the raised tattoos [190] on

304 831 certain parts of the female body is very exciting to them, essentially as a result of the very pronounced movements of the woman during sexual contact. This explanation, which according to the natives seems to be the only reason for tattooing the women of certain tribes (this applies, in our opinion, to the Bateke, Basfomongo, Baboma, and, up to a certain point, to all the riparian peoples of Lake Leopold II), also enables us to explain the special character of the tattooing of Yaelima women. It extends all around the mons Veneris, follows the fold of the groin, and continues in concentric circles on the inside of the upper thighs. The tattoo scars on these parts of the woman's body are usually more symmetrical and in more pronounced relief, and these characteristics increase in direct proportion to the nearness of the pubic region. Coquetry cannot be the reason for making these raised scars. Their presence is largely hidden, even by the flimsiest and most primitive loincloth. Among certain tribes, the loincloth completely covers this part of the body, and since native women exercise a great deal of care and modesty in hiding these tattoos from the public eye, it was only with great difficulty that we were able to verify their existence. Let us note in passing [14] that despite earnest endeavors, we never were able to persuade a native woman of the interior to be photographed without her loincloth. The civilized women, whether local demimondaines or housewives, were, it is true, less [131] timid. The natives themselves make a distinction between these tattoos and those which appear on other parts of the body, notably on the arms, back, and face.

304 831 Tattoos on the back, arms, and throat are always essentially decorative. We found them especially on the women, who are coquettish by nature even among the most primitive peoples. These tattoos generally lack the characteristic uniformity which is such a clear mark of the racial tattoos. The latter are found in their most characteristic form on the men, particularly on the forehead, temples, cheeks, and sometimes the chest. Among certain tribes, the women have also taken over this artificial deformation peculiar to the men. Elsewhere,the women have special tattoos which are clearly distinct from those of the men, and, finally, among some peoples the women have no racial tattoos.

291 834 embarrassed by the glances of others. This feeling extends even to other parts of the body which, irrespective of the degree of culture they have reached, most peoples try to cover. [55]

2) Between persons of the same sex and age a certain freedom
834 514 is permitted. This may be observed especially among young boys when they have to urinate. In our countries of Europe the situation is no different. I must say, however, that I have only noticed this freedom in the schools and never in the villages of the interior. Is there a gap in my observations, or should this laxity in the schools be attributed to the influence of the law of least effort (the suitable places in the schools are at some distance) and to the lack of leisure available to the pupils given the shortness of recreation periods on the one hand and their love of play on the other? It is also possible that among these boys modesty has barely made its appearance, since this feeling is strongly linked to the sexual instinct and awakens only with the latter. It would also seem that living in a group tends to reduce the power of modesty.

3) It is obvious that sexual excitement runs counter to modesty
834 832 and that sometimes -- especially among young people -- immodest acts may be used to arouse another person, especially in situations, such as bathing, which lend themselves easily to such actions.

4) Bathers, whether washing or swimming, are very careless,
515 836 especially when they are in a group of their own sex and age. In former times no doubt they did not indulge in the luxury of even a rudimentary bathing costume. But at the present time it is not at all difficult for them to obtain the small piece of cloth needed for that purpose. Nevertheless, nude bathing in rivers and streams is a common practice. It is far more frequent among women than among men. The natives with whom I have discussed the subject attribute this fact to levity and a lack of concern; but they see nothing very wrong in it. Whether or not [56] the bathers are in a group also seems to make a difference. If you surprise one or two people under such circumstances, they will hide in haste. If, on the other hand, you find a dozen, they will not move; on the contrary, they will interrupt their toilette to watch you pass. Perhaps they are simply unconcerned about their nakedness. But it is also possible that they

512 wishing to commit myself on the reason for this custom, it is a fact that a Nkundó woman will refuse to marry a man who has not been circumcised. Consequently, all the natives want to undergo this operation. That is the reply given by the natives when we asked about the reason for circumcision. When we pushed the inquiry further, they added that the women abhor the deposits that form under the foreskin. I mention this explanation for what it's worth. Nevertheless, this may really be the reason that impels them.

In any case circumcision would seem to have no religious or initiatory significance.

3. Tattooing

192

Two kinds of tattoos exist among the Nkundó: purely ornamental tattoos and sexual tattoos. (2) The latter are to be found only on women. The [67] designs are located on portions of the body surrounding the sex organs and even on the outside of the latter.

---

[619] 2. I will not discuss tribal tattoos because these do not seem to exist among the Nkundó. The reasons for tattooing vary from people to people and from group to group. It is for this reason that they are a distinctive mark. But that does not mean that such is their purpose. The distinctions apparent among the tattoos of various tribes are not an objective but a consequence, as are, for example, the variations among national costumes in Europe. Moreover, the contacts of our people in peace or war have extended by and large only to neighboring clans or tribes, who use the same type of ornamentation as they did. And in these encounters dialect differences serve as a much better means of identification.

What brings the Nkundó to practice this second form of tattooing? First of all the following considerations must be taken into account: since a woman is by nature more eager than the man to appear beautiful, it seems altogether appropriate that her tattoos should be more abundant, more elaborate than the man's. And since coquetry is a form of the desire to appeal to the opposite sex and since members of the latter are susceptible to it, the tattoos attract them. Therefore, too, the women's tattoos have been most elaborated on those parts of her body which are nearest the sex organ.

The reason for the existence of these tattoos may be that they add additional pleasure to intercourse. (1) This explanation does not seem entirely implausible. I have never been able to obtain a clear-cut or direct confirmation of this point, but it is a fact that a man sometimes makes malicious remarks to his wife if she is not sufficiently tattooed to his taste ("You, your body is as smooth as a man's"). This fact lends considerable validity to the explanation given. The persistence of these tattoos in spite of modern dress also makes it convincing, although the evidence is not entirely conclusive, considering that its significance is not diminished by the psychological explanation that follows.

The figures are placed in such a way that they converge toward the sex organ. Moreover, the men see the tattooing at some time or other, either in its entirety or in part. Clothing may cover them more or less, but at some time for one reason or another the woman uncovers them, if only partially. [48] The imagination works on what is seen and quite naturally arouses sexual desire. The accuracy of this psychological explanation can be verified even in Europe: one is tempted particularly by what one has only glimpsed.

1. This is the explanation given, for example, by Dr. J. Maes in Notes sur les Populations des Bassins du Kasai, de la Lukenie et du lac Léopold II (Notes Concerning the Peoples of the Kasai and Lukenie Basins and of Lake Leopold II), p. 189 ff.

309/ and "modern" fashions, as well as some ancient ones, take this into ● 132 account. In the next paragraph, moreover, we will note analogous phenomena.

Both of the explanations given can be defended, since each has its value. But it seems to me preferable not to oppose them but rather to bring them together, as they probably are in the thinking of the native.

It should also be noted that a man never performs the operation of making a sexual tattoo on a woman, although a woman may indeed operate on a man. And finally it should be mentioned that the [791] specific terms designating these tattoos are considered as obscenities.

The practice of tattooing is decreasing at the present time.
[178] Many boys are already without tattoos. But very few girls lack them; among them the fad has not disappeared. Some even have themselves tattooed without the knowledge of their parents and in spite of their opposition. Among the Blacks, as everywhere in the world, fashion is deeply rooted because it is natural. But the designs of the tattoos are now becoming smaller. It seems to me that this change is due, not to a reaction against tattooing as such, but rather to a modification of the style. For tattooing is a real fashion, and like all fashions it is subject to change and development. Nowadays there is a tendency to imitate the designs of other peoples of the Congo. Elsewhere, as among the Injolo, for example, an internal evolution may be observed, although it is occurring under foreign influence. The evolution is taking place chiefly in the face motifs, while those of the body are beginning to be omitted. But the sexual tattoos do not seem to be disappearing. [68]

4. Bead Belts

29/ From an early age the Nkundo child is adorned with a belt of 30/ trading beads. Before the coming of the Europeans this decoration
132 made its appearance only towards puberty and was restricted to girls. Nowadays, many men also adorn themselves in this manner. And since it is now easier to obtain the beads, women are no longer with a single string but wear several in assorted colors. They add smaller ones below the knee.

191/ 30/ 192 According to what I have been told, this type of ornament may also have a sexual significance. Normally -- and this statement is applicable only to the present time -- the beads are entirely covered by clothing and are visible only on a few occasions. If a large number of strings (as many as six, eight, or ten) or very many beads are worn, attention may be attracted to them because there will be a bulge in the clothing worn over them. Their sound will reveal their presence during a race or a dance. And according to my informants, that is enough to awaken passion. Making an allusion to the beads and especially touching them deliberately is considered as an invitation. For her part, a woman sometimes rubs them together in her fingers so that they will make their characteristic noise and thus attract a man's attention and arouse his interest.

The preceding does not mean that simply the wearing of the beads is necessarily intended for a bad purpose. Not only must such an intention be excluded in the case of serious persons, especially if they are elderly and content themselves with wearing a single string, seldom a second one to support the first. But there is also the possibility [192] that a young Black beauty may adorn herself with ten or more strands out of sheer vanity, so that the whole world may see that she has so many. [70]

Furthermore, it has been shown that attention to appearance is not necessarily directed to another person. Though that may be generally true, many people like to dress for the pleasure of being well dressed, and girls who never dream of an adventure may still enjoy wearing pretty undergarments. This desire for adornment for its own sake can, no doubt, explain the belts, as well as other embellishments on more than one Nkundó woman.

We should add that those who adhere to the theory that the tattoos have an immediate sexual influence could apply such a theory here as well.

302 5. Depilation

193 All Nkundó of both sexes practice depilation of the genital organs and even the armpits. The natives believe that the hair growing 833 826 become somewhat violent, the women recall these flaws, to the great shame of the person who suffers from them. The same is true of the weakness of some of the men which, like an excess of sexual activity, can cause difficulties in a household.

2. Rape

839 Rape in the true sense of the word -- that is, the abuse of a woman by the use of violence -- is most unusual among the Nkundó. If a woman does not consent, the angry seducer leaves her, often insulting her to the best of his ability. I know of only one case of rape, which occurred some time ago and caused much consternation in the region. Banɛ́ngɛ, the daughter of Iloko [94] Is Ɛ́fekele of Lofelɛ (Bongili), was at that time living with her mother's clan the Bonyeka (Bonkoso). She had not yet fully attained physical maturity (her breasts were still very small). One day she went into the forest and did not return in the evening. The family was alarmed, and her father and her uncle Mpɛ́nda ɛ́a Nkotonkale went to look for her. Finding traces of fresh blood, they followed them till they found Banɛ́ngɛ's corpse buried in the nsusulu. She had died of hemorrhage; her sex organs, torn, showed the unmistakable signs of rape. People had their suspicions, but it has never been possible to prove the identity of the criminal. If there had been proof, he would not have escaped the mortal vengeance of the unfortunate victim's parents.

All the data I have been able to collect indicates that other instances must undoubtedly have occurred.

3. Incomplete acts

832 Here we are speaking of what moralists call actus impudicitiae, that is, acts whose nature physically leads to sexual pleasure.

Obscene bodily contacts between persons of opposite sex are preparatory acts which excite; even touching the breasts, the abdomen, and taking a person by the arms are included in this category.

852 Kissing between persons of opposite sex is unknown. Embraces occur on the other hand but not in public; they must be considered as preparation to approaching intercourse. (1) An extraordinarily strong passion sometimes leads lovers to engage in more intimate kissing, usually as a prelude to normal intercourse. Although some natives are not shocked by such practices, more responsible people consider them improper. [96]

Article VI. Vices "Contra Naturam"

858 1. Male homosexuality

Homosexuality has been known among the Nkundó since time immemorial, among men as well as women.

Among the former it took the form of sodomy in the past, with one particular characteristic -- for which I do not know the explanation, that is, only the younger of the two men could take the active role. Nowadays among the youth, homosexuality has begun to take on a different form; the boys who practice it lie down in the positions of husband and wife. It is reported that sometimes one of the two says from time to time to his accomplice, "This is what I do with your sister." Is this an indication that here we have homosexuality only in action but not in feeling (in effectu not in affectu, as the moralists say)?

Homosexuality among the Nkundo does not seem to be the result of a special inclination for this vice; rather it has always been a last resort open to those who could not find a natural outlet for their passions. Although we cannot approve of this depravation of instinct either on rational grounds or in adherence to the faith, we must admit that it was more excusable among these peoples whose social organization was disadvantageous to many young people. At the present time there is already much less sodomy because it has become easier to get married. As for the new form of homosexuality, it may be observed especially in places where men are kept rigidly apart from relations

---

1. See above, Part 1, Article III.

835 encounter it only in connection with magical practices and sorcery
759 (boté, plural beté), for which it is the nkimbo, that is, the condition without which the beté would lack efficacy. If the nkimbo is not observed, the boté turns against its owner and, by a reversal of its effect (bonsongano), brings death to the latter. Therefore the interested parties submit to these degrading requirements despite their natural repugnance. Depending on the case, incest with the mother, the daughter, or the sister is required. The first of these eventualities is the most repugnant to our natives. Though it goes altogether against the grain to do so, the mother submits to this ignominy to save the life of her foolhardy and greedy son.

[87] The nkimbo of incest does not exist in all beté. It even seems to have been absent from the beté which are ancient and purely Nkundó. It is found primarily in the big modern beté, which have been imported from other peoples or invented on the spot since colonization. (1)

1, See Kaptein, in Congo, 1922,
Vol. 1, p. 534.

Article VIII. Love Philters

852 The Nkundó are familiar with two love philters, the efóndé and the bonsílá. Other modern beté may produce the same effect in part or secondarily. Here [101] we will only deal with the first two, which are "pure" and ancient love philters.

The love philters (boté w'ëlangyá) serve to gain the heart of a young girl as much as to entice a married woman away from her husband.

1, Efóndé

Efónde (1) is a common charm. Anyone can procure it from the maker in consideration of the appropriate payment, of course. Various kinds of efóndé exist, differing as to the ingredients used, the manner

---

1, Efónde is often used as a synonym of elangyá in its sexual meaning.

132 in which they are manufactured, and consequently in the way they [124] are used. The most common ingredients are certain leaves mixed with red rouge (ngóla) and a sort of lichen which forms red slabs on the back of certain species found in the forest; the whole thing is [125] carefully wrapped in a small fur (especially the skin of the small feline iyeli).

The charm is hidden under a slat of the bed where the desired one takes her nightly rest. Because this is done an ardent love for the owner of the charm will grow in her heart. Or it may be placed somewhere in a hut; then the desired woman is called in, the owner of the charm takes her arm, and the elôndé immediately "turns her heart." Or, still without the woman's knowledge, the charm is thrown into the fire where she cooks. If she begins to sneeze when she returns home, this is a sign that the smoke charged with mysterious emanations from the philter has penetrated through her nostrils all the way to her heart and filled it with ardent love for the Adonis in question.

The elôndé is considered an ilófo, that is, a subjugation. Elôndé ékôka bâmato, "the elôndé masters women, has power over [126] them." The substance which prevents the elôndé from being efficacious is the bokai, a kind of sour vegetable. [102] The owner of the philter must abstain from eating it. For the bokai cause vomiting and if he ate any the woman would in the same manner eject her love and thus make the bote ineffective.

2. bontélé

Contrary to the elôndé, the bontélé, is a love philter which is not available to everyone; it is a charm only for dancers of the iyaya. This does not mean that all the artists who perform this dance have it, but they alone are acquainted with it. The material basis of the bontélé, as of most Nkundô bote, are the leaves of certain plants.

The efficacy of the bontélé is infallible. It acts not only on the beloved one, but also on any woman who involuntarily or on purpose fulfills the condition necessary to its operation. That is, as soon as a woman's head touches the arm of the possessor of the bontélé, her heart is moved in his favor; should she be married, her love for her 582 husband will change to revulsion, and she will leave him to be with her charmer.

Part 3

The Search for a Wife

584 When a young man old enough to marry believes he has the means to do so, he goes out to seek a wife. Naturally, he knows a number of girls, and as a rule he has no trouble finding one who suits him. The courtship is quite simple. As everywhere there are meet- [95] ings, visits, chats, and jokes; but there is no romanticism or sentimentality, for they are absolutely unknown to these peoples. Since they are in a hurry [102] to reach the objective of their relationship, namely conjugal life, -- and their progress toward this goal is facilitated by usages and customs -- there remains little time for poetry.

There is no specific term for courtship itself. The Nkundó simply speak of "talking with a woman," sanja bómoto, "looking for a woman," asa bómoto. The girl who is its object is referred to as bombéyó (or bosombé among the Injólé).

First, the young man addresses his proposals to the girl: "Ńlanga ńkokolá (ńkokumbéla) la wǎli", "I want to take you for wife." She shows her agreement by saying, "Ńkolanga wě ng'ókó", "I love you also," or more frequently, "elakó ó wě", "as you wish," jú ó límé, "it's up to you," or something of this sort. (1)

[95] [576]

1. Note that for the Nkundó these expressions have quite a different significance than would appear from the words. They express a real agreement and an explicit and personal consent. In fact it is considered improper for a woman to use a more direct expression.

584 93/ The lovers exchange gifts. The girl gives food which her mother has provided, or which she has been able to procure herself.

¶6 especially very early in the morning at the crowing of the cock.(1)
[illegible]

1. The natives also use this means to call their children who long ago left for the "lowlands" and whose return they ardently desire.

If the one who is called does not return, the charm will take revenge either on her or on her lover, depending on the desire of the person operating it. Another intervention on his part is then required, however, and it varies according to the form used. Note that according to the native view it is impossible for the wife not to hear the call, no matter how far away she may be. If she does not return, it is because she is being obstinate and deserves to be punished.

The spirit of vengeance alone is involved in:

¶7 2) The ngondé. This charm comes from the Coquilhatville region or even further away. The word ngondé is the Loįfogá form of the Lonkundó word nkondé, which means "gavial." The teeth of this reptile actually play a part in its composition. It is used to punish any thief by death. Therefore it has been declared effective against anyone who tries to seduce the wife of another. It will cause the culprit's feet to swell and to open with pus. Like the above practices, this one has not yet crossed Momboyo.

¶12 177 Such usages like many others have therefore been recently introduced. Before the arrival of Europeans in these parts, only love philters were known. However, it is easily understandable that the Nkundó gladly and confidently received these new practices which are so useful -- in their opinion -- and operate in a domain of capital importance for which colonization has deprived them of their ancient sanctions and means of prevention. [417]

[177
291] personal vanity, and to excite the male. At the present time only the latter reason accounts for the practice in the region where our influence has been effective. The introduction of European fabrics, the expansion of the economy and the progress of civilization have led the women to clothe themselves and to hide and screen a large part of the body from indiscreet glances. [189] The small primitive loincloth has given way to a toga of variable length, which hides from the public eye that part [Fig. 112 appears here] of the body which is covered with tattoos. In such cases, the woman can no longer display her tattoos for the sake of vanity. [Figs. 113 and 114 appear here] If, despite this, some of them continue to have themselves tattooed just like the old matrons, it is because they hope to attract a man, to please him, and to be able to participate sooner in the pleasures of intimate life. When questioned on this subject, the natives are very definite. The men maintain that the raised tattoos [190] on

[291

304 certain parts of the female body is very exciting to them, essentially as a result of the very pronounced movements of the woman during sexual contact. This explanation, which according to the natives seems to be the only reason for tattooing the women of certain tribes (this applies, in our opinion, to the Bateke, Bankutungo, Baboma, and, up to a certain point, to all the riparian peoples of Lake Leopold II), also enables us to explain the special character of the tattooing of Yaelima women. It extends all around the mons Veneris, follows the fold of the groin, and continues in concentric circles on the inside of the upper thighs. The tattoo scars on these parts of the woman's body are usually more symmetrical and in more pronounced relief, and these characteristics increase in direct proportion to the nearness of the pubic region. Coquetry cannot be the reason for making these raised scars. Their presence is largely hidden, even by the flimsiest and most primitive loincloth. Among certain tribes, the loincloth completely covers this part of the body, and since native women exercise a great deal of care and modesty in hiding these tattoos from the public eye, it was only with great difficulty that we were able to verify their existence. Let us note in passing [834]

that despite earnest endeavors, we never were able to persuade a native woman of the interior to be photographed without her loincloth. The civilized women, whether local demimondaines or housewives, were, it is true, less [191] timid. The natives themselves make a distinction between these tattoos and those which appear on other parts of the body, notably on the arms, back, and face.

304
832
Tattoos on the back, arms, and throat are always essentially decorative. We found them especially on the women, who are coquettish by nature even among the most primitive peoples. These tattoos generally lack the characteristic uniformity which is such a clear mark of the racial tattoos. The latter are found in their most characteristic form on the men, particularly on the forehead, temples, cheeks, and sometimes the chest. Among certain tribes, the women have also taken over this artificial deformation peculiar to the men. Elsewhere, the women have special tattoos which are clearly distinct from those of the men, and, finally, among some peoples the women have no racial tattoos.

Yaelima

This consists of a set of small curves drawn above the root of the nose, similar to those we previously noted among the Ipanga-Bakutu, but usually sharper and more pronounced. This identical and characteristic motif seems to establish an affinity between these two groups, but it must be noted that the motif on the temples varies considerably from one region to another. Here we find again the rosette of the peoples of Lake Leopold II, although much larger. The concentric circles cover the temples, and very often they extend over a wider area as arcs, always concentric, are added above the cheeks. 304

Both men and women have adopted this tattoo.

2) Sexual tattoos, reserved for women. 304 833

These consist of scars in relief which are found on all parts of the body from just above and between the breasts to the middle of the thighs.

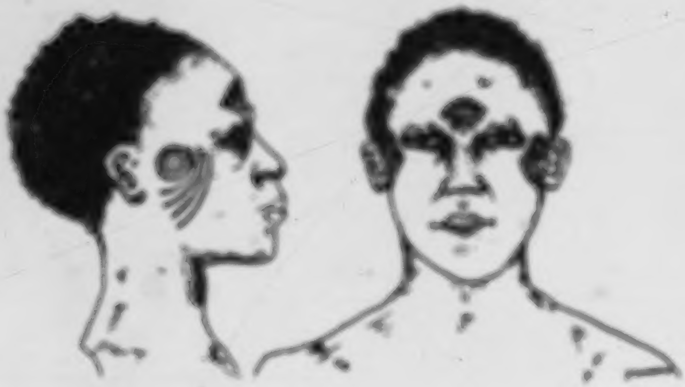

Fig. 120. Bokala-Yaelima Tattoos.

3) Ornamental or coquettish tattoos. [156] 304

These extend irregularly over all the other parts of the body, including the arms and back.

The tattoos in the second category form a series of concentric, rounded triangles whose tip is actually the mons Veneris. 304 833

The designs between the breasts and the navel vary considerably from one person to another. The rosettes and palm-leaf motif clearly predominate. The man does not use this type of tattoo, but the woman, on the other hand, takes a great deal of palms with it, from which we may conclude that her chief aim is a heightening of sensation in sexual relations.

Dengese FO 16

309

The motifs or designs in the third category are extremely varied [197] and most irregular, as we noted earlier. Aside from the concentric rosette, we saw the most varied designs: small dots, stippled lines, crescents, diamond shapes, palm-leaf motifs, and other figures cross, cut into each other, are superimposed on each other, and are mixed in such a way that the scars seem to have been scattered at random all over the body.

Men and women both have adopted these designs, but the woman seems to be especially fond of them. In this respect the Bokala and Yaelima differ sharply from their neighbors to the west, but seem to resemble closely the tribes to the east, especially the peoples of the Dekese region. Photographs sent by Mr. Van den Broeck and designated as Dengese show us the undeniable

304 171 we made of the many figures we saw in this region showed us that the variations are so numerous, so diverse, and so closely intertwined that it is totally impossible to use this as a basis for determining ethnic sectors with clearly-defined characteristics.

304 171 ● 833 Finally, if we consider only those tattoo figures to which we attributed, if not a familial origin, at least a familial nature [200] (incitement to sexual relations), we see that throughout the region this type of tattoo is peculiar to women.

From Leopoldville to the confines of Batitu territory and even among some Bokala women, this tattoo consists (where it still exists) of a number of small, aligned dots, just like the ornamental tattoos.

Among the Ipanga-Batitu, these figures sometimes embellish the arms and part of the back, while among the other tribes they are less elaborate.

304 171 833 In the region of the Yaelima, Dengese, and some of the Bokala, this tattoo consists of a series of broken, concentric lines with the pubic region as the main center.

We do not know if this tattoo is also worn by the Basongo-Meno and Bankutshu women, but this seems probable to us. We can, however, assert that among those peoples this tattoo does not extend to the upper thighs, except for one or two lines of small incised dots running parallel to the fold of the groin.

[192] [302]

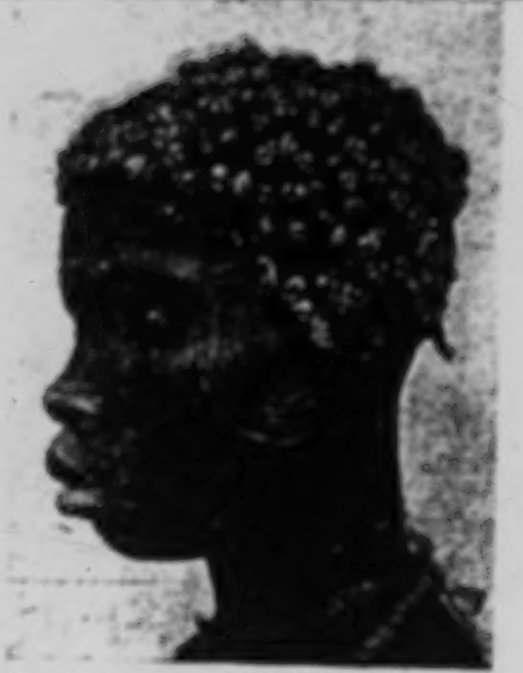

Fig. 125. Yaelima Tattoing and Headdress Adorned with Peanuts Smeared with Ngula.

The incisions for ornamental and sexual tattoos are usually made by women, although a man sometimes takes over this task.

304 The operation is carried out at very irregular intervals and at practically any [201] time of life. Moreover, it requires several sittings, usually spaced from 10 to 15 days apart.

The tattooing knife, which is also used for depilation, consists of a small, broad iron blade with a curved, very sharp cutting edge.

515 834 are reassured by the fact that they are in a group, so that no one feels singled out by the gaze of the passer-by. Washing away from major streams is always surrounded by more propriety. For this purpose a [341] small enclosure (ilomba) is built behind the hut or among the banana trees, or a small thicket is allowed to grow there. By this means the native is sheltered from indiscreet glances if he wants to take a [517] bath or give himself an enema. As a matter of fact these things are done preferably after dark.

571 152 5) Violent anger or sorrow drown out modesty, just as they momentarily destroy the use of reason and suppress all feelings which are contradictory or simply different. In this situation, too, the man shows himself superior to the woman. He is less impulsive, calmer, less prone to lose control of his actions, to be carried away by his anger. Thus he almost never strips himself bare. The woman, on the other hand, readily strips off all her clothing. This behavior is extremely common; a woman undresses completely whenever she experiences great sorrow or intense anger. Luckily for propriety's sake some friend or relative always hastens to cover at least the essential parts. For a woman who throws off her clothing exposes herself to the mockery and jeers of spectators. (1)

[594] [578] 1. An angry woman may also undress to shame her husband; it is a way of insulting and mocking him.

● 833 6) The Nkundó practice sexual intercourse only at night. I believe that this custom is due to their sense of propriety, [57] supplemented by a superstitious explanation which will be described in detail in Article V.

573 834 7) The sense of modesty has its fullest expression in relation to parents, brothers, sisters, etc. Thus it is unheard of that a son should see his mother naked: bóna ěnfndiká ǒnanyí nyangó. If an adult daughter is ill and requires personal care (such as an enema, for example), the father has to take care of her himself if no other female relative is near by. But their sense of modesty is such that they both shed tears over the event. As a matter of fact this situation

834/ 116 It goes without saying that the feeling of sexual modesty and its various manifestations among these people are being transformed by two different currents. On the one hand, their moral laxity is increased by their contact with all sorts of other peoples, by a greater freedom, by the partial emancipation of women, and by the attraction of the large centers and their luxury. On the other hand, there is the preaching of Christian morality, although its effects are still very slight and certainly do not counterbalance the influences mentioned above.

Article II. Preparation for Sexual Life

1. The Woman's preparation

● 833

When a girl wishes to indulge in pleasures of the flesh, she prepares her sexual organs in advance. The preparation itself consists of "opening the way" (lifola mbóka). This operation, which is repeated several times, is performed in hiding, preferably in the forest. The girl may or may not have companions with her who share her intentions. Each girl operates on herself. In order to gradually enlarge the organ, a girl uses progressively thicker shoots of the [929] bonkónga or bokaoló plant (Costus afer), making sure first to remove the tip. Later these shoots are replaced by the bombólé fruit of the bosáombó plant (Aframomum) or, more infrequently, by a young manioc tuber.

This is the general practice; exceptions are few or nonexistent. It is followed because the girls want the event to which they aspire to occur without difficulty (bilota bálifo'ikoala).

837/ 515 In addition to this basic preparation, girls [65] also wash the private parts of their bodies. This is a cleanliness measure which they continue to practice save in exceptional cases for the rest of their lives. According to my informants, the native woman -- as a very general rule -- stresses this cleanliness as much for herself as for the sake of not repelling her husband or lover. When a girl begins to practice this personal hygiene, it is a sign that she wants to begin her sexual life.

> prohibition under any circumstances. I have heard these same terms used also by the natives in the vicinity of Coquilhatville.

The body becomes flabby and without strength, and this weakness ends in a fatal paralysis ([illegible] [illegible] or [illegible]). In addition, the girls feared that their sexual organs, not yet fully formed, would be torn. They were also imbued with a very intense fear: [illegible] [illegible], "the fear of males," [illegible] [illegible], "the fear of females." They also feared death -- [illegible] [illegible]. The parents added that sexual acts were free from danger only between persons of the requisite age.

156 864 171 This does not mean that children did not commit indecent acts. The game of [illegible], in which little girls try to cook (and which is always one of their favorite games (3) as it probably is throughout the world), often gave rise to it. Small boys joined in the game in order to taste the meal. And quite naturally they began to play at "husband and wife," more or less. Often this game involved only innocent imitations, but other times touching and exhibitions occurred between children of the same sex or of opposite sexes. This game is far more dangerous nowadays, [81] because of a change in the attitude of young people toward sexual matters.

> 3. Some boys imitate this game in order to acquire the habit of preparing their own meals. Later they benefit from it on more than one occasion.

The game of [illegible], in which boys, imitating monkeys, chase each other through the trees and creepers can -- and does -- result in reprehensible scenes.

[illegible] 171 In former times most girls were married before puberty. But their husbands did not touch them until they had completed their normal development.

156 [illegible] 864 Among some individuals the fear of sexual relations was so deeply rooted that it persisted even beyond the age limit and was

[592 conquered only by repeated assaults of passion. Thus it is generally
593] known among the natives that young women used to seek refuge in 864 their mother's house when the husband wanted to begin making use of his rights as a husband. The mother would try to persuade her daughter to submit to the law of life. But sometimes, if her child seemed too resistant, the mother made excuses for her and asked the husband to consider her daughter's youth. The man usually wanted to remain on good terms with his mother-in-law so he did not insist and resigned himself to waiting till nature influenced the spirit and heart of his wife.

Since young people were brought up in deep fear of dangerous relations, it should not surprise us that this feeling became a real habit and did not disappear spontaneously the moment a certain degree of liberty was permitted. As a matter of fact, could we not make similar observations in Europe?

This is the natural explanation for the praiseworthy degree of morality among adolescents in the past.

[171] Nowadays all that has changed. The young people follow where their passions lead them. Not the slightest check is placed on [836 their impulses. Parents pay only slight attention to the conduct of 864 their children. [82] It is better not to inquire into the morality of modern youth. Husbands no longer respect the bodies of their adolescent brides, who are themselves quite used to a sexual life and eagerly look forward to it, and no longer know the feeling of "the fear of men." Should we then be astonished at the frightening de-[164] crease in the birth rate (1) and the ever increasing spread of venereal diseases, which seem to have been unknown in the past?

The reasons for this change will be investigated further on, under the letter C.

836 B. Between adults. Here the Nkundó are very lenient. There is a difference, however, between the socio-legal and moral viewpoints, although as we shall see the latter is influenced by the former.

[582] A woman is entirely free, legally speaking, as long as the first payment on her bride price has not been made. No man has

1. The natives say that in the past young wives quickly became pregnant. And now ...

591 684 soon as her family becomes aware of her condition. The accomplice is made officially responsible and is required to accept this responsible and is required to accept this responsibility by publicly pledging his willingness to take all consequences upon himself. This pledge like all pledges is called ndonga. It consists of a knife, a ring of copper or brass, a spear, or similar objects. (2)

2. The same custom is practiced in the case of pregnancy resulting from adultery.

Article V. Sexual Intercourse

• 833 Although this subject is extremely delicate and therefore difficult to investigate and describe, it does not seem pointless to note here a few details with which I have become acquainted. We will discuss in succession a few circumstances relative to the act, then rape, and finally what are called incomplete acts. [92]

1. Circumstances relative to the act

[N] The Nkundó have intercourse lying on their sides. Nowadays, natives who have had frequent contacts with Whites are beginning to abandon the old manner for that of the Europeans. The spirit of imitation probably plays some part in the transformation which is beginning, but the gradual spread of the knowledge that the European system makes conception more likely is also a factor.

Even for illicit relations our natives seldom choose the forest or near-by palm or banana groves. Usually they prefer an isolated hut, or they take advantage of the absence of witnesses who might intrude on them. At night they are generally afraid of anything that stirs in the forest.

833 953 684 The Nkundó have sexual relations only during the night. To do so in the daytime would be to risk being striken by a mortal illness called bombilé (derived from mbilé "noon," by extension, "day"),

833 753 684 which has a strong resemblance to sleeping sickness. (1) One of its symptoms is a weakness of the lower limbs. Instances are cited of individuals who were unable to resist their passions and were punished in this manner. Apparently only the woman dies. As soon as her family discovers that she is stricken,the guilty woman denounces her accomplice. The latter is held responsible and is required to pay a heavy indemnity, which may amount to several dozen copper rings.

833 751 Here as in many other situations the Nkundɔ́ have found a way to avoid the danger. There is an antidote (nsengɔ́), and it is water (bǎsi bale nsengɔ́ ɛâ bombilɛ́). Thus those who are unable to control their aroused passions during the day, satisfy it in a shallow stream.

833 753 The fear of bombilɛ́ has been greatly shaken [93] by colonization. If we are to believe the natives, foreign soldiers are responsible for this change also. But the behavior of the latter could not completely destroy the ancient feeling, probably due to a natural shame which makes them seek darkness and privacy for acts of this sort.

833 [515] [842] After intercourse a native woman usually gives herself a douche. She does so for the sake of cleanliness. It often happens, however, that she does not wait long enough before doing so, and thus she neutralizes the effect of the intercourse. This is chiefly a matter of carelessness. Nevertheless, under certain circumstances she may use this means to prevent conception. (1)

---

1. It is not sleeping sickness itself, however, for that disease seems formerly to have been unknown in this area.

1. See Chapter X, Article I, 2.

833 826 According to my informants, some women have constitutional abnormalities which repel men. As everything readily becomes public, such flaws are quickly known after marriage, though not quite as readily beforehand. Actually love can -- and often does -- cause them to be overlooked. But after the first ardor has cooled, such a situation may become a threat to the stability of a marriage. When quarrels 833 826 become somewhat violent, the women recall these flaws, to the great shame of the person who suffers from them. The same is true of the weakness of some of the men which, like an excess of sexual activity, can cause difficulties in a household.

2. Rape

839 Rape in the true sense of the word -- that is, the abuse of a woman by the use of violence -- is most unusual among the Nkundɔ́. If a woman does not consent, the angry seducer leaves her, often insulting her to the best of his ability. I know of only one case of rape, which occurred some time ago and caused much consternation in the region. Banɛ́ngɛ́, the daughter of Iloko [94] Is Ɛ́fekele of Lofelɛ́ (Bongɛ́li), was at that time living with her mother's clan the Bonyeka (Bonkoso). She had not yet fully attained physical maturity (her breasts were still very small). One day she went into the forest and did not return in the evening. The family was alarmed, and her father and her uncle Mpɛ́nda ɛ́a Nkotonkale went to look for her. Finding traces of fresh blood, they followed them till they found Banɛ́ngɛ́'s corpse buried in the nsusulu. She had died of hemorrhage; her sex organs, torn, showed the unmistakable signs of rape. People had their suspicions, but it has never been possible to prove the identity of the criminal. If there had been proof, he would not have escaped the mortal vengeance of the unfortunate victim's parents.

All the data I have been able to collect indicates that other instances must undoubtedly have occurred.

3. Incomplete acts

832 Here we are speaking of what moralists call actus impudicitiae, that is, acts whose nature physically leads to sexual pleasure.

Obscene bodily contacts between persons of opposite sex are preparatory acts which excite; even touching the breasts, the abdomen, and taking a person by the arms are included in this category.

4. Onanism [coitus interruptus]

893 Onanism also seems to be unknown. No doubt many women have learned this vice through their concubinage with Europeans, but they have not spread it. The same may be said of involuntary onanism. For the native does not look for sensual refinements; rather he follows his natural impulse. (1)

> 1. The practice described in Chapter X, Article III, 3, may be slightly tainted with onanism; it could certainly lead to such a practice, but it is not caused by perversion.

Article VII. Incest

614 We here must distinguish between 1) sexual relations between distantly related kin and 2) between close kin.

1. Among distant relatives

Incest among distant relatives (in the Nkundó sense of the word) has existed since time immemorial. It is called lonkâna (bombakɛ́ among the Bombwanja). Lonkâna is derived from nkâna, "brother, sister." The expression liɛ́la j'ōlóló, "sexual union in the village," is also used. The term lonkâna is applied to relations between members of families which are only very distantly related (not at all related, according to our notions) but between whom marriage is not permitted. Thus one hears that such and such kin groups do not marry each other (báfóyakumbólɛ́) but they commit lonkâna. Two kin groups of this sort may be considered closely related clans. The groups between whom lonkâna is practiced each has its own cemetery, while those between whom it is absolutely forbidden share a common cemetery. Thus, to cite an example, the "village" [98] of Elɛ́ngɛ l'Imomo l'Ontole (Bongíli) is composed of three kin groups, as the name indicates. The Imomo settlement is partially located in the

Article I. Girls

584 According to Nkundɔ custom it is acceptable for an expected child, not yet born or still very young, to be promised in marriage to X or Y. This practice was formerly very common and is still quite prevalent today. It is called banda bɔ̌na or bǒmoto, literally, "to count a child" or "to count a woman." The ikulɛ is paid at the time of the promise. Later the matter is carried out in the usual fashion; the other parts of the bride price are paid either while the fiancée is young or, preferably, at the time when she goes to her husband.

584
855 Until that time, if one of the girl's relatives is already a wife of a polygamist husband-to-be or of one of his relatives, the child is brought up in her husband's family from a fairly early age, depending on the circumstances. She lives with her relative. She may be barely seven or eight years old, for example. If no one in her husband's clan can take care of her, [232] she spends only one or two weeks there to become acquainted, little by little, with people and places; she repeats the visit from time to time. Her mother accompanies her, for being so young she could not get used to being there alone, without support, without her parents. Therefore it is necessary to wait till she is old enough to be somewhat independent and able to manage by herself. That time usually comes around the [145] beginning of puberty, thus sometime between the ages of twelve and fifteen.

584
833 Like an adult woman, she is already called bompɛka or wǎlɛ, depending on the portion of the bride price that has been paid. She has all the duties and privileges of a wife: sexual relations, food preparation, care of the household, etc. There is no set date or age for the beginning of cohabitation. This matter is settled between the husband and his parents-in-law. The latter do not have the right to [606] delay the time, even if their daughter is still too young, but they can make use of their great influence over their son-in-law. The modern [178] generation is not shocked by sexual relations between an adulterer [sic] [571] and a girl who has not reached puberty. Besides, all is in order from the legal standpoint; since the man has paid the bride price, he is the

584 legitimate husband and is entitled to his wife. Everything depends
833 on his personal attitude, his passion, or his respect for the body of his young wife. If he is reasonable he will be very careful during his relations with her or will abstain altogether, so as not to "damage" her body. But from the legal standpoint he may do as he chooses. Thus there are adults who have regular relations -- one way or another -- with a wife whose breasts are not in the least developed. In such cases marital relations take place before nubility. (1) The consequences with respect to the birth rate may easily be guessed. [233] It may also happen that the husband himself has not reached puberty. This fact presents no obstacle to cohabitation. As soon as he feels that he is a man, he builds his hut and the couple live there together. In all these cases the girl often goes to her parents' home, and sometimes her visits extend for weeks during which she does not see her husband.

Formerly things did not work out in this fashion. The young wife often refused to participate in the sexual act, especially if the husband was considerably older than she. Her reaction was due to her natural modesty and timidity, together with her education. A polygamous husband usually respected her feelings, till she gradually came around. When her normal physiological development was completed and her love reached a sufficient intensity, she would begin to follow her instincts. In the light of what was said in Chapter I, Part 2,, Article IV, 2, A, we may readily accept our informants' statements on this score; the situation seems altogether natural.

[882] 1. Note that the immature girl is not called filingo in Nkundó, as Engels ("Les Wangata," Revue congolaise, 1910, p. 36) maintains. This word is but the Nkundó transformation of the word virgo. There is no specific term for "prepubescent." A girl who is not yet a woman but is no longer a child is called itembeleke.

Article III. Relations between Spouses; Their Various Rights and Duties

593x
833 Spouses are obliged to fulfill the duties and perform the tasks incumbent upon them .

It is difficult to say just how far the sense of duty to fulfill the debitum conjugale extends among the Nkundó. Normally, they very frequently fulfill this obligation toward each other. But after a good quarrel they abstain, either through mutual consent or because one of them refuses. [586] If one of the parties fails seriously and repeatedly in this respect, the question is resolved by a divorce. The response to temporary lapses is limited to reprimands, disputes, blows, and other common reactions. [834] It should be added that continence is required during the ekelé period after the birth of a child and after setting up a new hunting enclosure (lokombo) or a new fishing weir (bosaka), before the third piece of a game or fish is caught.

1. Meals

593x
264 A couple never take their meals together. The husband eats the food prepared for him and served to him by his wife alone, with his grown sons, or with friends or relatives. The wife herself eats with her small children, her daughters, or her female relatives. The two sexes never mingle at meals.

593x
521 The same rule applies to talks, but it is much less strictly maintained; it is not rare to find that, for one reason or another, women participate in the conversation of men.

It will not be long before, through the influence of Christianity, [266] women will generally be admitted in the conversations of the opposite sex. Developments with respect to mixed meals will come with much more difficulty; in practice the question has not even been broached.

593x
348 Thus one finds a kitchen next to the bedroom or separated from the hut; in addition to being the place where food is prepared, it is [354] where the woman spends her day. The kitchen is sometimes a structure separated from the dwelling itself, sometimes a part of the house separated from the bedroom by a partition containing a door.

595x Thus a favorite is in every way the object of her husband's [431] preference. He divides with her all presents he receives, while the other wives are not included in this expression of generosity.
●[853] But in the matter of sexual relations, apart from his trips, he has obligations to all of them. The most he can do is to add one night to the usual number (see below).

The co-wives adapt fairly well to this preferential system. Nevertheless, there is a good deal of backbiting on account of it. It may also happen that one or another of the wives is jealous to [586] the point of being unable to bear it. [347] The signs of her rancor multiply, and a divorce results in the end.

[765] The nkɔ́ndɛ́ does not have to go into mourning for anyone other than her husband. Even then she does not remove her clothing. But she does not have to abide by mourning regulations either for her parents or her own children.

[587] Like the other wives, the favorite is passed on through inheritance. But she cannot be taken as a bosɔ́lɔ́ by anyone except an elder brother of the deceased.

595x
192 Nkɔ́ndɛ́ is the specific term by which a favorite is designated. Its etymology is unknown to me. The word is used everywhere, although the Injɔ́lɔ́ often say lokílo (whose etymology is equally obscure). Another less common (older?) term known to the Bonkoso, Bongili, Wǎngatá, and Bakáala is bongilɛ́ or bongijí (1). In addition to the term ikundaka, already cited, there is also the word ebɛ́lɛ́kɛ́, a generic term meaning "preference, predilection" or, when applied to a child or a slave, "an object one does not want to dispose of." The favorite is also called áfɔ́kńámɛ́, "untouchable," because other men may not have relations with her.

1. The Ekonda call the favorite bokɔ́lo. The Elanga of Losanganya say bofiɛ́, a name borne by certain women among the Nkundɔ́ between Jwalɛ́ and Boloko. Might this also be an old name?

595x cultivate. Whatever food he has been able to obtain (from hunting and fishing, the fruit of palm trees, etc.) must be impartially distributed by the bomátsa. He is required to eat food prepared by each one, either on the same day or, more frequently, each in turn.

595x 833 The same holds true for their intimate relations. He must divide his nights equally among them all and in turn (-kafa mpóngó). Usually he spends three or four nights with the same one. He is not allowed to favor one wife over another. He may add an extra night to the usual number only in favor of the bomátsa or the favorite. If he wants to have continuous relations with the favorite, he goes on a trip with her for a real or invented reason.

Partiality is sharply criticized and gives rise to violent domestic quarrels. It may result in the breaking up and dispersion of the harem. It is very badly tolerated, especially in sexual matters. The husband must therefore watch himself carefully and respect the rights of each and every one. Exceptions are made only with regard to women who occupy a special rank in the harem, and then only with respect to the privileges or duties that go with the position.

On their set nights, the women go to cohabit with their husband in his house. He seldom goes to their houses unless he has no hut of his own. Each wife knows her turn, and none of them are ashamed to let the others know when it comes. On the contrary, it is sometimes in their interest to do so.

595x There is no sharing of property among co-wives except in the case of a bibísa. Each one takes care of her own household, does her own cooking, cares for her own children, cultivates her [360] own crops. Each one has her own tools and utensils. They may help each other if they wish to, however. Especially for fishing they often go together, particularly for scooping ponds.

847 they could count. Nevertheless, if it happens to a young unmarried mother, little or no fuss is made over it because no one can feel wronged; at most the culprit is scolded. For a married woman, on the other hand, it is one of the most serious infractions. Her husband has an immediate right to the fetus that would have become his child. He cannot beat or mistreat the offender in punishment, for her condition will not permit violence, but he can abandon her to her fate by refusing her all assistance, in particular by refusing to bring her firewood, the heat of which she greatly needs under such circumstances. For she has done him an enormous wrong and has acted with real malice (aônjokel'inkúnyá, he says), since he married her chiefly so that she would give him descendants. If she dies it is her own fault. Even her family will not support her, for [682] they would be accused of being involved in the crime; inevitably they would lose the case and be condemned to indemnify the husband.

An abortion which is ascertained to be involuntary [i.e., 843 a miscarriage] is treated like an accident or an illness and the appropriate legal stipulations are applied to it. Thus if it happens while the woman is at her parents' home, the responsibility for it falls on them. Usually the palaver is settled in a friendly manner; the family makes a few nkọmí payments, and the question is closed. If relations between the husband and his son-in-law are somewhat strained, the dispute may be drawn out and may result in the breaking up of the marriage. If the woman dies from the accident, the rules given in Article X of the preceding chapter come into play. [469]

Article II. Conception and Pregnancy

842
● 833 The Nkundó have only a partial notion of the phenomena of conception. They are well aware of which acts cause the procreation of children. They have a perfect knowledge of anatomy and a rich vocabulary pertaining to sexual life. But they know only as much about physiological processes as experience can teach them. Furthermore, they believe that the act of procreation must be repeated several times in order to produce its natural result. Note,

Note,

842 finally, that sexual relations are strictly forbidden to them during ● 833 menstruation (-kona or éna nsóngé, literally "to be ill from" or "to [843] see the moon," and other similar expressions). The reason given is that a woman in that difficult condition should be spared all additional annoyance.

1. Elímá

The Nkundó attribute the procreation of children sometimes 842 to God (Njakomba) and sometimes to spirits (elímá, pl. bilímá).
776 God forms (-ánga) the children in the mother's womb, but at the same time the bilímá provide the men among the progeny. (1)

There is no point in trying to make the natives resolve this apparent contradiction; they would not succeed. They simply state the two points. I say "apparent contradiction," for as the Nkundó admit that the bilímá are subject to Njakomba, the contradiction is not real, and the two propositions can be [470] reconciled by explaining the intervention of the spirits as an operation which is dependent on divine action: they are secondary, intermediary causes, although our natives do not make this philosophical analysis.

To explain all the beliefs pertaining to spirits would be to go outside the framework of this study. Nevertheless, we cannot leave out those details which closely touch on our subject.

[182] 1. Contrary to what is reported by Father Lestaeghe (Congo, 1922, Vol. 1, p. 363) concerning the Ekonda, the tribes that I have known never address prayers for children to God, although they attribute the gift of children to Him. This matter does not concern God (Njakomba or Mbombiándá) directly, but rather a particular elímá.

Sterility, which is a common phenomenon here, is not imputed to sorcery but is considered an innate flaw. Natives usually claim that God refuses them children.

843 a woman's mother proceeded with the ceremony in the absence of the husband and his family. The latter were furious. They revealed the matter so that if anything should happen later to the mother or the child the law would be on their side. In that way the husband could evade responsibility and place the blame on his wife and her family so that they would have to pay an indemnity.

The pregnant woman does not remove the paint for three or [302] four weeks after the ceremony. Nowadays the use of paint having [178] disappeared except for certain occasions and among older persons, it is left on for only one night. In addition the surface smeared has been reduced to a line in the middle of the head or even one single spot.

[783] During this ceremony the Bombwanja have a public confession
[837] (etato) of the lovers. But since the Bokótɛ́ wait until after delivery, we will deal with it later on.

On the night following the ceremony described, the couple [633] [476] "fasten the fetus" through their carnal union. Were they to omit this act, the child would die before birth.

For subsequent pregnancies the fastening of the fetus is no longer preceded by the same formalities.

The couple continue to have relations during the entire [833] period of pregnancy "in order to open an easy passage for the child."
843 On the other hand, they must strictly observe marital fidelity.
837 Nevertheless, a polygamist may have relations with his other wives.

In addition to this essential art, the interdict also includes a secondary part; the couple may not even commit acts even very remotely related to procreation. Thus they may not:

1) Touch in any way whatsoever -- even to shaking their hands -- persons with whom they have had adulterous relations; such persons must therefore be avoided.

2) Sit next to such persons.

3) Look at them.

4) Enter a house or apartment where they are.

5) Eat "from the same pot."

6) Lie in another couple's bed.

7) Other persons may no longer sleep in the bed of the couple bound by the bokeka.

M
846 for and fed so that she may regain her strength rapidly. [486]

3. Seclusion

After childbirth the mother remains secluded (-ulama) in her hut for several weeks -- two, three, or more, depending on circumstances and especially on her husband's social position. Her seclusion is called julé. The hut bears the same name, or else it is called janga, "palm leaf." Sometimes the term ekelé is also applied to it, denoting the period of seclusion with all the special regulations it involves. These are as follows:

M [184] 1) Meals. In some tribes the woman may already eat on the day of the delivery. But among others she is only permitted to drink. The reason for this fast is given in the form of a legend. One day P [846] long ago a Botswa asked his master for a little manioc, but the master refused to give it to him. The master's wife had just given birth. Annoyed by the refusal, the Botswa cursed his master, saying: "From now on your women will have to fast the day they give birth." (1) Another explanation is that at sometime in the past someone refused food to a slave who was about to be sacrificed at a feast of the lifting of mourning. Tribes and villages that do not give any reason of this sort permit a woman to eat in the evening, if the delivery takes place in the morning.

M [833] A mother's first meal is prepared by a woman who has performed the carnal act the preceding night. She goes to draw water, and on her return she fastens or attaches over the door of the seclusion hut a piece of palm (jånga) or, among the Bombwanja, a piece of dried banana leaf; in this way she informs everyone that it M [262] is a house of ekelé. Then she prepares the food, which consists of bananas with fish or a hen in palm-oil sauce. It is eaten by the mother and her husband as well as the cook. Their very young children may also delight in it, but [487] the older ones, approaching puberty, may not. The newborn child is given a tiny bit of the sauce to taste.

1. Batswa women never fast under such circumstances.

For a young unmarried mother, the meal is prepared by a 846 [589] girl who has not reached puberty or a woman who is quite old, that is, by someone who does not engage in sexual intercourse.

2) Various regulations. From the time of the preparation of the first meal until the end of the bokeka, that is, until the day the umbilical cord becomes detached, the hearth of the seclusion hut is sacred, so to speak. Apart from the couple and the assistants, no one may enjoy it or profit from it, either to light anything from it or eat anything that has been prepared there. However, some men have a means of lifting the prohibition pertaining to the fire. Upon the hearth and all the hearths of the village or a group of houses, depending on the situation, they let fall a few drops of a special concoction.

It is also forbidden to sweep or pick up the ashes from the fire. Everything must stay put until the umbilical cord of the newborn child becomes detached.

During the entire period of seclusion, the mother is assisted by a kinswoman (or one of her husband's kinswomen; among the Bombwanja there are always two), who is the wujisa, "the one who makes the seclusion" (from the verb uja). The seclusion should not be thought of as that of a hermit; the mother may go out as soon as her condition permits, and the helper goes about her occupations, but she does not do so more than necessary. Rather the hut is a house of prohibitions.

During this period the mother and her helper do not do farm [834] work. In addition they must abstain from carnal relations and from all contacts with the opposite sex, in conformity with the customs explained in Article II, 3, above. The ekelé extends to the husband and to any other person who enters the hut. Any infraction results in the death of the mother or the child in the same manner as in the case of the bokeka (see loc. cit) . [488]

3) The end of the bokeka. When, at the end of four or five days, the umbilical cord becomes detached, the news is announced to the whole village, so that everyone may go back to their [833] work that has been suspended. The following night the father and mother perform the conjugal act to "destroy the bokeka and 846 to be able to nurse the child together." This does not mean that ● 833 from then on they may have regular sexual relations, for these are not permitted until after the end of seclusion. But if they were to omit the act at this time, they would have to abstain from it until the child is weaned. The Nkundó say that the act is performed "only a little." For many it becomes masturbation; others withdraw before obtaining the effect of the act. In no case may the act reach its natural climax. The reason for this practice is unknown to me. Perhaps it is done in order not to molest the woman while she is in a painful condition.

The next day the ashes in the hearth of the seclusion hut
846 are swept out, and the fire becomes "ordinary"; anyone may use
it and eat food prepared on it.

4) The umbilical cord is dried on the bolíkó (a tray or shelf) and then buried at the foot of a young banana tree planted for that purpose, preferably under a bọnkọḿ tree if possible. The ashes and sweepings from the seclusion hut are thrown there. The banana tree is called nkíndá. (1) Its fruit may be eaten only by the child's [153] grandfather and grandmother. If another person eats it, he will be punished with a headache of a nervous type.

The umbilical cord is always buried in the father's native
846 soil. People who are far from home (laborers for the Whites, etc.)
614 preserve the umbilical cords of their children with great care in order to take them back [489] when they return to their village, or send them back when a favorable opportunity arises. The Nkundó hold to this usage tenaciously, because a person whose umbilical cord is not buried in the lands of his paternal clan has no authority in the group. The person involved would meet with the following objection: ntákokúndela lokolé, ntákokundela lọkọkí, óyakúmya ngámo? olě nk'eyâya, "The lokolé was not beaten for you, your [824] 1. This is a generic term used for any banana tree planted for a special purpose (a magical practice, a game, etc.).

837 783 853 Note, finally, that the confession is restricted to married women. It is never expected of a young unmarried mother. Therefore it would seem to be a practice connected with marriage (a social institution) and not with childbirth (a physiological phenomenon).

[192] This confession is called etato or lotato, from the verb -tata, "to confess," (for which the generic term, sanga, "to say," is sometimes substituted).

I was unable to find any reason for this practice other than that of avoiding the death of the child. It is evident, however, that this explanation does not exhaust the question, although it is entirely possible that the original and deeper meaning has been lost without leaving any trace in the minds of the present generation. [496]

853 833 3) During the entire duration of nursing, the mother must not be separated from her child. For the usual circumstances of daily life, this rule is broadly interpreted; but during sexual relations it is strict, and no exceptions or excuses are permitted. Negligence under these circumstances would inevitably bring about the death of the child by ndota as soon as the mother took it back. This rule holds for legitimate relations as much as for illicit ones. Therefore the mother must always keep her child at her breast.

853 [757] [278] 4) If at some point during nursing, the milk no longer flows in sufficient quantity, the mother is given a potion consisting of the extract of the bark of the bolóngé tree (which has a fruit containing a very sweet milky sap). Then she eats vegetables called lotélé. (1)

(1) The leaves of this plant are also ordinarily eaten as vegetables, but they are consumed especially by those who possess the modern magical practice known as boyaóli.

[262] 5) An accident to which the Nkundó attach great importance is the rejection or vomiting of milk into the mouth of an adult, even if the person affected is the infant's mother. Such a person

M S 258 462 the flooded banks of all the rivers in the Mosengere-Basakata region. When the nature of the ground and the level of the river permit, the grass is spread out on the spot to dry in the sun, while in flooded areas the woman loads the harvest in the canoe and takes it to the temporary village set up [108] on the bank. The dry grass is packed in stacks which are like the haystacks on our European farms.

M S 258 When a family deems that its harvest of grass is sufficient, the chief of the group prepares the incinerating grounds or furnace. Pulverized earth from small termites' nests is mixed with mud from the river. The mixture is well worked and kneaded so as to make a firm and pliant paste and is then spread over the surface of a small hole from 15 to 20 centimeters deep and one or two meters square.

M S 258 462 When this coating is entirely dry, the women begin their work. One of them loads the furnace and lights it, while the others bring in grass from the stacks.

As the first pile burns down, the woman in charge of the furnace throws in new sheaves, and the work, accompanied by a low, monotonous chant, continues without pause until the full harvest of salt grass is burned.

Fig. 63. Stacks of Salt Grass, among the Bobaie.

M S [533]

● M S 258 ● 834 462 The burning usually lasts a whole day. During this time and during the period when the furnace is being prepared, all

M S 258 834 462 sexual relations are strictly forbidden between the head of the family and the woman in charge of the burning.

M S 258 285 462 When the last sprig is burned, the fire extinguished, and the ashes cold, the women heap them in large baskets.

Meanwhile the head of the family has made a sort of large funnel out of broad and tough rattan splints, bound with fine thongs of raffia stems and lianas. These funnels vary between two and three meters in height. The diameter of the large opening is one and a half to two meters. The bottom is formed by the cluster of rattan splints, roughly tied with a broad rattan thong. This funnel is placed upright between three or four sticks planted in the ground. An earthenware jar is placed under the funnel. The women line the inside of the funnel with banana leaves, placed on top of each other in such a way as to make the sides completely [109] waterproof. They next pour the ashes from the incineration into the funnel, pressing and squeezing them as much as possible.

When the funnel is three-fourths full, the woman draws about ten pots of water, or about 50 liters, and pours them over the ashes. This water takes two or sometimes three days to spread through the ashes. When the ashes are saturated, the woman pours two or three more pots of water into the funnel. From then on there is a slow drain of water, strongly salted from the dissolution of the soluble alkaline matter contained in the ashes. The water is caught in the earthenware jar under the funnel. The woman thus obtains four or five pots of a strong salt solution and two pots of water less saturated with salt. After putting aside her six or seven pots of salt water, the woman lights a fire and puts one or several earthenware bowls over it. Into these, little by little, she pours the strong salt solution, which she allows to boil.

When the water evaporates, the first salt deposit forms on the bottom and sides of the bowl.

M S 415 The heat from these evaporation hearths is so intense that it is impossible to come near them. The woman therefore carefully provides herself with two long ladles to refill the bowls at a distance as the evaporation progresses. The whole lot is left on the fire until all the salt water is evaporated. Even after the evaporation is completed, the woman leaves the jar over the fire, which she stokes, so as to completely dry and solidify the salt deposit. This

304 833 certain parts of the female body is very exciting to them, essentially as a result of the very pronounced movements of the woman during sexual contact. This explanation, which according to the natives seems to be the only reason for tattooing the women of certain tribes (this applies, in our opinion, to the Bateke, Banfumungu, Baboma, and, up to a certain point, to all the riparian peoples of Lake Leopold II), also enables us to explain the special character of the tattooing of Yaelima women. It extends all around the mons Veneris, follows the fold of the groin, and continues in concentric circles on the inside of the upper thighs. The tattoo scars on these parts of the woman's body are usually more symmetrical and in more pronounced relief, and these characteristics increase in direct proportion to the nearness of the pubic region. Coquetry cannot be the reason for making these raised scars. Their presence is largely hidden, even by the flimsiest and most primitive loincloth. Among certain tribes, the loincloth completely covers this part of the body, and since native women exercise a great deal of care and modesty in hiding these tattoos from the public eye, it was only with great difficulty that we were able to verify their existence. Let us note in passing
● [834] that despite earnest endeavors, we never were able to persuade a native woman of the interior to be photographed without her loincloth. The civilized women, whether local demimondaines or housewives, were, it is true, less [191] timid. The natives themselves make a distinction between these tattoos and those which appear on other parts of the body, notably on the arms, back, and face.

304 832 Tattoos on the back, arms, and throat are always essentially decorative. We found them especially on the women, who are coquettish by nature even among the most primitive peoples. These tattoos generally lack the characteristic uniformity which is such a clear mark of the racial tattoos. The latter are found in their most characteristic form on the men, particularly on the forehead, temples, cheeks, and sometimes the chest. Among certain tribes, the women have also taken over this artificial deformation peculiar to the men. Elsewhere, the women have special tattoos which are clearly distinct from those of the men, and, finally, among some peoples the women have no racial tattoos.

000 delicacy of a person's sexual modesty, the better that person is armed -- all other things [51] being equal -- against the excesses of passion. The habits of lust, on the other hand, dull and weaken the sense of modesty.

On the basis of these psychological and moral considerations as well as the facts of experience, it is impossible to say that a people is lacking in modesty simply because of the fact that they clearly have sensual tendencies and show a good deal of lasciviousness.

834 Among the Nkundó one should not expect the delicate sentiments found among some other peoples, especially those strongly influenced by Christian morality. But modesty is not unknown to them.

In the lines to follow we will say nothing more about the instinct of sexual modesty, which I think has been to a great extent blunted among the Nkundó, but of modesty in manner, which is an indication of inner modesty. The comparatively strict rules by which the Nkundó community tries to protect modesty shows that these people are fully aware of the value of that instinct as a safeguard against human weakness.

In general they hide the manifestations of sexual passion. In addition, certain practices which they favor show their attitude toward this matter; we will examine them in greater detail. It should be noted that, as we will see below, modesty among the Nkundó extends to situations where we would not consider it applicable, and vice versa, because of differences in the attitude toward certain questions.

Ethnologists in general consider the following among the chief effects (or indications) of modesty: the wearing of clothing (1) and the existence of regulations concerning the decency and [52] discretion which in word or deed should be observed between persons of the same sex and, more especially, toward persons of the opposite sex.

1. Although the wearing of clothing is a precaution arising from modesty, it has been asserted that the lack of garments is no proof of the lack of this sentiment.

291 581 speaking. (1) Is this custom in some way related to modesty? The

1. See Chapter VI, Article VI.

[606] same question may be raised with respect to another strict rule of decorum which forbids a man to look his mother-in-law in the face. (2)

2. For details concerning this custom, see Chapter VI, Article V, 1.

It can readily be answered in the affirmative. (3)

3. Nevertheless, see Chapter X, Article II, 3.

784 516 The rule of decorum which forbids a man to sit down on a seat where a woman is seated who is not his wife seems to me also to be dictated by sexual modesty. On the other hand, stepping over the seat under such circumstances has nothing whatever to do with this feeling. The purpose of this practice is to enable the person seated (regardless of sex) to avoid the evil repercussions of a charm or magic spell in his or her possession. (4)

4. Contrary to the explanation given by Jadot in Blancs et Noirs au Congo Belge (Whites and Blacks in the Belgian Congo], p. 90.

291 834 Is the native ashamed to show his nakedness? Let us beware of answering this question in general terms. In order to have an idea of the situation which is sufficiently clear and precise, various cases and circumstances must be taken into account.

1) First of all it can be stated that in the normal course of daily living the Nkundó, men as well as women, do all they can to hide their genital organs. That is to say that basically they are

291 834 embarrassed by the glances of others. This feeling extends even to other parts of the body which, irrespective of the degree of culture they have reached, most peoples try to cover. [55]

834 514 2) Between persons of the same sex and age a certain freedom is permitted. This may be observed especially among young boys when they have to urinate. In our countries of Europe the situation is no different. I must say, however, that I have only noticed this freedom in the schools and never in the villages of the interior. Is there a gap in my observations, or should this laxity in the schools be attributed to the influence of the law of least effort (the suitable places in the schools are at some distance) and to the lack of leisure available to the pupils given the shortness of recreation periods on the one hand and their love of play on the other? It is also possible that among these boys modesty has barely made its appearance, since this feeling is strongly linked to the sexual instinct and awakens only with the latter. It would also seem that living in a group tends to reduce the power of modesty.

834 832 3) It is obvious that sexual excitement runs counter to modesty and that sometimes -- especially among young people -- immodest acts may be used to arouse another person, especially in situations, such as bathing, which lend themselves easily to such actions.

515 834 4) Bathers, whether washing or swimming, are very careless, especially when they are in a group of their own sex and age. In former times no doubt they did not indulge in the luxury of even a rudimentary bathing costume. But at the present time it is not at all difficult for them to obtain the small piece of cloth needed for that purpose. Nevertheless, nude bathing in rivers and streams is a common practice. It is far more frequent among women than among men. The natives with whom I have discussed the subject attribute this fact to levity and a lack of concern; but they see nothing very wrong in it. Whether or not [56] the bathers are in a group also seems to make a difference. If you surprise one or two people under such circumstances, they will hide in haste. If, on the other hand, you find a dozen, they will not move; on the contrary, they will interrupt their toilette to watch you pass. Perhaps they are simply unconcerned about their nakedness. But it is also possible that they

515 are reassured by the fact that they are in a group, so that no one feels ● 834 singled out by the gaze of the passer-by. Washing away from major streams is always surrounded by more propriety. For this purpose a [343] small enclosure (ikomba) is built behind the hut or among the banana trees, or a small thicket is allowed to grow there. By this means the native is sheltered from indiscreet glances if he wants to take a [157] bath or give himself an enema. As a matter of fact these things are done preferably after dark.

834 5) Violent anger or sorrow drown out modesty, just as they 152 momentarily destroy the use of reason and suppress all feelings which are contradictory or simply different. In this situation, too, the man shows himself superior to the woman. He is less impulsive, calmer, less prone to lose control of his actions, to be carried away by his anger. Thus he almost never strips himself bare. The woman, on the other hand, readily strips off all her clothing. This behavior is extremely common; a woman undresses completely whenever she experiences great sorrow or intense anger. Luckily for propriety's sake some friend or relative always hastens to cover at least the essential parts. For a woman who throws off her clothing exposes herself to the mockery and jeers of spectators. (1)

[593]x
[578] 1. An angry woman may also undress to shame her husband; it is a way of insulting and mocking him.

833 6) The Nkundó practice sexual intercourse only at night. I believe that this custom is due to their sense of propriety, [57] supplemented by a superstitious explanation which will be described in detail in Article V.

593x 7) The sense of modesty has its fullest expression in relation 834 to parents, brothers, sisters, etc. Thus it is unheard of that a son should see his mother naked: bǒna átěnáká ěsunví nvangó. If an adult daughter is ill and requires personal care (such as an enema, for example), the father has to take care of her himself if no other female relative is near by. But their sense of modesty is such that they both shed tears over the event. As a matter of fact this situation

●834 arises but rarely. Furthermore, if a daughter is required to perform similar duties for her father, she will undertake this obligation only [539] with the lament: njôy'ɔ́ẹna ɛ̌kɛ́'m wímɔ́kɔ́, "I have come to see where I had my origin." Any woman who has been in that position will later know no oath more sacred than this one: la botakɔ́ wɔ̌ fafɔ́ bɔ̌kɛ́ 'm wɛ̌nɔ́kɔ́ la mpaka, "by my father's nakedness which I saw when he was old."

834
291 Thus we can draw the conclusion that the Nkundó are offended by nakedness and as a rule do not tolerate it. The exceptions do not invalidate this generalization; on the contrary, they tend to support it.

2. Speech. Obscenities and propriety.

831 In general the Nkundó see nothing wrong with using obscene expressions. They only describe them as "bad" if they become indecent.

195 If a conversation touches on matters of sex, they may wonder whether a particular topic is necessary, interesting, or entertaining; they will not ask themselves whether it is moral. For it will be apparent throughout this study they have no concept of morality strictly speaking.

The Nkundó possesses a varied and extensive list of obscene words -- nor is he alone in this respect. [58] We are not compiling a dictionary, and therefore we will not list them. What interests us are the circumstances that make these words indecent and under which a proper use of them impossible. The circumstances provide us with a criterion of the degree of obscenity of a word or expression. Let us say at once that we include in this category not only terms applied to organs and phenomena which are of a sexual nature strictly speaking, but also words pertaining to certain anatomical parts or physiological functions such as, for example, excretion, hair and tattooing found on private parts, and the female garment called efufa. We [184] should also point out that some tribes will consider expressions obscene which do not shock others at all.

514
576 even answer her husband, but he may indicate his presence by coughing lightly.

Any infraction of these rules is considered a grave insult. A 514 person offended in this manner may seek revenge by violent means,
576 either personally or through the medium of his son, brother, etc.
578 According to native justice he will always be in the right, even if 831 the quarrel becomes bloody. The simple act of uttering obscenities while passing in front of a house in which there is someone who is entitled to the speaker's respect may result in reprisals by the latter. (1)

---

1. See Jadot, Blancs et Noirs au Congo belge [Whites and Blacks in the Belgian Congo], p. 90.

578 Crude language is especially reprehensible and wounding if it
834 contains allusions to incest or other reflections on a relative whom the speaker wants to insult. And it must be admitted that such expressions may go beyond the limits (for example: coi cum patre, matre, fratre, sorore, etc.). In connection with this topic it should be noted that reference is always made to a relative of the opposite sex to that of the person who is directly or indirectly being addressed. Furthermore, licentious talk and the use of indecorous language are more severely condemned when they take place in the presence of [554] women and old people [60] or are said by a slave in front of his master, by a Botswa in front of a Bootó (1).

1. See Introduction, footnote 2, p. 4.

578 If a man catches anyone uttering obscenities in front of his 604 wife, especially if they are addressed to her personally, he can start 834 action in adultery proceedings. If the woman refuses to listen to the seducer, she will not answer him, or sometimes, annoyed at the insult, she may retort by insulting his mother. She can complain, but generally she does not do so. Is she ashamed, or is she afraid that the tempter might make public some excess in her conduct which he has discovered? In any case a woman is more sensitive than a man to the 578 shame of obscenities. They say: ɔ̌lekɛ́ nsɔ́nvi ɛ́â bitɔ́li ń'kɔ̌moto.

684 Bɔ̌moto ndɛ́ ndota (itúfâ) "A woman is a ndota snake. Just as that ●834 reptile twists through the grass and rolls up as soon as it sees a man approaching, so a woman finds it difficult to endure any obscenity."

The ideal way to be sure whether an expression is actually considered indecent is to check whether it may be used in the presence of a close relative, for a Nkundɔ́ never utters an obscenity in front of such a person.

834 Among the Nkundɔ́, as in Europe, certain indelicate exclamations are so deeply rooted that they seem to have lost their original meaning, that is, most of the population no longer thinks of it at all. That a few more serious and modest individuals are still aware of it is apparent from the way they change the pronounciation of the terms in question.

Licentious expressions are never considered indecent and shock no one when they are uttered in a group or during group activities.
[571] Such activities include communal fishing and hunting expeditions, [61] drinking parties, dances, funerals, and -- at the present time -- communal work on a road, a resthouse, etc.

Thus we see that in these matters there is a remarkable discretion side by side with a certain degree of tolerance, which may be carried quite far. Licentious remarks are not condemned in themselves, but only because of fortuitous circumstances, so we see that the Nkundɔ́ do not consider them from a moral point of view, as we do, but from a social one. But the fact that those are precisely the words which can become indecent and socially bad shows that the native sees in their content something shocking, shameful, some quality likely to give offense. The freedom exercised in certain cases does not alter this general conclusion but simply gives evidence of he inclinations of a passionate nature.

3. Dances

Nkundɔ́ dances change periodically, as is the fashion in Europe. Old dances are given up after a time and are replaced by others which are newly invented or recently introduced. The dances fashionable at the present time came from the Besongɔ́, who are by 535 177 831 may be ribald, but this occurs rather rarely. However, at the present time, they are often actually obscene -- especially since "European-style" dancing has been introduced, and more particularly in the centers, small and large, and among those who have come under [63] its influence. This kind of dancing for amusement is chiefly practiced by young people.

To the credit of morality it should be noted that mixed dancing is unknown to strictly native ways. It occurs in the centers (in the form of the mixed bofenya or the balinga, grotesque imitations of European dances) but is spreading -- and rapidly -- to the villages of the interior. The second variety especially raises havoc, for it has a deleterious influence on morality. It has been the cause of a number of cases of adultery, divorce, palavers, and quarrels, and has been forbidden by certain chiefs and headmen, who would like to be able to severely punish anyone who dances it.

Conclusion

● 834 The data presented in the foregoing section forces us to conclude that sexual modesty does exist among the Nkundó. The wearing of clothing, the various prohibitions, the attitude of the older and wiser members of the community show that they experience this feeling. It is the same here as elsewhere. In certain areas it is even carried to an extreme. The exceptions should be attributed to individual deviations; and because of the reactions they provoke, they even provide conclusive evidence. The general laxity which may be observed on some special occasions does not provide material for a serious objection against the existence of modesty. Yet it is difficult to determine the reason for such an attitude which seems to contradict the rest of our data. Should it be interpreted as a yielding to human weakness, or seen as a weakening of public morality? Or is it not rather because these special circumstances make an unfavorable interpretation of such actions impossible? An allusion made in public, in a group, [64] does not have the same significance as that same allusion may have between two people, where it implies a suspicious intimacy.

834 178 It goes without saying that the feeling of sexual modesty and its various manifestations among these people are being transformed by two different currents. On the one hand, their moral laxity is increased by their contact with all sorts of other peoples, by a greater freedom, by the partial emancipation of women, and by the attraction of the large centers and their luxury. On the other hand, there is the preaching of Christian morality, although its effects are still very slight and certainly do not counterbalance the influences mentioned above.

Article II. Preparation for Sexual Life

1. The Woman's preparation

833

When a girl wishes to indulge in pleasures of the flesh, she prepares her sexual organs in advance. The preparation itself consists of "opening the way" (lifola mbóka). This operation, which is repeated several times, is performed in hiding, preferably in the forest. The girl may or may not have companions with her who share her intentions. Each girl operates on herself. In order to gradually [824] enlarge the organ, a girl uses progressively thicker shoots of the bosáánga or bokaakó plant (Costus afer), making sure first to remove the tip. Later these shoots are replaced by the lombólé fruit of the bosǒombó plant (Aframomum) or, more infrequently, by a young manioc tuber.

This is the general practice; exceptions are few or nonexistent. It is followed because the girls want the event to which they aspire to occur without difficulty (bálota báfóv'ǒkeela).

833 515 In addition to this basic preparation, girls [65] also wash the private parts of their bodies. This is a cleanliness measure which they continue to practice save in exceptional cases for the rest of their lives. According to my informants, the native woman -- as a very general rule -- stresses this cleanliness as much for herself as for the sake of not repelling her husband or lover. When a girl begins to practice this personal hygiene, it is a sign that she wants to begin her sexual life.

Article III. Relations between Spouses; Their Various Rights and Duties

593x
833 Spouses are obliged to fulfill the duties and perform the tasks incumbent upon them .

It is difficult to say just how far the sense of duty to fulfill the debitum conjugale extends among the Nkundó. Normally, they very frequently fulfill this obligation toward each other. But after a good quarrel they abstain, either through mutual consent or because [586] one of them refuses. If one of the parties fails seriously and repeatedly in this respect, the question is resolved by a divorce. The response to temporary lapses is limited to reprimands, disputes, blows, and other [834] common reactions. It should be added that continence is required during the ekelé period after the birth of a child and after setting up a new hunting enclosure (lokombo) or a new fishing weir (bosaka), before the third piece of a game or fish is caught.

1. Meals

593x
264 A couple never take their meals together. The husband eats the food prepared for him and served to him by his wife alone, with his grown sons, or with friends or relatives. The wife herself eats with her small children, her daughters, or her female relatives. The two sexes never mingle at meals.

593x
521 The same rule applies to talks, but it is much less strictly maintained; it is not rare to find that, for one reason or another, women participate in the conversation of men.

It will not be long before, through the influence of Christianity, [266] women will generally be admitted in the conversations of the opposite sex. Developments with respect to mixed meals will come with much more difficulty; in practice the question has not even been broached.

343
[354] Thus one finds a kitchen next to the bedroom or separated from the hut; in addition to being the place where food is prepared, it is where the woman spends her day. The kitchen is sometimes a structure separated from the dwelling itself, sometimes a part of the house separated from the bedroom by a partition containing a door.

593x themselves of the usual and ordinary obligations incumbent upon 577 them on the death of a son-in-law. Should this be taken as a kind
762 of implied condemnation of suicide? [278]

593x The wisdom of the elders recommends to youth that they not let anger lead them to brutal acts even where, legally, it is 578 permissible to use force. They do not act in such a way through a 967 policy of adaptation to the present regime. Even before the arrival 626 of the white men, they gave lessons in calm and self-mastery. For serious blows, wounds, and especially homicide could have deplorable consequences legally and even politically (war). They preferred recourse to punishments, such as abstention from food and the refusal of debitum conjugale, which although less violent, are not without efficacity. In that way they were also spared the vexation of in-laws, whose pity would be aroused by the wounds and bodily suffering of their child or sister.

578 One thing that deserves blows or a good whipping because it
593x is considered a serious failure in the fulfillment of the duties of married life is indifference and negligence in housework. A husband may safely deal forcefully with the situation, although he must first inform the qualified authorities. The following are some examples of such faults: the wife does not give the necessary attention to the kitchen, her children, the cleaning of the hut and court; she neglects her crops, does not go fishing, makes no attempt to obtain salt, etc.; in short, she does not give the required time and care to the tasks incumbent upon her. She herself, her children, and her house remain disgustingly filthy, her fields and banana groves are invaded by weeds and her pantry is devoid of utensils and food, while she wastes her time doing nothing or rather spends it running about the village, going to one woman's house, chatting with another, spending the better part of her day gossiping. The Nkundó does not put up with this sort of behavior, and no one can reproach him. Even other men and the woman's companions condemn [279] such conduct. Often the woman is ridiculed, and on occasion she may
● [834] hear unflattering comments such as bǒmot'ǒw'asoló, efufa eténgamaka, "a gossip, her cloth is to the side," that is, the interminable chatting

593ˣ to which she devotes her time, sitting on a couch or a log, so oc-
578 cupies her attention that she is no longer aware that her narrow
● 834 garment is no longer in its proper modest position, and the gossip is therefore exposed to shame and ridicule.

593ˣ In addition to giving his wife a good whipping, the husband
578 also brings out his vocabulary of invective and sarcasm. The woman does not run the risk of complaining, for she knows in advance that she will be placed in the wrong. Nevertheless, the discreet husband will not go too far. The elders suggest that the young people moderate the violence of their expressions. For, they say, "a woman is more sensitive to it than a man; she might go and hang herself [825] in the forest," lǐkinya áyakóma lóí la nsónyi, "lǐkinya (the ant) will hang herself one day out of an excess of shame" (this is a reference to the way this insect bites into a blade of grass or some other object and dies rather than let go). "And above all," they say, "do not extend your insults to your wives' parents, for they could urge their daughters to leave you."

With respect to adultery, the punishments prescribed in Nkundó law will be examined below in Article VIII.

It is apparent from the preceding description that the Nkundó attach relatively little importance to the outpourings of loquacious eloquence characteristic of the weaker sex as long as they do not go beyond limits or degenerate into outrageous and ignominious insults. The elders teach youth to be calm in the face of these demonstrations of the declamatory art at which most Negresses are as adept as our fishwives at home.

[562] They say that a woman is like an elephant: bǒmoto ale é njoku. There is nothing to be done about her. It is futile [280] to try and speak gently to her; she does not even listen. To impose silence on her is impossible. To try and calm her, make her listen to reason, is a waste of effort. It is the same with an elephant: He [825] can perhaps be chased away with cries and noise, but he will destroy the crops nonetheless.

The fact that a woman readily opens her mouth is not considered a sign that she does not love her husband. The Nkundó even 684 movement and therefore serves as the Nkundó prison. But in addition, if it is applied for a long time, it becomes a real torture; the skin becomes painful and comes off, inflammations readily appear, and bugs sometimes lodge there.

As soon as the woman's family hears (through the ndonga) that she is being so tortured, they often come and beg her husband to [576] free her. To pacify and propitiate him, they offer him an ad hoc payment, that is, a boóndo of a few copper rings. Generally, he yields to their entreaties. A good relationship and his respect toward them require that he not remain indifferent to their supplications, especially as he needs them for the stability of the marriage and the good functioning of the household.

2) Byéngẹtanyi, or handcuffs, which consist of sticks attached either to the wrists or to the ankles (to prevent walking), or to both arms and feet. Two sticks were used, one above and one below, with the limb placed in between, and they were tied with ropes that were attached and fastened in notches made at [317] each end of the sticks. In rare instances the wrists were bound. To increase the pain and immobility, the ropes were shrunk and hardened by pouring water on them. These handcuffs were generally added to the etóka and were never applied alone.

3) Exposure to the bites of nkongôtó ants. In the region under [184] discussion, I have never heard the people speak of exposure to bafumba (Dorylus), or even to the venomous benkǒnkóme. This fact contrasts with the practice of other Móngo tribes and with the content of certain legends (evolution?).

4) The pouring of water containing pepper into the vagina. Sometimes the genital organs were rubbed with crushed pepper.

5) Exposure of the sex organs to fire. A burning log was held near them.

The last two types of torture were the most dreadful.

We can add one last form of punishment which is derived from the same legal rules, although it is not a torture:

[634] 6) Nudity. The husband tears off the guilty woman's garments and thus exposes her to public shame. Even if she resorts to using leaves, no one mistakes the situation, and her shame is only partly reduced.

C. Against a husband and his accomplice. There is no specific sanction in Nkundɔ́ law against a husband's adultery, [323] but an outraged wife may take revenge on him, as on her rival. Her weapons against her husband include invective, the refusal of food, drink, baths, and finally of debitum conjugale. These are appreciable punishments about which the husband can in no way complain, for he would be found entirely in the wrong. The woman's actions stem from a legitimate jealousy. Sometimes her feeling becomes so intense that she tears off her clothing and stands before her husband completely naked; this shames him greatly and constitutes a stinging reproach. Invectives flow out of the wife's mouth in torrents: ilolɛ́ inɛ̌, itutula inɛ̌, inyanyama inɛ́, owá lɔ́í ô ndá nyongo, ndá ntɛ́mbɔ̌, "that imbecile, that good for nothing, that beast, one day you'll die of penalties, of being caught in flagrante delicto . . . ." Then there is a whole string of the usual insults. Our Nkundɔ́ say that the more abundant the insults, the greater is the woman's love. She may carry on like this for days, even for weeks. Her responses to her husband's adultery are thus of the same sort as those she makes use of under other circumstances.

●[834]

[578]

[152]

If a jealous wife sets fire to the hut in which her husband yielded to his passion, no one can reproach her. The damage was caused on her husband's account.

Against the woman accomplice, the wife may use more violent means. She may fight her, strike her, even injure her. The rival's husband will demand a liombo, or payment "for blows and wounds," which has to be paid not by the wife's family, but by the guilty husband. Thus in the final analysis it is again he who is punished. If the offending woman is killed, it is again the unfaithful husband who is obliged to pay an indemnity to the widower. (See Article II.)

One form of punishment to which a wife likes to have recourse to take revenge on her adulterous husband and his accomplice if she catches them in the act is to pour a pot of hot or boiling water on their bodies. [324]

3. The period of prohibitions

843 When a pregnancy is far advanced -- about two or three months before delivery (a period which has now been reduced to one or two weeks) -- the Nkundó proceed with the "preservation of the fetus" (báomba jě́mi, "they preserve the fetus," or báaka jěmi, "they fasten the fetus"). The period called bokeka or bokeko begins at that moment and does not end until after childbirth. The oral expression is lémba bokeka, "to bind the period of sexual prohibitions." (1) This term also extends to all special prohibitions (bikilá) resulting from this condition. [475]

For the first pregnancy the period begins with the following [386] ceremony: The woman's mother smears her daughter's head and [302] all of her body with a red paint called ngóla. This paint, usually used as make-up, is used here as a mark of affection and given to honor and congratulate the future mother on this happy occasion. When the ngóla is somewhat hardened, the mother smears her daughter's hair with it and rolls the hair into little balls, using an iron bosóngó, which is the instrument usually used for hairdressing. Then she gives her daughter a hen and some bananas to eat. From then on the pregnant woman may no longer eat hens, for the con- [825] sumption of this bird (which the Nkundó place in the same category as ducks) and its eggs would stop the normal development of the fetus. The ceremony is called îla bongata (eleku among the Bombwanja), "to smear with red paint in little balls."

The woman's father and the husband's kin feel strongly about being present at this ceremony, for it is considered very important. I know of an intense palaver which occurred because ● [834] 1. The expression lémba lǔmbá is also used. A similar period of sexual prohibitions called by the same name still exists for, among other things, circumcision, the construction of a hunting enclosure, and the setting of elephant traps.

For a young unmarried mother, the meal is prepared by a 846 [589] girl who has not reached puberty or a woman who is quite old, that is, by someone who does not engage in sexual intercourse.

2) Various regulations. From the time of the preparation of the first meal until the end of the bokeka, that is, until the day the umbilical cord becomes detached, the hearth of the seclusion hut is sacred, so to speak. Apart from the couple and the assistants, no one may enjoy it or profit from it, either to light anything from it or eat anything that has been prepared there. However, some men have a means of lifting the prohibition pertaining to the fire. Upon the hearth and all the hearths of the village or a group of houses, depending on the situation, they let fall a few drops of a special concoction.

It is also forbidden to sweep or pick up the ashes from the fire. Everything must stay put until the umbilical cord of the newborn child becomes detached.

During the entire period of seclusion, the mother is assisted by a kinswoman (or one of her husband's kinswomen; among the Bombwanja there are always two), who is the wujisa, "the one who makes the seclusion" (from the verb uja). The seclusion should not be thought of as that of a hermit; the mother may go out as soon as her condition permits, and the helper goes about her occupations, but she does not do so more than necessary. Rather the hut is a house of prohibitions.

During this period the mother and her helper do not do farm
[834] work. In addition they must abstain from carnal relations and from all contacts with the opposite sex, in conformity with the customs explained in Article II, 3, above. The ekelɛ́ extends to the husband and to any other person who enters the hut. Any infraction results in the death of the mother or the child in the same manner as in the case of the bokeka (see loc. cit) . [488]

3) The end of the bokeka. When, at the end of four or five days, the umbilical cord becomes detached, the news is announced to the whole village, so that everyone may go back to their [833] work that has been suspended. The following night the father and mother perform the conjugal act to "destroy the bokeka and

846 taking the child would cause the child's death. The same precau-
789 tion is also in order if the husband goes on a trip before the child's birth and does not return till after the delivery

We have just seen that the harmful effects of the father's 846 misconduct on his child's life is effectuated through the father's 837 act of taking the child on his knees. Thus the Nkundó speak of baóngó b'âbé, "a father's bad knees," to indicate his reprehensible
[826] conduct, and they say that the bondandota potion is administered to the child so that it will not die because of the father's bad
knees. (1)

1. The expression baóngó b'âbé is also used when an undertaking which requires continence is unsuccessful. (See Article II, 3).

When a child has painful and persistent diarrhea, it is often 753 interpreted as the effect of the father's infidelity. As soon as they 854 become aware of it, the couple separate for some time, and the father no longer touches the child. [492]

Contrary to what one reads on this subject about other peo-
837 ples of the Congo, Nkundó couples do not have to remain continent
834 beyond the period of seclusion. The separation ceremony gives the 789 husband back the freedom of action he had before his wife's pregnancy. For the wife the bokeka remains strict with respect to illicit relations until the child is weaned However she, too, may regain
her freedom by having recourse to an antidote, the ingredients of which she purchases from a person who holds the secret. The ingredients are placed in a small antelope horn which is then stopped [824] up by means of bolaká (resin from the Symphonia gabonensis). The interested party wears it about her loins on a string or a bead belt or, preferably, on a special creeper. This amulet protects the child's life from the harmful influence of the mother's acts of adultery, but it does so only on condition that she does not separate herself from the child, as we will explain further on. This procedure

837 is not morally condoned, and a woman who resorts to it does not
● 834 escape criticism. She is compared to a goat, who does not have 789 a regular and steady husband: álómya bǒna lontaa, "she nurses her child as a goat does." (1)

1. The opposite of lómya lontaa, -- if it is used to show the contrast -- is lómya lontómbá.

When the separation ceremony is ended, the mother is 846 adorned with all her ornaments and goes out to walk in a procession through the village. The child is carried by an older sister, a niece, etc. He is taken around the village, bánangya bǒna l'olóló Small presents are offered him everywhere -- an arrow, a small knife, a hairpin, etc There is no feast, however; if that honor were accorded him he would die of it (for when someone dies, there is always a feast of farewell in his honor). [493]

Article IV. Nursing

853 During the first few days after birth an infant does not suck the milk of its mother, since it is "too hot." He is fed by a third person, preferably a relative.

On the third day the following occurs:

853 1) The mother's breasts are massaged (-kulola baéle). For 757 this purpose the Nkundó use leaves of the bǔte creeper and the lilongyá plant (Adenostemma viscosum Forst.), a green leaf from a banana tree called nselenge, several pieces of peeled sugar cane, the tips of the dried leaves of any banana tree, and sometimes other plants are added as well. All the ingredients are crushed, then boiled, and white sand and a bit of red paint are mixed in with them. The mixture is called ndengó. It is prepared by the women who are in charge of massaging the breasts. The bǔte leaves, however, must be picked by the father. He goes to the forest early in the morning and first shakes the creeper so that all leaves that are not firmly attached will fall off. Then he climbs it and picks the desired

4. Onanism [coitus interruptus]

893 Onanism also seems to be unknown. No doubt many women have learned this vice through their concubinage with Europeans, but they have not spread it. The same may be said of involuntary onanism. For the native does not look for sensual refinements; rather he follows his natural impulse. (1)

1. The practice described in Chapter X, Article III, 3, may be slightly tainted with onanism; it could certainly lead to such a practice, but it is not caused by perversion.

Article VII. Incest

614 We here must distinguish between 1) sexual relations between distantly related kin and 2) between close kin.

1. Among distant relatives

Incest among distant relatives (in the Nkundó sense of the word) has existed since time immemorial. It is called lonkâna (bombaká among the Bombwanja). Lonkâna is derived from nkâna, "brother, sister." The expression liála j'ölóló, "sexual union in the village," is also used. The term lonkâna is applied to relations between members of families which are only very distantly related (not at all related, according to our notions) but between whom marriage is not permitted. Thus one hears that such and such kin groups do not marry each other (báfóyakumbólé) but they commit lonkâna. Two kin groups of this sort may be considered closely related clans. The groups between whom lonkâna is practiced each has its own cemetery, while those between whom it is absolutely forbidden share a common cemetery. Thus, to cite an example, the "village" [98] of Elánga l'Imomo l'Ontole (Bongíli) is composed of three kin groups, as the name indicates. The Imomo settlement is partially located in the 835 allied district of the Bombomba). The same is true of the Bontole. 614 Elángá and Imomo, together with Eleke (Lokongo), comprise the posterity of the son of Ambá, who was the sister of Iloko, Eángá, and Bokungó, the latter being the ancestor of the Bontole. The three groups do not intermarry. Between the Elángá and the Imomo, lonkâna relations are also not permitted, but they are practiced with the Bontole. Note that the term lonkâna is never applied to relations between truly separate clans, that is, between exogamous entities.

To define the precise limits of this practice we would have to examine each kin group separately, and this would lead us too far afield.

It should also be noted that lonkâna may be limited to an isolated act, or it can become an intermittent concubinage. The name of the practice does not change when it involves a married woman who is visiting her family. Sanctions against adultery are applicable to such a case, however, as to all others. (1) Although the relatives of the woman are more lenient than if the adulterous relations had occurred with a different lover, the husband whose rights have been infringed on makes no such distinction.

835 614 174 The custom of lonkâna seems rather strange. After all, if sexual relations between these clans are not reprehensible, why is marriage between them forbidden? This is an apparent contradiction which merits attention. Should not this practice be viewed as a relaxation of the law of exogamy? In past times all sexual relations between members of the clans under discussion would have been forbidden, a very natural phenomenon when the families originated. [99] Later the young people would have succumbed to the temptation, and little by little infractions would even have multiplied. For as the clans became increasingly extended, the temptations became more and more numerous and the rule, now detached from its natural significance because very distant kinship was involved, came to seem more or less arbitrary to the interested parties. It was supported by no sanction or fear. (1) Thus the very number of violations would have gradually

1. Actually, no sanction is provided against marriages within an exogamous entity; everything lies in the opposition of parents and elders and in a habit which is almost innate.

made the practice customary. Powerless to stop it, the persons in authority, guardians of traditional morality, would have contented themselves with channeling the development and restricting it to a minimum by being lenient on the subject of extramarital relations in order to save the principle of exogamy. This explanatory hypothesis can find a little confirmation in the fact that at the very beginning of colonization when European influence was not felt as yet, there were isolated and very rare cases of marriage in opposition to the law of exogamy between members of groups which were only very distantly related but already practiced lonkâna. The exception then became the rule, and from then on the two groupings in question intermarried regularly and without hindrance, while other families remained under the ancient law. Thus there is the known case of Boyela village (Bakɛala), which includes the Bokambɛ, Bembakɔ, Besɔlɔ, and Bekɔlama (extinct), all descendants of Ngonde and one wife; his union with another spouse gave rise to the Lilekɛ and the Likongo, to whom Bongilɛ, a group related through marriage (likilo), is attached. These two groups of families could not intermarry, but they did engage in lonkâna. Around the time of the first arrival of the Whites, a member of the Bembakɔ [100] family a certain Bonjɔmbɔ was impelled by an excessive love to violate the law of exogamy by taking Bolondɔ of Lilekɛ for his wife. As his love did not cool and the marriage proved stable, it was recognized and accepted as legitimate. Since then the two groups in question have each become exogamous.

754
2. Between close relatives

Incest between close relatives has no special name of its own. As a matter of fact, it never occurs as an outgrowth [illegible]. We

835 encounter it only in connection with magical practices and sorcery
154 (botɛ, plural betɛ), for which it is the nsimbo, that is, the condition without which the betɛ would lack efficacy. If the nsimbo is not observed, the botɛ turns against its owner and, by a reversal of its effect (bosesengano), brings death to the latter. Therefore the interested parties submit to these degrading requirements despite their natural repugnance. Depending on the case, incest with the mother, the daughter, or the sister is required. The first of these eventualities is the most repugnant to our natives. Though it goes altogether against the grain to do so, the mother submits to this ignominy to save the life of her foolhardy and greedy son.

[184] The nsimbo of incest does not exist in all botɛ. It even seems to have been absent from the betɛ which are ancient and purely Nkundó. It is found primarily in the big modern betɛ, which have been imported from other peoples or invented on the spot since colonization. (1)

Article VIII. Love Philters

832 The Nkundó are familiar with two love philters, the efóndɛ and the bontɛlɛ. Other modern betɛ may produce the same effect in part or secondarily. Here [101] we will only deal with the first two, which are "pure" and ancient love philters.

The love philters (botɛ w'ɛ̌langyɛ) serve to gain the heart of a young girl as much as to entice a married woman away from her husband.

1. Efóndɛ

Efónde (1) is a common charm. Anyone can procure it from the maker in consideration of the appropriate payment, of course. Various kinds of efóndɛ exist, differing as to the ingredients used, the manner

1. Efónde is often used as a synonym of elangyɛ in its sexual meaning.

582
567 matters are more important than the father's ancestry. (1)

[554] 1. Among the Nkundɔ́ no shame is attached to not knowing the family of one's father. But not to be able to name the mother's clan is a great dishonor for it proves that she was a slave.

There is less opposition to the first generation born of a couple who were both slaves than for their parents, and it progressively decreases with each succeeding generation. There is practically no opposition now to the grandsons. The reason seems to be [597] that although receiving a wife from one's master in a regular marriage does not constitute emancipation (nsikɔ́, nsikola) for the slave, it is a kind of adoption (wɛ̌mya, -ɛ́mya). [246]

Article III. Kinship

835 Marriage between members of the same kin group (isangano, bosangema, from the verb -sangema, "to be related") is forbidden. But how far does such a kin group extend? It is impossible to give a general rule. On the one hand, it is certain that if two groups are not descended from a common ancestor there is no bond of kinship between them, even if they live side by side. But on the other hand, it is not possible to say that all those who are descended from the same ancestor are relatives and that marriage is forbidden between the various branches of the grouping they comprise. The question therefore amounts to knowing by which ancestor the exogamous grouping is defined. A decision on this point may only be made through the examination of each case individually.

614 It is impossible to deduce anything from the meaning of the term clan, for it is usually defined as "a grouping of families united to one another by kinship." This leaves us back where we started. The characteristics usually given for a clan are: generic name,

M
614 untangle all the threads. Thus it happens that young people form 582 relationships with the intention of marrying without knowing that they are related; they are warned only by the opposition and ensuing explanations of the elders.

We may conclude that marriage among descendants of a common ancestor is generally prohibited if they live in the same village. It is frequently permitted on the other hand, if they belong to different villages, provided that they are not, at the same time, related to one of the ancestresses.

M
Clearly, it is difficult to say what precise degree of kinship
582 formed the basis for the prohibition of or permission for a marriage
835 between descendants of a common ancestor, or what are the boundaries of an exogamous grouping.

It is also apparent from the preceding observations -- as
M
from the examination of affinity as an obstacle to marriage -- that [611] the descent from a common mother is a more important factor than descent from the father. This does not give proof of a form of matriarchy, though it could be the remains or the beginning of one,
M
or could provide a partial explanation for one. It stems quite simply [842] from the Nkundó notions concerning procreation, in which they
M
attribute the major role to the mother. There is also the fact that [602] greater shame is attached to being united with a person descended
M
from the same woman, and finally the fact that they feel a stronger [593] affection for the mother than for the father (a sentiment [250] which is accentuated by polygamy). The three causes are closely related.

M
Finally, it should be noted that there is a group among the 184 Nkundó we are discussing which is less strict than the others in this 582 matter. The relatives among whom marriage is prohibited is definitely more limited; that is, their exogamous groupings are more limited. The people in question are the Bongale (see Introduction), and the same phenomenon may be observed among the Elingá. (1)

[582]

1. The Batswá are still more liberal, and in this respect their practices differ very little from ancient European laws and customs.

602 brings forth reprimands on the part of the husband and his parents which obviously can easily degenerate into quarrels. If the omissions are so frequent and of such a nature that they can no longer be explained as simply forgetting, a whim, or a fit of peevishness, but [299] are taken to indicate spitefulness or vulgarity, the matter is [621] brought before the ndonga (who is often assisted by the family tribunal) or brought before the authority constituted by the woman's kin. If in spite of everything the expected improvement does not take place, the break-up is inevitable.

606 The husband's father and mother extend the same affection to their son's wife as they feel toward him. They consider her their own child, and it is not unusual to find that their love for the wife equals their feeling for their own son. She is only a relative by marriage, but out of affection for her they call her their child. She, for [601] her part, does not use toward them the term bakanga (or bakiló) but out of filial respect calls them "father" and "mother." Exceptions to this practice may be found, however.

606 224 If the father (and those who fall in the same category such as uncles, elder brothers, etc.) kills a large game animal, he is expected to give his son's (or brother's, etc.) wife a piece of meat, whose size depends on the number of daughters-in-law he has and which consists of one or several chops (bokálako) (1) and the piece at the nape of the neck (botómbyá).

606 ●835 Illicit relations between the husband's father and his daughter-in-law would be an unheard of crime. The same would be true with respect to any of the "superior" relatives. (2) The laws regulating

1. Called liéto among the Bolengé and the tribes of the Losanganya.

[178] [184] 2. Only the Boangi -- like the Elángá of the Losanganya - allow relations between a brother and the wife of his junior; and they are already beginning to find imitators among their neighbors to the southeast, the Injóló.

606 135 the relations between a wife and her husband's parents are closely connected with the rules pertaining to the prohibition related to affinity and seems to spring from the same source. Therefore it will be useful to have in mind what we have said in the preceding chapter, Article IV.

607 The husband's elder brothers treat his wife as their sister. The wife calls her husband's sisters [300] bakiló, but out of respect she often gives them the title of "mother." (1)

[601] 1. Among the Elángá the wife also calls her husband's sisters bongíli (pl. bangíli); they call her bǒnongíli (pl. bǎnangíli). A wife often calls her husband's mother nyangôngíli. Bǎnangíli l'ǎnangíli means "the brother's wives and their sisters-in-law."

587 After the husband's death, as has been said suo loco, his father or his brother may marry his widow. But this practice is not well regarded and is permitted only rarely, chiefly when the scattering of the family patrimony is feared or if the two interested parties have an unusual love for each other.

837 602 With respect to children or younger brothers and all those who fall into that category, the situation is altogether different. Illicit relations with wives of their father, grandfather, uncle, elder brother, or elder cousin, are judged much less severely. Generally, misconduct does not give rise to claims for payment, or the payment is demanded "for form's sake" and consists of a hen and a bunch of bananas. By means of this payment the guilty one recognizes his error and renders homage to the right of his elder.

[626] In general public opinion condemns these relations and often with great severity. The question of degree of kinship as well as other considerations result in a great diversity among the cases, so we will examine each situation separately and distinguish each time between the husband's reaction and that of public opinion.

000 the same rights as the other children of the polygynist.

595 The polygynist always sought to increase the number of his
556 wives, for his prestige rose and his fortune increased in that manner.
593 If anyone in civilized lands seeks to enlarge his fortune, this is done, people say, in order to insure the future of his children. The native thinks little about that; his primary idea is to enjoy himself and to surpass others in prestige and esteem. As far as the future of his children is concerned, there are polygynists who possess twenty or thirty wives or even more, and sometimes they have only one or two children. Also it is little in keeping with their notions to care for the future; he who is still alive tomorrow must take care of 595 tomorrow then, so they reason. On the contrary, instead of caring for his children, the polygynist often took great trouble to obtain a 593 wife for his son. The son, however, was not yet the owner of his 584 wife; it was, so to speak, only a loan. Not until after the death of 606 his father did he become owner. In some districts, when the father had obtained a wife for his son, he first kept this wife for some time for himself. Only after a few months did he give her to his son. In 595 other districts, when the wife was pregnant by the son, he was obliged
593 to send her for a few days to his father. He was not allowed to bear
606 the honor of fatherhood alone; his father must share that with him.
842 The father reserved for himself the honor of naming all of the children of his children. In some areas of the Congo, morals were so 551
835 low and common that the father even kept his own daughters in his harem. This did not occur in Equatorial Africa, but there was a custom that was not much better. The magician was sometimes 583 consulted about the bride price which the father tried to get for his
791 daughter, or the brother for his sister.

The magician then gave them the advice that they themselves should first have relations with their own daughter or sister. This custom existed almost everywhere in Equatorial Africa.

583 [535] Bride Price. In general, the daughter was given in marriage upon payment of a bride price. The father had little choice of the future husband of his daughter. The one who guaranteed the most goods in payment was certain to get her. Since, in most cases, the little daughter had not yet arrived at the years of maturity, there was naturally no question of her consent. The bride price was not paid all at once, but gradually during the years while the daughter grew up. Since the daughter was given without her consent

614 554 only of lesser importance (see below, under local groups). The headman of the B-group is the oldest of the seniors of the related A-groups, that is, the senior of the B-group. He is not, however, fully in charge of affairs like the elder of the A-group; he should rather be seen as princeps inter pares. This, of course, does not affect his position as senior of his own A-group.

614 423 Within a B-group landed property is often still regarded as belonging together, even though fixed boundaries between the territories of the constituent groups may already exist. In general, however, it may be assumed that the other elders will not object if a hunting expedition is extended to their territory, if, under certain circumstances, the soil of their district is used for planting, or if certain wild plants are taken from there for building a house or as raw material for a craftsman. Membership in a B-group is determined by membership in an A-group.

614 835 At this point we shall not enter into a discussion of the genealogical peculiarities which result from the significance of the bride price. We learned of one case of incest which occurred between members of two A-groups which formed a B-group, but we have not heard of anything like that occurring within an A-group. In this connection, however, we do not refer to those acts of incest which are required to make a particularly powerful charm become effective.

Summing up all that is characteristic of B-groups:

614 There is only one priest of the kinship group; cohesion within a B-group is very close, people cooperate extensively, all important matters are decided by the group, even those which, strictly speaking, concern only the constituent A-groups; in this connection, the oldest of the seniors has a somewhat privileged position.

Groups of Rank C

The cohesion within a group of this category is considerably looser, although on this level particularly one can find great differences among the individual groups. For example, the groups Lovendo and Besilo consider themselves much closer

614 to each other than either of these groups with Nsambásálá (see Diagram 2). It was for this reason that in my dissertation I divided this rank into two different ranks (kinship subgroups I° and II°). (15) Since there are no obvious criteria for the two ranks and since such a division is not possible in the other villages, I no longer make such distinctions.

15. Müller, Fürstentum, p. 125.

[582] [835] The groups of rank C are the exogamous units of the future. Although marriage is not permitted between the members of different C-groups, sexual relations between them are permitted. This permission corresponds to the lonkana of the Bokóté (16).

16. Hulstaert, "Mariage," p. 97. f.

Groups of Rank D

614 582 The groups of this category constitute the truly exogamous units. It is true that marriages between "advanced persons" ["evolués"] take place even within rank D, but this practice is still frowned upon by the old people. In Isangi we also find the special stipulation that members of two D-groups, Ngelé and Nkoto, may intermarry, [195] but they may not enter into marriage with members of the D-group, Bolíma. Since in present-day Isangi, Bolíma is extinct, this stipulation only works to the disadvantage of the emigrants in Bolíma w'ási and of the children of sisters in other villages. The Bolíma group is regarded as the father group of Isangi (see Diagram 1); Ngelé is the group of the older brother, Nkoto that of the younger brother. This serves as an explanation for the special position of Bolíma in the exogamous system. It is said that it would not be right for a "father" to marry one of his "children" even if these children are the offspring of such distant generations that they intermarry.

595 837 not appreciate marital fidelity the same way we do. A wife's unfaithfulness is severely punished by the laws. But adultery may be discovered and known to all without causing shame or remorse. This is a marked difference between our way of thinking and that of the Nkundő. They maintain that a passing infidelity which is not followed through does not denote an absence of love for one's spouse, even if it is repeated. In spite of the implausibility of this statement, I had to accept it, for those who argued with me were so many, their positions so various, and they were really serious. Among them were a number of Christians with whom we are very satisfied and who conduct themselves admirably, as do their wives. They consider these errors to be momentary failings [48] due to passion, which permit love to remain. Indeed, often these men and women are models in the performance of their other duties. This misbehaviour is without doubt considered very serious -- their anger shows clearly that they do not consider it trivial -- but it does not exclude love and thus, as far as everything else is concerned, the spouses continue giving proof of it to each other.

Let us not forget that many elements may lead to a fall and that consciences may go far astray. On the other hand, the fact that a husband is tolerant, even to the point of exploiting his wife, does not exclude a certain love for her; a husband may be extremely indulgent and at the same time jealous to the point of crime. All that may be found among the Whites, after all. Love without the feeling of duty will not suffice to sustain a union.

Moreover, there is no dogma, no moral teaching based on religion, to restrain the instincts. And we should add that among these [562] primitive people, the woman's natural tendency to please, to submit to a man's desires, is highly developed. In Europe these feelings are channeled by the Christian religion and its influence on society. Here they encounter no direct obstacle except for sanctions. Before marriage [836] sexual passion and all sensations connected with it and adjunct to it can be pursued without physical, moral, or social obstacles, at least at the present time. The surroundings in which a girl grows up and the example and conversations of her companions will tend even to push her in that direction.

864 During a girl's early childhood beginning when she is still nursing, a mother with foresight will work to make her organs as perfect as possible. By applying pressure repeatedly and for long periods, she molds, so to speak, the outside in order to make it narrow, as this quality is greatly valued by our people.

It is the mother, too, who trains the girl in her preparations for married life. She teaches her how to behave toward her future husband, and at the same time instructs her in the duties of a good housewife (see Chapter X, Article VIII).

864 Certain forms of behavior, although their relationship to our subject is only superficial and external, must nevertheless be mentioned. An adult man will often take in his arms a little girl who has not yet been weaned, or perhaps only slightly more developed. He considers this child to be his wife. He has paid no bride price for her. But since she is a sister, cousin, or other relative of one of his wives, she is a "wife" from his point of view; that is, not only will it be possible for him to marry her later on, but even without becoming her husband he will enjoy a certain liberty in relation to her. (1) Thus, when such a man takes his young "wife" in his arms,

1. See Chapter VI, Article V, 2.

he is enjoying an anticipation of the future and speaks to her [66] in that sense, often accompanying his words with intimate caresses.

The same practice, mutatis mutandis, may be observed on the part of a woman toward a small boy whom she can consider as her "husband."

2. Circumcision

Circumcision is generally practiced. It is usually performed at an early age. Without going into the details at this point (1) or

1. They will be found in Chapter X, Article VII.

549 available to me, the government recognizes the presence of 702 free women out of a population of 8,386 persons who are not permanent residents.

Article IV. Premarital Sexuality

836 Under this heading we will examine:

1. What the Nkundó think about virginity.
2. Relations between single people.
3. The Nkundó's attitude toward births outside of wedlock.

1. Virginity

The word "virginity" has a double meaning. It may signify the presence of the hymen, the wholeness of the body, or it may have the meaning given in the dictionary: "virgin, a girl who has never had intercourse with a man."

Because of the practice described in Article II, 1, Nkundó girls who remain physically virgin until adulthood are extremely rare. Even if a girl does not begin sexual life until after her body has reached maturity -- a situation which occurs rarely today but which was formerly common, (2) [78] she will not give herself up to carnal pleasures until after she has broken her hymen.

836 What is the Nkundó attitude toward virginity? This question must be divided into two parts:

1) Does the future husband attach any importance to the physical virginity of his fiancée? Evidently not from what we have seen.

2) Does he attach any importance to her moral virginity? That is, is it a matter of indifference to him whether or not he is the first to have intercourse with her?

2. See no. 2 of the present article.

585 836 To say that it makes absolutely no difference to him might be too extreme a statement. But it is certainly not very important to him, since the primary purpose of his marriage is to obtain progeny and to follow his natural instinct in an honest fashion. This does not mean that he likes to marry a woman of loose morals; quite the contrary.

171 585 836 What is the linguistic data on the subject of virginity? In an interesting paper entitled "The Principles of Bantu Marriage" (_Africa_ Vol. 2, No. 3 (1929), p. 255), E. Torday says, "Some of the most competent philologists assure us that in most Bantu languages there is no word for 'virgin'; .... The Wachagga, who may be an exception, use the word 'unimpaired,' and it is perhaps in the use of similar expressions, not exclusively applied to physical virginity, that we shall find the explanation of the absence of a specific term."

585 836 192 Thus the Lonkundó have a noun: _ekâtɛ́_. It is derived from the root _kât_ (the verb is _-kâtema_), which means "to be firmly attached, to be tenacious" (e.g., _lokâtɔ́_, "tenacity"). _Ekâtɛ́_ designates something which is difficult to open, to separate, to break up, especially fruit with a tough, hard, thick rind. It is applied to the _litófɛ́_, _lisɛ́njá_, and the _lindongó_ when it is impossible to break the shell which contains the edible portion even though the fruit is ripe. [79] This term is used in a figurative sense for a woman who resists seduction, who "does not allow herself to be opened." It is not at all specific and in no way the equivalent of our word "virginity," rather it seems to signify "chastity."

Other Nkundó tribes seem to have a specific word, _bokotó_. I learned this term from natives living between the Ikelemba and the Tshuapa, both east and west of the Julɛ́, as well as from some Basɛ́kâ Bongwalanga from the old Lulonga District. The missionaries of the Apostolic Prefecture of Basankusu use it in their publications to mean "virginity, virgin." I was not able to get an exact idea of its precise meaning, but as far as I was able to make out it is much closer to "virgin chastity" than _ekâtɛ́_. In any case it includes no reference to physical virginity. (1)

1. We should not be astonished that "primitive" tribes have no word in their language

000 > which specifically expresses our idea of virginity, nor deduce from its absence that the thing itself is unknown to them. The Greeks and Romans were well acquainted with it, yet they had no precise word for it. Parthenos and Virgo mean simply "unmarried girl." The Germanic words such as Maagd and Jungfrau, which now signify "virgin," originally had the same meaning as the Greek and Latin terms.

● 836
The foregoing does not imply that every Nkundő girl is free to have sexual relations and that public opinion approves of libertinism among single people. We will examine this question in the following paragraphs.

896
2. Sexual relations between single people

In dealing with this question we must distinguish between relations between adults and the contacts between nonadults. We will therefore examine the two situations separately so that at the end we can attempt to explain the changes in native attitudes in this realm that have occurred. [80]

A. Before physical maturity. We will first relate what the natives tell about customary practices in the past, and then describe the practices of the present day.

In the past, sexual contacts between young people not yet marriageable were severely punished by their parents. The children were taught that those who were guilty would be struck down by a very serious illness which was inevitably fatal. This illness was called by the generic term ndota (1), and the more specific one, esέmbέji.

> 1. Ndota is the name of the illness which is the punishment for an infraction of a sexual

864 prohibition under any circumstances. I have heard these same terms used also by the natives in the vicinity of Coquilhatville.

The body becomes flabby and without strength, and this weakness ends in a fatal paralysis (byongé nnyǎnyuka or nkatááná). In addition, the girls feared that their sexual organs, not yet fully formed, would be torn. They were also imbued with a very intense fear: bofolu w'aende, "the fear of males," bofolu w'ǎmato, "the fear of females." They also feared death -- bálotákí iwá. The parents added that sexual acts were free from danger only between persons of the requisite age.

836 This does not mean that children did not commit indecent acts.
864 The game of ioto, in which little girls try to cook (and which is al-838 ways one of their favorite games (2) as it probably is throughout the world), often gave rise to it. Small boys joined in the game in order to taste the meal. And quite naturally they began to play at "husband and wife," more or less. Often this game involved only innocent imitations, but other times touching and exhibitions occurred between children of the same sex or of opposite sexes. This game is far more dangerous nowadays, [81] because of a change in the attitude of young people toward sexual matters.

The game of yembankongo, in which boys, imitating monkeys, chase each other through the trees and creepers can -- and does - result in reprehensible scenes.

582 In former times most girls were married before puberty. But 178 their husbands did not touch them until they had completed their normal development.

582 Among some individuals the fear of sexual relations was so 838 deeply rooted that it persisted even beyond the age limit and was 864

2. Some boys imitate this game in order to acquire the habit of preparing their own meals. Later they benefit from it on more than one occasion.

582 conquered only by repeated assaults of passion. Thus it is generally 833 known among the natives that young women used to seek refuge in 864 their mother's house when the husband wanted to begin making use of his rights as a husband. The mother would try to persuade her daughter to submit to the law of life. But sometimes, if her child seemed too resistant, the mother made excuses for her and asked the husband to consider her daughter's youth. The man usually wanted to remain on good terms with his mother-in-law so he did not insist and resigned himself to waiting till nature influenced the spirit and heart of his wife.

Since young people were brought up in deep fear of dangerous relations, it should not surprise us that this feeling became a real habit and did not disappear spontaneously the moment a certain degree of liberty was permitted. As a matter of fact, could we not make similar observations in Europe?

This is the natural explanation for the praiseworthy degree of morality among adolescents in the past.

Nowadays all that has changed. The young people follow
178 where their passions lead them. Not the slightest check is placed on ● 836 their impulses. Parents pay only slight attention to the conduct of 864 their children. [82] It is better not to inquire into the morality of modern youth. Husbands no longer respect the bodies of their adolescent brides, who are themselves quite used to a sexual life and eagerly look forward to it; and no longer know the feeling of "the fear of men." Should we then be astonished at the frightening de-[164] crease in the birth rate (1) and the ever increasing spread of venereal diseases, which seem to have been unknown in the past?

The reasons for this change will be investigated further on, under the letter C.

836 B. Between adults. Here the Nkundó are very lenient. There is a difference, however, between the socio-legal and moral viewpoints, although as we shall see the latter is influenced by the former.

[562] A woman is entirely free, legally speaking, as long as the first payment on her bride price has not been made. No man has

1. The natives say that in the past young wives quickly became pregnant. And now ...

562 exclusive rights over her. Hence the proverb: Mbɛmbo ǐle nd'âns'ôimbo 836 ɛfa la nkɔ́lɔ́, "boimbo fruit found under the tree have no owner; they [539] belong to the first person who gathers them." Thus a girl for whom nothing has been paid belongs to no one. A woman free in this manner does not infringe on the rights of any man in her sexual relations. There are therefore no sanctions against her licentiousness.

836 864 Furthermore, the discovery of her activities gives rise to no shame. At most more serious parents will rebuke children who go too far -- the girls because they abuse the body and reduce their value for a prospective marriage (2), the boys because they [83] run the risk of financial difficulties (the dangers of adultery, indemnity for childbirth with death as a result, etc.).

[585] 2. Not that a smaller bride price would be given for them. But a serious man would rather not take a woman for wife who has "run around" a great deal and therefore is more likely to commit adultery, to be unfaithful, and less likely to become the mother of a numerous progeny.

626 836 Public opinion is even more lenient than the parents. This attitude is easy to understand: strangers need fear no unpleasant consequences. Errors of this sort are generally considered natural weaknesses, provided that they do not occur too frequently. For public opinion is hard on people who run from one to another; they are stigmatized with the name ebɛ́bɔ́ɛ́, "unfaithful, flighty, without intelligence or reasoning powers," or ebɔ́ngɛ́, a stronger term with the same meaning.

836 From all the foregoing should we deduce that every woman is free to indulge fully in fornication? On the basis of the above considerations we could frankly conclude the affirmative. The behavior that can be observed from day to day fully confirms this answer. Some people stray more or less accidentally, but for others the practice quickly becomes a habit. And it can be said of all of them that

● 836 they succumb to any favorable opportunity. The validity of this generalization is not affected by extremely rare exceptions which may be encountered and which are due either to a constitutional abnormality or to an extraordinarily firm Christian conviction. How should 836 178 these observations be reconciled with the statement so often heard from natives that the situation was entirely different before the coming of the white men? It was not unusual to see young women not only abstaining from sexual relations but having such a "fear of men" that they drove away seducers and defended their chastity by hitting them with a stick.

When the woman did not accept the young man's proposition, she considered it a grave insult. The initiator was entitled to no indemnity "for blows and wounds." The woman replied only in violent terms, in word or act. [84] Often she went and insulted the mother of the guilty party. When the latter was told the reason for this behavior, she could only turn on her misbehaving son and usually gave him a good talking to; if he was young enough she gave him a good beating. Thus the girl had every right to defend herself.

If the provocation gave rise to no complications in family or society, the parents paid a lot less attention. But they tried to teach [864] their children discretion in these dangerous matters, though their instruction primarily took the form of a lesson after an error was committed, or sometimes apropos of an incident that had befallen someone else. Some parents were very severe. These attitudes were based on a vague sense of morality which was not deduced from philosophical reasoning or religious or superstitious ideas but which was innate and instinctive so to speak. In addition, the fear of excesses and eventual social consequences no doubt also played a considerable [577] role. Excesses were feared above all, and an isolated occurrence was regarded more or less as a momentary weakness.

To form an accurate picture of the situation that existed in the past, we must not lose sight of the fact that, because of very early marriages, the number of young single women was necessarily limited.

The attitude toward single men was more lenient than toward 562 836 girls, unless their behavior had any consequences and apart from the danger of their actions becoming habitual, leading inevitably to palavers.

174 836 C. An attempt to explain the modern changes. The facts themselves as much as a knowledge of human nature, together with the lenient attitude of parents and the lack of sanctions (the last two points are relevant only to relations between adults), are in direct contradiction to the statements of the natives. Should these not therefore be explained as exaggerations, stemming from a desire for national glory and a resentment of the situation created by colonization? The [124] natives whose strange assertions I have cited are elderly and serious; they demonstrate all the qualities of truthful witnesses. But are they not -- perhaps unconsciously -- laudatores temporis acti? I thought so for a long time and never allowed their statements to carry any weight. I have discussed this question over and over again, not with one or two natives, but with dozens of the most serious and sincere people, under various circumstances and in regions far removed from one another. Yet all supported the same argument, and I could never make my point of view prevail. I always received the same reply: "You Whites are not willing to believe us when we tell you what we know better than you, what is the pure truth. You are so involved in your own point of view!" Finally, before so much formal testimony -- uniform, unchanging, repeated ad nauseum in such varied circumstances as to individuals, times, and places -- my attachment to my own idea began, with some regret, to falter.

But how is it possible to resolve the contradiction between a rather broad liberty and the practice of chastity? And above all how can less than fifty years have sufficed to transform any attachment to virginity into licentiousness? The difficulty presents itself for relations between adults, but it is especially great with respect to reprehensible contacts between nonadults, because of the terrible sanction that we have described above.

The first objection may be partially met if we take into account the habit of "the fear of men," which is acquired and maintained through the severe prohibition against sexual relations before physical maturity and the terrible punishment with which the transgressor is threatened. [86]

The second objection on the other hand is much more serious. It is the one which above all has always kept me from accepting the

174 thesis of the natives. This is how it is refuted by those who contradict 896 me: "When the first black soldiers and their assistants, archers, and [175] spear carriers were sent by the Whites to conquer us, they committed all sorts of atrocities and permitted themselves all the licentious acts that occurred to them. Among other things they took advantage of young girls, even those who were not nubile. They required immature girls to engage in sexual intercourse. They even went so far as to force people to commit incest, uniting mother and son, father and daughter, pointing a gun at their breasts. (1)

> 1. The fact that the soldiers required that immature girls be delivered over to them, because they were afraid of venereal diseases, is still notorious.

These accusations are so shocking and repugnant that one refuses to admit their veracity. Yet it is possible that they correspond to reality. For one thing, the informants are entirely reliable. For another, the account is internally consistent. As a matter of fact, scenes of the sort described seemed to have occurred at the beginning of almost all colonizations. Their authors were usually the natives of other regions rather than Whites (in our area Europeans were almost entirely absent from the first contacts between the inhabitants and the new power). By the nature of things anything can be expected at such a time. For occupations are carried out under martial law. And everyone is aware that war unleashes the human beast which -- as even contemporary history abundantly shows -- is capable of worse and more repugnant excesses.

It is possible to object to all this for, if the assertions of the natives are true, the events they describe did not give rise to a practice of incest and, consequently, need not have given rise to the far-reaching changes which we have observed. [87] But the two situations are entirely different. For licentious behavior between single people is more or less consistent with the passionate tendencies of human nature, which were mostly checked by the fear of a sanction -- a terrible sanction, it is true, but it was shown in fact to be nonexistent. Incest,

836 on the other hand, is extremely repugnant by nature, especially for the Nkundɔ́. It is a vice which comes about only as a result of special beliefs or through a fundamental degeneration of sexuality.

The breaking up of the framework of traditional organization may furnish a partial explanation in this realm as in many others. In the case of sexual relations between single adults, it might even be deemed sufficient. As much may be said about greed, vanity, the desire for ostentation and display. These are very natural sentiments in a woman, and they were greatly stimulated by the dazzling riches imported from Europe. But these facts are not sufficient in themselves to account for everything. They are especially and entirely inadequate in explaining the considerable changes in the relations between immature children, and we are thus forced to accept the explanation given by serious natives.

3. Children born out of wedlock

848 Among the Nkundɔ́, giving birth to a child outside of wedlock has never from time immemorial been considered a grave misdemeanor. It is not considered criminal, as ethnographers say it is among many other African peoples.

Furthermore, this attitude logically follows from the liberty permitted to adolescents, as described above. Neither the woman nor her lover are harassed or punished as a result. On the contrary, the grandparents joyfully receive the child, who adds to the size, power, and wealth of the clan. [88] For an illegitimate child (entombɔ́) (1)

1. Such a child is also known as bọna ɓa wanẹ́, "child of the sunlight," or bọna ɓa bombamboka, "child of the highway" or "of a girl of the streets." Among the Bombomba the term bọkẹlankɔ́lo is also heard.

584 For his part, the young man gives her some small game animals 431 (especially the big rat called botómba, lemurs of the genus esɛ́ndɛ́, etc.) or fish. These gifts have no specific name. The man's gifts are simply called mpató "gift sent"; the woman's are called botímo, a term used for all presents given by a woman to her lover (see also Chapter VI, Article VII, 2). The verb used with this noun is tumba, "to make burn." Etymologically the two words are in no way related.

Sometimes the sweethearts give each other a secret mutual pledge of their desire to be married. This pledge is called bondengɛ́ or bonengɛ́ and consists particularly of a necklace of beads called bafomakongo (or, more rarely, bisengɛ́ or bisenggɛ́la). [103]

581 In choosing their wives, the men allow themselves to be motivated by the various factors which may influence them in this realm, such as physical or moral attractions. Wealth or social rank almost never play a part in determining the choice. Youth is easily carried away by physical attraction and passionate love. Men who are already more settled as well as the more sensible young men pay more attention to moral qualities, such as general conduct, submissiveness, goodness, gentleness, and especially diligence, careful attention to work, etc. In short, we find here the full range of individual variations that are encountered elsewhere, with the exception of marriages motivated by financial or political interests or by the degree of moral elevation that can be aroused by the Christian religion, such as pure devotion.

584 After a few days of courtship the girl lets her suitor know that if he really loves her he had better settle the matter and that consequently he must obtain her parents' consent. [836] Meanwhile they have already had intimate relations several times; therefore the moment of official negotiations should not be delayed.

586 587 584 Seeking a wife who is already married is in no way different from the procedure we have just described, but a great deal of circumspection must be used so that the husband's suspicions will not be aroused. The exchange of the secret pledge we have mentioned occurs especially in this situation.

Once the divorce is completed, the woman falls in the same category as a single girl since she is free.

Seeking a future wife in an as yet unborn child or one that is very young will be discussed in a special section (Chapter IV, Article I). [105]

584 The young man informs his own parents of his intentions, and they make certain that this marriage merits [106] consideration and that there are no obstacles or too great difficulties that might cause trouble later on.

For the official negotiations the suitor and his father (or a substitute for the latter) go to the home of the girl's parents, who inquire as to the purpose of their visit, and when they discover that so-and-so would like to marry their daughter, they ask: "How do you want her?" (1) "I want her for my wife," he replies. Whereupon they tell him to make the necessary arrangements to make the first payment on the bride price. When the two parties have come to an agreement the parents of the intended conclude the conversation by saying: "We are not opposed; it is up to you."

[586] The formalities of the negotiations in the case of a woman who already has a husband do not differ from those for a girl who is free. Only, in the first instance the proceedings must go on with great circumspection so as not to anger the abandoned husband. In addition the woman's parents inform the suitor and his family of the amount of the bride price they must bring in order to reimburse the first husband. (2)

In cases of engagement before birth or at a very early age, the same procedures are observed, but they are adapted to the special circumstances of the situation, which will be explained in detail in Chapter IV.

After the negotiations have thus begun, the suitor's father prepares the first payment of the bride price which, accompanied by his son and the ndonga, he delivers to the future wife's family. But let us first explain the ndonga.

● [886] 1. That is, do you want her as your legitimate wife, or are you only planning to live with her for a time? In this fashion the parents of the intended assure themselves that the suitor has serious intentions of contracting a real marriage

586x only consider the marriages of adult individuals through the nkúmbó, that is to say, unions that are truly and perfectly voluntary on both sides. Finally, we should exclude those wives of polygamists who prefer monogamy and have taken advantage of an opportunity to break their unions in order to enter into a marriage contract with a bachelor. It seems to me that when these reasonable considerations and restrictions are taken into account, the figures established will not argue against the stability of Nkundó marriages to the extent that one might have thought at first. Or at least that is my impression, derived from the many cases that have come to my attention and that it has been my duty to investigate thoroughly in the course of my ministry as a priest.

The 112 marriages recorded in our last two books at Flandria can be broken down as follows (1): 18 widows, (2) 6 inherited wives, [47] 1 replacement, 3 cases of women who had broken marriages entered into before puberty, 29 wives of polygamists, 18 divorced wives of monogamous men, and 37 first marriages. If we exclude the replacement, the marriages of children and of former wives of polygamists, but include widows and women who are inherited, we arrive at 37 + 18 + 6 = 61 persons for whom their present marriage is still their first, as against 18 clear-cut cases of divorce.

[797] Nevertheless, it should be noted that these figures are based on only a tiny minority of the population and on that part which, from our point of view, may be considered the best, because these people are willing to submit to the yoke of Christian morality. In addition these people are in their prime, and it is impossible to say whether later on they will persevere in these good inclinations. But in any case these instances show that faithfulness to a promise can, and in fact does, exist among the Nkundó.

595x
837 Without a doubt one of the most beautiful aspects of love in general, and marital love in particular, is conjugal faithfulness. As will be shown in detail in Chapter VI, Article VII, 2, the Nkundó do

595 837 not appreciate marital fidelity the same way we do. A wife's unfaithfulness is severely punished by the laws. But adultery may be discovered and known to all without causing shame or remorse. This is a marked difference between our way of thinking and that of the Nkundɔ. They maintain that a passing infidelity which is not followed through does not denote an absence of love for one's spouse, even if it is repeated. In spite of the implausibility of this statement, I had to accept it, for those who argued with me were so many, their positions so various, and they were really serious. Among them were a number of Christians with whom we are very satisfied and who conduct themselves admirably, as do their wives. They consider these errors to be momentary failings [48] due to passion, which permit love to remain. Indeed, often these men and women are models in the performance of their other duties. This misbehaviour is without doubt considered very serious -- their anger shows clearly that they do not consider it trivial -- but it does not exclude love and thus, as far as everything else is concerned, the spouses continue giving proof of it to each other.

Let us not forget that many elements may lead to a fall and that consciences may go far astray. On the other hand, the fact that a husband is tolerant, even to the point of exploiting his wife, does not exclude a certain love for her; a husband may be extremely indulgent and at the same time jealous to the point of crime. All that may be found among the Whites, after all. Love without the feeling of duty will not suffice to sustain a union.

Moreover, there is no dogma, no moral teaching based on religion, to restrain the instincts. And we should add that among these [562] primitive people, the woman's natural tendency to please, to submit to a man's desires, is highly developed. In Europe these feelings are channeled by the Christian religion and its influence on society. Here [836] they encounter no direct obstacle except for sanctions. Before marriage sexual passion and all sensations connected with it and adjunct to it can be pursued without physical, moral, or social obstacles, at least at the present time. The surroundings in which a girl grows up and the example and conversations of her companions will tend even to push her in that direction.

595x 837 548 Finally, let us not forget the spirit of gain and greed. Except in a few instances, a woman expects remuneration from a man to whom she has surrendered her body. Many infidelities may be explained by this practice, at least at the present time. But on the other hand, it should be noted that the woman's demand for a "wage" from her lover may be explained by an amorous concern; by giving the woman a gift or an amount of money the man shows [49] his regard for her; it is a demonstration of his affection for her, and the woman wants to be paid in order to be sure of her lover's love. That is not to say that such instances are common or frequent, but such a feeling is natural and actually exists in more than one case. (1)

1. See Chapter VI, Article VII, 2.

It is not surprising that the woman who lives in circumstances which are always unfavorable to chastity and marital fidelity is easily led to adultery and often falls. That is the basis of the proverb: [589] bǒmoto ndé lofolókó, nkó ngonda ěfá'nd'ósengámé, "the woman is a chrysalis; there is no forest where she does not hang" -- a clear condemnation of the frivolity of the daughters of Eve in the land of the Nkundó. Nevertheless, these moral criticisms in the form of proverbs can be accepted only in a general way and must be understood cum grano salis; they leave the door wide open for exceptions.

595x 152 In his Blancs et Noirs au Congo Belge [Whites and Blacks in the Belgian Congo], (p. 38), Jadot has written: "The Bantu is capable of love . . . and that is all, and his wife -- no matter what has been said -- of a certain amount of marital fidelity. In general, neither the one nor the other go too far. Platonism, Petrarchism, and Romanticism are foreign to the love of the natives . . . I know . . . of cases of fierce jealousy and of beautiful faithfulness." (2)

2. See also ibid., p. 208 ff.

152 We conclude that love exists among the Nkundó. This feeling is subjected to harsh attacks and is affected by many unfavorable circumstances, which may account for its imperfection and for certain 291 184 The nkásá is unknown beyond the Jwalé and the Luilaka. In that region the women tie a string (or a belt of beads) around themselves and attach a second piece of cloth to it.

291 Thus the male garment is a rudimentary sort of shorts, open on the sides, while female dress is much more open. In general the efufa is an appropriate protection of one's modesty, but it is inadequate in certain positions. (2)

[611] [196] 2. It may be interesting to note that etóo nsamányá, or just plain etóo, which is the term for a man's garment, also indicates the male line of descent, while the female line is often designated by the term nkásá (sometimes by the word jwǒmoto derived from bǒmoto, "woman"). Let us add that lonkundó jwǎ nkásá means "pure, flawless Lonkundo, not corrupted by foreign influences." This expression should be compared with the following phrases: langue maternel, moedertaal, "mother tongue," etc.

291 177 At present the nkásá is no longer worn except by a few elderly inhabitants of villages far from the main communication lines. Everywhere else the ancient mode of dress has been replaced by materials imported from Europe. The women wear at least a sangatúmbo, a kind of short skirt which falls from their loins at least to the middle of their thighs if not further. Middle-aged men in the interior have simply changed the material of their garment but not its form. The younger ones, on the contrary, have frankly adopted the European mode of dress.

291 581 [824] [837] A married woman is not allowed to enter the village of her relatives by marriage (bakiló) or appear before them [54] without supplementing her usual attire with one or more beleleke (banana leaves cut into fringes). The term bakiló must be understood as it is meant by the Nkundó; it excludes those with whom the wife may sometimes perform the sexual act and who are called "husbands" broadly speaking.

178 The fact of colonization has greatly changed the situation. The freedom of communication across great distances, the introduction of new and varied goods and especially of money, have had a great influence on the development of prostitution. The economic system of the people remains the same; but when the women are away from their families or their husbands, they spend their means at their own discretion. And, since the objects of adornment available to them have greatly increased, they have a personal incentive to engage in immoral conduct.

The vice has not therefore taken on European forms; modern changes have simply increased -- but in enormous proportions -- the number of occasional streetwalkers. The development of this state of affairs is encouraged by the procuring activities of certain polygamous and even monogamous men living near European centers, which give rise to the attitude of their wives. For though the husband may reap the primary financial benefit, the wife is not deprived of her little gain, and her native cupidity easily pushes her to engage without scruple in commercializing her body.

548 The women under discussion are usually married. Often they have a recognized lover among the laborers in the camps, and he usually pays for their faithfulness. Thus we arrive at the married woman with a regular paying lover. [76]

This form of prostitution has developed even outside laborers' camps. It is to be found among the people on the river banks, who are more in contact with the Whites and their people and in the neighboring villages. It is especially prevalent among the Beloko, fairly near Coquilhatville, where it is spreading even among wives of monogamists. This perversion takes root all the more rapidly because it has a certain resemblance to the ancestral custom of a recognized concubinage (see Chapter VI, Article VIII, 2) and like the latter, it often does not take the form of prostitution. That is to say, the illicit relationship is not engaged in for the sake of gain. Furthermore, an arrangement is often made with the husband.

[369] As to the other forms of prostitution listed, they are still unknown in the native villages and in the small centers located in the territory studied. Some of them, however, may develop in the fairly near future.

587 Lastly, these facts demonstrate collective ownership within the clan or the extended family. When a close relative, such as Bosɔlɔ for instance, marries a widow, he considers her legally as his legitimate spouse, just as she was the legitimate spouse of the deceased. [200] No new bride-price agreement is necessary, since the preceding one continues to be valid. The only new element introduced is that another person in the family of the deceased enters into a marriage bond with the widow. Whether the person marrying the woman is the legitimate heir or a close relative makes no difference because of the community of interests that exists (the children belong to Bosɔlɔ as much as to the heir, for example). (1)

1. We will come back to this question further on (see Article IX).

837 Because of the superficial resemblance between different situations, it should be mentioned here that the enjoyment of a woman in a common-law relationship is not asked for exclusively in the case of a widow. Such a request may also be made in connection with the wife of a polygamist while the husband is still living, but this is done only by a close relative and even then is not well regarded. Usually the situation is as follows: a man falls in love with one of the wive's in his relative's harem, and she shares his sentiments. He takes her home with him. There is a palaver. The husband is furious, breaks of all relations with the seducer, and wants no more of his invitations or his gifts, which means the quarrel is serious. Therefore, other relatives intervene to try and reconcile the two adversaries; seeing that there is no way to prevent the cohabitation of the pair or judging that such action would not be expedient, they try to pacify the legitimate husband. Through the agency of his elder brother, the lover sends him a gift in entreaty. The husband, finding no one on his side, bows down before the fait accompli, accepts the gift (bompángá), and yields the enjoyment of the woman. Instead of going about the matter in this cavalier fashion, the lover may also make his request in the normal manner. If for one reason or another the lovers want to stop living together, they separate without further

837 ceremony. If the husband is kindly disposed toward them, he gives back to his relative the valuables the latter has paid, and the incident is closed. [201]

That is what happened some time ago to Insɛ́lo, of Bokenyola (Bonjoku). (1) In the harem of his maternal uncle, Efonja Is'Ôfuwa, who was originally from Bonjoku but had been integrated into the Bongale, he had noticed a certain Mbilɛ́eyenga, originally from Bosáá, and "his heart was rent asunder," as the Nkundɔ́ say. Through the agency of his older first cousins Mpetsɛ́ ɛ́â Lingomo, ye sent Efonja a bompángá of 6 rings, asking him to be kind enough to allow him to cohabit with this woman. His request was well received. But after a certain number of years their passion cooled, and Insɛ́lo wished to contract a proper marriage to give himself posterity. He therefore parted from Mbilɛ́, who went back to her husband. The latter returned the 6 rings to Insɛ́lo, because he did not want to enrich himself at the expense of a relative.

Article III. The Bosɔ́lɔ́

428 The marriage of a bosɔ́lɔ́ is a special form of the inheritance
587 of women.
768 The term bosɔ́lɔ́ is used everywhere. The Injɔ́lɔ́ also use a synonym, njɛ́mɔ́, an incorrect term derived from the verb ɛ́mola, "to make [someone] get up." Thus they say ɛ́moja bǒna njɛ́mɔ́, "to give the child (son, daughter) a bosɔ́lɔ́. (2) Among the Beloko and their Elɛ́ngá the term bombɛ́jɛ́ is used as well as bosɔ́lɔ́.

On the day when the widows are "lifted from the ground" and 583x 184 a new element from the legal standpoint. This is clearly apparent in the repugnance with which these same Bombwanja who practice the form of exchange just described regard an exchange pure and simple, which will be described below.

The exchange of widows is also practiced by the Elíngɔ. Like the Bombwanja, they also have the two forms of quasi-exchange described at the beginning of this article.

4) On the other hand, a true exchange of wives exists among the riverain peoples known as the Boɔ́yɔ and the Longa (1); in their dialect it is called iengyɔ. Two men exchange wives. If the bride price of one is greater than that of the other, the difference is refunded. Such an exchange is carried out with the consent of the women involved.

583x 184 152 [837] Let us see how such an exchange usually comes about. Imagine two men, Bokulɔ and Mpolɛ, with their respective wives, Mbindo and Baɔnɔ. Suppose that Bokulɔ falls in love with Baɔnɔ, the wife of Mpolɛ, and the pair become involved in an adulterous relationship. There is a cooling of Baɔnɔ's love for her husband Mpolɛ; she performs fewer and fewer services for him, etc. The same thing happens to Bokulɔ's relationship with his wife Mbindo. The latter is jealous; her patience is soon at an end. She discusses the matter with Mpolɛ, her rival's husband. "See how your wife deceives you; she no longer loves you. My husband is forsaking me [217] for her; he no longer loves me. This is a challenge to you as well as to me. If you are a man (1), pick up the challenge."

1. They live near the mouth of the Salonga (in the villages of Bonsela, Pomputɔ, Nkɔse, Bombomba, Isakɔ, etc.)

1. "Man" in the sense of vir (jwende); the meaning is: "If you have any courage, show that you are not a coward."

573* dare to maintain that a woman's speaking out about her husband is a 578 sign of affection. On the other hand, a woman who instead bewails her lot softly and quietly saying, ngɔ́ya ñkeke lɔ́í l'ɔ̌m'o̱né̱ na?, ("mother, what shall I do with this husband?"), will not be with him long. Her complaint is chiefly egoistic, while the other seeks the good of her spouse and her household.

As we have already mentioned, the perfect punishment, and one frequently employed in ordinary cases, is a husband's refusal to eat food prepared by his wife or to wash with water she has drawn or boiled. It is a type of reprimand to which she is sensitive. The husband's aversion must not last too long, however, for it could lead to ●[837] a breaking up of the marriage, more especially since in the end the woman would begin to suspect infidelities -- which do occur.

The fact that Nkundɔ́ law does not allow the husband complete freedom and clearly limits his rights does not in any way exclude the occurrence of infractions. The mass of human beings is always inferior to the moral ideal imposed by legislation. But these provisions of Nkundɔ́ law do protect a woman against her husband's excesses. We have already cited the expedients available to her: abandonment of the home shared with her husband; legal apologies (bo̱ɔ́ndo̱), indemnity for injuries (lio̱mbo̱). In addition, a wife who has been wronged will abstain from foods (such as meat or palm nuts) given her by her husband and, even more important, will refuse to have sexual relations with him. And for our people this is a great affront. In order to re-establish a normal and peaceful situation, a husband often has to pacify [281] his spouse by means of a bo̱ɔ́ndo̱. In addition to the measures mentioned, a wife may of course use insults, of which every native has a rich and varied collection.

No one can condemn or reprimand a woman for abusing a lazy husband. If he does not go to the hunt and bring back game, if he neglects the building or repair of the house, if he is too much of a laggard, if he does not fell the forest to set up food crops, it is clearly he who is in the wrong, and he will find no one who will approve of his conduct and condemn his wife. If he turns out to be incorrigible, it will not be long before the marriage is broken, according [539] to the axiom elɔ́ng'ey'ɔ̌moto ñk'okɔ́fo, "the woman's victory is divorce."

606 the act of procreation on the part of one of them. Perhaps this idea is latent in the native mind, or at least is at the basis of this rule. The fact that this hypothesis applies only to the wife's mother-in-law [mother?] does not weaken it; for in native eyes [291] the other instances are entirely without importance. (1)

1. See, for example, Chapter II, Article X, and Chapter V, Articles II and III.

606 292 Another regulation pertaining to the mother-in-law requires that she -- and all the women who are given the same title in current usage -- may appear in her son-in-law's village only when dressed in a bọlẹlẹkẹ. A bọlẹlẹkẹ is a banana leaf, either green or dried, which has been torn in several places perpendicularly to the large [765] central rib, and constitutes the first and principal sign of mourning. Moreover, Batswa women must also dress in this manner before entering a Baotó settlement. The following reason is given for the rule in the second instance: a Bọtswá woman's dress consists of a lolímba, a belt of small braided ropes about 10 centimeters long. Although in ordinary positions the lolímba provides fairly good protection, it is not considered adequate to really stop all indiscreet looks. And it is popularly believed that if a Bootó sees a Bọtswá woman's genital organs, she will die. Might we conclude from this last explanation that there is a fundamental connection between the reasons that necessitate the wearing of a bọlẹlẹkẹ in these three instances? Or is the mother-in-law to imitate a Bọtswá woman and thus show a certain subordination to her son-in-law?

2. Female relatives

607 831 As long as they are free, that is, as long as no bride-price payment has been made for them, a woman's sisters or cousins are considered by her husband as his wives, and he calls them so (baálí). This term is applied only to relatives of a generation below that of the true wife or to members of the same generation who are younger than she and with whom marriage [292] is permitted. It is therefore never

607 extended to relatives with whom marriage prohibited, such as nieces
837 who are banankáná, who are his wife's "mothers." (1)

1. See Chapter V, Article IV and the examples cited there (for instance, examples 25, 26, 17).

When such relatives of the wife marry, the situation changes. They belong to another man, and a continuation of the same practice as when they are single produces very serious cases of adultery. There are differences depending on the degree of affinity, however. In addition to the usual sanctions against adultery, other measures may be taken, especially the dissolution of the marriage. An especially serious case, but one which is more or less hypothetical, would be adultery between a man and his father-in-law's wife; a special feeling of shame is connected with it, and our Nkundó say that the two persons are like a Botswá and his master. Misconduct with the wife of a brother-in-law (or cousin-in-law) is also a very serious matter. The latter may take his sister (or cousin) away from the guilty husband and thus break the marriage. The same applies to adultery with a nyangôkiló (1)

1. See Chapter V, Article IV and the examples given there (for instance, examples 25, 26, 17).

3. Legal matters

685 Here we must examine the manner in which breaches of the law are settled between parents-in-law and son-in-law. It is known that among these peoples justice, in the strict sense of the word, is one of the most prominent aspects of social legislation. Theft is one of the principal causes for shame and was formerly severely punished. The thief, especially if he continued to repeat his offence, could be sold as a slave.

606 835 the relations between a wife and her husband's parents are closely connected with the rules pertaining to the prohibition related to affinity and seems to spring from the same source. Therefore it will be useful to have in mind what we have said in the preceding chapter, Article IV.

607 The husband's elder brothers treat his wife as their sister. The wife calls her husband's sisters [300] bakiló, but out of respect she often gives them the title of "mother." (1)

[601] 1. Among the Elángá the wife also calls her husband's sisters bongíli (pl. bangíli); they call her bǒnongíli (pl. bǎnangíli). A wife often calls her husband's mother nyangôngíli. Bǎnangíli l'ǎnangíli means "the brother's wives and their sisters-in-law."

587 After the husband's death, as has been said suo loco, his father or his brother may marry his widow. But this practice is not well regarded and is permitted only rarely, chiefly when the scattering of the family patrimony is feared or if the two interested parties have an unusual love for each other.

● 837 602 With respect to children or younger brothers and all those who fall into that category, the situation is altogether different. Illicit relations with wives of their father, grandfather, uncle, elder brother, or elder cousin, are judged much less severely. Generally, misconduct does not give rise to claims for payment, or the payment is demanded "for form's sake" and consists of a hen and a bunch of bananas. By means of this payment the guilty one recognizes his error and renders homage to the right of his elder.

[626] In general public opinion condemns these relations and often with great severity. The question of degree of kinship as well as other considerations result in a great diversity among the cases, so we will examine each situation separately and distinguish each time between the husband's reaction and that of public opinion.

837 A. A woman's misconduct with her husband's son does not re-
626 sult in the payment of an indemnity. Nevertheless, the husband who 595x has been wronged takes action; he defends his rights and is enraged, 593x whether the situation is very serious or not, and especially if he is monogamous. If he has several wives, he is more apt to pass over the matter, unless it involves his favorite. Sometimes he takes revenge by striking the guilty son's mother, taking her hens away from her, etc. But such action may lead to complications: [301] the brother of the woman so treated might intervene, and if the reaction of the husband who has been wronged is too violent or recurs too often, a divorce may result. In any case the father never hurts his heedless son's wife, since he loves her like his own daughter.

The father may apply a direct sanction against the offender by delaying the acquisition of a wife for him and refusing his blessings for his son's travels and undertakings -- still a serious thing in purely native society.

Such relations are always greatly criticized by public opinion, even if relatives intervene on the culprit's behalf. The latter is disgraced as a result; he is mocked with the epithet etóonjóló, to which [578] often is added the explicative phrase l'óála banyangó b'áningá. Etóonjóló is derived from etóo, "masculine clothing" and, figuratively, "virility in the physical sense," and from bóló, "strength." Thus the epithet implies that the culprit is so virile that he goes so far as to unite even with his brothers' mothers.

587 Marriage with the father's widow after his death is legitimate.
626 Nevertheless, if the widow has left children, public opinion does not entirely refrain from judgment and though the severity of the criticism cited above will be attenuated, it may still be heard. Such was the case of Yoká of Bokenyola (Bonjoku), which is well known in this region. He married Lokokú, widow of his father Insílo y'Òkátola and mother of Insílo Antoine, present chief of the Bonkoso. (1).

1. With reference to the above-mentioned attitude, an exception must be made with regard to the inheritance of a widow by right

587
626 of seniority (she is then called bosólɔ́ -- see Chapter III, Article III). The giving of a widow who is in the position described is preferably avoided.

● 837
626 Illicit relations between a son and his father's wife are judged with especially great severity if the young man's own mother is still alive. He is reproached for his behavior in terms which are clear and crude: Oɔ̂y'ɔ̌sanganya mbindo ĭkɛ̌ la mbindo y'îs'â nyangɔ́, "you unite your stains (impurities) with those of your father and [302] mother"; Outɛ́ ńk'eki wɛ̌ wǐmánáká, "you are returning from whence you came." To these expressions is often added ɔ́wa lɔ́í ɛ! olekí liloka, "you will die because of your too great wickedness." To the [761] Nkundɔ́ this last statement is a kind of curse, and if it is repeated by several persons it will not fail to have its effect. Or, to speak as our people do, if everyone greatly wails over and against this man, he will really die. (1)

1. This attitude of the Nkundɔ́ may be one of the reasons why widows are assigned not to the son of the deceased, but to his brother.

If the son in question is not married, especially if he has already reached a relatively advanced age, and if he approaches the wives of his polygamous father, the matter is considered less serious. The latter cannot be too angry, especially when only isolated instances are involved; for other relatives will allow their affection for this young man to speak, since they are aware of his passion and therefore understand his temptations and follies. They would intervene to pacify the father and urge him to prevent the repetition of such occurrences by obtaining a wife for his son. In exceptional cases the family council may even judge the father to be in the wrong because of his harshness toward his son and may allow the latter to take his father's wife away from him (never, however, the first wife, the favorite, or the bolómbu); such was the case we described in 837 626 Chapter II, Article XI, 2. But such a situation is far from ideal in Nkundô eyes and is permitted only if, on the one hand, the son ardently loves the woman and, on the other, if the father is too slow in obtaining a wife for him.

837 602 Here then we observe a conflict between two feelings: a husband's jealousy and the affection of a father and various relatives. That is why it is difficult -- as in many situations -- to draw the line between what is permitted and what is forbidden. From what has preceded and from the general explanations given by natives, we can conclude, however, that: [303] 1) relations between a woman and her husband's son are forbidden and severely judged, but with much more leniency than in the case of "superior" relatives; 2) the [593] father may not go to extremes in repressing misconduct nor ask his own son to pay an indemnity, since to do so would be to enrich himself through his child's misbehaviour, and the latter would have no means of paying him except through him or his mother's clan -- and it would be very unjust and inappropriate to force him to have recourse to the latter.

593 837 607 B. A younger brother calls his elder brother's wife wǎlí, or wife, and she calls him bǒme, or husband, because they may marry one another. Therefore adulterous relations may also be found among them. But in practice some distinctions must be made.

If the younger brother is not married and the elder one has a harem, -- a state of affairs which was very common in the past but today is very rare -- the situation is analogous to the one described above in relation to a father's wife except that there is greater indulgence toward the culprit.

If the elder brother is monogamous and the younger brother a bachelor, relations of the latter with the former's wife when the husband is present are forbidden. If the younger brother nevertheless yields to the temptation, he is condemnable. The husband may not claim an indemnity. But in revenge he may procure for himself a "make-believe indemnity" (nyongo ěa bolîlambo) by felling one of the culprit's banana trees, taking away his chickens, moving his hut, taking some other similar action. The purpose of these acts, according 593ˣ 607 837 to our people, is to inspire the young man with a little more respect for his elder. The latter may not go to extremes, however, (as for example by fighting his younger brother), for fear of being censured for a lack of brotherly love. (1) Besides, the valuables with which he obtained his wife [304] belong in one sense to both brothers. If the two brothers have different mothers, the elder has many more trumps in his hand. And if in addition his mother's clan has provided the entire bride price or a major part of it, he would win his case entirely as regards the indemnity, although the duty of brotherly love, and therefore of leniency, would still remain. In the case of isolated misdeeds there must always be this leniency. But if the misconduct is frequently repeated, the culprit's excuses no longer carry much weight.

If the younger brother, too, is married, the matter takes on a totally different aspect. Since he has a wife of his own, he no longer has any excuse for satisfying his passions by adulterous means. It is true that the injured husband is still obliged to modulate his anger and its manifestations, but he can obtain more financial satisfaction. The indemnity he claims, however, must be added to the guilty wife's bride price; for it is inconceivable that he enrich himself at his brother's expense. If he himself obtained his brother's wife for him, he may take her away and give her to another brother, cousin, etc., or even take her for himself, in spite of the impediment of affinity. However this is an exceptional case and only applied if the misconduct has been serious and repeated and the culprit has taken an insolent attitude.

If the husband is not present, because he is on a trip or the younger brother has met his sister-in-law while she is staying with her family or traveling elsewhere, the younger brother is entirely free

1. A slight brotherly punishment is not taken seriously, particularly if the younger brother is considerably his junior; it is permitted, especially where the younger brother has erred repeatedly.

595ˣ to have relations with her. If the woman refuses to have relations
607 with her brother-in-law, the latter often reports her ill will to her
837 husband, who will reprimand her or even strike her because she does not love his own brother, and will accuse her of having lovers: ótóna bɔ́n'ɔ̂â ngɔ́ya, ólangakâ ók'aend'ɔ́nkinɔ́. Since there is more affection between brothers born of the same mother, the husband's anger would then be even greater. A lack of affection on the part of his wife arouses her husband's suspicions on the question of her fidelity because Nkundó women are extremely ready to yield to temptation. [305] Therefore if she refuses her own brother-in-law-husband, she must be obtaining satisfaction elsewhere. This reasoning may be false, but it is based on a frequency of cases. The husband's attitude does not show a lack of jealousy; on the contrary, it proves its existence.

If the younger brother meets his sister-in-law in the home of her family, they will intervene on his behalf. They will tell her to receive "her husband" well, to prepare food for him, to clean the hut set aside for him. They will even force her to cohabit with him for the entire duration of his stay in their village. By this means they seek to avoid palavers with their son-in-law. If the woman's antipathy toward her brother-in-law is so great that she cannot be made to submit to him, they sometimes give their visitor another of their daughters (or cousins, etc.), younger than his brother's wife, to perform wifely duties for him.

All those designated as bakínɔ́ in Nkundó terminology fall into the same category as a younger brother (thus younger male cousins are also included). The seriousness of the conflict that may arise on this question and of its consequences vary in proportion to the degree of kinship between the individuals involved.

C. The position of a nephew (bɔ́ɔnankáná) in relation to his 604 maternal uncle's wives is to a great extent comparable to that of a 837 son in relation to his father's wives. The fact that marriage is effected 578 through the payment of a bride price gives the nephew greater 595ˣ freedom; for the uncle was enriched through the marriage of his

604 nephew's mother. There is no question of indemnity, except that of 837 "respects," to show the nephew's submission, and it consists of a hen and 578 a bunch of bananas. If the nephew refuses to make this gesture of 593 deference and submission, he is considered in the wrong and the entire family gangs up on him in order to save the authority and hierarchy of the family. "You are offending your uncle," they say, "no doubt you want him to die so that you can take his place and profit from the inheritance." And the offended uncle, after being patient for a few days, may demand a real indemnity. [306] But then other considerations become involved, and a new situation is created.

Actually, the young man's mother often -- though not always -- takes his side and turns on her brother. Two situations may arise:

1) The nephew's mother may not be born of the same mother as the uncle. In that case she seldom refrains from intervening on her son's behalf. She reproaches her brother for his hardness and his lack of affection for her, especially if the adulterous wife is her nkita, that is, if she were acquired by means of the bride price paid for her. She will say, "To whom do you owe this wife? And yet you demand riches from my son. Give me back my bride price, so that I may get him a wife." The uncle also gets angry, and sometimes accedes to his indignant sister's request and returns her bride price. If he does so all relationship between brother and sister is broken. But this is an unusual outcome; matters are almost always settled before this extremity is reached.

2) If brother and sister have the same mother, peace is always re-established before this aggravation, and the interchange is limited to a few reproaches and a little momentary anger. For the proverb says, bɔ́sangɔ́ nyangó bɔ́fomb'ilɔ́ngɔ́, "hatred between children of the same mother is but feigned, illusory; it is not true or real."

837 (F) passion unless he is the nkóló of his sister (E), that is, unless the 578 mother (C) of his sister (E) is the nkita of his aunt (B), [307] who is the 579 sister of his father (A). Indeed in that case his sister may not complain, for she owes him respect and submission; her subordination to her brother and master is greater than the gratitude he owes her for any riches he may have obtained through her or on her account.

603 D. In the case of the relationship of a grandson (bonkána) to
837 his grandfather's wives, his freedom is, in practice, complete. Actually, among the Nkundó the affection of a grandfather (nkóko) for his own grandson often exceeds his love for his own son and completely degenerates into weakness. (1) The grandfather puts up with all his grandson's carryings-on, his whims, all his teasing, his insults, etc.

After illicit relations the grandson sometimes carries his insolence so far as to spontaneously send his grandfather a "mock" indemnity in the form of a basket filled with stones in the place of copper rings.

606 Although the grandfather treats his grandson with good humor,
603 public opinion does not favor the latter's conduct, though it is more
837 lenient than in the cases described above. The public reaction, as well as the sending of the "mock" fine, shows that in principle these relations are censurable and condemned. Because of present circum-
[78] stances, particularly marriage at an earlier age than in the past, the age difference between a grandson and his grandfather's wives has increased considerably in the constantly growing number of cases, and their relations have proportionately decreased. (2) [308]

---

1. As happens very often also in Europe.
See Chapter I, Part 1, Article I, 3.

[114] 2. We have seen above that other Nkundó tribes are even less strict in these matters. On the other hand, the Ekonda, a Nkundó group living on Lake Leopold II, have a

603
837 626
194 > higher morality -- in our terms. Among them the question of relations between a woman and her husband's son, younger brother, etc., does not even arise. Have they been influenced by some neighboring tribe? Or must we attribute the inferior morality of some of the tribes in this respect to decadence."

837
602

The following conclusions emerge from this long description:

1) Relations between a man and the wife of his son, younger brother, etc., in short of anyone inferior to him in the family hierarchy, are always strictly prohibited and never occur.

2) They do occur on the other hand between an inferior and the wife of his senior and superior. The degree of kinship between the husband and the culprit plays a considerable role in determining the seriousness or triviality of an infraction, the sanctions applied, and the various consequences. Some relations are accepted, others are censured with varying degrees of leniency, still others are pitilessly criticized.

3) In these matters a distinction may be made between two aspects:

a) the husband's reaction and the repression of the illicit relations;

b) the judgment of public opinion;

or:

a) the financial aspect;

b) the moral aspect -- to use that term for want of a better one.

Sometimes a third element comes into play, namely the intervention of the family on the side of the culprit against the injured husband who, for one reason or another, is in the wrong himself.

684

a) The usual sanction for adultery is, for the man, an indemnity to pay. But such a payment cannot be made since no financial transaction -- strictly speaking at least -- may be made

602 within a group of close kin, seeing that, from a certain standpoint, 837 property belongs to all the members, each sooner or later receiving 684 or inheriting from the other. But in cases where other sanctions can be imposed, they are considered legitimate. [309]

b) Except in the case of relations between brother and sister-626 in-law -- within the limits described above -- public opinion is 837 severe in its judgment, even more severe than for ordinary cases of 602 adultery, although because of the more tangible nature of the sanctions imposed against the latter, these seem on the surface to be considered more serious; many natives even have that impression. Or at least that is the first impression that spontaneously comes from their explanations; currently, they stress the indemnity, and in their accounts of ancient proceedings and violent sanctions, they forget the other aspect. Others do not distinguish between the two sides of the problem, or distinguish between them only very poorly. Only in going to the bottom of things do they -- like ourselves -- become aware of the two aspects and the importance of not confusing them.

The leniency we observe in certain cases on the part of the interested parties who have been wronged, and sometimes on the part of public opinion, does not seem to us to have been explained as a leniency based on principle nor as a legitimation of these relations (except in the case of brothers within the limits indicated). They seem rather to spring from the affection they have for the culprit, their sympathy for his condition as a bachelor, a certain community of interests, and finally from an evaluation of certain other elements that may be involved (such as a fundamental jealousy in the case of brothers).

602 The great distinction made by the Nkundő in this realm as 181 in others between inferior and superior relatives is based on their conception of authority, which is patriarchal, therefore paternal. What is involved is not so much a fear of power as a reverent awe -- although the first should not be excluded. In their eyes an inferior does not exist for the benefit and advantage of the superior, but the reverse; authority exists for the good of the inferior, who to preserve hierarchy and order must submit to the [310] superior. The superior's duty to help his inferior (in his difficulties, his palavers, his poverty),

602 181 to be liberal and generous toward him and therefore to make goods available to him, to be lenient in matters concerning justice and property and obliging in conjugal matters -- as long as the principle of authority remains secure is based on the same idea. The exploitation of an inferior by his superior is entirely contrary to the basic nature of Nkundó authority, while the reverse is entirely in conformity with it. (1)

> 1. This attitude may account -- at least to some extent -- for the liberties that the natives readily take with the European, their superior or master, such as domestic thefts, inappropriate requests, the kind of begging and lack of respect for authority that we are accustomed to seeing, etc.

Article VII. Adultery

837 For the Nkundó, adultery is an illicit union between a man and a married woman. From the moment the ikulá is paid for a woman, any relations with her by a man other than the husband-to-be are considered adulterous.

1. Terminology

There is no exclusive or specific term in Lonkundo by which our word "adultery" may be translated. There are a number of words in the language which are only partially equivalent to it.

1) First of all, the Nkundó speak of bongombe, a term denoting steady and continuous relations with a woman who is a complete stranger, that is, who is not related in any way. The word designates the relationship as well as the persons involved. This type of adultery is also called a wǐsamaka or linsámba jó njísámá (from the verb ísama) -- that is, a secret, as against a true linsámbá (which will be 837 discussed in the next article). The Bombwanja, the Ionda, and the Injɔ́lɔ́ call it lɔ̌ngɔla, "(any) act performed in hiding" (from the verb ɔ́ngɔla). The Ionda also use [311] the term ekundɛ́ (from the verb kunda, "to bury), which refers to "something that is buried or hidden under a heap."

Nowadays there is a tendency to apply the term linsɛ́mbɛ́, without any qualification, to adultery of this sort, at least if it is not limited to a single act. The woman and her lover are both called bonsɛ́mbɛ́ (pl. bansɛ́mbɛ́).

2) If only an isolated act takes place, it is called yĕtsí (from the verb ɛ́ta, "to call"). But this term may also be applied to unmarried persons. Strictly speaking, it denotes a single union and not continuous relations. Certain tribes (the Injɔ́lɔ́, the Elɛ́ngɛ́) also have the word efongo (for instance in the expression nyong'ɛ̌'efongo, "indemnity for a single instance").

3) The term lonkâna (bombakɛ́ among the Bombwanja) designates adultery between persons belonging to a single exogamous entity and, by extension, between persons belonging to different families but comprising a single settlement.

As the word itself indicates, the relations involved take place between "cousins" in the broadest sense of the term.

192 The natives gave me an account of the etymology of the terms bɔngɔmbɛ and lonkâna, which it may be useful to repeat here. They are believed to have been invented by fickle wives and their lovers in order to hide their illicit love affairs. Even of old there were relations between the Nkundó and the Ngɔmbɛ. A Ngɔmbɛ who appeared in a Nkundó village was the object of the curiosity of all the young people. A man going to his paramour (or vice versa) or coming back at a very late hour could reply, if suspicions were aroused, that he had been to see the Ngɔmbɛ. The same trick could be used in a case of lonkâna. I am passing on this explanation for whatever it's worth -- (for lonkâna, for instance, the etymology I cited at the beginning seems a good deal more natural), [312] it may be of interest at some time to have it noted and preserved in writing.

837 [196] 4) To indicate a tendency toward adultery (especially on the part of women) the Nkundó use the verb fâfoka which literally denotes clothing that is too big and that flies in the wind. The noun loyǒ or boyǒ is also used.

The verb used for discovering a case of adultery is té̠mbo̠la, the noun is nté̠mbó̠.

[574] Occasional or permanent adultery has always been very common. This fact is undoubtedly due to the relative ease with which it is possible to escape discovery and consequent sanctions. A woman going to visit her family cannot possibly be followed or watched by her husband; the distances make such surveillance difficult and, furthermore, it would have disastrous consequences for the stability of the marriage, since neither the woman nor her family would put up with it. Other partial causes are lasciviousness, polygamy, etc., as we will see later in the text.

2. Gifts

837 431 [602] An adulterous man and woman send each other presents; his consist of meat, arrows, etc., hers of food and various small objects. A woman's gifts to her lover are called botúmo (the noun used with the verb tumba, "to make burn" (1). Very young relatives generally serve as intermediaries. Note that a woman rarely sends her son, for she has reason to fear that the gift would not reach its destination; the boy would give himself a treat with it. She can have more confidence in a daughter.

A man's gift is called by the generic term mpató, "a gift that is sent, a dispatch." [313]

In isolated cases (yětsi) a man sends an arrow, some small object, beads, meat, etc. Nowadays money or cloth have been

1. Note that the noun and the verb are not etymologically related. Perhaps botúmo might be related to túma, "to show, to designate." The Ekonda call this gift elika. See Chapter II, Article I.

● 837 431 substituted for all these items. As a rule the woman demands some remuneration although there are exceptions, which may be frequent or rare, depending on the region and on the nature of the persons involved. They are due to extraordinary passion or to the woman's love for her lover. (1)

1. See Chapter I, Part 1, Article IV.

3. Evidence of adultery

837 684 The strength of the evidence may vary.

1) The strongest evidence is finding the couple in flagrante delicto. No objection will hold up against it, and it constitutes for the application of the severest sanctions. The act must be observed by the husband. The testimony of a third party is never introduced. If another person discovers the adultery and favors the husband, that person will inform the latter so that he can take precautions in order to catch the culprits personally. If it is discovered by the woman's father or other close relative who favors the husband, [606] he informs the latter and, if possible, calls him to witness the infraction himself. If he does so, the husband must give the indemnity to his father-in-law. This is not a legal obligation but one imposed by good relations and decorum, since the father-in-law has shown good will and affection toward his son-in-law.

2) A wife's admission is almost as important and always decisive. Such a confession mitigates her husband's anger toward her and directs it chiefly toward her accomplice. Therefore most women do not hesitate to denounce their paramours if they feel somewhat cornered. (On the other hand, women never denounce each other.) [314]

3) A third form of evidence can be obtained by surprising the lovers while they are planning a meeting. The husband can accuse them on the spot and try to extract a complete confession from his wife on the subject of the past or the future. If possible he assures himself of the co-operation of witnesses. If he foresees a denial on his wife's part, he lets the occasion pass and looks for a good opportunity to surprise the culprits in the act. Regardless of the

937 684 wife's inclinations, a husband often will not intervene at once; he will give no sign of what he has observed but will skillfully seek an opportunity to observe the pair in flagrante delicto, so that he can take more violent action. This approach is absolutely necessary if he has nothing but suspicions, even if they are well founded. To act otherwise would not have great results and would show a lack of judgment -- often true of young, inexperienced husbands or ones with too irascible a temperament. An intercepted message bearing an invitation or an acceptance has the same practical value.

This form of evidence is weaker than the two preceding ones -- unless these are added -- and justifies only certain sanctions.

4) The sight of lovers giving gifts, either from hand to hand or through an intermediary (" with so-and-so's compliments") also has its value as evidence. But here again the best approach is to use this evidence as a means of obtaining the wife's confession. That is the only practical value of discovering gifts in the wife's possession. If a wife finds no explanations that will pacify the husband, she is forced to admit the act and denounce her accomplice.

4. Sanctions

684 Nkundó law includes several sanctions against adultery some of which are applicable to the spouse, some to the accomplice, and some to an intermediary (ekímá). There are differences [315] in the application of these sanctions depending on the gravity of the case (for instance, repetition of an offence or a habitual offence), the inclinations or temperaments of the persons involved, and the value of the evidence. Although the sanctions are legitimated by law, most of them are applied at the spouse's initiative; but in some instances the authority of the family as well as that of the ndonga have to be involved. Therefore the following varied situations should be pointed out:

A. A husband's sanctions against an adulterous wife.

a) In the case of a delicto flagrante, the husband may beat his wife, wound her, and even kill her. Neither she nor her family have the right to complain. If he kills her he is no longer entitled

684 that she becomes accustomed to her husband's relations with various 581 other women. Consequently, the reaction of the women in general
562 [325] against adultery is much weaker than that of the men. Moreover, because of this same system, a woman is much more exposed to weakness, and stronger sanctions are therefore necessary to insure her fidelity.

Finally, there is one last reason for considering a woman's misconduct as more serious. It is the danger of conception through adultery, with all the attendant consequences: risks for the pregnant woman, forced continence for the husband, etc. (1)

1. See no. 6 below as well as Chapter I, Part 2, Article IV, 3, and Chapter X, Article II, 3.

From the description of sanctions it is apparent that in spite 562 684 of the woman's inferior position, Nkundó law does not leave husbands the full and complete freedom which, according to certain writers, they are accorded among other peoples. Even if the means of repression available to the wife do not incontestably prove that the husband has an obligation of conjugal fidelity -- and the wife's legal status explains a great deal -- the fact remains that the ndonga as well as public opinion approve of even her violent reaction, proving that she is right and the husband wrong.

5. Public opinion

626 Public opinion is fairly lenient in relation to isolated in-837 stances (yětsi, efongo). It clearly recognizes the error involved in infringing on the conjugal rights of another, but the error is attributed to human weakness. In the case of habit the situation is different; it is criticized frequently and severely. Habitual sinners
[192] are called efáfóká (from the verb fafoka, literally "to flutter" and figuratively "to flirt"), ebóngá or ebábóngá (from the verb bâbonga) or ebábóá (from bâboa) "to flutter, to be flighty and fickle." These epithets are applied primarily to women, who are more subject to this failing than men.

626 The shame attached to the discovery of this sort of miscon-
837 duct in the better circles in Europe is unknown among the Nkundó.
This is natural since isolated instances are readily excused. As to [152] the habitual offenders, they are sensitive [326] to the above-mentioned epithets but will not correct their ways on this account any more than people in other parts of the world.

An adulterous husband is criticized as much as an adulterous
837 wife in spite of the difference in the means of repression which 626 684 Nkundó law provides for their respective misconduct.

Public opinion therefore corroborates the conclusion toward which our examination of sanctions has pointed, namely that adultery is condemned by the Nkundó. Opinion is not based on the existence of the sanction but seems to spring from their innate mentality, which makes them perceive adultery as a disorder.

6. Aggravating circumstances

837 If a case of adultery is followed by conception, it becomes 842 especially serious, and for the husband as much as for the natural 672 father. Indeed the latter must assume all the consequences. When circumstances permit the husband makes his wife denounce her accomplice, and she does not refuse to do so. The husband then calls a meeting and demands a pledge (ndanga) from the culprit, who in that way acknowledges that he is at fault and shows his willingness to assume all responsibility. If there is a miscarriage or the child dies during delivery, the natural father must pay the legal father an indemnity of "a slave" or more (sometimes 50 rings); a smaller indemnity is required for a child who is only deformed or sickly. If the mother dies the indemnity consists of a slave and 50 rings, and it may go as high as 100 rings.

In the interim the husband no longer goes near his wife. He leaves her to her lover, who must "preserve the foetus" and observe all the rites and practices associated with pregnancy and childbirth, since, physically, he is the father. (1) [327]

---

1. For fuller details see Chapter X, Article II, 3. For analogous practices

672 837 [842] in the case of an unmarried mother, see Chapter I, Part 1, Article III, 3.

[843] Adultery also becomes especially serious during the period preceding childbirth when there is a special prohibition against it, as endangering the lives of both mother and child, as we will explain in Chapter X, Article III.

7. Remarks and general conclusions

837 [721] 1) In former times the offense of adultery, even in its mildest form, that is, an isolated act, was one of the chief causes of "wars" between villages. Sometimes both sides called on their relatives by marriage to assist them, and the result was a general upheaval.

837 595* 2) As a rule a husband wants his wife to be faithful. Doubtless there are exceptions. Most if not all of them were formerly found among the old polygamists. At their age they were disgusted with continual palavers, and their experience as men had taught them that they often became angry and uselessly complicated their little lives. They preferred to close their eyes, like good old Bo̲no̲ɔ́ w'ìko̲lo̲ngɔ́ of Ite̲ko̲ (the Bombwanja clan of the Boɔ́yá). He came to see me in the Christian village of Bombomba through which I was passing at the beginning of March, 1933. I asked him why he was adorned with so many bells, and he answered naively, "I always wear them. That way my wives know of my coming already from a distance. It gives them time to stop slandering me and to send their lovers away." When I expressed my surprise that he did not want to catch them in the act in order to punish them and end their infidelities, he answered me with a smile, "No, Father, jealousy . . . is for the young. As for me, I have seen so much of it that I no longer have any desire to get angry and make palavers for these trivialities."

548 837 595* Since the coming of the Europeans some unscrupulous men -- especially polygamists -- have been engaging in [328] a kind of procuring. They send their wives to commit adultery in order to be able to catch them in the act and thus enrich themselves. Or else they lend their wives for one night or more to laborers or soldiers who are 548 bachelors in law or in fact.

837 595 x Knowing their wives' weak and sensual natures, some men save the rings that come to them as indemnities -- today as in the past. When this capital has grown sufficiently, they use it to acquire a new wife. The latter is in a sense the other wife's nkita, and she is called, rather crudely, nkita é' efufa, efufa being the piece of cloth (apron) worn by the women. Such action does not mean that the husband wishes to speculate in immorality. He simply profits from what is a fact. But this attitude could easily degenerate, and at the present time the danger that it might is no longer imaginary, although for the moment things have not gone that far. Watchfulness on the part of administrative authorities can avoid all exploitation of marital infidelity by preventing the development of this evil or checking it where it already exists.

837 593 x The attitude toward a spouse's adultery varies greatly with different situations. These variations spring not only from the temperament of the injured party -- this goes without saying -- but also from the way the one guilty of adultery fulfills other marital obligations. This is particularly true with respect to a woman's "weaknesses." If she otherwise shows herself to be a devoted wife who is attentive, respectful, hard working, and one who takes the interests of her husband and children to heart, in a word, a good housewife, her husband will regret her infidelities, but he will pay less attention to these failings, since she compensates for them by many good qualities which show that she seriously loves him and lets herself go solely out of weakness. On the other hand, if a wife becomes neglectful, [329], disagreeable, and disrespectful, the change will indicate that something other than just weakness is involved, that her love for her husband has cooled and has chosen another object.

This is the sound philosophy of conjugal life among the Nkundó, as it is proclaimed and taught by all their old men and sages.

837 3) In spite of the terrible sanctions against adultery, it would appear that this offence has always been common. Certain events, such as deaths, feasts, and dances which last long into the night, are especially conducive to laxity. But even under ordinary

837 circumstances, the dark of evening provides strong provocation. A noisy crowd of young people is often deliberately aroused for the purpose of hiding such frolics. Women especially are the ones to start the scene (called iole). They begin with "games," pinching, etc. Sometimes those who are bolder cry out, iole o! by way of a signal. These irregularities are sometimes agreed upon in advance; other times they are provoked without any advance agreement. The husbands intervene, but it is very difficult for them to catch the culprits.

577 837 4) It would seem that according to Nkundó notions, adultery is not a moral fault, even in the broadest sense of the term, and not punishable by a nonearthly power of religion or superstition, which would intervene to re-establish the order that has been disrupted. Rather one has the impression that their law pertaining to it is purely social. Not that I want to say that this law and its sanctions do not, in the last analysis, spring from a moral idea; but if this moral idea exists, it is very vague and confused and is not expressed by our people. In practice all attention is focused on the sanctions because of the injury to property rights. There never seems to be the slightest reference to a moral religious idea. [330]

And this is probably the chief reason for the frequency of adultery in spite of the sanctions, for while these undoubtedly reduce the evil they are powerless to stop it. But this statement does not apply exclusively to our people. Every law is an ideal. Sanctions attempt to ensure that it is observed. But the masses never attain the intended goal. When some individuals are superior to the ideal imposed by law, it is because society falls short in performing its task, as is the case in Europe today. Among the Nkundó, law and society are superior to the morality of individuals. Besides, sanctions though necessary have never sufficed to assure perfect obedience of laws: nihil leges sine moribus. Good morals must come from considerations that are superior to particular laws and the basis for them.

Although, as we have seen, the Nkundó do not connect the subject at hand in any way with their religious understanding, how can we explain the praiseworthy conduct of many individuals? In my opinion although the Nkundó are not aware of the relationship between the law and its ultimate legislator, they are not without a certain vague, innate feeling that adultery is immoral, and this is corroborated by

● 837 their sense of the personal injustice involved. But they do not reason 577 out these feelings; they follow them spontaneously, blindly.

There is a greater awareness of the social evil in adultery. But it is based not on the philosophical considerations of this harm in itself, but on the consequences of individual cases for the proper functioning of society -- palavers, financial difficulties, enmities, quarrels, wars.

This it seems to me is the present state of their ideas. It does not preclude the possibility that the law and sanctions against adultery may rest on an ultimate basis of moral ideas. And more particularly it is quite possible that the moral idea [331] operates only in the form of a feeling of the great principles of fundamental natural law which is innate to all human reason.

837 5) No one will be astonished if we say that colonization, far 177 from reducing the frequency of adultery, actually contributed to its considerable increase. The abolition of native penalties and punishments together with a great freedom of movement could not help but lead, naturally, to this state of affairs. Every informed colonial who is in close contact with the natives is aware of the situation. "The prohibition of corporal punishments which, according to custom, were the sanctions imposed against a woman's adultery have brought about a license whose extent can be measured by the degree to which a group is subject to our occupation. The forgetfulness if not the contempt for the promises of marriage is nowhere carried so far as in places where the customary disciplines have been completely re-[113] moved." (Maj. Engels, Bulletin Soc. Belge. Et. Col., cited in Congo, 3rd year, Vol. 1, p. 77, April, 1922). That is why various persons have repeatedly called for sanctions against adultery to replace the ancestral means of repression that have been abolished.

But the decrees hoped for have never passed beyond the stage 692 of mere projects. Fortunately, another step, and a fundamental one,
177 has been taken in the meantime through the establishment of native
837 jurisdiction (1926). Under the guidance and control of European authorities, native courts will turn the helm halfway back to the ancient sanctions, adapting these all the while to the new conditions created by colonization and by the introduction of more humanitarian 177 ideas. Nevertheless, great care must be exercised not to go to extremes in introducing these ideas to the point where a society only just beginning to emerge from a pagan barbarism because of the presence of a civilization based on Christianity, is treated as an equal of European communities. Native society must evolve gradually and harmoniously. Rushing is often synonymous with breaking, and it is always a [332] great mistake. And in the matters under discussion, the abolition of sanctions which, in spite of their imperfection and their inadequacy for fulfilling the whole task, have been shown to have a real efficacy, has removed all the coercive power of Nkundó law. A sentimental and excessive humanitarianism must yield before the native society's right to respect for its vital institutions -- unless these are entirely to be condemned -- and therefore before the necessity for severe punishments which it cannot do without for the moment. For our natives are not yet ready for a complete abolition of their customary sanctions, since they still lack a new foundation that would replace their fear of the ancient penalties. Let us therefore take care not to take all means of punishment away from husbands and wives, even if they seem somewhat violent from our viewpoint. Finally, there is no sense in overstressing a respect for members of the weaker sex, who by their very nature sometimes need punishment for the greater good of the whole community. Moreover, as for this respect, our Nkundó do not understand it at all; the way we conceive of it is entirely opposed to their mentality and their laws. Therefore, everything will work out more easily if the native courts are given sufficient latitude to act in the spirit of their ancestral law and if their activity is guided by a constant, informed, and sympathetic control whose sole aim is the healthy evolution of native society.

000 If it is applied within these limits and under these conditions, Nkundó law can redress many wrongs and help to save native society from the abyss into which it is in danger of falling. In spite of its faults and imperfections, it is preferable not only to the system of freedom (or license) which has reigned for many years, but also to

000 new legislation emanating from the European power, a very slow and complex system (the law against adultery which has been requested for decades is still in the realm of studies and projects), lacking in flexibility and the ability to adapt to the very varied circumstances of the peoples of the Congo. A law is needed only for the persons who do not fall within the jurisdiction of the native courts, in order to preserve harmony and impartiality in the exercise of justice, since native society must of necessity feel its effects.

Article VIII. Relations Permitted to the Wife

●837 In this article we will examine the relations a wife may have -- under certain conditions -- with various persons. According to our law, such relations would be adulterous, but Nkundó law does not consider them as such. From this arises the difference between this article and the preceding one. Such relations may be 1) transitory or 2) permanent (concubinage).

1. Transitory relations

561
[574] A wife is permitted to have sexual relations with her husband's age mates (baníngá, sing. boníngá). (1) When one comes to the home of another in the course of travel, the host lends his wives to the visitor, saying: "Here is your house; here are your wives." If he is monogamous he leaves his house and his spouse at the visitor's disposal and goes to bed elsewhere alone. If a woman who is traveling arrives [illegible] village of one of her husband's age mates, the latter -- as soon as he learns of her presence -- invites her to stay in his home for the length of her stay. When they say good-by he gives her a present for her husband" with the boningá's compliments." When one visits another, wives are often exchanged.

1. See Chapter I, Part 1, Article III.

● 837 561 Such is the practice among age mates who maintain good and true relationships. They have free access to each other's wives, and [334] their actions cannot give rise to claims or fines. Nor if one is more "stingy" in the native view than another, can the latter start palavers with him on that account. But such an attitude will result in a cooling of the cordiality of their relationship, and refusals will be reciprocated.

Age mates do not demand indemnities from each other because it is not fitting for one to enrich himself at the other's expense. This rule applies even to "private" relations, to a simple "call," occurring without the lending described above. But if one of them goes too far, that is if he avails himself of another's wife two or three times without the latter doing likewise, a palaver may arise. The husband will believe that he has been wronged and will demand an indemnity. If his companion refuses on the grounds of the relationship which unites them, he may receive a reply such as the following: iníngá átswɛ̌ngela ndé baálí é? "is the age-mate relationship a means for acquiring wives?" A regular battle may follow, and the husband is the one who will win the case before the court.

There are no relations permitted between men and women age mates. Such relations would be considered typical adultery.

The relations between a man and his age-mate's wife are therefore permitted not in themselves, but because of the husband's willingness to have them occur. Furthermore, the husband is not strictly required to yield his wife to him. That he does so is a [572] matter of good friendship, harmony, payment for services, and mutual respect and affection. From the purely matrimonial point of view, the terrain is free and neutral since, they say, the relations involved are purely private between them, and each one does what he thinks best.

837 572 In addition to the boníngá, the Nkundó have a relationship called boseka, "friendship," "friend." (It is called bokandeko among the Bombwanja). (1) In contrast to the practices that prevail between

1. See Chapter I, Part1, Article III.

837 572 age mates, the friendship pact has no connection with the wives of the men involved. If [335] there is a very firm friendship between them, one may lend his wife to the other in some situation or other, but this is a fairly rare occurrence. The Nkundó say that the boseka relationship is for mutual assistance only.

If a case of adultery occurs, the husband has every right to demand an indemnity, but if the occurrence is not repeated, he never goes to extremes, and, because of the friendship, he may ask as little as 2 or 3 rings. If the occurrences are repeated without reciprocity, however, the husband often makes a great to-do; he demands a large indemnity and breaks the friendship pact.

Instead of demanding an indemnity some men give their [431] friend a gift (mpólí) asking him to stop the illicit relations. Often this action is but a subterfuge to relax the other's vigilance so that, feeling freer, he will be more easily apprehended.

837 551 Between persons bearing the same name (ndoí, pl. bandoí), (1) there is no free access to wives, nor are persons of opposite sexes ever considered ndoí. Such relations would be considered concubinage or pure and simple adultery.

837 To summarize, a certain freedom of access to each other's wives exists among age mates, but it is subject to the expressed or tacit consent of the respective husbands. These relations are not considered adulterous. Such freedom does not exist with respect to other categories of persons. But these, nevertheless, had to be mentioned here because the similarity among the kinds of relationship discussed might produce errors in the reader's mind, and because in certain parts of the Congo such persons fall into the same category as Nkundó age mates.

2. Concubinage

595x 837 Concubinage (called limsámbá among the Bokote, isoke among the Bombwanja as well as the Ekonda) is a union [335] between

---

1. See Chapter I, Part 1, Article III.

595 a man and another's wife which is legitimate, regulated, officially 587 acknowledged, and accepted. It is not a marriage; there is no bride price nor are there witnesses other than the woman herself; the wife does not belong to the secondary husband, and in case of a rupture of relations, there is no restitution of valuables however numerous they may be. A man who in this manner purchases the right to cohabit with the wife of another does so because of poverty; he does not have the means to pay a bride price for this woman or [626] any other. Therefore he is disdained and scorned by his fellows. To a certain extent the husband and the lover share a common life: they give each other presents and food, help each other, eat together, and call each other bakalɛ, the same name by which wives of a polygamist address each other.

Such a concubinage can last fairly long. It is usually difficult to break, for the legitimate husband takes such a breaking up badly and considers it an injustice. If the husband is rich and influential, it is dangerous for the partner to dissolve the relationship for he will have to count on the husband's wrath. Thus in the past such a union could continue for many years (in that case it was called ɛkɔkɔ) until the lover (bomɛmbɛ, pl. bamɛmbɛ) was rich enough to free himself. Often it continued for an entire lifetime, and the partner settled in the loɛnjɛ (a place occupied by a man and his wives) of the husband (limɛmbɛ jɛ́ njelɛ́ngwɛ, enjwɛ́ki); he thus became like the husband's child. Nowadays this custom has become much less common because of the freedom resulting from colonization as well as the greater possibility of acquiring wealth. This diminution shows that the practice is not ideal, even in native eyes, and is only a last resort resulting from the state of the distribution of wealth.

A man who desires to live in concubinage with another man's wife has some relations with her in secret and then makes the matter public. For that purpose he gives the woman a knife or a few bakonga to take to her [337] husband. Or he may even call a meeting of the patriarchs and pay the husband in front of them. To make a concubinage public in this way is called ɔja limɛmbɛ, "to make 595 the concubinage come out," (the intransitive of the verb is óla), or 837 ieja (iela) limɔ́mbɔ́, "to bring out into daylight, to make public."

The payment for the right of concubinage is called lonyɔ́ɔ́ngo, although it may also be designated simply by the term limɔ́mbɔ́ (iloko). To show his agreement the woman's husband sends the partner a dog or a few hens (2, 3, 5, or more, depending on his wealth or his satisfaction). The intermediary is not the woman involved but one of her co-wives. Nor is one of the husband's children ever charged with this office. Thereafter, the two partners [431] regularly give each other gifts. The husband's presents are all called botɔ́mo (the generic term given to all presents from a woman to her lover), while those of the other man are called by the term mpatɔ́, "package, gift sent" -- also a generic term.

Often the woman herself urges her lover to make their concubinage public because she wishes to regularize the situation as she fears its possible consequences. Sometimes she threatens to break off all relations, but usually she nevertheless succumbs to temptation.

As soon as the concubinage is made public in the manner described, that publication itself renders it legitimate. The expression used for the act of contracting such a union is kota limɔ́mbɔ́.

If a woman's official lover catches her in the act of adultery, he does not denounce her to her husband but personally demands an indemnity as if he himself were the legitimate husband. If the culprit refuses to pay him, the lover breaks off relations with the woman and denounces her to her husband. Thus the adulterer is punished in any case, and from his point of view it is preferable to pay the bonɔ́mbɔ́, who will be satisfied with a smaller indemnity. [338]

Since the woman does not belong to her lover, he has no rights whatsoever to the fruits of her labor or to her children, who are considered her husband's. But the partner has a right to expect that the woman will prepare food for him. The husband, for his part, has the right to his partner's assistance. The social situation is therefore entirely in the husband's favor. The lover's only gain is to have access to a woman whom he could not otherwise have obtained. But the respect due to the legitimate husband prohibits him from freely availing himself of the woman while he is in the village.

595* Some men are strict on this point, while others are more tolerant.
●837 Clearly, the technique of such men is most subtle. The more a wife's lover is permitted his freedom, the greater is the likelihood that other women, who prefer a young man passionately enamoured of them to their husband, will ask the polygamist to marry them. A [59] man who is sufficiently wealthy and influential can in this manner build up a harem from which he does not benefit physically but which assures him of a dominant social position.

This practice exists almost exclusively in conjunction with polygamy, but cases do occur among monogamists. And among more "civilized" tribes, such as the riverain people of the Lower Congo, a tendency in that direction is developing.

A request for concubinate made by a relative of the husband cannot be considered in the same category with the situation we have just examined. Such a request is more closely related to the request for an inherited wife (see Chapter III, Article II). The difference is obvious. The only thing the two situations have in common is the fact of legitimate cohabitation with another man's wife. One perceives this immediately upon comparing the two.

Article IX. The Family's Role in Marriage

We have found that there are situations in which a woman is 596 to some extent considered and treated as the wife not only of her 581 husband, but also of certain of his relatives (Article VI). Moreover, we have seen in Chapter II the big role that the families play in the arrangement and continuation of their children's marriage. In discussing the question of the inheritance of wives, we have seen that the close relatives of the deceased have rights over the widow; one of them may marry her without any obligations toward the chief heir, and the new union is not a new marriage but a continuation of the previous marriage, which is not broken in spite of the first husband's death. A similar observation was made in relation to the practice of wife replacement (Chapter III, Article IV).

All this leads us to raise a question: To what extent does the family have collective rights over the wife? The following answer is 595x that no one will see her. She lives in this house in the company 554 of her ebísa, her daughters, some female relatives, or even another of her husband's wives, who must wait on her, prepare food for her, etc., and who go out and enter freely. Her husband also enters at will and spends the usual number of nights with her. No other man is permitted to enter the enclosure.

During her period of seclusion, the bolɛ́mbɛ́ may not do the slightest work. She does not wash with water, but only with palm oil. She walks only on mats. She is also exempt from mourning for her parents. (Compare with Chapter I, Part 1, Article II.)

When the period of seclusion comes to an end, the husband announces the coming-out feast. There is merrymaking, dancing, and drinking. Mats are spread from the door of [351] the hut of seclusion all the way to the middle of the street. The two men who brought the woman to the hut come again and, taking her by the arms at the entrance to the enclosure, lead her over the mats. The ceremony thus ends without further ado.

The bolɛ́mbɛ́ is henceforth free and acts like any other woman except for the wearing of furs. She may work, draw water, cook, travel, visit her parents, etc. But her husband's [563] honor and his reputation as a rich man require that he give his [567] bolɛ́mbɛ́ one or several slaves, or Batswa, or -- as is more frequently done -- one or two bibísa, who are supposed to take [377] care of her housework and thus free the princess.

595x Adultery with her -- after her seclusion -- is more 554 severely punished than misconduct with an ordinary woman as
● 837 regards the indemnity to be paid. But as a flagrant insult, it is 614 considered very serious indeed, not so much as an infringement or marital rights as an attack on the honor of the whole clan or group of clans involved. Thus, while adultery with a nkɛ́ndɛ́, for instance, is a private matter, arousing the husband's jealousy and anger, misconduct with a bolɛ́mbɛ́ is a public offense. The whole clan is enraged -- for they believe that their honor has been attacked, and all the members together press for vengeance for

595A
579 this outrage (nkele eleki ɛy'olɛmbɛ). It is a kind of national dis-
591 honor. This observation also clearly pinpoints the great differ-619 ence between the favorite and the bolɛmbɛ.

The following custom should be mentioned in this con-
595A nection: if any man, even a stranger or one who comes from a
721 great distance, comes and -- over the fence -- strikes the roof 579 of a bolɛmbɛ's ilɛlɛ of seclusion with his elɔfɔ (1) as a call to [579] 1. A wooden bell (see Congo, 1935, Vol. 2, p. 366, figs. 4 and 5).

war, the whole village is obliged to take up arms to defend him. All the men [352] accompany him and unite with his family against the enemy clan, whatever the distance may be. The Nkundo say that the act of touching the bolɛmbɛ's hut infuriates the entire clan and makes them take up arms without hesitation. (1)

1. Compare the result of a serious offense, whose effect is entirely in the offender's favor, to analogous cases described previously, for example in Chapter III, Article VII; Chapter VI, Article V, 4, Appendix; and below in Chapter VIII, Article II, 3, (2).

595A One last indication of the social nature of this institution
579 is the fact that the bolɛmbɛ has the right to sit beside her husband at public gatherings and feasts, a prerogative which she alone of all women possesses. With her is a boy or girl who serves as her "boy" and carries the seat (bofnga) on which she sits.

When a bolɛmbɛ dies her husband may put another in her place. To do so he repeats the ceremony described above. It is called sangoja bolɛmbɛ, "to make succeed to the title of bolɛmbɛ."

As we saw in Chapter I, Part 1, Article II, a man may even make his daughter a bolɛmbɛ.

595* Since there are many wives, they have much less work in preparing the husband's food, regardless of whether the co-wives divide the days among themselves or cook for him every day. Therefore, the fields they have to prepare and care for are less extensive, there is less firewood to fetch, less manioc to soak, fewer vegetables to grow, etc. On the other hand, if a monogamous husband has visitors, his wife's work never ends.

In addition to this reason there is another, which is not admitted but is given categorically by impartial natives; it is freedom or license. The wife of a monogamist is always bound to her husband and can absent herself [367] only with difficulty. Her husband wants to have her near him, both for food and for conjugal relations. A polygamist's wife is a good deal freer. Even her prolonged absence does not disturb her husband unless he suspects infidelity or is excessively jealous. Furthermore, [837] since the various wives have their specific nights, she has more freedom to give herself to her lovers. For many wives this is the chief reason for their preference for polygamy -- we are speaking, of course, of the situation today.

Article IX. Children of a Polygamist

The various children of a polygamist live with their respective mothers, who must provide their sustenance and bring them up. Usually the other wives are strangers to them, and their contacts with them are not much more frequent than with the other women in the village. If a special affection binds their mother to her co-wives, children also become involved, just as they are involved in the antipathies, dissensions, and rivalries of the harem. Usually they respect their father's wives, especially the elderly ones. But later a boy may allow himself to be carried away by passion and have illicit relations with one of the younger wives.

> of this rule, however, could trouble the religious feelings of native Christians and thus produce an effect that is the reverse of the one desired. A religious marriage is in fact indissoluble, and in such cases the obligation to make restitution would be equivalent to a recognition that a religious union could be dissolved. And not only would the native consider this an opposition between the public authorities and Christian morality, but in addition the stability of marriages in general would greatly suffer.

here it must be noted that certain parents use hypocritical circumventions rather than openly showing their refusal. This is how they go about it: if the woman has really abandoned her husband and he, for good reasons such as those given above, no longer cares for his wife with whom he can no longer live (especially if he is monogamous), the question of reimbursement arises. The woman, in connivance with her parents, who do not want to make restitution of the bride price, publicly and officially declares that she is not leaving her husband and wishes to return to the conjugal household, whereas her only intention is to help her parents avoid paying the bride-price valuables. In time she will manage to get out of it one way or another.

3. Special cases

586x There are some rather special cases in the dissolution of marriage. The first has occurred more frequently since colonization, while the last has practically disappeared.

586x 1) Njangó. This word is the noun form of the verb angola, "to seduce or lead astray" (another's wife, his laborer, his slave,
● 837 etc.). Therefore, it is a generic term, but it is primarily applied 587 to the seduction of a married woman in order to make her leave her husband. It therefore denotes a man's act. Of the woman it is

586 simply said that she has left her husband (aɔ̃kɔ́fa) and has been taken
837 in marriage by X (aɔ̃kúmbwa ɛ́ka Sóngɔ́ló). Having fallen in love
587 with another man's wife [390] and desiring to marry her, a man tries to win her favor. If she consents he collects the valuables necessary for the bride price. He then asks the woman to come to him and pays the bride price as for any marriage.

Instead of going directly to her seducer, the woman may also first go to her parents, especially if they are in favor of her plan. If they are not she would not succeed, because they would prevent her from carrying it out.

Cases of njangó were formerly rare because they were risky.
[721] As a matter of fact, they constituted a casus belli. Anyone who undertook such a venture had to be in a position to take the consequences of his act, especially with respect to the payment of an in-[178] demnity. Nowadays, on the other hand, these occurrences are much more frequent, even when the new husband does not have the means to pay the bride price at once. Nevertheless, the reversal in government policy is beginning to produce good results. The woman, or her mother, is often imprisoned; rarely the seducer. This penalty is often sufficient to restore order. But to keep from being exposed to further difficulties caused by the woman who no longer loves him, the abandoned husband sometimes refuses to take back his unfaithful wife.

The rarity of cases in former times as well as the fact that [671] they constituted a legitimate reason for war shows that the njangó did not have the approval of Nkundo law but that it was more or less considered an infraction.

2) Taking refuge. Because of the change in circumstances,
586 the practice of taking refuge is no longer common today. It used
577 to be done as follows: A woman who absolutely wanted to leave her husband and had no means of doing so, since no man had asked for her in marriage and her parents were powerless to help her, went secretly to a rich and influential man whom she would have liked as a husband. She arrived unexpectedly, stood before him, or even threw herself at him, crying, [391] Bejwó békí! ónjéngé.

843 a woman's mother proceeded with the ceremony in the absence of the husband and his family. The latter were furious. They revealed the matter so that if anything should happen later to the mother or the child the law would be on their side. In that way the husband could evade responsibility and place the blame on his wife and her family so that they would have to pay an indemnity.

The pregnant woman does not remove the paint for three or [302] four weeks after the ceremony. Nowadays the use of paint having [178] disappeared except for certain occasions and among older persons, it is left on for only one night. In addition the surface smeared has been reduced to a line in the middle of the head or even one single spot.

[783] During this ceremony the Bombwanja have a public confession
● [837] (etato) of the lovers. But since the Bokótɛ́ wait until after delivery, we will deal with it later on.

On the night following the ceremony described, the couple [833] [476] "fasten the fetus" through their carnal union. Were they to omit this act, the child would die before birth.

For subsequent pregnancies the fastening of the fetus is no longer preceded by the same formalities.

The couple continue to have relations during the entire [833] period of pregnancy "in order to open an easy passage for the child."
843 On the other hand, they must strictly observe marital fidelity.
837 Nevertheless, a polygamist may have relations with his other wives.

In addition to this essential art, the interdict also includes a secondary part; the couple may not even commit acts even very remotely related to procreation. Thus they may not:

1) Touch in any way whatsoever -- even to shaking their hands -- persons with whom they have had adulterous relations; such persons must therefore be avoided.

2) Sit next to such persons.

3) Look at them.

4) Enter a house or apartment where they are.

5) Eat "from the same pot."

6) Lie in another couple's bed.

7) Other persons may no longer sleep in the bed of the couple bound by the bokeka.

843 This law requiring a most strict fidelity lasts until the end 837 of the bokeka for the husband, but until the weaning of the child for the wife. It is especially strict for the period of seclusion (see below, Article III, 3).

The violation of the essential stipulation of this interdict (-fénda bokeka) results either in the death of the woman during pregnancy and especially during seclusion or in the death of the child later on. [477]

A. If the woman dies during this period, the suspicion is placed a priori on her husband. The Nkundó say abfénda wǎlɪ, "he has transgressed against his wife." Unless he can prove his innocence through public actions, the judgment of a magician, or autopsy[sic].

If the woman has been the victim of a seducer, he is held responsible and must pay a large indemnity equivalent to the bride price that was paid for the deceased. If no other man is involved, the affair has no consequences.

843 In the past the combined autopsy and Caesarian section was 163 always performed. It had a dual purpose: to remove the child and 754 to examine the mother. If the operation revealed the existence of 845 a "stomach" (likundú), the deceased was of a noxious (lilọka)
853 nature or constitution and therefore caused the death of her child.
If the child remained alive, it proved that he was of a magically superior nature and was able to resist the natural evil spells of his mother, which thus turned against their unwitting author. (1)

1. The Nkundó believe that only animals have a "stomach" (likundú). If a human being has one, that is, if his viscera are large, curved, in compartments, in a word, abnormal, that person is an evildoer. He commits evil acts voluntarily or, most frequently, unknowingly. Some men with a likundú can be recognized by the fact that they eat their nails, hair, etc. The Nkundó must certainly have observed relationships between this habit and a deformity of the stomach.

853 The child is given to a wet nurse (a kinswoman, a stranger, a Botswa woman, depending on who is available).

845
843 If the mother's body shows no signs of evil-doing or of "the hatred of others," it is thought that her death was caused by evil spells on the part of the child. Thereupon some kill the child to prevent it from doing harm during its whole life; others, on the contrary, spare it despite everything.

● 837 If the husband (for it is he above all who is involved, since he is most exposed to possible lapses) has unfortunately been guilty of misconduct, his wife has only a slim chance [478] of salvation. Nevertheless, it is still possible for her to be saved, on condition that from then on her husband abstain from any sexual act and from all the accidental gestures and actions described above. The least he can do under these circumstances is to inform his wife of his indiscretion so that she can take precautions. If he wants to [672] ward off any possibility of causing his wife's certain death, he sends her home and gives his father-in-law a pledge (ndanga) through which he recognizes his guilt and shows his intention to assume the entire responsibility for his misdeed. An upright man prefers to act in this fashion, for he never knows whether one day he will not inadvertently violate one of the prohibitions.

837 B. The child's death is the result of the putrefaction of the mother's milk, the mother being thus incapable of nursing. As in the preceding case, the offense is a priori imputed to the husband -- isɛ́ aβoma bɔ́na la ndota. (1) Since he has wronged no one but himself, no palaver ensues; the "natural" punishment is sufficient. This does not mean that he is not the object of evil tongues; people point at him and at times remind him of his misdeed. To remove the blame from himself, he can resort to [153] 1. Ndota is an illness caused by the violation of prescriptions of a sexual nature (See Chapter I, Part II, Article IV, 2, A).

853 an ordeal or ask a magician's judgment or a magical practice to 837 reveal the culprit. The culprit who is discovered is not subject to any social sanction; he is punished by the ordeal itself or the spell cast against him.

If the mother's adultery is proven through her having been [684] caught in the act, her seducer is considered guilty. He must pay the death indemnity (20 to 30 copper rings). The woman is not at all involved as far as society is concerned; it is a matter between her and her husband.

In order to prevent any harmful effect on the child, the 751 Nkundó resort to a potion called bondandota, which will be explained 854 in [479] the next article, 3. "Medication" by scarfication might also be mentioned. This therapy is applied to the parents as well as to the child. If the father is wealthy, he invites the wife's family to come and perform the operation themselves.
As in all comparable situations, the invitation is accompanied by the handing over of a pledge, and farewell presents (belingako) are given at the end of the visit. In addition the wife very often goes to live with her parents for some time after her seclusion in order to increase the efficacy of the treatment.

The sanction incurred for a violation of the secondary
843 stipulations is less serious. For instance, the pregnant woman suffers
[684] from violent migraines, which often cause fainting and sometimes make delivery very difficult; thus they can even cause death. The husband is seldom bothered by these headaches. But he takes great pains to faithfully observe the law in order to spare his wife such painful consequences and to avoid the death of the child being born.

Apart from sexual abstention and the rules connected with it, the couple are also subject to various prohibitions which are clearly based on superstitious ideas. Thus:

1) They must neither go down into a well nor dig in the earth. The woman would die, for it is as if they were digging her grave.

2) They must not carry anything together with another person, for that is how corpses are carried, and such carrying would be the cause of death, through imitation of the woman's funeral procession.

843 3) They must not climb up on the roof (they are not forbidden to climb a palm tree in order to cut off nuts)

4) They must not eat animals killed by a carnivore (leopard,
843 841 crocodile, etc.), or the child would die a sudden and unnatural
262 death like the victims of such wild beasts. [480]

825 5) They must abstain from animals such as porcupines, anteaters, certain birds, crocodiles, and gavials, (1) who are in the habit of living in the hollows of trees or in dens. The delivery would be very painful if they ate them, for the child would roll up and crouch in the mother's womb. Fish that find shelter in passageways do not produce such consequences and are therefore eaten.

1. In this region women never eat snakes or bats (loléma, bonkómí, ífukyá).

6) They must not eat turtles (2). A very difficult birth is feared, for the turtle withdraws into its shell and encloses its anal extremities as in a vise, and the child would do the same.

2. In some tribes (Bongili, Bonkoso) women always abstain from eating such reptiles.

7) They must not eat the head of a monkey. The child would be born with deep-set eyes resembling the monkey's.

8) They must not eat the large antelope known as mbuli, because it has a long neck and flabby flesh, and the child would acquire the same defects.

9) They must not eat the lioóló fish, which would cause
[153] migraines, since it swims fiercely without direction.

The results of bokeka and the obligations resulting from it
843 are connected with natural paternity. Thus, if a woman becomes
● 837 pregnant as a result of relations with a regular, recognized lover, the latter must assume all responsibility. He is required to "fasten the fetus" and to observe all the regulations pertaining to the

843 bokeka. The same is true if the pregnancy is the result of adultery; 837 the natural father must bear all the consequences of his act. The husband is absolved from them and has no relations with his wife until the end of this particular pregnancy. The culprit must give him a pledge by which he publically recognizes his responsibility, and he is expected to fulfill all the duties of a husband. Therefore he may have relations with the woman during her entire pregnancy without paying additional indemnities. If any accident befalls the mother or the child, he is made to pay a large indemnity.

Note finally that, as we have pointed out in Chapter II, [583] Article XI, no bride-price payment can be made from the time the pregnancy becomes visible until after the end of the period of seclusion.

843 844 757 To facilitate childbirth the previously mentioned concoction of various leaves mixed with kaolin (isaá) is continuously applied to the abdomen. Medical scarifications on the abdomen are also performed.

Finally, as the time of delivery approaches, special douches [278] made from a concoction of the bark of the boímbo tree (1) are administered. All these treatments are called betɛ́ byá bosánjá, that is, medicines (for the purpose) of an easy delivery.

Article III. Birth

844 1. Delivery

A woman remains with her husband for childbirth; she does not go home to her family. Only exceptionally does she give birth elsewhere -- for instance, if she has been sent home for one reason or another, or during a trip, while working in the fields, near a stream, or a spring, etc. Such sudden unexpected deliveries

1. Certain douches, especially the one made of boímbo, are also used as abortive agents.

846 of a dried banana leaf. Three knots are tied in it. The helper holds it in one hand and with the other cuts off the first knot, which she carries away with her. The mother keeps her end in her hand and presents the other to her husband. She receives the knife from the hands of the helper and cuts between the two knots so that each spouse carries away his end. Each time the parties involved say, "We have cut the bofofó; we are separating; go away." Having thus bid each other farewell, each fastens his end to the roof of the seclusion hut.

This ceremony ends the period of seclusion and puts an end 846 to the ekelɛ prohibitions. From then on the couple may have sexual 837 relations together, the helper can resume her usual life, and adultery on the part of the father can no longer harm the child or the mother. Note, however, that the child's immunity to the father's misconduct implies one condition: the father must not take it on his knees the day he commits adultery. By the following day the effects of his act have been nullified. A woman can discover her husband's infidelity through his refusal to take the child. Often she makes use of this means to obtain a confirmation of her suspicions. Some men abstain from all misconduct solely to guard against any such possibility. Adultery may have a harmful influence on the child even after it is weaned if it has a weak constitution. [491] All this seems to indicate that the reaction is considered to be physical and direct rather than a sanction based on religion or superstition.

846 Nkundó therapeutics include an antidote, however; it is 789 called bondandota (from ndota "an illness caused by the infraction of prohibitions of a sexual nature"). It consists of a potion made [278] from the sap of an aroid bearing the same name, which is mixed with the sap of the libúlúkakó plant. If for some reason or other the couple have been away from each other for a fairly long time, they sit or stand face to face and take the child on their knees, which touch each other, and each one makes the child drink the potion twice, once from each hand, making sure to turn its face toward him [or her]. Usually the couple also drink some of the brew, though it is intended primarily for the child. Without these precautions the relations between the pair and the father's

846 taking the child would cause the child's death. The same precau-
789 tion is also in order if the husband goes on a trip before the child's birth and does not return till after the delivery

We have just seen that the harmful effects of the father's 846 misconduct on his child's life is effectuated through the father's 837 act of taking the child on his knees. Thus the Nkundó speak of baóngó b'âbé, "a father's bad knees," to indicate his reprehensible
[826] conduct, and they say that the bondandota potion is administered to the child so that it will not die because of the father's bad
knees. (1)

> 1. The expression baóngó b'âbé is also used when an undertaking which requires continence is unsuccessful. (See Article II, 3).

When a child has painful and persistent diarrhea, it is often 753 interpreted as the effect of the father's infidelity. As soon as they 454 become aware of it, the couple separate for some time, and the father no longer touches the child. [492]

Contrary to what one reads on this subject about other peo-
837 ples of the Congo, Nkundó couples do not have to remain continent
834 beyond the period of seclusion. The separation ceremony gives the 789 husband back the freedom of action he had before his wife's pregnancy. For the wife the bokeka remains strict with respect to illicit relations until the child is weaned However she, too, may regain
her freedom by having recourse to an antidote, the ingredients of which she purchases from a person who holds the secret. The ingredients are placed in a small antelope horn which is then stopped [824] up by means of bolakɔ́ (resin from the Symphonia gabonensis). The interested party wears it about her loins on a string or a bead belt or, preferably, on a special creeper. This amulet protects the child's life from the harmful influence of the mother's acts of adultery, but it does so only on condition that she does not separate herself from the child, as we will explain further on. This procedure

837 is not morally condoned, and a woman who resorts to it does not 834 escape criticism. She is compared to a goat, who does not have 789 a regular and steady husband: álɔ́mya bɔ̌na lontaa, "she nurses her child as a goat does." (1)

1. The opposite of lɔ́mya lontaa, -- if it is used to show the contrast -- is lɔ́mya lontómbá.

When the separation ceremony is ended, the mother is 846 adorned with all her ornaments and goes out to walk in a procession through the village. The child is carried by an older sister, a niece, etc. He is taken around the village, bɔ́nangya bɔ̌na l'olóló Small presents are offered him everywhere -- an arrow, a small knife, a hairpin, etc There is no feast, however; if that honor were accorded him he would die of it (for when someone dies, there is always a feast of farewell in his honor). [493]

Article IV. Nursing

During the first few days after birth an infant does not suck 853 the milk of its mother, since it is "too hot." He is fed by a third person, preferably a relative.

On the third day the following occurs:

1) The mother's breasts are massaged (-kulola baɛ́le). For 853 this purpose the Nkundó use leaves of the bǔtɛ creeper and the 757 lilongyá plant (Adenostemma viscosum Forst.), a green leaf from a banana tree called mɛlɛngɛ, several pieces of peeled sugar cane, the tips of the dried leaves of any banana tree, and sometimes other plants are added as well. All the ingredients are crushed, then boiled, and white sand and a bit of red paint are mixed in with them. The mixture is called ndengó. It is prepared by the women who are in charge of massaging the breasts. The bǔtɛ leaves, however, must be picked by the father. He goes to the forest early in the morning and first shakes the creeper so that all leaves that are not firmly attached will fall off. Then he climbs it and picks the desired 853 757 the sap, which she then mixes with water. The resulting liquid is oily and foams like soap. She places a few drops on a piece of banana leaf and makes a sachet of it. She holds this against the breast for a certain time until the boil, similar to a blood clot or a piece of liver, leaves the breast and enters the sachet. She then shows it to those present. From then on the mother can nurse her child without fear; her milk has become healthy and normal.

837 853 684 783 2) The mother's public confession must include the names of all the men with whom she has had carnal relations since the child's conception. Other groups, such as the Injóló, extend this obligation even to instances preceding that moment but which have not been declared at a previous occasion. The confession is public. The masseuse related to the husband begins to crush the leaves to be used in rubbing the breast; as she moves the pestle and says to the mother, "Name a man." The mother replies by giving a name. The masseuse says nyongo, "indemnity." Then all those present say yengô, yengô, yengô, "absolved". Then it is the other masseuse's turn, and she interrogates the mother in the same way. The process continues till all the names have been cited. If [495] the mother cites the name of a man who is a close relative of her husband and who therefore does not need to pay an indemnity, the masseuse does not reply nyongo. Instead a member of the husband's clan makes the gesture signifying [201] exemption: he holds the kernel of a palm nut (lolikó) in his left hand and throws it by means of a small board which he holds in his right. Among the Injóló the man takes two kernels and strikes them against each other and then throws them away. Were the woman to suppress a name the child would die. If she has no admission to make, she replies, "No one besides my husband."

The indemnity that must be paid by those who are obligated to do so consists of a hen and a bunch of bananas (or their cash value) which are to be given to the masseuses, who will then divide them. Were the accused to refuse, the husband would demand a regular indemnity from him after the end of the seclusion.

The Bombwanja have this confession at the time of the [194] fastening of the fetus. A few old women married into the clan carry out the interrogation. The kernel of the fruit of the palm is thrown by means of a knife.

837 Note, finally, that the confession is restricted to married 783 women. It is never expected of a young unmarried mother. Therefore it would seem to be a practice connected with marriage (a 853 social institution) and not with childbirth (a physiological phenomenon).

This confession is called etato or lotato, from the verb [192] -tata, "to confess," (for which the generic term, sanga, "to say," is sometimes substituted).

I was unable to find any reason for this practice other than that of avoiding the death of the child. It is evident, however, that this explanation does not exhaust the question, although it is entirely possible that the original and deeper meaning has been lost without leaving any trace in the minds of the present generation. [496]

3) During the entire duration of nursing, the mother must 853 not be separated from her child. For the usual circumstances of 933 daily life, this rule is broadly interpreted; but during sexual relations it is strict, and no exceptions or excuses are permitted. Negligence under these circumstances would inevitably bring about the death of the child by ndota as soon as the mother took it back. This rule holds for legitimate relations as much as for illicit ones. Therefore the mother must always keep her child at her breast.

4) If at some point during nursing, the milk no longer flows
853 in sufficient quantity, the mother is given a potion consisting of [757] the extract of the bark of the bolóngé tree (which has a fruit con-
[278] taining a very sweet milky sap). Then she eats vegetables called lotélé. (1)

1. The leaves of this plant are also ordinarily eaten as vegetables, but they are consumed especially by those who possess the modem magical practice known as boyaóli.

5) An accident to which the Nkundó attach great importance
[262] is the rejection or vomiting of milk into the mouth of an adult, even if the person affected is the infant's mother. Such a person

595 wife was called Lonkata. This was, however, more a category, for there were sometimes four Lonkata in a harem. The rest were ordinary wives. Among the Ekonda, the first wife was called Nkumokolo, just like the Bomatsa. The second wife was called Ekila or Nkonde. The remaining wives were the ordinary wives of the harem.

The first wife, Bomatsa, always remained at home and never 595 left the harem. The second, Ekila or Nkonde, accompanied the 484 polygynist everywhere; she was at his side on all his trips. The Bolumbu usually went completely alone to do errands in other villages.

595 These old customs of priority among the wives are now gradually beginning to disappear.

684 It was forbidden under severe penalty to have relations with the first, second, or third wife of the polygynist. The penalties were death, slavery, or a large fine.

This was their law concerning adultery, enforced with severe punishment.

The ordinary wives of the harem were less strictly guarded.
595 This often depended on the jealousy or indifference of the polygynist.
837 Anyone who had relations with these wives had to pay a fine, or rather, a price of prostitution. Since the wives were almost all in the possession of the polygynists, there were naturally many men without a wife. These, then, often had relations with the ordinary wives of the polygynists. Also, the sons of the polygynist had relations with them; the polygynist himself sometimes even had relations with the ordinary wives of his neighbor. This was the bad consequence and the immorality of polygyny.

It is easy to understand that the ordinary wives of the polygynist, 595 having relations with others, often left their husband, or rather,
586 their master in order to go to another. The ordinary wives constituted the largest number. It is because of this that one now finds many women who have had three or four, sometimes even seven, different husbands in succession. Among some tribes, [534] the Ekonda among them, they were stricter; a wife who had already left her husband or master two or more times was considered to have little worth.

567 The female slaves who were taken in war were given by the 595 polygynist to his male slaves as wives. They could also be installed in the harem among the ordinary wives. Their children could have the same rights as the other children of the polygynist

837 When a wife of a polygynist had illicit relations with another
586 man of the same village, this was called Bonsamba. When she had such relations with a man of another village, this was called Isoke. As we have observed, the ordinary wives of the harem often had such relations. When the woman eloped with her bonsamba or isoke, or with whomever it was, she was pursued by her husband or owner, who tried to get her back. If the wife refused, negotiations over the bride price began.

If an agreement was reached or if a pledge was given as guarantee for the payment, the first bond was considered broken, and the woman was considered bound to this second man, even though he had been her bonsamba or isoke.

It might also happen that the first husband was so jealous that he did not want to make any agreement; then he attempted to kill either the guilty wife or her second husband. If the woman became 593 ill at the home of her husband, he went to tell her family and had to 758 give a security to the family.

583 Often the family came to get the wife, in order to be able to care for her better. If, in such a case, the wife [538] died at the home of her family, there were no further difficulties about the bride price, according to their customs. If, however, the bride price had still not been completely paid, the family asked their son-in-law to pay the remainder.

583 In recent times, now that the heathen customs have been
178 undermined by the European occupation, we see that the husbands whose wives have gone to their family when sick and have died there, demand the return of the bride price from the family, but this is completely contrary to their old customs. In one case the husband could demand the return of the bride price, namely, if the wife had left while healthy to go to her family and had died there.

562 Buying or Trading of Women. The woman was also in many 439 cases an acknowledged object of trade. The great village chiefs, among others Ibuka and Yoma, of whom we shall speak further, carried on a sort of woman trade. With European articles and also native currency, they went to other districts of the Equator [Province] to buy women with them, just like someone who goes to market, even though no public markets where women were sold actually existed.

prohibition under any circumstances. I have heard these same terms used also by the natives in the vicinity of Coquilhatville.

The body becomes flabby and without strength, and this weakness ends in a fatal paralysis (byongé nsyÍnyuka or nkatééné). In addition, the girls feared that their sexual organs, not yet fully formed, would be torn. They were also imbued with a very intense fear: bofolo w'aende, "the fear of males," bofolo w'ámato, "the fear of females." They also feared death -- bélotéké iwé. The parents added that sexual acts were free from danger only between persons of the requisite age.

857

This does not mean that children did not commit indecent acts. The game of loto, in which little girls try to cook (and which is always one of their favorite games (2) as it probably is throughout the world), often gave rise to it. Small boys joined in the game in order to taste the meal. And quite naturally they began to play at "husband and wife," more or less. Often this game involved only innocent imitations, but other times touching and exhibitions occurred between children of the same sex or of opposite sexes. This game is far more dangerous nowadays, [81], because of a change in the attitude of young people toward sexual matters.

2. Some boys imitate this game in order to acquire the habit of preparing their own meals. Later they benefit from it on more than one occasion.

The game of yembenkongo, in which boys, imitating monkeys, chase each other through the trees and creepers can -- and does -- result in reprehensible scenes.

In former times most girls were married before puberty. But their husbands did not touch them until they had completed their normal development.

836
831
864

Among some individuals the fear of sexual relations was so deeply rooted that it persisted even beyond the age limit and was

832 Kissing between persons of opposite sex is unknown. Embraces occur on the other hand but not in public; they must be considered as preparation to approaching intercourse. (1) An extraordinarily strong passion sometimes leads lovers to engage in more intimate kissing, usually as a prelude to normal intercourse. Although some natives are not shocked by such practices, more responsible people consider them improper. [95]

Article VI. Vices "Contra Naturam"

838

1. Male homosexuality

Homosexuality has been known among the Nkundó since time immemorial, among men as well as women.

Among the former it took the form of sodomy in the past, with one particular characteristic -- for which I do not know the explanation, that is, only the younger of the two men could take the active role. Nowadays among the youth, homosexuality has begun to take on a different form; the boys who practice it lie down in the positions of husband and wife. It is reported that sometimes one of the two says from time to time to his accomplice, "This is what I do with your sister." Is this an indication that here we have homosexuality only in action but not in feeling (in effectu not in affectu, as the moralists say)?

Homosexuality among the Nkundo does not seem to be the result of a special inclination for this vice; rather it has always been a last resort open to those who could not find a natural outlet for their passions. Although we cannot approve of this depravation of instinct either on rational grounds or in adherence to the faith, we must admit that it was more excusable among these peoples whose social organization was disadvantageous to many young people. At the present time there is already much less sodomy because it has become easier to get married. As for the new form of homosexuality, it may be observed especially in places where men are kept rigidly apart from relations 998 with the opposite sex for a long time, such as internment camps, prisons, etc.

2 Female homosexuality

Nkundó girls play at "husband and wife," and even adult married women engage in this vice. According [96] to my informants, the causes are the following: first, an intense and very intimate love between two women, and second, and above all, the fact that wives of polygamists find it difficult to satisfy their passions in a natural way. Often they engage in this practice with co-wives of the same man. The greater liberty introduced through colonization could reduce its frequency, but up till now no great improvement has been observed. What is more, in establishments where girls are too severely kept away from the opposite sex, there has been an increase.

The verb used to designate these depraved acts is yamɛ́ma, "to each other, one against the other." The noun bomɛ́mo is derived from it. But these words are also used to designate a simple embrace. A more specific term is yafkya bonsángo; the verb yafkya (simple form: fkya) means "to press against each other."

Is there any need to say that a people like the Nkundó, whose beliefs are founded on nature, see nothing the least bit wrong with this vice? Consequently it would be desirable for educators and missionaries to draw their pupils' attention to the harm present in such practices.

3. Masturbation

999 This vice seems never to have been practiced by the Nkundó, but at the present time it is known in the large centers and in the camps; from there it gradually penetrates into the interior. Yet it seems to spread with difficulty in native society. It is understandable that a man who has acquired the habit in one of the centers does not rid himself of it without great effort; but as the natives do not have the will to corrupt others, he does not become an agent of its propagation. 837 become somewhat violent, the women recall these flaws, to the 826 great shame of the person who suffers from them. The same is true of the weakness of some of the men which, like an excess of sexual activity, can cause difficulties in a household.

2. Rape

● 839 Rape in the true sense of the word -- that is, the abuse of a woman by the use of violence -- is most unusual among the Nkundɔ. If a woman does not consent, the angry seducer leaves her, often insulting her to the best of his ability. I know of only one case of rape, which occurred some time ago and caused much consternation in the region. Banángɛ, the daughter of Iloko [94] is Liefele of Lofeli (Bongili), was at that time living with her mother's clan the Bonyeke (Bonkoso). She had not yet fully attained physical maturity (her breasts were still very small). One day she went into the forest and did not return in the evening. The family was alarmed, and her father and her uncle Mpɛ́nda ɛa Nkotonkale went to look for her. Finding traces of fresh blood, they followed them till they found Banángɛ's corpse buried in the [illegible]. She had died of hemorrhage; her sex organs, torn, showed the unmistakable signs of rape. People had their suspicions, but it has never been possible to prove the identity of the criminal. If there had been proof, he would not have escaped the mortal vengeance of the unfortunate victim's parents.

All the data I have been able to collect indicates that other instances must undoubtedly have occurred.

3. Incomplete acts

832 Here we are speaking of what moralists call actus impudicitiae, that is, acts whose nature physically leads to sexual pleasure.

Obscene bodily contacts between persons of opposite sex are preparatory acts which excite; even touching the breasts, the abdomen, and taking a person by the arms are included in this category.

276 ●842 According to native belief, the kola nut ensures the fertility of a woman if sexual relations take place the night after the man has used this stimulant.

276 The regular use of kola induces very intense nervous excitement. We noticed that the adolescents and men in their prime scarcely use it. Only the old people use it regularly. Kakua, the old native chief, chewed it from morning to night. One day I pointed this out to him, asking if he were not afraid of the dangerous effects of this overindulgence. He proudly pointed out to me the huts of his seven wives, saying, "Ask them if they don't have children!"

276 263 278 Among the stimulants we may also mention the peanut, widely used by all the tribes, a type of small ground pea, and certain tree roots known to the natives but the exact nature of which we unfortunately could not determine. It is well to note, moreover, that most of the natives use the stimulants as medicaments as well as condiments. They are used for intestinal pains, colic, and as purgatives.

462 252 In all the tribes the preparation of food and meals is exclusively the task of women. They always do it with great care. [142]

252 The kitchen, if it can be called one, is always very simple. If the weather is good, cooking is done in the open in the middle of the village, in front of the hut or behind it, and very often in the shade of the banana trees. If the weather is rainy or cold, the women prepares the meals inside the hut. [Ed., a passage is omitted here.]

833 753 654 which has a strong resemblance to sleeping sickness. (1) One of its symptoms is a weakness of the lower limbs. Instances are cited of individuals who were unable to resist their passions and were punished in this manner. Apparently only the woman dies. As soon as her family discovers that she is stricken,the guilty woman denounces her accomplice. The latter is held responsible and is required to pay a heavy indemnity, which may amount to several dozen copper rings.

833 751 Here as in many other situations the Nkundó have found a way to avoid the danger. There is an antidote (mengɔ́), and it is water (bàsi bale mengɔ́ éà bombilɛ́). Thus those who are unable to control their aroused passions during the day, satisfy it in a shallow stream.

833 753 The fear of bombilɛ́ has been greatly shaken [93] by colonization. If we are to believe the natives, foreign soldiers are responsible for this change also. But the behavior of the latter could not completely destroy the ancient feeling, probably due to a natural shame which makes them seek darkness and privacy for acts of this sort.

833 [579] [842] After intercourse a native woman usually gives herself a douche. She does so for the sake of cleanliness. It often happens, however, that she does not wait long enough before doing so, and thus she neutralizes the effect of the intercourse. This is chiefly a matter of carelessness. Nevertheless, under certain circumstances she may use this means to prevent conception. (1)

833 826 According to my informants, some women have constitutional abnormalities which repel men. As everything readily becomes public, such flaws are quickly known after marriage, though not quite as readily beforehand. Actually love can -- and often does -- cause them to be overlooked. But after the first ardor has cooled, such a situation may become a threat to the stability of a marriage. When quarrels

583 We have spoken of the unproductivity of the bride price. This is a Nkundó notion, and it is accurate only because the old men want to satisfy themselves before their sons. Actually, they could very easily reconcile their desire that the bride price should be productive with the aspirations of the youths, at least in many instances. All they would need to do would be to use the valuables they have received for their sons' benefit by acquiring girls of the same age for them. The productivity of the valuables would not diminish [228] in the least, of course, since the goods would remain in the family. On the contrary, it would be increased because a greater number of progeny would probably be born. But our natives
● [842]
[161] knowledge of physiology does not seem to be sufficiently developed for them to come to this conclusion. And even more probably their egoism has greatly clouded their intelligence and silenced the voice of good sense and fatherly love to make it possible for them to multiply the number of their wives and thus increase the easy satisfaction of their sensuality, augment their wealth, and reinforce their social position. It will be their sons' turn after their death.

561
595 This situation is aggravated by the fact that, except for the bosilo, the brothers, not the sons, of the deceased inherited the widows, who thus remained in the hands of the old men.

582 Because of their attitudes the old men monopolized most of the women. They established large harems for themselves, so that it was very difficult for the young men to find a woman to marry; they had to consider themselves lucky if their father provided them with a child.

582
578 Thus it was unheard of that a young man between twenty and thirty years old should marry, except for a few instances where a man acquired a child who was to become his wife after a number of years. Men were usually forty years old or older before they married.

Nowadays the situation has changed entirely; the attitude of the old men favors the young much more and has become almost normal. The great majority of fathers, if they have the means, procure a wife for their sons as soon as the latter are old enough to express a desire for one. This improvement is due to the fact that it has become

M [illegible] untangle all the threads. Thus it happens that young people form relationships with the intention of marrying without knowing that they are related; they are warned only by the opposition and ensuing explanations of the elders.

We may conclude that marriage among descendants of a common ancestor is generally prohibited if they live in the same village. It is frequently permitted on the other hand, if they belong to different villages, provided that they are not, at the same time, related to one of the ancestresses.

M [illegible] Clearly, it is difficult to say what precise degree of kinship formed the basis for the prohibition of or permission for a marriage between descendants of a common ancestor, or what are the boundaries of an exogamous grouping.

It is also apparent from the preceding observations -- as M [illegible] from the examination of affinity as an obstacle to marriage -- that the descent from a common mother is a more important factor than descent from the father. This does not give proof of a form of matriarchy, though it could be the remains or the beginning of one, or could provide a partial explanation for one. It stems quite simply M [illegible] from the Nkundó notions concerning procreation, in which they attribute the major role to the mother. There is also the fact that M [illegible] greater shame is attached to being united with a person descended from the same woman, and finally the fact that they feel a stronger M [illegible] affection for the mother than for the father (a sentiment [230] which is accentuated by polygamy). The three causes are closely related.

M [illegible] Finally, it should be noted that there is a group among the Nkundó we are discussing which is less strict than the others in this matter. The relatives among whom marriage is prohibited is definitely more limited; that is, their exogamous groupings are more limited. The people in question are the Bongale (see Introduction), and the same phenomenon may be observed among the Elingá. (1)

P [illegible] 1. The Batswá are still more liberal, and in this respect their practices differ very little from ancient European laws and customs.

626 (837) The shame attached to the discovery of this sort of misconduct in the better circles in Europe is unknown among the Nkundó. This is natural since isolated instances are readily excused. As to [152] the habitual offenders, they are sensitive [326] to the above-mentioned epithets but will not correct their ways on this account any more than people in other parts of the world.

837 626 684 An adulterous husband is criticized as much as an adulterous wife in spite of the difference in the means of repression which Nkundó law provides for their respective misconduct.

Public opinion therefore corroborates the conclusion toward which our examination of sanctions has pointed, namely that adultery is condemned by the Nkundó. Opinion is not based on the existence of the sanction but seems to spring from their innate mentality, which makes them perceive adultery as a disorder.

6. Aggravating circumstances

837 592 672 If a case of adultery is followed by conception, it becomes especially serious, and for the husband as much as for the natural father. Indeed the latter must assume all the consequences. When circumstances permit the husband makes his wife denounce her accomplice, and she does not refuse to do so. The husband then calls a meeting and demands a pledge (nlenga) from the culprit, who in that way acknowledges that he is at fault and shows his willingness to assume all responsibility. If there is a miscarriage or the child dies during delivery, the natural father must pay the legal father an indemnity of "a slave" or more (sometimes 50 rings); a smaller indemnity is required for a child who is only deformed or sickly. If the mother dies the indemnity consists of a slave and 50 rings, and it may go as high as 100 rings.

In the interim the husband no longer goes near his wife. He leaves her to her lover, who must "preserve the foetus" and observe all the rites and practices associated with pregnancy and childbirth, since, physically, he is the father. (1) [327]

1. For fuller details see Chapter X, Article II, 3. For analogous practices

837 [842]

in the case of an unmarried mother, see
Chapter I, Part 1, Article III, 3.

[843] Adultery also becomes especially serious during the period preceding childbirth when there is a special prohibition against it, as endangering the lives of both mother and child, as we will explain in Chapter X, Article III.

7. Remarks and general conclusions

831 [721] 1) In former times the offense of adultery, even in its mildest form, that is, an isolated act, was one of the chief causes of "wars" between villages. Sometimes both sides called on their relatives by marriage to assist them, and the result was a general upheaval.

837 595 2) As a rule a husband wants his wife to be faithful. Doubtless there are exceptions. Most if not all of them were formerly found among the old polygamists. At their age they were disgusted with continual palavers, and their experience as men had taught them that they often became angry and uselessly complicated their little lives. They preferred to close their eyes, like good old Bonof w'Ilolongo of Iteko (the Bombwanja clan of the Boôyé). He came to see me in the Christian village of Bombomba through which I was passing at the beginning of March, 1933. I asked him why he was adorned with so many bells, and he answered naively, "I always wear them. That way my wives know of my coming already from a distance. It gives them time to stop slandering me and to send their lovers away." When I expressed my surprise that he did not want to catch them in the act in order to punish them and end their infidelities, he answered me with a smile, "No, Father, jealousy . . . is for the young. As for me, I have seen so much of it that I no longer have any desire to get angry and make palavers for these trivialities."

558 837 595 Since the coming of the Europeans some unscrupulous men -- especially polygamists -- have been engaging in [328] a kind of procuring. They send their wives to commit adultery in order to be able to catch them in the act and thus enrich themselves. Or else they lend their wives for one night or more to laborers or soldiers who are

842 5) The desire to increase the number of children is one of the reasons most frequently given; it is the chief, and sometimes the only, one cited by ethnographers. There is no question that it has a great deal of validity, for the Nkundó like to have many children. It is one of the things on which they pride themselves as well as a powerful means for reinforcing a social position (and we are thus led back to the first reason cited).

The question of knowing whether polygamy actually does favor the birth rate is irrelevant here, even if the results of a comparison were clearly against this system and were it proved that "the more wives a polygamist has, the fewer children he has." For the Nkundó never make this statistical computation. He sees only the principle: several women give more children than one. And for them, that is the gist of the matter. Furthermore, the interest of the people as a whole does not appear on the [157] horizon of the Nkundó's thoughts and feelings: they think only of themselves, and in their egoism, they consider only their own interests.

831 6) To all these reasons given by the Nkundó to justify the practice of polygamy, we must add a sixth, which they never mention, sensuality. Without colonization it would have been difficult for us to make this statement. [374] But the new state of affairs shows several flaws in our people's arguments. We have already pointed out some of them. Furthermore, all the reasons mentioned up to now do not suffice to account for the existence of polygamy. They do not explain why in the past the old men wanted to keep all the women to themselves, or why a given individual becomes a polygamist. It is a fact that for more than one man none of these alleged reasons have been involved. It is also known that several natives have acquired fortunes by European work (as clerks, salesmen, traders, etc.) in order to be able to establish a harem, though there could have been no motive of vanity or gain in social influence. On the basis of my knowledge of circumstances, persons, and places, I am convinced that even for some natives living in their villages, the primary purpose was clearly sexual. I am acquainted with more than one such case.

586ˣ 672 If the wife is ill she may have become ill at her husband's home or elsewhere and these two possible situations must be considered separately. In the first instance there is no cause for divorce, since responsibility for her illness rests entirely with the husband. On the other hand, if the wife contracted her illness while staying with her family, the family must shoulder the responsibility, and if her illness is incurable, the husband can have recourse to divorce. But this is not so if the wife has gone to her parents' home in response to her husband's express order, or if she ran away from the husband's for reasons which are just and reasonable. Some situations may give rise to violent disputes. Such is the case, for example, of an illness during a visit undertaken at the wife's own initiative but for the good of the husband. Theoretically, he should win the case. Also, a stay of twenty-four hours is not considered sufficient to place the responsibility for the illness on the wife's family. (1)

1. For details see Chapter VI, Article III, 3 and 4. See also Chapter IX, Article X.

586ˣ The difference between the consequences of the husband's illness and his wife's is of a practical nature. A husband who suffers from an incurable illness or one that takes too long to cure is usually (though not always) abandoned by his wife. If no other man pays a bride price for her, the marriage continues. If the woman finds a lover, he pays the bride price, which is turned over to the first husband, completing the divorce. But it is not possible to say that the man's illness per se is a cause of divorce, for the wife is under an obligation to take care of a sick husband. [378] But in practice neither of the two families involved demand the application of this law. All yield to the wishes of the woman, who will refuse to continue a union that has so little attraction for her.

Thus illness is not a legally valid reason for divorce. But in practice it is recognized as a situation that can result in the dissolution of a marriage.

● [672] Although the Nkundó ardently desire children, sterility

586 842 is not invoked as a reason for divorce. Yet there are many sterile women. To obtain the fulfillment of his desires, a man will have recourse to polygamy. He will try to obtain the valuables he needs in order to acquire another wife. If he does not have the financial means, he could make life difficult for his wife through petty annoyances and meanness of the kind that are not likely to place him in the wrong. In that way he could drive her into leaving him, and thus recover the cost of the bride price. But such behavior is only hypothetical; it could happen here and there, but I know of no instance. In any case a husband never invokes sterility in order to break up a marriage. Therefore, contrary to what happens elsewhere, the question is not raised in Nkundó law.

586 Included among the factors that make the continuation of marriage impossible is a husband's violations of sexual prohibitions during pregnancy or after childbirth, exposing the wife to mortal danger. For through his misconduct the husband becomes guilty of an implicit repudiation, and the wife's father will make use of his right to protect his child's life. (1)

1. See Chapter X, Article II, 3.

The remaining reasons are those given at the beginning, which can be reduced to the impossibility of continuing the marriage due to an incompatibility of temperaments, the cooling of love, serious offenses, especially if repeated, [378] serious and continual failures in the performance of duties, and faults that dishonor the culprit. (1) The habit of stealing, in particular, must be mentioned in this last category. Women who steal, even small things like manioc, fish, or meat, end in provoking most husbands' antipathy

Article I. Preliminaries

1. Generalities

●842 The Nkundó like to have children. Not only do they like to have daughters, as some too superficial colonials sometimes maintain, but they like to have boys just as much. It is true that a daughter carries the hope of a bride price and all it represents for polygamists eager for pagan glory and carnal pleasures; yet a real preference for children of the weaker sex is seldom observed. What one does encounter, just as in Europe for that matter, is a desire to have a child of a particular sex when, for example, the other is already abundantly represented in the household. Thus a native who already has several boys but no girl or only one, will make offerings to obtain a sister for the boys. That he should do so is hardly astonishing since among these people a sister is the proper and sometimes the only means by which a man can acquire a wife. On the other hand, a father whose progeny are exclusively, or almost exclusively, members of the female sex ardently desires the birth of a son, an heir to the fruits of his labor and someone who would be able to aid and assist him in his old age by building him a hut, clearing the forest for him, and bringing him game or the products of fishing.

855 Actually one seldom hears these preferences expressed. The impression one gets is rather that the Nkundó love their children as such and also because, whatever their sex, they greatly contribute to the reinforcement of his social position; the two motives are inseparable in practice.

It is sometimes maintained that the natives do not refuse to have children because their coming does not inconvenience them in any way, nor do they impose crushing financial obligations

842 855 upon them; their upbringing costs them nothing, whereas among Whites the maintenance, dress, food, instruction, and occupational placement involve considerable expenses. It cannot be [465] denied that while the modern European is exacting from all these viewpoints, enchained and blocked by an ever growing multitude of needs, the material life of the native is simple and his necessities are reduced to an indispensable minimum. Nevertheless, it can hardly be said that it is as easy for him to raise a large family with many children as it is to have the responsibility of a smaller number. Without speaking of clothing -- especially at the present time -- there is the food for growing children, which forces him to clear a greater expanse of forest and to work harder at the various ways of fishing and hunting; and when the time comes for the sons to find wives, he is the one who must arrange to procure the valuables needed for a bride price.

For their part, Nkundó women like to transmit life as much as the men, if not more so. Pregnancy may make them disagreeable and grumpy and sometimes cause them pain, but they put up with it and, as a very general rule, do not think of depriving themselves on that account of the happiness of giving birth to a cute little creature, of nursing it, of carrying it in their arms or on their shoulders. The difficulties and pains of maternity do not repel them. Although later, during the payment of her daughter's bride price, a Nkundó woman's greed will lead her to loudly claim the payment due her and even sometimes destroy her child's love because of delaying this financial operation, the delay does not come to their minds until the time comes.

In short, the Nkundó woman feels a perfectly natural, maternal love for her child.

842 855 152 There are of course exceptions to this general rule. And the contrary would be astonishing for a pagan population who give free rein to all their passions or, at least, restrain them only very [466] slightly, and whose love is far from the perfection one may find among a people ennobled by fifteen centuries of Christianity. Moreover -- as all the preceding pages testify -- our Nkundó are not fashioned from a uniform mold notwithstanding the impression given by certain colonial and ethnological works. All the individual 842 855 152 differences can be found here, although they are less apparent to a European observer since we usually approach the natives as a group and our contact with them is often too impersonal.

2. Abortion

847 A great enemy of maternal love is the practice of abortion, which has always been known to the Nkundó. Here we cannot describe all the prescriptions used for that purpose. It will be sufficient to enumerate the reasons for which they have recourse to this practice. They are as follows:

1) A woman's lasciviousness; the procreation and subsequent care of a child to some extent prevent the indulging in carnal pleasures. Formerly this cause of abortion was nonexistent or very [178] rare. Needless to say, it has become more common, especially in the centers where it is constantly on the increase and where, in addition, occasional or regular "housekeepers" learn new means of sterilization and abortion.

2) A woman's antipathy or persistent anger toward her husband may encourage her to prevent conception or destroy its effect.

3) An excessive weakening of the mother's organism caused by a large number of conceptions and childbirths at too short intervals.

4) The encumberance and the difficulty of watching, carrying, and taking care of many small children -- bɛ́lota [illegible] [467] [179] [illegible]. This reason is especially important for well-known dancers.

It goes without saying that several of these motives may be combined in the same person. For instance, I knew of a woman who aborted at the time of her eighth child. Her recurrent pregnancies, together with continuous work, had greatly reduced her strength. A palaver with her husband was the last straw; she decided to get rid of the fruit she carried in her body.

Outside of these exceptions the natives of this country ardently desire their own continuation through a large number of progeny. (1)

1. The same is not true elsewhere. Examples to that effect are cited from regions that are

847] they could count. Nevertheless, if it happens to a young unmarried mother, little or no fuss is made over it because no one can feel wronged; at most the culprit is scolded. For a married woman, on the other hand, it is one of the most serious infractions. Her husband has an immediate right to the fetus that would have become his child. He cannot beat or mistreat the offender in punishment, for her condition will not permit violence, but he can abandon her to her fate by refusing her all assistance, in particular by refusing to bring her firewood, the heat of which she greatly needs under such circumstances. For she has done him an enormous wrong and has acted with real malice (efonjokel 'inkinyá, he says), since he married her chiefly so that she would give him descendants. If she dies it is her own fault. Even her family will not support her, for

An abortion which is ascertained to be involuntary [i.e., 847 a miscarriage] is treated like an accident or an illness and the appropriate legal stipulations are applied to it. Thus if it happens while the woman is at her parents' home, the responsibility for it falls on them. Usually the palaver is settled in a friendly manner; the family makes a few nkomi payments, and the question is closed. If relations between the husband and his son-in-law are somewhat strained, the dispute may be drawn out and may result in the breaking up of the marriage. If the woman dies from the accident, the rules given in Article X of the preceding chapter come into play. [468]

Article II. Conception and Pregnancy

842 (3) The Nkundó have only a partial notion of the phenomena of conception. They are well aware of which acts cause the procreation of children. They have a perfect knowledge of anatomy and a rich vocabulary pertaining to sexual life. But they know only as much about physiological processes as experience can teach them. Furthermore, they believe that the act of procreation must be repeated several times in order to produce its natural result. Now,

Ntfr,

[841]
finally, that sexual relations are strictly forbidden to them during menstruation (-bɛna or ɓɛna nsɔngɔ, literally "to be ill from" or "to see the moon," and other similar expressions). The reason given is that a woman in that difficult condition should be spared all additional annoyance.

1. Elimɔ

776
The Nkundɔ attribute the procreation of children sometimes to God (Njakomba) and sometimes to spirits (elimɔ, pl. bilimɔ). God forms (-ɛnga) the children in the mother's womb, but at the same time the bilimɔ provide the men among the progeny. (1)

[192]

1. Contrary to what is reported by Father Lemaeghe (Congo, 1922, Vol. 1, p. 363) concerning the Ekonda, the tribes that I have known never address prayers for children to God, although they attribute the gift of children to Him. This matter does not concern God (Njakomba or Mbombiandɔ) directly, but rather a particular elimɔ.

Sterility, which is a common phenomenon here, is not imputed to sorcery but is considered an innate flaw. Natives usually claim that God refuses them children.

There is no point in trying to make the natives resolve this apparent contradiction; they would not succeed. They simply state the two points. I say "apparent contradiction," for as the Nkundɔ admit that the bilimɔ are subject to Njakomba, the contradiction is not real, and the two propositions can be [470] reconciled by explaining the intervention of the spirits as an operation which is dependent on divine action: they are secondary, intermediary causes, although our natives do not make this philosophical analysis.

To explain all the beliefs pertaining to spirits would be to go outside the framework of this study. Nevertheless, we cannot leave out those details which closely touch on our subject.

776 825 There is a large number of diverse spirits, and almost every village has several in its territory. Each one has its own habitat in some singular place or object which stimulates the imagination: enormous trees, oval hollows which form ponds of a sort (ilímbo, pl. bailímbo), steep slopes, extraordinary pieces of limonite, whirlpools in streams and rivers, etc.

776 842 The Nkundó pray to the bilímá in order to obtain children. For that purpose they make offerings of food and money. To test someone's feelings toward it, an elímá may come to him in the evening or at night in the guise of a known person and ask for some small present. Unhappy is he who shows himself to be stingy; he will be deprived of the object of his desire, or his child will be premature or born sickly or deformed.

783 842 776 In addition to taking a generally friendly attitude toward the spirit, another means of ensuring his intervention is open to a woman. She can procure some kaolin ([illegible]) at the spirit's habitat (a ilímbo, preferably). In the evening she mixes it with some plants. She smears her abdomen with this mixture, known as inaá. [842] She continues the treatment throughout her pregnancy; it has the property of removing everything in her which is of such a nature that it might oppose the spirit (Ekifekola lokeko jwá bilíma ilio ndá likundú).

776 842 Certain water spirits are known for their generosity, for instance Bómbáliombé or Ekitaloŋgié of Mpakó, [471] who is considered to be a female being. She goes on distant voyages to seek a supply of children. On her return she appears to someone and communicates the news to him so that he may spread it. But she orders all women who desire her favors to observe some form of abstinence. Sometimes she sings to amuse or calm the children. On that day mothers must not use songs to pacify their little ones or to put them to sleep and can use only soft words for that purpose. Otherwise the child would die, for to do so would be to disregard the old elímá's kindness.

[787] Sometimes the spirits give signs of their blessing. A woman who is bathing on the shore just at the time a cargo arrives there will soon see her most intimate wish fulfilled. From forest spirits

776 842 [771] women receive other signs: an unexpected obstacle in the form of a stone, a stump, a root, the capture of a tree frog which comes and jumps onto the shoulder, etc

A spirit loves and protects only a child he himself has given. He abhors and hates to the death the living gifts of his fellow spirits. If there are several bilímá in the vicinity of a single village, however, the Nkundó explain the absence of the usual rivalries by considering them as related; one is the husband, another the wife, others the children; that is why they do not oppose each other.

Thus an elímá is hostile to any fetus not of his creation. 776 843 Nevertheless, his spiteful action only begins at the end of several weeks, and even then the pregnancy must have gone far enough to be visible (émi jôela isómbá) Does it take time for him to obtain evidence that the fruit in question is undoubtedly his own gift?

In any case the consequence of this belief is that a woman who has been pregnant for several months cannot long [472] reside in foreign parts, and one who, after conception, has accompanied a husband who has gone to work elsewhere, returns to her village to complete the last period of pregnancy and to deliver,

However, there is an antidote (mengó) against this murderous [751] action of the spirits. It may be obtained from a person who knows the recipe (this person is not the nkanga or "doctor"). The protective compound is wrapped in a bit of cloth and, by means of a thread of fibers from the lokóéá creeper, is tied in the middle of a rope braided with the fibers of the ikuluyaéndé bush, which the threatened woman ties around her hips. [114] [115] 1. These data on the subject of the elímá is diametrically opposed to the ideas of Father Schebesta (Vollblutneger und Halbzwerge, p. 241, and W. Schmidt, Der Ursprung der Gottesidee, Vol. 4, p. 322), based on the word of his interpreter, Bern.. Bongonga of Bodlama (Bombwanja) (now deceased), who was

000 the same rights as the other children of the polygynist.

595 The polygynist always sought to increase the number of his
556 wives, for his prestige rose and his fortune increased in that manner.
593 If anyone in civilized lands seeks to enlarge his fortune, this is done, people say, in order to insure the future of his children. The native thinks little about that; his primary idea is to enjoy himself and to surpass others in prestige and esteem. As far as the future of his children is concerned, there are polygynists who possess twenty or thirty wives or even more, and sometimes they have only one or two children. Also it is little in keeping with their notions to care for the future; he who is still alive tomorrow must take care of 595 tomorrow then, so they reason. On the contrary, instead of caring for his children, the polygynist often took great trouble to obtain a 593 wife for his son. The son, however, was not yet the owner of his 594 wife; it was, so to speak, only a loan. Not until after the death of 606 his father did he become owner. In some districts, when the father had obtained a wife for his son, he first kept this wife for some time for himself. Only after a few months did he give her to his son. In 595 other districts, when the wife was pregnant by the son, he was obliged
593 to send her for a few days to his father. He was not allowed to bear
606 the honor of fatherhood alone; his father must share that with him.
●842 The father reserved for himself the honor of naming all of the chil-
551 dren of his children. In some areas of the Congo, morals were so 835 low and common that the father even kept his own daughters in his harem. This did not occur in Equatorial Africa, but there was a custom that was not much better. The magician was sometimes 583 consulted about the bride price which the father tried to get for his
791 daughter, or the brother for his sister.

The magician then gave them the advice that they themselves should first have relations with their own daughter or sister. This custom existed almost everywhere in Equatorial Africa.

583 [535] Bride Price. In general, the daughter was given in marriage upon payment of a bride price. The father had little choice of the future husband of his daughter. The one who guaranteed the most goods in payment was certain to get her. Since, in most cases, the little daughter had not yet arrived at the years of maturity, there was naturally no question of her consent. The bride price was not paid all at once, but gradually during the years while the daughter grew up. Since the daughter was given without her consent

584 On the other hand, as we have seen, two women may have one nkita in common, especially if their combined bride prices have been used to obtain a single wife. In such a case the two bankílɔ́ and their descendants share their duties and prerogatives. In practice this situation arises only if the two bankílɔ́ are uterine sisters, but seldom in the case of other relatives. It does occur occasionally, however, as for instance in the case of Bolɔ́fɔ w'Imeka and Bolɔ́mbɛ́ w'Ikofo. Both were daughters of Bakutu b'is'ɛy'olɔ́njɔ́ of Bokonda (Bosombo), but they had different mothers (Mbɛ́lɛ and wĨngi, respectively). Their joint bride prices were used for the marriage of Bolɔ́fɔ wâ Ekɔ́fɔ́mɛ Bonkɔ́fɔ w'Ĩlɔ́mɛ (son of Bakutu and Wĩngi) to Bokungɛ of Engɔ́njɔ́ (Bonkoso). [172]

Article XI

General Remarks on the Payment of the Bride Price

585 §43 A few general comments should be added to all the foregoing ideas and rules concerning bride price.

1) During a woman's pregnancy no payment of any kind may be made. This principle is stated by the Nkundɔ́, and they strictly adhere to it. Pregnancy, however, must be understood as a pregnancy which is clearly visible to everyone, that is, the period of bokeka, and not that of the beginning, bɔfɔswa, (1) during which payments may still be made.

If one inquires into the reason for this prohibition, one receives the reply that if payments were made during the bokeka the woman would have great difficulties in delivery and would stand very little chance of escaping death. (Pregnancy is considered a dangerous condition. Of a pregnant woman, the Nkundɔ́ say: akɛ́kí la lɔ́fa, "she is blocked by the sun," or "the sun stands across her path," that is, she is between life and death.) That is the only explanation given for the prohibition. Is it perhaps connected in some way with the belief in the elímɛ? (See Chapter X, Article II, 1).

1. See Chapter X, Article II, 3 and 4.

673 937 [843] in the case of an unmarried mother, see Chapter I, Part 1, Article III, 3.

● [841] Adultery also becomes especially serious during the period preceding childbirth when there is a special prohibition against it, as endangering the lives of both mother and child, as we will explain in Chapter X, Article III.

7. Remarks and general conclusions

937 [731] 1) In former times the offense of adultery, even in its mildest form, that is, an isolated act, was one of the chief causes of "wars" between villages. Sometimes both sides called on their relations by marriage to assist them, and the result was a general upheaval.

937 945 2) As a rule a husband wants his wife to be faithful. Doubtless there are exceptions. Most if not all of them were formerly found among the old polygamists. At their age they were disgusted with continual palavers, and their experience as men had taught them that they often became angry and uselessly complicated their little lives. They preferred to close their eyes, like good old Bonsof w'Ilonga of Imbo (the Bombwanja clan of the Bofiyi). He came to see me in the Christian village of Bombomba through which I was passing at the beginning of March, 1933. I asked him why he was adorned with so many bells, and he answered naively, "I always wear them. That way my wives know of my coming already from a distance. It gives them time to stop slandering me and to send their lovers away." When I expressed my surprise that he did not want to catch them in the act in order to punish them and end their infidelities, he answered me with a smile, "No, Father, jealousy . . . is for the young. As for me, I have seen so much of it that I no longer have any desire to get angry and make palavers for these trivialities."

938 937 945 Since the coming of the Europeans some unscrupulous men -- especially polygamists -- have been engaging in [328] a kind of procuring. They send their wives to commit adultery in order to be able to catch them in the act and thus enrich themselves. Or else they lend their wives for one night or more to laborers or soldiers who are

[661] already more "civilized," such as the neighborhood of Coquilhatville and the Losangenya region.

847
848 Attention should be drawn to the danger of an increase in abortions for a new reason, namely the shame of giving birth outside of wedlock. As we have seen in Chapter I, Part II, Article IV, 3, premarital pregnancies have existed since time immemorial without resulting either in remorse or in palavers. Through the teaching of Christian morality, the feeling of shame must sooner or later be extended to this phenomenon. In explaining the evil of fornication, care should therefore be taken to insist on the fact that transgressing the Fifth Commandment by abortion is a far greater evil.

847
● 845 Voluntary abortion is not considered a moral error by the Nkundó. (2) In their eyes an imperfectly formed fetus, not viable,

2. An attitude which also exists in Europe at the present time, according to Haesaert in Kultuurleven, Vol. 6, no. 1, p. 21 (1935), and the brochure by Prof. D. Schockaert quoted there.

is not yet a man. It is only a human being in the process of formation, in potentia. Hence the custom of burying the aborted child in the [466] hut or quite near it. Thus the spirit responsible for the pregnancy will see that it is respected and repeat its benevolent action. (1)

[764]
[776]

1. Others explain this custom by saying that the fetus already has a soul which remains near the tiny body and will take the first opportunity to re-enter the mother's body.

But if it is voluntary an abortion is always a wrong against family and society, for it deprives the family of a member on whom

847] they could count. Nevertheless, if it happens to a young unmarried mother, little or no fuss is made over it because no one can feel wronged; at most the culprit is scolded. For a married woman, on the other hand, it is one of the most serious infractions. Her husband has an immediate right to the fetus that would have become his child. He cannot beat or mistreat the offender in punishment, for her condition will not permit violence, but he can abandon her to her fate by refusing her all assistance, in particular by refusing to bring her firewood, the heat of which she greatly needs under such circumstances. For she has done him an enormous wrong and has acted with real malice (abnjokel 'isidinyá, he says), since he married her chiefly so that she would give him descendants. If she dies it is her own fault. Even her family will not support her, for [847] they would be accused of being involved in the crime; inevitably they would lose the case and be condemned to indemnify the husband.

● 843 An abortion which is ascertained to be involuntary [i.e., a miscarriage] is treated like an accident or an illness and the appropriate legal stipulations are applied to it. Thus if it happens while the woman is at her parents' home, the responsibility for it falls on them. Usually the palaver is settled in a friendly manner; the family makes a few nkgmí payments, and the question is closed. If relations between the husband and his son-in-law are somewhat strained, the dispute may be drawn out and may result in the breaking up of the marriage. If the woman dies from the accident, the rules given in Article X of the preceding chapter come into play. [469]

Article II. Conception and Pregnancy

153
The Nkundó have only a partial notion of the phenomena of conception. They are well aware of which acts cause the procreation of children. They have a perfect knowledge of anatomy and a rich vocabulary pertaining to sexual life. But they know only as much about physiological processes as experience can teach them. Furthermore, they believe that the act of procreation must be repeated several times in order to produce its natural result. Note,

Nele,

842 finally, that sexual relations are strictly forbidden to them during 833 menstruation (-bɔna or ɛna nsɔ́ngɔ́, literally "to be ill from" or "to [843] see the moon," and other similar expressions). The reason given is that a woman in that difficult condition should be spared all additional annoyance.

1. Elímɔ

842
The Nkundó attribute the procreation of children sometimes to God (Njakomba) and sometimes to spirits (elímɔ, pl. bilímɔ). God forms (-ânga) the children in the mother's womb, but at the same time the bilímɔ provide the men among the progeny. (1)

There is no point in trying to make the natives resolve this apparent contradiction; they would not succeed. They simply state the two points. I say "apparent contradiction," for as the Nkundó admit that the bilímɔ are subject to Njakomba, the contradiction is not real, and the two propositions can be [470] reconciled by explaining the intervention of the spirits as an operation which is dependent on divine action: they are secondary, intermediary causes, although our natives do not make this philosophical analysis.

To explain all the beliefs pertaining to spirits would be to go outside the framework of this study. Nevertheless, we cannot leave out those details which closely touch on our subject.

[842] 1. Contrary to what is reported by Father Lemaeghe (Congo, 1922, Vol. 1, p. 262) concerning the Ekonda, the tribes that I have known never address prayers for children to God, although they attribute the gift of children to Him. This matter does not concern God (Njakomba or Mbombiánda) directly, but rather a particular elímɔ.

Sterility, which is a common phenomenon here, is not imputed to sorcery but is considered an innate flaw. Natives usually claim that God refuses them children.

776 825 There is a large number of diverse spirits, and almost every village has several in its territory. Each one has its own habitat in some singular place or object which stimulates the imagination: enormous trees, oval hollows which form ponds of a sort (elímbo, pl. belímbo), steep slopes, extraordinary pieces of limonite, whirlpools in streams and rivers, etc.

776 842 The Nkundó pray to the bilímá in order to obtain children. For that purpose they make offerings of food and money. To test someone's feelings toward it, an elímá may come to him in the evening or at night in the guise of a known person and ask for some small present. Unhappy is he who shows himself to be stingy; he will be deprived of the object of his desire, or his child will be premature or born sickly or deformed.

783 842 776 In addition to taking a generally friendly attitude toward the spirit, another means of ensuring his intervention is open to a woman. She can procure some kaolin (ponga) at the spirit's habitat (a elímbo, preferably). In the evening she mixes it with some plants. She smears her abdomen with this mixture, known as isaá. ● [843] She continues the treatment throughout her pregnancy; it has the property of removing everything in her which is of such a nature that it might oppose the spirit (ẽkẽhola lokeko jwá bilíma ẽkie ndá likundó).

776 842 Certain water spirits are known for their generosity, for instance Iténdélombé or Ehótalombé of Mpaká, [471] who is considered to be a female being. She goes on distant voyages to seek a supply of children. On her return she appears to someone and communicates the news to him so that he may spread it. But she orders all women who desire her favors to observe some form of abstinence. Sometimes she sings to amuse or calm the children. On that day mothers must not use songs to pacify their little ones or to put them to sleep and can use only soft words for that purpose. Otherwise the child would die, for to do so would be to disregard the old elímá's kindness.

[787] Sometimes the spirits give signs of their blessing. A woman who is bathing on the shore just at the time a cargo arrives there will soon see her most intimate wish fulfilled. From forest spirits

776 842 [791] women receive other signs: an unexpected obstacle in the form of a stone, a stump, a root, the capture of a tree frog which comes and jumps onto the shoulder, etc.

A spirit loves and protects only a child he himself has given. He abhors and hates to the death the living gifts of his fellow spirits. If there are several bilímá in the vicinity of a single village, however, the Nkundó explain the absence of the usual rivalries by considering them as related: one is the husband, another the wife, others the children; that is why they do not oppose each other.

776 843 Thus an elímá is hostile to any fetus not of his creation. Nevertheless, his spiteful action only begins at the end of several weeks, and even then the pregnancy must have gone far enough to be visible (émi jóbela ioómbá) Does it take time for him to obtain evidence that the fruit in question is undoubtedly his own gift?

In any case the consequence of this belief is that a woman who has been pregnant for several months cannot long [472] reside in foreign parts, and one who, after conception, has accompanied a husband who has gone to work elsewhere, returns to her village to complete the last period of pregnancy and to deliver.

However, there is an antidote (nsengé) against this murder- [751] ous action of the spirits. It may be obtained from a person who knows the recipe (this person is not the nkanga or "doctor"). The protective compound is wrapped in a bit of cloth and, by means of a thread of fibers from the lokólá creeper, is tied in the middle of a rope braided with the fibers of the ikulayafódé bush, which the threatened woman ties around her hips. (1)

[114] [115] 1. These data on the subject of the elímá is diametrically opposed to the ideas of Father Schebesta (Vollblutneger und Halbzwerge, p. 241, and W. Schmidt, Der Ursprung der Gottesidee, Vol. 4, p. 322), based on the word of his interpreter, Bern. Bongonga of Bodilama (Bombwanja) (now deceased), who was

776 179
115
obliged in my presence to retract his statements under the pressure of crushing objections on the part of a considerable number of other natives. See also Father Boelaert, Nsongo Lovesa, 1938, p. 60, and Congo, 1936, Vol. 1, p. 43, as well as Hulstaert, Congo, 1936, Vol. 2, p. 670.

2. The beginnings of pregnancy

777
The first months following the cessation of menstruation are called bofgwa. The oral expression is -fgwe ɔ́mi (ɔ́mi meaning "fetus")

A woman who has just conceived no longer has any success in looking for caterpillars or in fishing (by scooping, whether with bofingd baskets or drugs, called lisola). She is unable to catch anything while the efforts of her companions are fruitful. That is because the bofgwa is wɛ̂kɔ́, that is, a cause for a lack of success (bɔ́mɔnɔ ba wɛ̂kɔ́ ilɔ̂kɔ). Note that this word may be derived from the verb ɛ̂kɔ, "to place an obstacle."

The husband of a woman in this condition is no better off. His wife's wɛ̂kɔ́ is communicated to him as well as to all those of his relatives who [473] live in the same village or, as the natives say, ɔ̂ɔ́ nyɔlɔ́ ɔmɔ̂kɔ́, "one who eats from the same pot," and okɔlɔ́ ilɔmbɛ ɔmɔ̂kɔ́, "one who lives in the same house." Friends are not harmed, even if they live in the same settlement as the pregnant woman, nor are relatives living elsewhere.

The wɛ̂kɔ́ brings misfortune to anyone tainted with it. Thus if he goes hunting, he will return empty handed; if he participates in a war he will be wounded. Furthermore, if there is a leopard in the vicinity he will choose to kill that man. An elephant will detect his presence and try to kill him. A snake will bite him more readily than another. At market he will be charged more for everything.

This burdensome situation continues during the entire period of pregnancy, hence until the birth of the child.

● 615 777 The Nkundó know an antidote (nsengó or lonenjó), however, a means of getting rid of such annoying obstacles. Of the three known processes the last is especially common at present.

[825] 1) The husband (or any person to whom the wɛ̌kɛ́ is attached and who wants to be rid of it) picks up a nkɔ̂ngolɔ́ chilopod, naturally by means of a leaf, encloses it in a large leaf which he binds with a thin creeper, and makes a small package of it, as one makes a package of meat, fish, etc. He gives this package to his wife, who thinks it contains food and opens it without any suspicion. But when she sees the detested arthropod, she throws it far from her with cries of disgust, while her husband says to her, "You are the one who remains with the wɛ̌kɛ́." As a result he himself is freed from it.

2) A second means is to take the pregnant woman by the nose when an opportunity presents itself and to say to her: "May the wɛ̌kɛ́ remain attached to you."

[252] [264] 3) The woman prepares some tsibóndó (manioc leaves [474] salted and dipped in palm oil). The two spouses eat it together contrary to the usual practice. But the husband arranges matters in such a way that his wife gets the last mouthful and keeps the leaf which serves as a plate and represents the wɛ̌kɛ́. Then the husband says to her, "Keep the wɛ̌kɛ́ for yourself."

The wɛ̌kɛ́ cannot be detached from the woman, for she is the bomɔ́ngo wɛ̌kɛ́, "the owner of the wɛ̌kɛ́," the one who is the basis for it. For her it continues until the child is on the point of being born (elaká ô jómi jókinda, literally "he has come to the end of his growth," or jóhékama, "has turned to one side"), and thus, in practice, until the birth of the child.

[152] If a first wife dies at the beginning of her first pregnancy, a cesarian operation must be performed on her. The fetus is removed (it is still no more than an embryo -- ilóngɛ́lá or bokelé, literally "an egg," or ilóngó, literally "blood") so that it can be buried behind the hut. An omission of this practice would result in the death through pregnancy of the deceased's husband's other wives or of the women he will subsequently marry.

3. The period of prohibitions

● [843] When a pregnancy is far advanced -- about two or three months before delivery (a period which has now been reduced to one or two weeks) -- the Nkundó proceed with the "preservation of the fetus" (bákomba jómi, "they preserve the fetus," or bíáka jómi, "they fasten the fetus"). The period called bokeka or bokeko begins at that moment and does not end until after childbirth. The oral expression is lóoba bokeka, "to bind the period of sexual prohibitions." (1) This term also extends to all special prohibitions (bekilá) resulting from this condition. [473]

[834] 1. The expression lóoba lóobé is also used. A similar period of sexual prohibitions called by the same name still exists for, among other things, circumcision, the construction of a hunting enclosure, and the setting of elephant traps.

For the first pregnancy the period begins with the following [796] ceremony: The woman's mother smears her daughter's head and [302] all of her body with a red paint called ngóla. This paint, usually used as make-up, is used here as a mark of affection and given to honor and congratulate the future mother on this happy occasion. When the ngóla is somewhat hardened, the mother smears her daughter's hair with it and rolls the hair into little balls, using an iron bosángó, which is the instrument usually used for hairdressing. Then she gives her daughter a hen and some bananas to eat. From then on the pregnant woman may no longer eat hens, for the consumption of this bird (which the Nkundó place in the same category [825] as ducks) and its eggs would stop the normal development of the fetus. The ceremony is called fia bongata (elelu among the Bombwanja), "to smear with red paint in little balls."

The woman's father and the husband's kin feel strongly about being present at this ceremony, for it is considered very important. I know of an intense palaver which occurred because

● [illegible] a woman's mother proceeded with the ceremony in the absence of the husband and his family. The latter were furious. They revealed the matter so that if anything should happen later to the mother or the child the law would be on their side. In that way the husband could evade responsibility and place the blame on his wife and her family so that they would have to pay an indemnity.

The pregnant woman does not remove the paint for three or [illegible] four weeks after the ceremony. Nowadays the use of paint having [illegible] disappeared except for certain occasions and among older persons, it is left on for only one night. In addition the surface smeared has been reduced to a line in the middle of the head or even one single spot.

[illegible] During this ceremony the Bombwanja have a public confession [illegible] (otato) of the lovers. But since the Boloki wait until after delivery, we will deal with it later on.

On the night following the ceremony described, the couple [illegible] [476] "fasten the fetus" through their carnal union. Were they to omit this act, the child would die before birth.

For subsequent pregnancies the fastening of the fetus is no longer preceded by the same formalities.

The couple continue to have relations during the entire [illegible] period of pregnancy "in order to open an easy passage for the child." [illegible] On the other hand, they must strictly observe marital fidelity. [illegible] Nevertheless, a polygamist may have relations with his other wives.

In addition to this essential art, the interdict also includes a secondary part; the couple may not even commit acts even very remotely related to procreation. Thus they may not:

1) Touch in any way whatsoever -- even to shaking their hands -- persons with whom they have had adulterous relations; such persons must therefore be avoided.

2) Sit next to such persons.

3) Look at them.

4) Enter a house or apartment where they are.

5) Eat "from the same pot."

6) Lie in another couple's bed.

7) Other persons may no longer sleep in the bed of the couple bound by the bokeka.

843
837 This law requiring a most strict fidelity lasts until the end of the bekeke for the husband, but until the weaning of the child for the wife. It is especially strict for the period of seclusion (see below, Article III, 3).

The violation of the essential stipulation of this interdict (-fifinda bekeke) results either in the death of the woman during pregnancy and especially during seclusion or in the death of the child later on. [477]

A. If the woman dies during this period, the suspicion is placed a priori on her husband. The Nkundó say afifinda wălí, "he has transgressed against his wife." Unless he can prove his innocence through public actions, the judgment of a magician, or autopsy[sic].

If the woman has been the victim of a seducer, he is held responsible and must pay a large indemnity equivalent to the bride price that was paid for the deceased. If no other man is involved, the affair has no consequences.

763 754
845
853 In the past the combined autopsy and Caesarian section was always performed. It had a dual purpose: to remove the child and to examine the mother. If the operation revealed the existence of a "stomach" (likundú), the deceased was of a noxious (lilgho) nature or constitution and therefore caused the death of her child. If the child remained alive, it proved that he was of a magically superior nature and was able to resist the natural evil spells of his mother, which thus turned against their unwitting author. (1)

(1). The Nkundó believe that only animals have a "stomach" (likundú). If a human being has one, that is, if his viscera are large, curved, in compartments, in a word, abnormal, that person is an evildoer. He commits evil acts voluntarily or, most frequently, unknowingly. Some men with a likundú can be recognized by the fact that they eat their nails, hair, etc. The Nkundó must certainly have observed relationships between this habit and a deformity of the stomach.

853 The child is given to a wet nurse (a kinswoman, a stranger, a Batswa woman, depending on who is available).

847 845 760 If the mother's body shows no signs of evil-doing or of "the hatred of others," it is thought that her death was caused by evil spells on the part of the child. Thereupon some kill the child to prevent it from doing harm during its whole life; others, on the contrary, spare it despite everything.

683 837 If the husband (for it is he above all who is involved, since he is most exposed to possible lapses) has unfortunately been guilty of misconduct, his wife has only a slim chance [478] of salvation. Nevertheless, it is still possible for her to be saved, on condition that from then on her husband abstain from any sexual act and from all the accidental gestures and actions described above. The least he can do under these circumstances is to inform his wife of his indiscretion so that she can take precautions. If he wants to [672] ward off any possibility of causing his wife's certain death, he sends her home and gives his father-in-law a pledge (nkanga) through which he recognizes his guilt and shows his intention to assume the entire responsibility for his misdeed. An upright man prefers to act in this fashion, for he never knows whether one day he will not inadvertently violate one of the prohibitions.

853 837 B. The child's death is the result of the putrefaction of the mother's milk, the mother being thus incapable of nursing. As in the preceding case, the offense is a priori imputed to the husband -- lal afoma bǫna la nkota. (1) Since he has wronged no one but himself, no palaver ensues; the "natural" punishment is sufficient. This does not mean that he is not the object of evil tongues; people point at him and at times remind him of his misdeed. To remove the blame from himself, he can resort to an ordeal or ask a magician's judgment or a magical practice to reveal the culprit. The culprit who is discovered is not subject to any social sanction; he is punished by the ordeal itself or the spell cast against him.

If the mother's adultery is proven through her having been caught in the act, her seducer is considered guilty. He must pay the death indemnity (20 to 30 copper rings). The woman is not at all involved as far as society is concerned; it is a matter between her and her husband.

In order to prevent any harmful effect on the child, the Nkundo resort to a potion called bondandota, which will be explained in [478] the next article, 3. "Medication" by scarification might also be mentioned. This therapy is applied to the parents as well as to the child. If the father is wealthy, he invites the wife's family to come and perform the operation themselves. As in all comparable situations, the invitation is accompanied by the handing over of a pledge, and farewell presents (belingaka) are given at the end of the visit. In addition the wife very often goes to live with her parents for some time after her seclusion in order to increase the efficiency of the treatment.

The sanction incurred for a violation of the secondary stipulations is less serious. For instance, the pregnant woman suffers from violent migraines, which often cause fainting and sometimes make delivery very difficult; thus they can even cause death. The husband is seldom bothered by these headaches. But he takes great pains to faithfully observe the law in order to spare his wife such painful consequences and to avoid the death of the child being born.

Apart from sexual abstention and the rules connected with it, the couple are also subject to various prohibitions which are clearly based on superstitious ideas. Thus:

1) They must neither go down into a well nor dig in the earth. The woman would die, for it is as if they were digging her grave.

2) They must not carry anything together with another person, for that is how corpses are carried, and such carrying would be the cause of death, through imitation of the woman's funeral procession.

847 3) They must not climb up on the roof (they are not forbidden to climb a palm tree in order to cut off nuts)

847 4) They must not eat animals killed by a carnivore (leopard, crocodile, etc.), or the child would die a sudden and unnatural
262 death like the victims of such wild beasts. [400]

825 5) They must abstain from animals such as porcupines, anteaters, certain birds, crocodiles, and gavials, (1) who are in the habit of living in the hollows of trees or in dens. The delivery would be very painful if they ate them, for the child would roll up and crouch in the mother's womb. Fish that find shelter in passageways do not produce such consequences and are therefore eaten.

6) They must not eat turtles (2). A very difficult birth is feared, for the turtle withdraws into its shell and encloses its anal extremities as in a vise, and the child would do the same.

7) They must not eat the head of a monkey. The child would be born with deep-set eyes resembling the monkey's.

8) They must not eat the large antelope known as mbuli, because it has a long neck and flabby flesh, and the child would acquire the same defects.

[163] 9) They must not eat the lioóló fish, which would cause migraines, since it swims fiercely without direction.

The results of bokeka and the obligations resulting from it
843 are connected with natural paternity. Thus, if a woman becomes 837 pregnant as a result of relations with a regular, recognized lover, the latter must assume all responsibility. He is required to "fasten the fetus" and to observe all the regulations pertaining to the

1. In this region women never eat snakes or bats ([illegible], [illegible], [illegible]).

2. In some tribes (Bongili, Bombomo) women always abstain from eating such reptiles.

843 bokeke. The same is true if the pregnancy is the result of adultery;
839 the natural father must bear all the consequences of his act. The husband is absolved from them and has no relations with his wife until the end of this particular pregnancy. The culprit must give him a pledge by which he publically recognizes his responsibility, and he is expected to fulfill all the duties of a husband. Therefore he may have relations with the woman during her entire pregnancy without paying additional indemnities. If any accident befalls the mother or the child, he is made to pay a large indemnity.

Note finally that, as we have pointed out in Chapter II,
[585] Article XI, no bride-price payment can be made from the time the pregnancy becomes visible until after the end of the period of seclusion.

843 To facilitate childbirth the previously mentioned concoction of various leaves mixed with kaolin ([illegible]) is continuously ap-844 plied to the abdomen. Medical scarifications on the abdomen are 751 also performed.

Finally, as the time of delivery approaches, special douches
[278] made from a concoction of the bark of the bofimbo tree (1) are administered. All these treatments are called betɛ́ byâ bobɔ́tɔ́, that is, medicines (for the purpose) of an easy delivery.

Article III. Birth

844 1. Delivery

A woman remains with her husband for childbirth; she does not go home to her family. Article III. Birth

844 1. Delivery

A woman remains with her husband for childbirth; she does not go home to her family. Only exceptionally does she give birth elsewhere -- for instance, if she has been sent home for one reason or another, or during a trip, while working in the fields, near a stream, or a spring, etc. Such sudden unexpected deliveries

844 are not too rare. (2)

2. Ease in delivery is called bosánjá;
difficulty is called bonsombo.

A husband asks his mother-in-law to come and help her daughter. Other kinswomen of the husband or the wife do not refuse [482] their services either. Among them there is always one who is more expert in these matters and who acts as a midwife (mbótsi).

The delivery takes place in the banana grove behind the hut; there is light and air there. In the house it would be more difficult.

The husband cannot be present at this event. His presence would make it difficult and painful. The further away he is, the better. The prohibition is not rigid, however; if there is no one to help his wife (as in the case of an unexpected delivery in the forest, etc.), he will have no hesitation whatsoever in helping her with all the power and skill at his command.

To facilitate the arrival of the child, the midwife gives [278] the wife a potion to drink "in order to make slippery" (boté wǎ bosɛ́li), and administers a douche containing boímo bark.

If the pains continue for several days and all medication is 845 without results, it is assumed that some evil spell (liloka) is at work. To neutralize it the woman in labor is "blessed" (-saka). For that purpose her family and that of her husband each bring a stalk of the bokaakó plant (bosáánga). Two kinswomen, each with the stalk of her respective clan, squeeze out the sap with which they smear the woman's abdomen. After that the delivery takes place in a normal fashion.

845 The nkanga (doctor-magician) only intervenes when a woman
756 has already had several miscarriages or when all her children die.
769 If he is consulted he invariably attributes such misfortunes to the action of spirits of the deceased, who may be appeased by offerings and the promise that a manifestation of their will be heeded with respect to the naming of the child. Usually he adds that a few alimentary prohibitions must be observed until the child is weaned.

851 birth of a child involves a few prohibitions which affect the whole village and apply to the Batswá as well as the Baotó. They do not affect inhabitants of a portion of the village which is separated by a swamp from the group where the happy event has occurred. Those bound by the prohibitions may no longer go to "work" -- that is, to work in the fields, fetch food or firewood, build a hunting enclosure or a fishing weir, or work at the building or repair of a house. An infraction of this rule would result in the destruction of the fruit of all their labor: the fields would no longer produce, and no beast or fish would be caught. This deadly influence would [484] extend to all crops, etc. no matter whom they belong to. Nevertheless, there is nothing wrong in fetching firewood from the forest, harvesting manioc from a ripe field, or cutting the fruit of the palm.

Strictly speaking, these prohibitions touch only persons who have seen the newborn child. But since no one fails to go and admire it, all are subject to them. The prohibitions remain in effect until the umbilical cord is detached. [184] Some tribes, however, have the more convenient custom of limiting its duration to the day of the child's birth.

2. The hygiene of mother and child

[844] The umbilical cord (lǫkǫ́ki) is cut near the middle. An incision is made near the infant's navel. 846 Each day a concoction of herbs is poured on the part of the cord that is still attached and white sand is put on it to make it dry more rapidly. When the end falls off, a powder made of scorched banana is applied to the wound.

In order to prevent the weakening of a woman's abdomen, it is bound with a belt made of bands of the dried bark of the banana tree (ekutú).

The assistants wash the mother and child. On the mother they place dried leaves or bark of the banana tree which have been carefully crumpled. They are put on like panties to catch the blood and are replaced by new ones whenever necessary. Nowadays pieces of cloth are often used; they are put on like a man's garment.

843 This law requiring a most strict fidelity lasts until the end 837 of the bokeka for the husband, but until the weaning of the child for the wife. It is especially strict for the period of seclusion (see below, Article III, 3).

The violation of the essential stipulation of this interdict (-fénda bokeka) results either in the death of the woman during pregnancy and especially during seclusion or in the death of the child later on. [477]

A. If the woman dies during this period, the suspicion is placed a priori on her husband. The Nkundó say aôfénda wǎlí, "he has transgressed against his wife." Unless he can prove his innocence through public actions, the judgment of a magician, or autopsy[sic].

If the woman has been the victim of a seducer, he is held responsible and must pay a large indemnity equivalent to the bride price that was paid for the deceased. If no other man is involved, the affair has no consequences.

843 In the past the combined autopsy and Caesarian section was 763 always performed. It had a dual purpose: to remove the child and 754 to examine the mother. If the operation revealed the existence of 845 a "stomach" (likundú), the deceased was of a noxious (liloka)
853 nature or constitution and therefore caused the death of her child.
If the child remained alive, it proved that he was of a magically superior nature and was able to resist the natural evil spells of his mother, which thus turned against their unwitting author. (1)

(1) The Nkundó believe that only animals have a "stomach" (likundú). If a human being has one, that is, if his viscera are large, curved, in compartments, in a word, abnormal, that person is an evildoer. He commits evil acts voluntarily or, most frequently, unknowingly. Some men with a likundú can be recognized by the fact that they eat their nails, hair, etc. The Nkundó must certainly have observed relationships between this habit and a deformity of the stomach.

853 The child is given to a wet nurse (a kinswoman, a stranger, a Bo̲tswa woman, depending on who is available).

847 845 843 If the mother's body shows no signs of evil-doing or of "the hatred of others," it is thought that her death was caused by evil spells on the part of the child. Thereupon some kill the child to prevent it from doing harm during its whole life; others, on the contrary, spare it despite everything.

843 837 If the husband (for it is he above all who is involved, since he is most exposed to possible lapses) has unfortunately been guilty of misconduct, his wife has only a slim chance [478] of salvation. Nevertheless, it is still possible for her to be saved, on condition that from then on her husband abstain from any sexual act and from all the accidental gestures and actions described above. The least he can do under these circumstances is to inform his wife of his indiscretion so that she can take precautions. If he wants to [672] ward off any possibility of causing his wife's certain death, he sends her home and gives his father-in-law a pledge (ndanga) through which he recognizes his guilt and shows his intention to assume the entire responsibility for his misdeed. An upright man prefers to act in this fashion, for he never knows whether one day he will not inadvertently violate one of the prohibitions.

A husband asks his mother-in-law to come and help her daughter. Other kinswomen of the husband or the wife do not refuse [482] their services either. Among them there is always one who is more expert in these matters and who acts as a midwife (mbótsi).

The delivery takes place in the banana grove behind the hut; there is light and air there. In the house it would be more difficult.

To facilitate the arrival of the child, the midwife gives [278] the wife a potion to drink "in order to make slippery" (boté wǎ boséli), and administers a douche containing boímo bark.

If the pains continue for several days and all medication is 845 without results, it is assumed that some evil spell (liloka) is at work. To neutralize it the woman in labor is "blessed" (-saka). For that purpose her family and that of her husband each bring a stalk of the bokaakő plant (bosáánga). Two kinswomen, each with the stalk of her respective clan, squeeze out the sap with which they smear the woman's abdomen. After that the delivery takes place in a normal fashion.

845 756 769 The nkanga (doctor-magician) only intervenes when a woman has already had several miscarriages or when all her children die. If he is consulted he invariably attributes such misfortunes to the action of spirits of the deceased, who may be appeased by offerings and the promise that a manifestation of their will be heeded with respect to the naming of the child. Usually he adds that a few alimentary prohibitions must be observed until the child is weaned.

Article V. Name Giving

Naming does not occur on any predetermined date. It is 553 not delayed without a special reason. No feast or ceremony accompanies the event. The father simply puts colored powder on the child's forehead as a sign of joy.

It is the father's right to choose a name for his child. Sometimes he asks for the family's opinion. Preferably he gives names of his relatives, deceased or living, or sometimes his own. But it is proper to respect the mother's feelings also. Failure to take them into account could provoke the woman to cause an abortion in order to punish him for being so willful as to neglect her family.

[845] A painful childbirth, like the repeated death of preceding [769] children, is often attributed to the rancor of a dead person who is discontented. In such a situation the Nkundő await the verdict [787] of a dream, or they have recourse to the judgment of a nkanga (doctor-magician) in order to be able to satisfy the irascible dead.

If the situation recurs too often, the calamity is attributed 553 to a rivalry between dead persons who are fighting over which of 551 their respective names should be given to the newborn; the envious loser kills the child. In order to avoid such mean vengeance and make everyone content while satisfying none, the father gives the child a neutral name or a Bo̲tswa name, such as Bo̲tswá, Sáka, Ěfâlǐna (nameless), Botsilá (lack of success, bad luck), Litúli (dead without known cause), etc. If the child has already received a name, but for one reason or another the inauspicious fury of a ghost is feared, it is always possible to change from that name to another.

Children are usually given the names of relatives of the same sex. Exceptions are sometimes made, however, if one of the sexes is not sufficiently represented among the progeny, in which case the bearer of the name can always change it later, and he almost always does. Nevertheless, there are [500] no specifically male or female names, except for those that consist of the relative form of a verb, such as Ósâsuka, "the coquette," "Óyê̲me̲ngo̲, "she who comes with plenty," Ófénji, "she who excels." Finally, certain names are sometimes used for either sex.

551 The etymology of most names is impossible to trace, and they have no meaning. Some are borrowed from the nomenclature of the realms of nature or of things, but no attention is paid to their original meaning, and allusions to it -- sometimes attempted by certain Europeans -- are either not understood or badly received. Other names are dictated by the child's constitution, for example Ókunjoló, "who will be buried even today," or Báwáôlóí, "one dies only later." (1) Names sometimes also commemorate a special event, such as a great mourning (Báwá, "they die"; Bálela, "people weep"), a rivalry (Báunela, "they fight for," meaning that two men are rivals for the possession of the mother of the child to whom the name is given). Finally, some names carry the meaning of a saying, such as Báwake, "all men must die," etc.

[572] In closing let us repeat that persons who bear the same name are often bound by a special friendship, give each other presents, and help each other. However, such a relationship does not entitle persons of different sexes to have intimate relations with each other, and if they do so such relations are treated as concubinage or simply adultery.

Article VI. Twins

845 Although for the Nkundó the birth of twins (baása, sing. jäsa), does not have the importance that other peoples attach to it [501], it does have some special features, the chief of which is the absence of the prohibitions and regulations that go with ordinary births. Twins are free from all common prohibitions; they are fulúngú. (1) Let is examine the details.

---

1. Both names are intended to prevent allusions to the child's debility and to express the equivalent of the saying: it is but a life of languor.

1. This is true even with respect to abstentions during mourning.

2: Hulstaert--469 M-5 (ca. 1930) 1938 FO32 Mongo FO32
Nkundu

● 845 [202] The event is announced by the usual signal, but the signal is doubled or, if the children are of different sexes, the signal for each sex is given once. It is followed by the dance beat: two [535] or three long and two short.

845 778 The next day the father's relatives go outside the village, preferably to a crossroads. On each side they plant a stalk of lokőkólókő. All around the stalk they spread a little heap of small branches and various leaves called jǔké. It is a sign and a place of benediction and good fortune. Each passer-by stops, picks two leaves, places one on each pile, spits on it, and says swá.(2) Then they clap hands and twice sing out, yelí yeye. Such behavior brings the benediction of the twins upon a person's journey, his undertakings, his marriage. The umbilical cord as well as the placenta and membrane are buried under the heap.

845 362 [386] Every morning the mother and father draw two stripes with kaolin on the middle of their foreheads and on their arms, above and below the elbow. They do the same to the twins. (3) They continue doing so until the child is weaned. If after that time one of the children falls ill, they begin again treating him in this manner until he is cured, taking care not to omit his brother, lest he too fall ill. For while these designs are signs of joy, they are [751] above all a prophylactic measure against children's fever (ikűtswáki), [502] called wǎ́sanyi when it occurs in twins or in a child following them, and manifests itself chiefly by tumors of the head and face.

845 551 Twins are invariably called Mbőyő and Bo̱ké̱tu, names given to the first born and the second respectively, whatever their sex. The Bombwanja (like the Ekonda) use the names Mbőő and Mpia, respectively. The mother takes the name of Ǎmbá.

2. Onomatopoeia for "spit."

3. Sometimes a double stripe is added at the temples The kaolin may be used pure or mixed with the red paint called ngőla.

845 However, these names are not used exclusively by such persons; 551 they may be given to others as well. The father, on the other hand, does not receive a new name; but he bears the title Is'éy'ǎfé, which literally means "father of two." (1) Twins are also said to be Ǎmbámba (pl. Byǎmbámba) from the verb -ámba, "to accept, to receive," because they are permitted to accept and to take everything, since none of the usual prohibitions apply to them.

The mother of twins is not required to go into seclusion
845 (nyang'éy'aása áfőáte waékelé). The shed belonging to the head 343 of the clan, that is, the one in whose home important animals (leopards, etc.) are dismembered, is set up for her. (2) The shed is closed by means of palms. Neither the parents, nor the helper, nor the persons who enter this place are required to observe continence or the other prohibitions involved in ekelé.

All the members of the kin group come to greet the twins 845 and give each one a present (hens, knives, arrows, food), which is received by the father or the mother. Whenever anything is given to one of the twins, even if it is the smallest object, the same must be given to the other; otherwise the latter would die.
If the mother takes one in her arms, the other one must also be picked up, either by her or by the father. If she strikes one, she must also strike his brother. This [503] duality therefore applies to everything, and with even greater reason to nursing.

If a twin child cries or is ill, the parents must sing and [534] dance to the accompaniment of a lokolé and a ngòmo drum, a ceremony called -bénga baása. If someone invites a twin or his

1. Among the Ekonda he is called Buka.

2. Therefore, at the bonsenge place or the place of dismembering important animals (nyama yǎ bikofo, literally "superb animals").

845 parents to the dance, they must go. When the mother passes a [178] crossroads or the dwelling place of a spirit or an efeno (a place where the Nkundó gather for magical practices, oracles, etc.), she also sings and dances in honor of the spirit, so that he will favor her 845 children. Various songs are popular, such as: Elím'é'Ǎmbá 533 tongólela yelí yeye, "Spirit of Ǎmbá, do not weep; (1) Bokétu la

1. Tongólela is an archaic form still in use among the Ekonda, etc

Mbóy'é'Ambá tofúkáké tonyongáké, toléké bilingoi yelí yeye, "Ǎmbá's Bokétu and Mbóyó, do not bruise yourself, do not stir, do not eat bilingoi mushrooms"; Bokétu 'a Mbóyó njóátela ngóy' emengo yelí yeye, "Bokétu and Mbóyó, I surround my mother with abundance"; Bokétu'a Mbóyó lá'okono lá'okendo yelí yeye, "I shall fall ill, and yet I will walk (be well)"; Bokétu'a Mbóyó, lióta bokekesano yelí yeye, "difficult childbirth," etc.

Foods forbidden to twins are the mushrooms called bilingoi
845 (or bilingondo or bankǎnkíndá), the mpambí antelope, and the ǒlí 262 yam, which is also forbidden to parents whose child is not yet weaned.
(2)

2. This prohibition extends to all food cooked in pots in which such forbidden foods have been prepared. The extension is characteristic of all alimentary prohibitions.

845 When traveling, the parents of twins gird themselves with the 484 creeping plant called boyayenga, or wear it like a strap over the shoulder. The mother also attaches a bell to it. Their hair is often [301] adorned with two feathers from the tail of a gray parrot (nkoso) and two feathers from a white hen. [504]

845 The greeting to parents of twins and their reply must always 576 be double: w'ǒné w'ǒné, the reply em'óné em'óné; oôyá, oôyá, the reply bíka bíka. Note that the last greeting is not replied to differently

576
845 from the others. They thus rank with the great notables of the past. [sic]

845
554 When the children grow up and become self-sufficient, all the special regulations lose their force and they become like everybody else. Nothing distinguishes them from the rest in marriage, death, etc No preference is shown for or against them. But their descendants will again produce twins.

845 Thus the Nkundó consider twins as extraordinary children, but they do not carry this view to extremes. They are pleased to receive two children at a time, although they believe that under such circumstances the pregnancy and delivery are more dangerous for the mother. That is why she is called boyéngwá since, despite the seriousness of the situation, she did not die This epithet is also applied to the father and to the twins, probably for the same reason as well as because of their immunity with respect to prohibitions. If the twins are of different sexes, however, the mother is not as likely to be called boyéngwá, since she is likoka, "harmful." (1)

1. See above, Article II, 3.

789
754 It is apparent from the above description that twins are considered to be somewhat tainted with magic. The existence of this belief is confirmed by the prohibition against throwing anything (stone, palm kernel, etc.) onto their hut, the same prohibition applying to anyone who possesses a charm or practices sorcery or protective magic. In addition they possess a certain innate ability to cast a spell over the activities (hunting, fishing) of others. That is why persons who are afraid of being harmed by them smear themselves with kaolin in the same way as do such children and their parents. [505]

845 The Nkundó have had cases of triplets, but they are extremely rare. The youngest of the three is called Yěndembe, or Yěn[illegible]ende, or Yělele. The only special practice with reference to the youngest one is that he can never be ordered to do any work, be sent to carry a message, run any errand, etc., áfótswé ntómo.

845 In other respects he is not differentiated from the other two. Greetings are not tripled in the case of triplets.

A child born directly after twins is called Wuteji (from utela, "to repeat"). He is in no way different from other children.

Article VII. Circumcision

Circumcision is generally practiced. It does not have to 304 be performed at any particular age. It is usually done during childhood before the tenth year. The more timorous put it off until puberty or even later. Special customs of individual clans sometimes set a time. Thus, a man of the village of Besombó is not allowed to be circumcised until he has killed an animal at the hunt. On the other hand, the season during which circimcisions are performed is specified: they must take place during the period when the water level is low.

The operation may be performed by any man who is expert at it. It is carried out behind the huts. No one but the boys being operated on and their fathers are present. The boys stand in a group somewhat apart from the proceedings but place themselves so that with their eyes they can follow the treatment to which their companion is being subjected. The patient squats. One of the elderly assistants places his hands over the boy's eyes so that he cannot see what is happening. The person performing the operation has already dug a small pit to catch the blood. He pulls the foreskin, ties it with a string, and then uses ashes to trace the line which must be followed by the empúte knife that is used on such occasions. When the blood has stopped flowing, he chews some bondóngó [824] pepper (Aframomum . . .) or, preferably, [506] a caudal fin of [825] the ngolo fish and then spits it onto the wound. The resulting sensation is very painful. But the patient shows that he is brave; for if he cries he is mocked by his companions.

As long as the wound is not healed, the boy must not use [262] manioc leaves (bangánju) or manioc bread in the preparation of bosombó or lóóto. Nor may he eat the skin, head, or tail of fish.

While the wound is healing, the boy who has been circumcised is cared for, washed, etc., by his mother or, if he has reached

845 puberty, by his father. The performance of this role entails continence (bokeka) for the person who undertakes it, even with respect to the spouse. A violation of this rule prevents healing of the wound or at least makes the process very long and difficult. (1)

[755] 1. A similar bokeka applies to anyone nursing a large gangrenous ulcer (wǎlɛ́).

The foreskin that has been cut off is dried on the bolíkó (tray or shelf). Then no one bothers with it any longer, and it usually remains there, dusty and dirty, for an indefinite period of time if the rats leave it alone.

[177] In the centers the young people are beginning to neglect the native skilled in circumcising and resort instead to European surgeons.

[556] Circumcision is not an occasion for feasts or ceremonies. Sometimes a man who is rich and vain will give a feast, but this is not at all a common practice.

The term "to circumcise" is translated in Lonkundo as tɛ́na bonsoé, "to cut off the foreskin." The less vulgar term and one used much more frequently is tɛ́na nsóngé, "to cut off the tip." A much too decent circumlocution is tɛ́na batɔ́i, "to cut off the ears."

The reason for this custom has already been given in Chapter I, Part II, Article II, 2.

Article VIII. Education

868
857 From an early age a Nkundɔ́ child must perform various small services for his parents, especially in the household; he is asked to draw water, fetch firewood, take care of a little brother or sister, etc. The demands for such services are addressed chiefly to girls, but boys are not at all exempt. By the very nature of things, however, the latter are less frequently asked to help.

Quite early a boy may accompany his father on trips, at meetings, legal debates, etc The father makes a bow and arrows for him and teaches him the art of using them. The great pastime

624 thus, Nsono is a very prominent figure. Still arrayed as previously described, she sits outside the nongo near the road on the special stool of the nkumu. Nobody may pass her with food, a humane law, considering that she must spend the day fasting. If anyone attempts to do so she catches the unlucky individual, helps herself to as much of his food as she wants, the victim meanwhile begging her to be merciful and leave him a small portion, and the booty is taken into the ipana. During this sentinel duty Nsono must still keep the parrot's feather in her mouth and maintain silence, so, in case she catches an unsuspecting bearer of food, the remonstrance and argument are all one-sided.[1] After the first day Nsono no longer sits outside the nongo but goes from place to place in the village, choosing spots where people may least expect her, hoping thus to reap a bigger harvest for her pains. This is kept up for eight days, which comprise two Tumba ' weeks ' of three days' work and one of rest. The rest-day is appropriately named boina bo nsono after the duty of Nsono of sitting doing nothing day by day. The eight days of this ceremony over, Nsono lays aside her gourd and plantain stalk, which are placed at the foot of the first central supporting post [302] of the ebanga on entering. She is given a fresh coating of chalk and three coloured stripes are drawn the length of her back and down her arms. She still remains close to the nkumu.

[567] Various personalities are connected with the nongo of an nkumu. The Basele is a male slave, clothed in a skin breech cloth, whose duty it is to receive callers at the ipana before admitting them to the presence of the nkumu.

624 595 Mpenge is the name taken by the wife first married by the nkumu. From henceforth she no longer accompanies her husband, and their cohabitation ceases unless the nkumu is willing to pay her each time the sum of one hundred rods. But the nkumu is obliged to eat all food she cooks for him even though they have a quarrel. Mpenge does not honour her husband with the special greeting accorded to nkumu, but greets her husband and all other nkumu as she would ordinary people.[2] The second wife of an nkumu must assume the name of Iyombo Anganda, but no importance attaches to her position.

624 516 Among the Tumba generally, apart from the Bonginda, a woman is chosen from the molembe to bear the title Bolumbu Itina i Ekopo (Bolumbu, the ' raison d'être ' of the ekopo). She is, it would seem, a symbolical figure, a reminder that the ekopo owes its existence to the molembe of which this woman becomes the titular head. While the nkumu is still in seclusion the chosen woman is taken to the open space between the ipana and the row of sons' houses, known as the nanda. Here, in the presence of the assembled crowd she is praised by being addressed, 'Bolumbu Itina, bototo!' and the crowd exclaims, 'Bwoo!'[3] Strips of leopard skin, about eighteen

[845] [1] It is interesting to note that there are some exceptions to those who may be caught and robbed by Nsono during her eight days of watching. No member of the molembe may be thus treated, twins and their parents are exempt, and also all children born to the nkumu before he attains office, these being termed maomi.

[554 595] [2] Besides Mpenge, a mother of twins is also exempt from according nkumu special salutations, and among some groups the father of twins is also exempt.

[3] This ceremony gives husbands of any village, whether they are members of the molembe or not, the opportunity to single out a favourite wife for special honour, for at this time any woman may be given the name of Bolumbu, though not with the significant complement of Itina i Ekopo. The ceremony is similar, is performed at the nanda, but besides receiving the strips of leopard skin, she must be divested of all her clothing, a new lomboo and mpango are then placed round her, and the strips of skin then attached to the new belt.

must go to the monkeke for their fight, this being the location of the houses belong- 624
ing to the sons of the nkumu. The penalty for breaking this law is a fine, and if no 689 fine were forthcoming hanging used to be the alternative. If a quarrel arises elsewhere and one party wishes to avoid fighting, he may retire to the nongo and thus be safe. No trees in the nongo may be climbed. There are, however, privileged classes exempt from all such rules, and these embrace a good many people. Thus, the mother [845]
of twins, twins, Batwa, maomi, and all members of the molembe and ekopo are exempt from the laws of the nongo. If any of these commit acts which are illegal for those [672] coming under the law, they are not held guilty, but their actions will not be condoned;
they will be considered breaches of good conduct, and will be dealt with informally; [626]
the parties will be quietly reprimanded, and adjured to observe the proprieties of conduct. For outsiders breaking the laws of the nongo, what corresponds to a warrant is necessary. It is necessary to catch the culprit in the act and hale him before the [696]
nkumu. The nkumu himself cannot do this, nor can any of the ekopo; it must be done by one of the molembe, and so if the nkumu sees someone infringing the law he will try to get one of the molembe on the spot in a hurry in order to catch the offender.

In war,[1] it is the molomi o ehe who is most active in preparations, but the nkumu 624 will accompany his party to battle, keeping well in the rear, and surrounded by good fighters. He does not wear his montolo but puts on the informal hat. If an nkumu were 726 captured, he would never be tortured or killed as were other prisoners, unless he specifically sought such a fate. He could be ransomed, and his captors would [727] beseech him to let his people ransom him, but in many cases an nkumu would invite death rather than endure the shame of being yielded up as a prisoner of war.

An nkumu is always addressed by a double clap of the hands, and will not reply to 624 anyone rude enough to speak to him first. In answer to the clap he replies with a word of wisdom expressed in an aphorism or proverb. Such a reply, however, is 576 common to all elders, who have their favourite aphorisms ready for any who pay them special honour. Anything the nkumu says must be answered not by the customary nko boiko (even so) which ordinary people use, but with the special word, bionga, which is reserved exclusively for replying to an nkumu, and means the same thing.

When the hour of death approaches, an nkumu is attended by his Batwa. It is a 624 rule that he must not die a natural death, and near the end, while he is still conscious 763
and can still speak, all 'free men' clear out and leave the Batwa pygmies to their task of tying the nkumu very tightly with the fibrous yam vines known as menkiki. [563]
Often this secure lashing in the sitting posture, known as ilima, is sufficient to finish
the nkumu off, but sometimes the work is expedited by twisting his neck.[2] Then it is announced that he is dead, aohilwa, this being in contradistinction to the customary phrase aokoma moloko used of the death of ordinary people. While the latter means

[1] Owing to the lack of tribal cohesion, warfare was not on any considerable scale. The method of warfare consisted in sending groups of young men to fight first, the elders only joining in when one side began to get the worst of the fray. Victors and vanquished in such fights were designated 'husband' and 'wife' respectively, and members of the one group were free to come and go in the villages of the other, and even to help themselves to food. In future wars 'husband' and 'wife' were supposed to combine against their common foes.

[2] Besides nkumu, elderly and rich men, fathers and mothers of twins, and twins are buried in the ilima or sitting posture, in contradistinction to the monsepe position which is the recumbent one used for ordinary people and slaves. [764]

851 birth of a child involves a few prohibitions which affect the whole village and apply to the Batswá as well as the Baotó. They do not affect inhabitants of a portion of the village which is separated by a swamp from the group where the happy event has occurred. Those bound by the prohibitions may no longer go to "work" -- that is, to work in the fields, fetch food or firewood, build a hunting enclosure or a fishing weir, or work at the building or repair of a house. An infraction of this rule would result in the destruction of the fruit of all their labor: the fields would no longer produce, and no beast or fish would be caught. This deadly influence would [484] extend to all crops, etc. no matter whom they belong to. Nevertheless, there is nothing wrong in fetching firewood from the forest, harvesting manioc from a ripe field, or cutting the fruit of the palm.

Strictly speaking, these prohibitions touch only persons who have seen the newborn child. But since no one fails to go and admire it, all are subject to them. The prohibitions remain in ef-[184] fect until the umbilical cord is detached. Some tribes, however, have the more convenient custom of limiting its duration to the day of the child's birth.

2. The hygiene of mother and child

[844] The umbilical cord (lọkọ́ki) is cut near the middle. An in-
● 846 cision is made near the infant's navel. Each day a concoction of herbs is poured on the part of the cord that is still attached and white sand is put on it to make it dry more rapidly. When the end falls off, a powder made of scorched banana is applied to the wound.

In order to prevent the weakening of a woman's abdomen, it is bound with a belt made of bands of the dried bark of the banana tree (ekutú).

The assistants wash the mother and child. On the mother they place dried leaves or bark of the banana tree which have been carefully crumpled. They are put on like panties to catch the blood and are replaced by new ones whenever necessary. Nowadays pieces of cloth are often used; they are put on like a man's garment.

846 In order to facilitate the flowing out of all the blood, the mother is given hot baths. However, they are not begun before 515 noon, for the Nkundó say that in the morning and evening it is too cool and the blood is not sufficiently fluid. Those who have been [177] in greater contact with the Whites give the mother beer or wine to drink. The hot baths are administered behind the hut in an en-[843] closure set up for the occasion. They are of two kinds: baths by sprinkling (bompúlo wǎ mbǎomba) and steam baths (bompúlo w'ělángé). For the first method [485] very hot water is used, and by using a bunch of palms, the woman's abdomen, loins, and ribs are sprinkled. In the second method a pit is dug and large leaves (or a basin) containing boiling water are placed in it. Three or four strong, wide sticks are placed on top, and the woman is seated on them. She is wrapped in several mats to which, today, one or two blankets are added. She is left thus exposed to the action of the steam for several minutes. According to the natives, it is the ideal system because it makes all the blood come out, or almost all. Some people first give a sprinkle bath, and then follow it with a steam bath; others are satisfied with one or the other, depending on the circumstances. In any case more than one bath is never given in one day. This care may be given for one or two weeks, or it may stop after two or three days. The effect of "civilizing" is more inclined to the latter. But no Nkundó would want to omit the baths, for the woman's life is at stake.

After the bath the woman is carefully rubbed and dried, [302] and then anointed with oil mixed with red paint.

From time to time, usually every second day, she is given a douche.

846 As long as the mother remains weak, a large fire is maintained in her hut to keep her warm, and the doors are closed by means of palms. The husband and his relatives fetch the firewood. But the first log must be cut and brought by the husband who, to use the Nkundó expression, must "remove the violence" (ímola lofasó. In the beginning the woman lies down on a boánga right near the fire. She turns the front of her body toward it. The fire plays a great role in her quick recovery. She is very well cared

M
846 for and fed so that she may regain her strength rapidly. [486]

3. Seclusion

After childbirth the mother remains secluded (-ulama) in her hut for several weeks -- two, three, or more, depending on circumstances and especially on her husband's social position. Her seclusion is called julé. The hut bears the same name, or else it is called janga, "palm leaf." Sometimes the term ekelé is also applied to it, denoting the period of seclusion with all the special regulations it involves. These are as follows:

M
[844] 1) Meals. In some tribes the woman may already eat on the day of the delivery. But among others she is only permitted to drink. The reason for this fast is given in the form of a legend. One day long ago a Botswa asked his master for a little manioc, but the master refused to give it to him. The master's wife had just given birth. Annoyed by the refusal, the Botswa cursed his master, saying: "From now on your women will have to fast the day they give birth." (1) Another explanation is that at sometime in the past someone refused food to a slave who was about to be sacrificed at a feast of the lifting of mourning. Tribes and villages that do not give any reason of this sort permit a woman to eat in the evening, if the delivery takes place in the morning.

M
[833] A mother's first meal is prepared by a woman who has performed the carnal act the preceding night. She goes to draw water, and on her return she fastens or attaches over the door of the seclusion hut a piece of palm (jänga) or, among the Bombwanja, a piece of dried banana leaf; in this way she informs everyone that it is a house of ekelé. Then she prepares the food, which consists of

M
[262] bananas with fish or a hen in palm-oil sauce. It is eaten by the mother and her husband as well as the cook. Their very young children may also delight in it, but [487] the older ones, approaching puberty, may not. The newborn child is given a tiny bit of the sauce to taste.

---

1. Batswa women never fast under such circumstances.

846 [589] For a young unmarried mother, the meal is prepared by a girl who has not reached puberty or a woman who is quite old, that is, by someone who does not engage in sexual intercourse.

2) Various regulations. From the time of the preparation of the first meal until the end of the bokeka, that is, until the day the umbilical cord becomes detached, the hearth of the seclusion hut is sacred, so to speak. Apart from the couple and the assistants, no one may enjoy it or profit from it, either to light anything from it or eat anything that has been prepared there. However, some men have a means of lifting the prohibition pertaining to the fire. Upon the hearth and all the hearths of the village or a group of houses, depending on the situation, they let fall a few drops of a special concoction.

It is also forbidden to sweep or pick up the ashes from the fire. Everything must stay put until the umbilical cord of the newborn child becomes detached.

During the entire period of seclusion, the mother is assisted by a kinswoman (or one of her husband's kinswomen; among the Bombwanja there are always two), who is the wujisa, "the one who makes the seclusion" (from the verb uja). The seclusion should not be thought of as that of a hermit; the mother may go out as soon as her condition permits, and the helper goes about her occupations, but she does not do so more than necessary. Rather the hut is a house of prohibitions.

During this period the mother and her helper do not do farm [834] work. In addition they must abstain from carnal relations and from all contacts with the opposite sex, in conformity with the customs explained in Article II, 3, above. The ekelɛ́ extends to the husband and to any other person who enters the hut. Any infraction results in the death of the mother or the child in the same manner as in the case of the bokeka (see loc. cit.) . [488]

3) The end of the bokeka. When, at the end of four or five days, the umbilical cord becomes detached, the news is announced to the whole village, so that everyone may go back to their work that has been suspended. The following night the father [833] and mother perform the conjugal act to "destroy the bokeka and ●846 to be able to nurse the child together." This does not mean that 833 from then on they may have regular sexual relations, for these are not permitted until after the end of seclusion. But if they were to omit the act at this time, they would have to abstain from it until the child is weaned. The Nkundó say that the act is performed "only a little." For many it becomes masturbation; others withdraw before obtaining the effect of the act. In no case may the act reach its natural climax. The reason for this practice is unknown to me. Perhaps it is done in order not to molest the woman while she is in a painful condition.

The next day the ashes in the hearth of the seclusion hut 846 are swept out, and the fire becomes "ordinary"; anyone may use it and eat food prepared on it.

4) The umbilical cord is dried on the bolíkó (a tray or shelf) and then buried at the foot of a young banana tree planted for that purpose, preferably under a bọnkọmí tree if possible. The ashes and sweepings from the seclusion hut are thrown there. The banana tree is called nkíndá. (1) Its fruit may be eaten only by the child's [853] grandfather and grandmother. If another person eats it, he will be punished with a headache of a nervous type.

The umbilical cord is always buried in the father's native 846 soil. People who are far from home (laborers for the Whites, etc.) 644 preserve the umbilical cords of their children with great care in order to take them back [489] when they return to their village, or send them back when a favorable opportunity arises. The Nkundó hold to this usage tenaciously, because a person whose umbilical cord is not buried in the lands of his paternal clan has no authority in the group. The person involved would meet with the following objection: ntákokúndela lokolé, ntákokundela lọkọkí, óyakúmya ngámo? olé nk'eyâya, "The lokolé was not beaten for you, your [824] 1. This is a generic term used for any banana tree planted for a special purpose (a magical practice, a game, etc.).

846 umbilical cord was not buried; how dare you boast? You are but a 614 stranger." Therefore this custom constitutes a sort of matriculation into the family. If anyone wants to be entirely certain of a Nkundó's clan, he has only to look for the place where his umbilical cord was buried.

5) The end of seclusion is marked by a few ceremonies.

846 A. A meal. Early in the morning of the day set, the hus-
302 band goes and cuts a bunch of fruit of the palm tree, and the helper goes and picks manioc leaves (nowadays leaves and fruit collected the day before are sometimes used). The helper crushes all of this to make a dish of food. While she cooks it over the fire, she shaves a little hair off the mother, plucks out one eyebrow, and cuts one of her nails. Then she does the same to the child. The helper moves away, and the father comes in. His wife subjects him to the same treatment, and he reciprocates, doing the same to the child. The rubbish is simply thrown away without any ceremony. This practice has no special name; the Nkundó say: báyaténa bekengo, báyakenga, "They shave each other's heads."

When the vegetables are ready, all the women of the vil-
846 lage are gathered together. A little pit is dug in front of the hut. A large leaf is placed in it to serve as a dish, and the vegetables are poured into it. The mother, the helper, and all those assembled eat. Except for a few small boys no representatives of the stronger sex are present. When the meal is completed, [490] the leaf that served as a plate and those that served as spoons are buried in the pit. Today the more advanced of the population use a European plate and spoons. The meal and the vegetables eaten are called losanganya, "reunion," because the entire village is united in partaking of them, or lofanjola, "dispersion," because it is the prelude to the end of the bokeka.

B. Then follows the ceremony of separation (-téna bofofó, or, among the Injóló, bokékéléké. (1) The bofofó is the mid-rib

1. The expression and the ceremony designated by it are used whenever an important matter, such as a trial, etc., is to be terminated.

● 846 of a dried banana leaf. Three knots are tied in it. The helper holds it in one hand and with the other cuts off the first knot, which she carries away with her. The mother keeps her end in her hand and presents the other to her husband. She receives the knife from the hands of the helper and cuts between the two knots so that each spouse carries away his end. Each time the parties involved say, "We have cut the bofofó; we are separating; go away." Having thus bid each other farewell, each fastens his end to the roof of the seclusion hut.

This ceremony ends the period of seclusion and puts an end
846 to the ekelɛ́ prohibitions. From then on the couple may have sexual 837 relations together, the helper can resume her usual life, and adultery on the part of the father can no longer harm the child or the mother. Note, however, that the child's immunity to the father's misconduct implies one condition: the father must not take it on his knees the day he commits adultery. By the following day the effects of his act have been nullified. A woman can discover her husband's infidelity through his refusal to take the child. Often she makes use of this means to obtain a confirmation of her suspicions. Some men abstain from all misconduct solely to guard against any such possibility. Adultery may have a harmful influence on the child even after it is weaned if it has a weak constitution. [491] All this seems to indicate that the reaction is considered to be physical and direct rather than a sanction based on religion or superstition.

846 Nkundó therapeutics include an antidote, however; it is 789 called bondandota (from ndota "an illness caused by the infraction
of prohibitions of a sexual nature"). It consists of a potion made [278] from the sap of an aroid bearing the same name, which is mixed with the sap of the libúlúkakó plant. If for some reason or other the couple have been away from each other for a fairly long time, they sit or stand face to face and take the child on their knees, which touch each other, and each one makes the child drink the potion twice, once from each hand, making sure to turn its face toward him [or her]. Usually the couple also drink some of the brew, though it is intended primarily for the child. Without these precautions the relations between the pair and the father's

846 taking the child would cause the child's death. The same precau-
789 tion is also in order if the husband goes on a trip before the child's birth and does not return till after the delivery

We have just seen that the harmful effects of the father's 846 misconduct on his child's life is effectuated through the father's 837 act of taking the child on his knees. Thus the Nkundó speak of baóngó b'âbé, "a father's bad knees," to indicate his reprehensible
[826] conduct, and they say that the bondandota potion is administered to the child so that it will not die because of the father's bad
knees. (1)

1. The expression baóngó b'ǎbé is also used when an undertaking which requires continence is unsuccessful. (See Article II, 3).

When a child has painful and persistent diarrhea, it is often 753 interpreted as the effect of the father's infidelity. As soon as they 454 become aware of it, the couple separate for some time, and the father no longer touches the child. [492]

Contrary to what one reads on this subject about other peo-
837 ples of the Congo, Nkundó couples do not have to remain continent
834 beyond the period of seclusion. The separation ceremony gives the 789 husband back the freedom of action he had before his wife's pregnancy. For the wife the bokeka remains strict with respect to illicit relations until the child is weaned However she, too, may regain
her freedom by having recourse to an antidote, the ingredients of which she purchases from a person who holds the secret. The ingredients are placed in a small antelope horn which is then stopped [824] up by means of bolaká (resin from the Symphonia gabonensis). The interested party wears it about her loins on a string or a bead belt or, preferably, on a special creeper. This amulet protects the child's life from the harmful influence of the mother's acts of adultery, but it does so only on condition that she does not separate herself from the child, as we will explain further on. This procedure

837 is not morally condoned, and a woman who resorts to it does not 834 escape criticism. She is compared to a goat, who does not have 789 a regular and steady husband: álómya bǒna lontaa, "she nurses
her child as a goat does." (1)

1. The opposite of lómya lontaa, -- if it is used to show the contrast -- is lómya lontómbá.

When the separation ceremony is ended, the mother is
● 846 adorned with all her ornaments and goes out to walk in a procession through the village. The child is carried by an older sister, a niece, etc. He is taken around the village, bánangya bǒna l'olóló Small presents are offered him everywhere -- an arrow, a small knife, a hairpin, etc There is no feast, however; if that honor were accorded him he would die of it (for when someone dies, there is always a feast of farewell in his honor). [493]

Article IV. Nursing

853 During the first few days after birth an infant does not suck the milk of its mother, since it is "too hot." He is fed by a third person, preferably a relative.

On the third day the following occurs:

853 1) The mother's breasts are massaged (-kulola baéle). For 757 this purpose the Nkundó use leaves of the bǔte creeper and the lilongyá plant (Adenostemma viscosum Forst.), a green leaf from a banana tree called nselenge, several pieces of peeled sugar cane, the tips of the dried leaves of any banana tree, and sometimes other plants are added as well. All the ingredients are crushed, then boiled, and white sand and a bit of red paint are mixed in with them. The mixture is called ndengó. It is prepared by the women who are in charge of massaging the breasts. The bǔte leaves, however, must be picked by the father. He goes to the forest early in the morning and first shakes the creeper so that all leaves that are not firmly attached will fall off. Then he climbs it and picks the desired

842 differences can be found here, although they are less apparent to 855 a European observer since we usually approach the natives as a 152 group and our contact with them is often too impersonal.

2. Abortion

●947 A great enemy of maternal love is the practice of abortion, which has always been known to the Nkundó. Here we cannot describe all the prescriptions used for that purpose. It will be sufficient to enumerate the reasons for which they have recourse to this practice. They are as follows:

[178] 1) A woman's lasciviousness: the procreation and subsequent care of a child to some extent prevent the indulging in carnal pleasures. Formerly this cause of abortion was nonexistent or very rare. Needless to say, it has become more common, especially in the centers where it is constantly on the increase and where, in addition, occasional or regular "housekeepers" learn new means of sterilization and abortion.

2) A woman's antipathy or persistent anger toward her husband may encourage her to prevent conception or destroy its effect.

3) An excessive weakening of the mother's organism caused by a large number of conceptions and childbirths at too short intervals.

4) The encumberance and the difficulty of watching, carrying, and taking care of many small children -- bálota bọkẹkẹsano [467]
[535] wǎ bǎna nsátélá nsátélá. This reason is especially important for well-known dancers.

It goes without saying that several of these motives may be combined in the same person. For instance, I knew of a woman who aborted at the time of her eighth child. Her recurrent pregnancies, together with continuous work, had greatly reduced her strength. A palaver with her husband was the last straw; she decided to get rid of the fruit she carried in her body.

Outside of these exceptions the natives of this country ardently desire their own continuation through a large number of progeny. (1)

1. The same is not true elsewhere. Examples to that effect are cited from regions that are 847 [184] already more "civilized," such as the neighborhood of Coquilhatville and the Losanganya region.

847 848 Attention should be drawn to the danger of an increase in abortions for a new reason, namely the shame of giving birth outside of wedlock. As we have seen in Chapter I, Part II, Article IV, 3, premarital pregnancies have existed since time immemorial without resulting either in remorse or in palavers. Through the teaching of Christian morality, the feeling of shame must sooner or later be extended to this phenomenon. In explaining the evil of fornication, care should therefore be taken to insist on the fact that transgressing the Fifth Commandment by abortion is a far greater evil.

847 843 Voluntary abortion is not considered a moral error by the Nkundó. (2) In their eyes an imperfectly formed fetus, not viable,

2. An attitude which also exists in Europe at the present time, according to Haenecour in Kultuurleven, Vol. 6, no. 1, p. 21 (1935), and the brochure by Prof. D. Schockaert quoted there.

is not yet a man. It is only a human being in the process of formation, in potentia. Hence the custom of burying the aborted child in the [468] hut or quite near it. Thus the spirit responsible for the pregnancy will see that it is respected and repeat its benevolent action. (1) 847 [766] [774]

1. Others explain this custom by saying that the fetus already has a soul which remains near the tiny body and will take the first opportunity to re-enter the mother's body.

But if it is voluntary an abortion is always a wrong against family and society, for it deprives the family of a member on whom

● 841 they could count. Nevertheless, if it happens to a young unmarried mother, little or no fuss is made over it because no one can feel wronged; at most the culprit is scolded. For a married woman, on the other hand, it is one of the most serious infractions. Her husband has an immediate right to the fetus that would have become his child. He cannot beat or mistreat the offender in punishment, for her condition will not permit violence, but he can abandon her to her fate by refusing her all assistance, in particular by refusing to bring her firewood, the heat of which she greatly needs under such circumstances. For she has done him an enormous wrong and has acted with real malice (aônjokel'inkúnyá, he says), since he married her chiefly so that she would give him descendants. If she dies it is her own fault. Even her family will not support her, for [682] they would be accused of being involved in the crime; inevitably they would lose the case and be condemned to indemnify the husband.

An abortion which is ascertained to be involuntary [i.e., 843 a miscarriage] is treated like an accident or an illness and the appropriate legal stipulations are applied to it. Thus if it happens while the woman is at her parents' home, the responsibility for it falls on them. Usually the palaver is settled in a friendly manner; the family makes a few nko̱mí payments, and the question is closed. If relations between the husband and his son-in-law are somewhat strained, the dispute may be drawn out and may result in the breaking up of the marriage. If the woman dies from the accident, the rules given in Article X of the preceding chapter come into play. [469]

Article II. Conception and Pregnancy

133
The Nkundó have only a partial notion of the phenomena of conception. They are well aware of which acts cause the procreation of children. They have a perfect knowledge of anatomy and a rich vocabulary pertaining to sexual life. But they know only as much about physiological processes as experience can teach them. Furthermore, they believe that the act of procreation must be repeated several times in order to produce its natural result. Note,

853 The child is given to a wet nurse (a kinswoman, a stranger, a Botswa woman, depending on who is available).

847 If the mother's body shows no signs of evil-doing or of 845 "the hatred of others," it is thought that her death was caused 843 by evil spells on the part of the child. Thereupon some kill the child to prevent it from doing harm during its whole life; others, on the contrary, spare it despite everything.

If the husband (for it is he above all who is involved, since 843 he is most exposed to possible lapses) has unfortunately been guilty
837 of misconduct, his wife has only a slim chance [478] of salvation. Nevertheless, it is still possible for her to be saved, on condition that from then on her husband abstain from any sexual act and from all the accidental gestures and actions described above. The least he can do under these circumstances is to inform his wife of his indiscretion so that she can take precautions. If he wants to [672] ward off any possibility of causing his wife's certain death, he sends her home and gives his father-in-law a pledge (ndanga) through which he recognizes his guilt and shows his intention to assume the entire responsibility for his misdeed. An upright man prefers to act in this fashion, for he never knows whether one day he will not inadvertently violate one of the prohibitions.

B. The child's death is the result of the putrefaction of 853 the mother's milk, the mother being thus incapable of nursing.
837 As in the preceding case, the offense is a priori imputed to the husband -- isé aôoma bǒna la ndota. (1) Since he has wronged no one but himself, no palaver ensues; the "natural" punishment is sufficient. This does not mean that he is not the object of evil tongues; people point at him and at times remind him of his misdeed. To remove the blame from himself, he can resort to

[153] 1. Ndota is an illness caused by the violation of prescriptions of a sexual nature (See Chapter I, Part II, Article IV, 2, A).

174 836 on the other hand, is extremely repugnant by nature, especially for the Nkundɔ́. It is a vice which comes about only as a result of special beliefs or through a fundamental degeneration of sexuality.

The breaking up of the framework of traditional organization may furnish a partial explanation in this realm as in many others. In the case of sexual relations between single adults, it might even be deemed sufficient. As much may be said about greed, vanity, the desire for ostentation and display. These are very natural sentiments in a woman, and they were greatly stimulated by the dazzling riches imported from Europe. But these facts are not sufficient in themselves to account for everything. They are especially and entirely inadequate in explaining the considerable changes in the relations between immature children, and we are thus forced to accept the explanation given by serious natives.

3. Children born out of wedlock

● 848 Among the Nkundɔ́, giving birth to a child outside of wedlock has never from time immemorial been considered a grave misdemeanor. It is not considered criminal, as ethnographers say it is among many other African peoples.

Furthermore, this attitude logically follows from the liberty permitted to adolescents, as described above. Neither the woman nor her lover are harassed or punished as a result. On the contrary, the grandparents joyfully receive the child, who adds to the size, power, and wealth of the clan. [88] For an illegitimate child (entombɔ́) (1) 848 614 does not belong to its natural father. It is incorporated into the mother's family. It is said that he is born without a father. His

1. Such a child is also known as bọna ɔ́a wanɛ́, "child of the sunlight," or bọna ɔ́a bombamboka, "child of the highway" or "of a girl of the streets." Among the Bombomba the term bọkẹlankɔ́lo is also heard.

848 posterity constitute a separate family in the clan of his maternal
614 ancestors; it is called jwǒmoto or etóo éy'ǒnankáná (that is, the patrilineal posterity of the sister's son). Families and clans that have originated in this manner are not particularly rare in this region. One may even find an entire village born in this manner. Thus, Mbelé of the Bombwanja-Boéndé is the etóo éy'ǒnankáná of Lileko. A more striking example is that of the Injóló tribe, descended from the sister of Nsimba and Eanga, who are respectively the ancestors of the Ntómbá and the Boléngé. Since the male ancestor is unknown, it is assumed that their origin is due to an extramarital conception by the mother, and that her son, Nkólóbisé, had no father. The same is true of the Wesé subtribe, bǒnankáná of the eldest subtribe Engónjó, as well as of the Ngombe subtribe, which is bǒnankáná of the Wesé.

It would be incorrect, however, to attribute the origin of all the "jwǒmoto" clans to illegitimate children, for they may have come into existence for other reasons. Thus it is known that the ancestors of certain clans were born of a legitimate union, but the bride price payment had not yet been completed. Then, as some sort of obstacle intervened, the relationship by marriage was broken, and the child was incorporated into the mother's clan. The obstacle which interrupts the bride price payment may be a disharmony between the engaged couple or their families, as in the case of the Baséká Etáféngela of the Bakáala; but it is more likely to be war or the migrations of the tribes at certain periods of their history. The latter reason may have separated more than one husband from a wife for whom he had only made an initial payment at the time her child was born.

848 The fact then that many "female" clans exist in a [89] region does not prove that illicit relationships between single people were common in the past -- especially if one also takes into account that pregnancies were formerly much more frequent than they are nowadays. It merely shows that such relationships did occur.

An illegitimate child is considered and treated by the maternal grandfather as if it were his own. No distinction is made between him and the legitimate children. He is in no way despised. He has a voice in family councils and deliberations. And since according to Nkundó notions his relationship to his first cousins is that of father to son, he ●848 has precedence over them and can become head of the family after his grandfather and uncles. In his natural father's clan, on the other hand, he has nothing to say.

848 596 If a man pays the bride price for a girl who has had a child by him, he asks his father-in-law to let him have his illegitimate child. This wish is almost always granted. The father-in-law well understands his son-in-law's fatherly sentiment of love and considers it quite legitimate and proper that a father should himself possess the ×[583] fruit of his own flesh. The only condition laid down is that because of the child the son-in-law must increase the amount of the bride price valuables by an extra slave or his equivalent. (1)

1. This transaction may even take place after the mother's death.

The father is not in a position to invoke any rights strictly speaking. The child is not considered as his because of his physical paternity, but only because of his father-in-law's kindness. If the latter were to refuse the father's request, he would not be acting in violation of justice. But his behavior would be considered as inhumane toward his daughter's husband and his grandson, and it would be criticized.

When a child is adopted by his natural father in this fashion, no one despises him for his illegitimate birth [90]. This procedure may therefore be considered to establish his legitimacy.

848 178 Nowadays, among the Beloko and their Elíngá, the practice of "buying" the child has sprung up. That is, if a man does not marry a woman who has had a child by him, he pays her parents a certain amount in order to obtain the child. There does not seem to be much opposition to the introduction of this custom, which springs from an honorable feeling for paternity and its duties. Its only disadvantage is that in such a case the child may never claim any rights in his mother's clan. (1)

1. See Chapter VIII, Article IV.

848 614 583× If a stranger marries an unwed mother, he is never given the child, which remains in the mother's family. This situation is clearly distinguished from those mentioned above.

848 614 583 What happens is that when such a woman goes to live with her husband and her child is too young to remain with his grandparents, she takes him along. Later when the boy reaches adulthood, he sometimes settles with the clan of his mother's husband and produces a posterity. But he is more or less discredited by the adopting clan (and by the others). He has no political rights there, no mpifo. His posterity is called mbúsolá (from mbúsa, "behind" and bolá, "clan of origin"). (2) Its members may marry members of the adopting clan, excepting of course the descendants of their common mother. They also have their own cemetery. They thus form a separate clan within the village.

The practice of "bringing a child in the sling" seems to be disappearing at the present time, because everyone wants to remain in his own clan. Government policy deprives natives who do not live with their own families of almost all their rights. Moreover, [91] today it is much easier than in the past to procure the means for establishing a home. This last problem was certainly an important reason why a man would settle with the clan of his mother's husband.

848 684 The preceding clearly shows that a lover by whom an unmarried girl has a child incurs no blame, penalty, or fine. He has no obligation to care either for the mother or the child. Neither justice nor propriety requires him to marry the unwed mother. No indemnity is exacted.

There is only one exception: that is, if the mother dies as a result of the pregnancy or the delivery, or if the child is stillborn or born sickly, deformed, or crippled. In such cases the lover has to pay a heavy indemnity (mbálaka) (1) That is why an unmarried woman who is pregnant is pressed into giving the name of her accomplice as

2. They also say "he was brought in the sling," bôyélákí ndá lọmbẹ̌.

1. For the child, the indemnity goes up to 50 rings; for the mother, 50 rings and a slave (or his equivalent in currency), or 75 to 100 rings.

848 soon as her family becomes aware of her condition. The accomplice
684 is made officially responsible and is required to accept this responsible and is required to accept this responsibility by publicly pledging his willingness to take all consequences upon himself. This pledge like all pledges is called ndanga. It consists of a knife, a ring of copper or brass, a spear, or similar objects. (2)

2. The same custom is practiced in the case of pregnancy resulting from adultery.

Article V. Sexual Intercourse

833 Although this subject is extremely delicate and therefore difficult to investigate and describe, it does not seem pointless to note here a few details with which I have become acquainted. We will discuss in succession a few circumstances relative to the act, then rape, and finally what are called incomplete acts. [92]

1. Circumstances relative to the act

The Nkundó have intercourse lying on their sides. Nowadays, [77] natives who have had frequent contacts with Whites are beginning to abandon the old manner for that of the Europeans. The spirit of imitation probably plays some part in the transformation which is beginning, but the gradual spread of the knowledge that the European system makes conception more likely is also a factor.

Even for illicit relations our natives seldom choose the forest or near-by palm or banana groves. Usually they prefer an isolated hut, or they take advantage of the absence of witnesses who might intrude on them. At night they are generally afraid of anything that stirs in the forest.

833 The Nkundó have sexual relations only during the night. To 753 do so in the daytime would be to risk being striken by a mortal illness
684 called bombilɛ́ (derived from mbilɛ́ "noon," by extension, "day").

614
621
The Bongangá are divided as follows:

1) Bongangá, in the narrow sense of the term (Basékả Inanó, B. Bolaká, B. Bongénge, B. Bandúwá, B. Lokókómyá)

2) Bongangá of Bakoyó, or Bolíma

3) Bongangá of Mbómbé or Basékả Botúna

Thus Lotólá, Bakoyó, and Mbómbé each have an Etóo group and a Bongangá group. The Bongangá, in the narrow sense of the term, have in addition a "slave" group named Batsína, a part of which is located with the Bosánjo. A foreign clan is settled with the Etóo of Lotólá; they are the Bofalambóka, descendant of a man named Ekonda (Imbolo) and his sister who was married to Mbete, a slave from Bompángá (Wǎngatá) who was freed by his master.

Many villages have foreign groups living with them such as descendants of slaves (ekwála), or others (Ekonda, Bombwanja, groups related by marriage called likilo, mpámá or bowélé, and mbúsolá, (1) etc.). [249]

[609] 1. Mpámá or bowélé are any foreigners who were formerly invited by the group patriarch to remain with him in order to carry out certain tasks, especially metal-working. Mbúsolá is the term applied to a ●[848] child born to a woman out of wedlock [825] (Chapter I, Part 2, Article IV, 3). Such children are also called nkio y'áóme, "the husband's flying dogs," because they are not his own children but are attached to their mother's husband in the fashion of these animals, who attach themselves to trees when they sleep.

If we add the descendants of relatives who have married into other more or less remote groupings, the prohibition against marriage on account of kinship applies to a good many people. In accordance with the law of exogamy, such a kin group may be widely dispersed geographically, and it is understandable that it is not always easy to 586x 948 178 Finally, note that in the "lowlands" of the region [413] under discussion, payment for a natural child is beginning to be made regardless of whether the beginning of the bride price has been paid, or whether no payment at all has been made. In the past there was no question of such a practice, for the child would have been considered a slave in his father's clan and in the neighboring villages. And actually in the villages of the interior and in practically all of the region under consideration, that attitude has not changed. It is in the European centers, under the influence of Christian ideas, that these new ideas develop. In practice, cases do not occur except when the individuals in question are natives of very distant villages and are established permanently (to the extent that this term can be used) in their extra-customary residence.

Article V

The Position of Former Spouses and Their Children

586x Once the palaver concerning the reimbursement of valuables is settled, the former spouses become strangers to each other.

Their families sometimes continue relations with each other, however. In fact we have seen that a divorced woman may be replaced by a relative in her conjugal role. In such a case relations by marriage result from the continuation of the marriage agreement. (1)

Except in cases where a substitution occurs, all ties between the former spouses and their clans are thus broken.

The divorced wife can no longer claim the slightest right to the fields she has established on the land cleared by her husband. In general, all the fruits of her various activities remain the property of the husband; she herself [414] has no further right to them. In our time, however, it is not unusual for a man and wife who are 847 [184] already more "civilized," such as the neighborhood of Coquilhatville and the Losanganya region.

847 Attention should be drawn to the danger of an increase in 848 abortions for a new reason, namely the shame of giving birth outside of wedlock. As we have seen in Chapter I, Part II, Article IV, 3, premarital pregnancies have existed since time immemorial without resulting either in remorse or in palavers. Through the teaching of Christian morality, the feeling of shame must sooner or later be extended to this phenomenon. In explaining the evil of fornication, care should therefore be taken to insist on the fact that transgressing the Fifth Commandment by abortion is a far greater evil.

is not yet a man. It is only a human being in the process of formation, in potentia. Hence the custom of burying the aborted child 847 in the [468] hut or quite near it. Thus the spirit responsible for the [766] pregnancy will see that it is respected and repeat its benevolent
[774] action. (1)

1. Others explain this custom by saying that the fetus already has a soul which remains near the tiny body and will take the first opportunity to re-enter the mother's body.

But if it is voluntary an abortion is always a wrong against family and society, for it deprives the family of a member on whom

000 this people with a sense of duty, that individual conscience of which they are so imperatively in need. [515]

Article IX. Rights Over the Children

593x 851 Without repeating everything on this subject that is to be found at various points in this work, it is nevertheless appropriate to summarize here the various considerations and conclusions concerning the rights over children.

The great principle dominating the entire question is the Roman adage: Pater is est quem nuptiae demonstrant. The legitimate husband is the legal father of his wife's child. Without marriage the natural father has no rights.

● 848 851 593x Consequently, children conceived in adultery belong exclusively to the husband (Chapter VI, Article VIII). Since relations with a widow who is not yet legitimately remarried is adultery, a child born as a result of such relations is legally the heir's child, (Chapter III, Article II). The same rule, mutatis mutandis, applies to a divorcée before a regular remarriage (Chapter VIII, Article III, 1).

The child of an independent woman has no legal father. Consequently, it belongs to the mother's family and remains illegitimate (entombɔ́: entombó ɛ̌kámí is the name by which his grandfather calls him). (Chapter I, Part II, Article IV, 3.) But if the natural father marries the mother, he can obtain the child by paying an extra "slave" for it. In any case he must pay the complete bride price. If he does not marry the mother, he has no rights whatsoever over the child; however, this rule is in the process of changing in the northwest corner of the region under discussion (Chapter I, Part II, Article IV, 3).

This legitimation is not required if the pregnancy began after bride-price payments were begun. It can take place even after the mother's death by means of the above-mentioned payment. Such cases of posthumous legitimization sometimes occur in relation to children born of extra-customary [extracoutumiere] unions contracted during the early period of colonization. [516]

613 they always refer to their descent from the ancestor-founder: "We are baseka Ngoi (descendants of Ngoi; we belong to the clan of Ngoi)."

Naturally the Nkundo-Mongo know very well that all the Mongo clans are descended from a common ancestor. They even believe in the common descent of all people. However, in clan unity they only go back to that ancestor who made their group legally autonomous, who made himself independent.

To that group belong, thus, all the children of that founder, all of the children of his sons, all of the children of his grandsons and great-grandsons; thus, all those who keep the same family name in our society.

The Nkundo-Mongo call the clan from the father's side their wise, from ise (father). The children of the lawfully married daughters belong to another wise, since they go back on their father's side to another ancestor. However, children of an unmarried daughter of the 948 clan continue to bear their mother's name, and thus belong to the wise of the mother, just as, in our society, they take on the family name of the mother.

Married women, however, continue ethnically to belong to their own paternal clan and do not form part of the wise of their husband.

2. Kinship Terms in the Paternal Clan

601 613 All of the living members of the paternal clan constitute one extended family. In the bosom of that one family, all members of the same /151/ generation also bear the same title. All of the members of the grandfather's generation are grandfathers. All the members of the father's generation are fathers, also including the female members. Thus, the sisters and female cousins of the father who belong to the wise are all called "female fathers": isomoto or faomoto (from ise or fafa, father, and bomoto, woman). All of the older brothers and male cousins of the wise are batomolo; all younger brothers or male cousins of the wise are bakune; all sisters or female cousins of the wise are nkana. All of the children of brothers and male cousins, and also all of the children of sisters and female cousins who remain in the wise, are bana (children).

601 561 613 Such terms are to us, of course, a never ending source of mistakes, complications, and ridicule. The native cannot possible understand this and underneath takes it very much amiss. Socially, legally, and

602 another group. According to their relationship to others, groups may be designated as:

- brother, younger or older;
- brother or half brother (descended from various wives of the polygynous ancestor);
- ●[848] Illegitimate child of the sister which, legally, as the child of the oldest brother or of the father of his mother, belongs to the group of the mother's relatives;
- child of a boy who together with his sister has moved to the unit of his brothers-in-law and has settled there permanently;
- son of a sister, who for some reason has separated from his paternal relatives and has moved in with the group of his mother or of one of his grandmothers.

601 Present-day social relationships are influenced by this variety of kinship relations. The kinship terms which refer to the relationships of the genuine or assumed ancestors to each other are occasionally transferred to the groups.

621 In this paper we shall describe the Isangi group (12) as an

[101] example of hierarchical kinship structure. Isangi is a local group of the type described above (p. 1). Following the custom of the region, I shall refer to it as a "village." Until we have decided which terms are applicable to the various groups, I shall use the letters A to E for the individual ranks of the hierarchical structure. Within this system A shall stand for the smallest and E for the largest units (see Diagram 2).[1]

In addition to the three ranks of Group D in Isangi, there are others in the daughter villages (see Diagram 1). These may also include foreign groups, as, for example, the "Nkundó" group, Liimbu, in Wengā.

578 The second case is somewhat more recent. It occurred at the beginning of the European penetration of the area. During the general upheaval at that time, the natives of Bosɔ́ka village (Bilángi of Lingonju) took advantage of the absence of many adult men whom the soldiers had taken on an expedition against the Mbole. They were able to capture a woman named Nsombola and take her home with them. She loved one of the men of Bosɔ́ka, and after many years, he "purchased" her for the price of two slaves. She lived there happily until quite recently, when she was overcome with a desire to return to her own race. (She leaves no descendants.)

In this second instance, then, the Nkundɔ́ bowed to the woman's wishes and, in accepting a bride price for Nsombola, gave in to the inevitable. This example shows that they can be flexible in their customary requirements if the situation warrants it.

Nevertheless, there have been no admirers or imitators of these exceptional cases, and the opposition against unions between the two races remains firm. Mixtures are not desired. The position
P
M
[851] which the hybrid family of Bakao occupies in the village of Lotángonda is highly significant. For it is an exception to the rule applicable to such cases, namely, that a child who has no legitimate father is incorporated into his mother's clan. The descendants of Bakao and Njalɛ́ are dependents of Lotángonda and are a part of it politically, but [243] they are not included in the kin group. For they have inherited a Bilángi nature from their father, and therefore, contrary to the logic usually applied, they have not become relatives of their ancestress. Here, too, the "racial principle" has prevailed against common law.

595 Nor does one hear of temporary relationships or concubinage between them. I know only of one instance; its outcome was not happy, and it did not invite imitators. It happened around 1913. A certain polygamist, Lokɔ́ta of Bokeke (Bombwanja) fell in love with the wife of Bonkingɔ́, who at the present time is headman of Bosáola (Batswá of Ntɔ́mbá, Bombwanja). He became the laughing stock of the entire region, but because of his love, it did not deter him. In his own household, however, the situation was more serious. One of his wives (Ámbánsele) soon left him. The others refused him their bodies 000alimentary prohibitions must be observed until the child is weaned.

851 As soon as the child is born, the women present announce the happy event with shouts, and someone runs to inform [483] the father. The latter (or a kinsman) communicates the news by means of a lokolé. For a boy the message is: Bato̱kó̱ falafala, bokáta bőkátáká liko̱ngá la nguwa, ayíme lo̱ke̱ndo̱ ndá likundú, etc., (1)

1. Elsewhere the term is ásokúsola. Or: be̱so̱fó̱ la mpíko bésőkitela bele foléfolé, "bowels and livers have come down, are outside."

"The mats are spread; he who holds spear and shield has come from the journey in the womb." For a girl, bokáta ... nguwa is omitted and the words isekaseka y'ólíato, "sweet friendship of woman" are substituted. (2)

2. Other terms exist in certain tribes (See Anthropos, Vol. 30, 1935, p. 655 ff.)

The news is greeted with cries of joy in the whole village, and everyone runs to admire the child and congratulate the mother. They do not enter the house. No feast heightens the general rejoicing.

Then, if the child is a boy, the father or a man in his family places himself in front of the child, who is presented to him at the entrance to the hut or on the porch if there is one. He holds a spear and threatens as if he were about to attack the child, shouting: "Ha! ha! ha!," and gesticulating like a warrior. Then he takes the little hand and makes the child hold the spear, saying to him: "Be a strong man, make war bravely." (3) The

3. If later in life a boy lets himself be frightened, he is asked, "Was that ceremony not performed when you were barely born?"

●851 birth of a child involves a few prohibitions which affect the whole village and apply to the Batswá as well as the Baotó. They do not affect inhabitants of a portion of the village which is separated by a swamp from the group where the happy event has occurred. Those bound by the prohibitions may no longer go to "work" -- that is, to work in the fields, fetch food or firewood, build a hunting enclosure or a fishing weir, or work at the building or repair of a house. An infraction of this rule would result in the destruction of the fruit of all their labor: the fields would no longer produce, and no beast or fish would be caught. This deadly influence would [484] extend to all crops, etc. no matter whom they belong to. Nevertheless, there is nothing wrong in fetching firewood from the forest, harvesting manioc from a ripe field, or cutting the fruit of the palm.

Strictly speaking, these prohibitions touch only persons who have seen the newborn child. But since no one fails to go and admire it, all are subject to them. The prohibitions remain in ef- [184] fect until the umbilical cord is detached. Some tribes, however, have the more convenient custom of limiting its duration to the day of the child's birth.

2. The hygiene of mother and child

[844] 846 The umbilical cord (lo̱kó̱ki) is cut near the middle. An incision is made near the infant's navel. Each day a concoction of herbs is poured on the part of the cord that is still attached and white sand is put on it to make it dry more rapidly. When the end falls off, a powder made of scorched banana is applied to the wound.

In order to prevent the weakening of a woman's abdomen, it is bound with a belt made of bands of the dried bark of the banana tree (ekutú).

The assistants wash the mother and child. On the mother they place dried leaves or bark of the banana tree which have been carefully crumpled. They are put on like panties to catch the blood and are replaced by new ones whenever necessary. Nowadays pieces of cloth are often used; they are put on like a man's garment.

Article IX. Rights Over the Children

593x 851 Without repeating everything on this subject that is to be found at various points in this work, it is nevertheless appropriate to summarize here the various considerations and conclusions concerning the rights over children.

The great principle dominating the entire question is the Roman adage: Pater is est quem nuptiae demonstrant. The legitimate husband is the legal father of his wife's child. Without marriage the natural father has no rights.

848 851 593x Consequently, children conceived in adultery belong exclusively to the husband (Chapter VI, Article VIII). Since relations with a widow who is not yet legitimately remarried is adultery, a child born as a result of such relations is legally the heir's child. (Chapter III, Article II). The same rule, mutatis mutandis, applies to a divorcée before a regular remarriage (Chapter VIII, Article III, 1).

The child of an independent woman has no legal father. Consequently, it belongs to the mother's family and remains illegitimate (entombɔ́: entombó ěkámí is the name by which his grandfather calls him). (Chapter I, Part II, Article IV, 3.) But if the natural father marries the mother, he can obtain the child by paying an extra "slave" for it. In any case he must pay the complete bride price. If he does not marry the mother, he has no rights whatsoever over the child; however, this rule is in the process of changing in the northwest corner of the region under discussion (Chapter I, Part II, Article IV, 3).

This legitimation is not required if the pregnancy began after bride-price payments were begun. It can take place even after the mother's death by means of the above-mentioned payment. Such cases of posthumous legitimization sometimes occur in relation to children born of extra-customary [extracoutumiere] unions contracted during the early period of colonization. [516]

● 851 593x A father's rights over his child are not unassailable. He can lose them, especially if he neglects to fulfill certain duties because such conduct is equivalent to disowning. Among the duties whose neglect results in the loss of rights over the children are the following:

1) The completion of the bride price.

2) The fulfillment of funerary duties (burial, payments).

3) The relinquishment of a portion of the bride price to be restituted in case of divorce.

4) The performance of duties toward the child. Only instances of grave negligence, constituting real abandonment, enter into consideration here -- especially an illegitimate refusal to obtain the means for a son to get married. The case cited in Chapter II, Article XI, 3 and similar instances also fall into this category.

Conclusions

58 At the end of this work we shall sum up the conclusions it suggests to us:

1) Among the Nkundó marriage consists of a union between a man and a woman, constituted through the payment of certain valuables. This payment is made by the husband, through the intermediation of one or more official witnesses, to the wife's parents; it is counterbalanced by a payment of valuables on the part of the woman's family to the husband and his family.

2) There are various sorts of conjugal unions which differ somewhat from this standard form: the inheritance of a widow by a distant relative of the husband; the substitution -- during life or after death -- of a kinswoman who continues the union begun by a woman now deceased or divorced; [517] the offer of a wife in exchange for the performance of an important service; a certain kind of exchange and, in some tribes, purchase; and union with a slave.

3) Apart from the question of the Batswa, obstacles to marriage are due to kinship and affinity.

inches long and two inches in width, numbering up to seven are brought and attached [596] to the back of her lomboo by folding them over it.[1]

The first male child which was born to the nkumu before he acceded to the office is 852 ● known as Iyomi Nkoi. If he has none, then the right to this name passes to the first male child to be born to his younger brothers. Any child born on the day that the 624 nkumu is given his montolo is also called Iyomi; if a male he will be Mola Iyomi, if a [551] female, Mpembe Iyomi.[2] These children must not see the nkumu until they are old enough to know his name and greet him properly, and so they are taken to some village other than the one in which he has his residence. When such children are considered old enough to take up residence in the village of the nkumu it is an occasion for revelry, a big dance, nteko, is held, and there is a feast. The child, Iyomi, is brought to the village of the nkumu with rejoicing, and this is a signal for everybody desiring to do so to help himself to anything belonging to the nkumu. Goats and fowls may be killed and eaten, sugar-cane rooted up, bananas, plantains, and other crops growing near by seized for food. Because of this custom the nkumu will take precautions and send his livestock, at least, off to some other village in order not to lose more than he can help.[3]

The nyemba, the singer or singers, and the ntotii, the praisers already mentioned, 624 remain with the nkumu during his period of seclusion. Added to these is ntomba 533 lokombi, the bearer of the lokombi, a stringed instrument played with the fingers, 534 similar to a bass viol in its general appearance.

Inside the ipana during the seclusion of the nkumu, few people have the right of 624 entrance, but as one enters the ebanga where the daylight hours are spent, one finds 342 the couch of the nkumu on the left and towards the rear. On the same side and towards 352 the front are seated the ntombe lokombi and the nyemba. Nsono's couch is to the right of, and parallel to, that of the nkumu, but still to the left of the centre posts. To the right of her couch is the fire in the centre, and beyond the fire on the right side is a couch for the maomi, likewise somewhat to the rear, with a space in front for the ntotii.

The month's seclusion being completed, the nkumu prepares to buy the homage of 624 the village. Nsono gets rid of her decorative colours, and assumes ordinary attire, becoming like any other of the wives, and is ready to take up all the usual duties of 576 a wife, whether in the garden or at the house. The people are called to come and render to the nkumu their homage and praise. The men come to the ipana, are admitted to the presence of their nkumu and seat themselves on the bare earth with their legs wide apart and facing him. They then, without uttering a word, greet him in the

[1] The lomboo is a belt which used to be worn by Tumba women encircling the buttocks, and this was used to attach their only garment, the ekete among the Bonginda, this being a short loin cloth, or an mpongo among other groups, this being a woven cloth strip worn between the legs.

[2] When a new nkumu assumes office, one already in office will take this opportunity of getting more of his sons named Iyomi. He takes them to the molembe of the new nkumu, and having placed a bracelet of cowrie shells on the right wrist, and sometimes one on the right ankle, asks the member of the molembe whose right it is to give away the montolo to name these sons Maomi (pl. of 'Iyomi'). This man will then take such a son, and presenting him to the people introduce him by giving him a name, and following with praise as, 'Ose Iyomi Lonzie, bototo!' and the crowd replies with the customary 'Bwoo!' [291]

[3] It is well to remember that not every individual bearing names associated with the institution of the nkumu is directly concerned with it. With the practice of 'resurrecting' dead relatives by naming new-born children after them, such names as these become widespread. [551]

in three large stakes to support the main crosspieces. Then he builds the vertical framework of his hut by planting strong, straight stalks all around the perimeter, 70 centimeters apart. To these vertical stalks, the native attaches horizontal crosspieces made of strong raffia stems and spaced from five to seven centimeters apart. The same method is followed for the interior partition, although weaker and thinner raffia stems are used. The space reserved for the door is left open. At this stage, the dwelling resembles a large cage, [32] fully open to the sky, with its bars arranged horizontally. It remains in that state all through the period of time required to prepare the materials that will line the interior walls. To this end, the native cuts leaves of the nse-nse, a very common type of palm throughout this swampy region. The leaves are assembled in groups of four, the fronds having first been folded in along the rib and roughly braided. The free ends are tied with a fine thong, and the ribs are bound together at intervals of five centimeters. Once the leaves have been prepared, the native goes inside the hut under construction and begins to cover the walls. Proceeding systematically, he works from bottom to top, attaching the nse-nse leaves to the horizontal slats and placing them so that they overlap. When the wall has been covered, it is strengthened with a few slats placed vertically and tied to the outer framework

837 of the bokeka for the husband, but until the weaning of the child for the wife. It is especially strict for the period of seclusion (see below, Article III, 3).

The violation of the essential stipulation of this interdict (-fénda bokeka) results either in the death of the woman during pregnancy and especially during seclusion or in the death of the child later on. [477]

A. If the woman dies during this period, the suspicion is placed a priori on her husband. The Nkundó say aòfénda wǎlí, "he has transgressed against his wife." Unless he can prove his innocence through public actions, the judgment of a magician, or autopsy[sic].

If the woman has been the victim of a seducer, he is held responsible and must pay a large indemnity equivalent to the bride price that was paid for the deceased . If no other man is involved, the affair has no consequences.

843 In the past the combined autopsy and Caesarian section was 163 always performed. It had a dual purpose: to remove the child and 754 to examine the mother. If the operation revealed the existence of 845 a "stomach" (likundú), the deceased was of a noxious (liloka)
853 nature or constitution and therefore caused the death of her child.
If the child remained alive, it proved that he was of a magically superior nature and was able to resist the natural evil spells of his mother, which thus turned against their unwitting author. (1)

1. The Nkundó believe that only animals have a "stomach" (likundú). If a human being has one, that is, if his viscera are large, curved, in compartments, in a word, abnormal, that person is an evildoer. He commits evil acts voluntarily or, most frequently, unknowingly. Some men with a likundú can be recognized by the fact that they eat their nails, hair, etc. The Nkundó must certainly have observed relationships between this habit and a deformity of the stomach.

● 853 The child is given to a wet nurse (a kinswoman, a stranger, a Bo̱tswa woman, depending on who is available).

847 845 843 If the mother's body shows no signs of evil-doing or of "the hatred of others," it is thought that her death was caused by evil spells on the part of the child. Thereupon some kill the child to prevent it from doing harm during its whole life; others, on the contrary, spare it despite everything.

843 837 If the husband (for it is he above all who is involved, since he is most exposed to possible lapses) has unfortunately been guilty of misconduct, his wife has only a slim chance [478] of salvation. Nevertheless, it is still possible for her to be saved, on condition that from then on her husband abstain from any sexual act and from all the accidental gestures and actions described above. The least he can do under these circumstances is to inform his wife of his indiscretion so that she can take precautions. If he wants to [672] ward off any possibility of causing his wife's certain death, he sends her home and gives his father-in-law a pledge (ndanga) through which he recognizes his guilt and shows his intention to assume the entire responsibility for his misdeed. An upright man prefers to act in this fashion, for he never knows whether one day he will not inadvertently violate one of the prohibitions.

853 837 B. The child's death is the result of the putrefaction of the mother's milk, the mother being thus incapable of nursing. As in the preceding case, the offense is a priori imputed to the husband -- isé aôoma bǒ̱na la ndota. (1) Since he has wronged no one but himself, no palaver ensues; the "natural" punishment is sufficient. This does not mean that he is not the object of evil tongues; people point at him and at times remind him of his misdeed. To remove the blame from himself, he can resort to

837 an ordeal or ask a magician's judgment or a magical practice to reveal the culprit. The culprit who is discovered is not subject to any social sanction; he is punished by the ordeal itself or the spell cast against him.

[684] If the mother's adultery is proven through her having been caught in the act, her seducer is considered guilty. He must pay the death indemnity (20 to 30 copper rings). The woman is not at all involved as far as society is concerned; it is a matter between her and her husband.

854 In order to prevent any harmful effect on the child, the Nkundó resort to a potion called bondandota, which will be explained in [479] the next article, 3. "Medication" by scarfication might also be mentioned. This therapy is applied to the parents as well as to the child. If the father is wealthy, he invites the wife's family to come and perform the operation themselves. As in all comparable situations, the invitation is accompanied by the handing over of a pledge, and farewell presents (belingako) are given at the end of the visit. In addition the wife very often goes to live with her parents for some time after her seclusion in order to increase the efficacy of the treatment.

843
[684] The sanction incurred for a violation of the secondary stipulations is less serious. For instance, the pregnant woman suffers from violent migraines, which often cause fainting and sometimes make delivery very difficult; thus they can even cause death. The husband is seldom bothered by these headaches. But he takes great pains to faithfully observe the law in order to spare his wife such painful consequences and to avoid the death of the child being born.

Apart from sexual abstention and the rules connected with it, the couple are also subject to various prohibitions which are clearly based on superstitious ideas. Thus:

1) They must neither go down into a well nor dig in the earth. The woman would die, for it is as if they were digging her grave.

2) They must not carry anything together with another person, for that is how corpses are carried, and such carrying would be the cause of death, through imitation of the woman's funeral procession.

837 is not morally condoned, and a woman who resorts to it does not 834 escape criticism. She is compared to a goat, who does not have 789 a regular and steady husband: álómya bǒna lontaa, "she nurses her child as a goat does." (1)

1. The opposite of lómya lontaa, -- if it is used to show the contrast -- is lómya lontómbá.

When the separation ceremony is ended, the mother is 846 adorned with all her ornaments and goes out to walk in a procession through the village. The child is carried by an older sister, a niece, etc. He is taken around the village, bánangya bǒna l'ólóló Small presents are offered him everywhere -- an arrow, a small knife, a hairpin, etc There is no feast, however; if that honor were accorded him he would die of it (for when someone dies, there is always a feast of farewell in his honor). [493]

Article IV. Nursing

● 853 During the first few days after birth an infant does not suck the milk of its mother, since it is "too hot." He is fed by a third person, preferably a relative.

On the third day the following occurs:

853 1) The mother's breasts are massaged (-kulola baɛ́le). For 757 this purpose the Nkundó use leaves of the bǔte creeper and the lilongyá plant (Adenostemma viscosum Forst.), a green leaf from a banana tree called nselenge, several pieces of peeled sugar cane, the tips of the dried leaves of any banana tree, and sometimes other plants are added as well. All the ingredients are crushed, then boiled, and white sand and a bit of red paint are mixed in with them. The mixture is called ndengó. It is prepared by the women who are in charge of massaging the breasts. The bǔte leaves, however, must be picked by the father. He goes to the forest early in the morning and first shakes the creeper so that all leaves that are not firmly attached will fall off. Then he climbs it and picks the desired

853 quantity of leaves, which he puts in his little basket called ilámbá.
757 If a leaf falls in the course of this operation, he must stop and throw away all that he has picked up to that point. The massage cannot take place on that day for it would cause the child to die falling and withering like a leaf. The father must start all over again the next day.

There are always two masseuses: one of the husband's kinswoman and one of the wife's. (1) They crush the leaves in [783] the same single mortar (eoka). The mother meanwhile must make her public confession, of which we will speak again in a moment. When the substances intended for rubbing have been prepared, the two masseuses begin their operation, which must be quite painful. The husband's relative takes care of the right breast, the wife's concentrates on [494] the left. (1)

1. The Injóló sometimes permit a man to perform the massage.

1. This is a natural arrangement for our people; the term used to indicate "husband" (bóme) is undoubtedly etymologically related to the one denoting "the right" (elóme), and there is some likelihood that the same is true for wǎlí (wife) and íáli (left).

They energetically massage the breasts from the top to the bottom with the mixture. After a few minutes they test the milk by letting a few drops run out onto a burning fragment of pottery. If the reaction is normal the mother begins to nurse. If on the other hand, the milk curdles and solidifies (baéle báonda) like rubber, it is a sign that it is of bad quality because of the presence of an internal boil in the breast, called ĭtaí. In that case the knowledge and skill of a woman expert is called upon. The latter rubs the leaves of a creeper between her hands in order to extract

● 853 the sap, which she then mixes with water. The resulting liquid is 757 oily and foams like soap. She places a few drops on a piece of banana leaf and makes a sachet of it. She holds this against the breast for a certain time until the boil, similar to a blood clot or a piece of liver, leaves the breast and enters the sachet. She then shows it to those present. From then on the mother can nurse her child without fear; her milk has become healthy and normal.

2) The mother's public confession must include the names
837 of all the men with whom she has had carnal relations since the 853 child's conception. Other groups, such as the Injóló, extend this 684 obligation even to instances preceding that moment but which 783 have not been declared at a previous occasion. The confession is public. The masseuse related to the husband begins to crush the leaves to be used in rubbing the breast; as she moves the pestle and says to the mother, "Name a man." The mother replies by giving a name. The masseuse says nyongo, "indemnity." Then all those present say yengô, yengô, yengô, "absolved". Then it is the other masseuse's turn, and she interrogates the mother in the same way. The process continues till all the names have been cited. If [495] the mother cites the name of a man who is a close relative of her husband and who therefore does not need to pay an indemnity, the masseuse does not reply nyongo. Instead a member of the husband's clan makes the gesture signifying
[201] exemption: he holds the kernel of a palm nut (lolikó) in his left hand and throws it by means of a small board which he holds in his right. Among the Injóló the man takes two kernels and strikes them against each other and then throws them away. Were the woman to suppress a name the child would die. If she has no admission to make, she replies, "No one besides my husband."

The indemnity that must be paid by those who are obligated to do so consists of a hen and a bunch of bananas (or their cash value) which are to be given to the masseuses, who will then divide them. Were the accused to refuse, the husband would demand a regular indemnity from him after the end of the seclusion.

The Bombwanja have this confession at the time of the [184] fastening of the fetus. A few old women married into the clan carry out the interrogation. The kernel of the fruit of the palm is thrown by means of a knife.

837 Note, finally, that the confession is restricted to married
783 women. It is never expected of a young unmarried mother. There-853 fore it would seem to be a practice connected with marriage (a social institution) and not with childbirth (a physiological phenomenon).

This confession is called etato or lotato, from the verb
[192] -tata, "to confess," (for which the generic term, sanga, "to say," is sometimes substituted).

I was unable to find any reason for this practice other than that of avoiding the death of the child. It is evident, however, that this explanation does not exhaust the question, although it is entirely possible that the original and deeper meaning has been lost without leaving any trace in the minds of the present generation. [496]

3) During the entire duration of nursing, the mother must 853 not be separated from her child. For the usual circumstances of 833 daily life, this rule is broadly interpreted; but during sexual relations it is strict, and no exceptions or excuses are permitted. Negligence under these circumstances would inevitably bring about the death of the child by ndota as soon as the mother took it back. This rule holds for legitimate relations as much as for illicit ones. Therefore the mother must always keep her child at her breast.

4) If at some point during nursing, the milk no longer flows
953 in sufficient quantity, the mother is given a potion consisting of [157] the extract of the bark of the bolóngó tree (which has a fruit con-
[278] taining a very sweet milky sap). Then she eats vegetables called lotélé. (1)

1. The leaves of this plant are also ordinarily eaten as vegetables, but they are consumed especially by those who possess the modern magical practice known as boyaóli.

5) An accident to which the Nkundó attach great importance
[262] is the rejection or vomiting of milk into the mouth of an adult, even if the person affected is the infant's mother. Such a person

853 may not eat meat if the child is male, or fish if it is female, un-262 til the child in question is grown and kills either an animal (or bird) or a fish, according to the case, and has given it to the victim of the accident. If the child dies young, the person is accused of having violated the prohibition and is obliged to pay a large indemnity. This extremity is not usually reached, however, for the one to whom the accident has befallen scrupulously keeps away from everything that might cause this sort of murder. Then, if death occurs and he has nothing with which to reproach himself, he can resort to an ordeal or to the verdict of a test based on superstition. In addition in villages that have Batswa, a woman of that [863] race must nurse the child for an instant after the accident before its mother gives it her breast again. [497]

6) The child is carried on the shoulder, and as soon as it is 854 capable of holding on, on the hip. It does not take many weeks for it to become accustomed to that position. When the mother has to hold it for a long period of time (during a march, on a trip, etc.), she puts it in a scarf-shoulder strap (lombě), made from creepers that are scraped and woven as for a mat, or from a cloth of raffia fibers, or even from a pelt (nowadays it is often made from a piece of European cloth). The scarf must be sturdy, for were it to tear and the infant fall, far-reaching consequences would result;
all of that woman's subsequent children would be condemned to die in the mother's womb or during the period of nursing.

As the child grows it is sometimes carried astride the mother's back, either because she does not like to be separated from it, or because the tyranny of the little one forces her to keep it with her even during her work, errands, and even dances. She remedies this awkward situation if possible by resorting to the assistance of an older girl, a young niece or cousin, or a little boy from among the immediate kin.

When the child rests during the day, it is laid on an ordinary bed or on a movable bed (boánga), without any special arrangements. It has no difficulty sleeping soundly on such hard couches.

7) Weaning. Although a child is gradually accustomed 862 to solid food, it does not stop nursing. As it grows older, the nursing times are spaced farther and farther apart. But the child

862 does not really stop nursing till it is about two years old, and sometimes two and a half if it has a weak constitution.

Weaning is not accompanied by any ceremony or feast. In order to break the child's habit, the mother smears her nipples [824] with the sap of the lifété fruit (a kind of small sweet pimento or eggplant) or with a pimento-pepper extract (imbénga). Sometimes she leaves the child with some relative (daughter, sister, etc.) for a time [498] while she lives elsewhere.

As we have seen above, after weaning, the ekelé-bokeka period comes to an end for the mother, and her infidelities no longer have repercussions on the life of her child.

● [853] 8) If the mother dies while the infant is still being nursed, [589] the task of nursing is turned over to some woman who is disposed to undertake it even a Botswa, and there always is one. After the child is weaned the woman is suitably recompensed. The use of [235] goat's milk is unknown.

854 9) Young children frequently suffer convulsions. This illness
751 is thought to be caused by hawks, and for that reason it is called [653] mpulú (bird). The Nkundó try to prevent it by hanging an amulet around children's necks; it is usually the clavicular triangle of a hen's carcass. In addition they know a remedy whose purpose is to strengthen the nerves: the child is laid on a mat stretched out anywhere on the roof of the hut. An eyewash (bolóí) is prepared from the sap of leaves from the litóyansombo bush and extract of mbóló (fruit of the bosoombó). Using a leaf shaped into a horn, a few drops are put into the child's eyes. Then the father or some other relative pulls out the mat from under the child and lifts it several times, shouting: tá tá tá.

856 10) No special importance is attached to teething. But a child whose upper teeth come in before the lower ones (a defect called ingondo) is considered abnormal. Therefore he is forbidden to eat the first fruits of hunting or fishing in an enclosure (mpao), lest the latter lose their productivity.

The mortar used to make maize flour is made from a section of a tree trunk, with a rectangular opening hollowed in the outer surface and perpendicular to the axis of the trunk. Let us note, however, that among the Banfumu southeast of Tua we found a mortar of similar shape which the natives used to prepare vegetables.

are worn in the hair, around the neck, on the wrists and ankles, and at the waist.

From Stanley Pool to Mushie, the women slip a crown of cowries into the hair, sometimes wear bracelets of brass or glass beads on the wrist and forearm, and hang brass necklaces or imported beads strung on fibers around the neck. Very often the necklace goes from the shoulders under the arm. Throughout this region, imported ornaments predominate. Only the chiefs have retained a few special ornaments from the old days, notably the necklace and bracelet of worked brass and the necklace adorned with the teeth of leopards or lions. These latter objects are associated with a privilege, a prerogative, a right of use.

They are, in a way, badges of rank. In the full regalia worn by [180] Natali, a typical native petty chief, each detail seemed to have a special meaning. He had donned his finest costume in our honor and to impress us: an old tunic from the Belgian Regiment of the Guides, and a government medal around his neck on a chain, the badge of a native chief recognized by the government. He had attached a small whistle to the same chain, along with the five or six medals for his wives' taxes. Over this chain he wore the necklace of the native chiefs, made of brass and

T 301 554 302 decorated with worked designs. His black skin glistened with grease and oil. His face had a wide red line of oil and ngula powder from the tip of his nose to the top of his forehead. A large circle, white above and yellow below, was painted around his right eye. His eyelashes were very long and powdered white, while his eyebrows had been carefully plucked. His head was covered with thick hair, short and woolly. It was gathered at the back into a large chignon roll, to which was fitted a secondary coiffure in small braids, dyed with ngula and shining with grease. A long blue bead dangled below this original headdress, and a long cock feather topped off the whole thing. The T [304] temples and cheeks were marked with a set of light parallel lines, a tattoo which seems to be drawn with an iron comb and which is [181] characteristic of all the Banfumungu. T [481 293] In his left hand Natali held the big walking staff, adorned at the top with a small iron bell, and he M [301 ●854] carried a fly-chaser made from the tail of a buffalo under his right arm, the badge of a chief. This was Natali: a native chief whose T [651] ornaments indicated his authority, recognized by the state whose medal he possessed, a polygamist who had paid the tax on his wives as attested by the little receipt plates which hung from his neck, a sorcerer and fetisher who knew the art of making nkisi and the magic powders that striped his face.

M 301 857 Children are usually overloaded with gaudy ornaments: white feathers stuck in the hair, necklaces and belts of glass beads, and small bells attached to the belt. In our opinion, however, these objects are not primarily intended to adorn the child, but to protect it. There is no doubt that the mother sticks the feathers in her child's hair and attaches small bells to his belt in order to find him more easily if he gets lost in the fields or in the bush. As soon as the child is old enough to find his own way and return to the village alone, bells and feathers are given up permanently. [185]

583ˣ to leave her husband and he, in revenge, were to lay hands on her 431 mother or on one of the other wives of the clan. (1) [148]

1. See Chapter VI, Article VII, 4, (1), and Chapter VIII, Article II, 1.

7) Lombě: a wide shoulder strap made of fur or braided [824] bekombe reeds (Calamus sp.); though valuables of equal worth (one knife or a konga) may be given. Nowadays this boéngo consists of 2 or 3 rings; it goes to the mother in compensation for the wearying burden of carrying and nursing her daughter. (1)

1. Note that when a mother-in-law brings a child into the world, her son-in-law sends her a shoulder strap of liengé otterskin or a konga of equivalent value. He does not repeat this gift at each birth, however.

[854] 8) Betótswá byá nkwá: leaves of the bonkongé bush used to remove, wipe off, and carry away (tóta) a child's excrement. This boéngo consists of a ring and goes to the mother as compensation for her performance of these tasks. In the absence of the mother, it is claimed by another of the father's wives or by a female relative of the mother.

[224] 9) The bojángá, "hunting net," is demanded in many villages for no special reason. Certain clans, however, scoffed at by others because they have few members, officially ask a man belonging to one of the latter and wishing to marry one of their daughters to bring a net, saying: "You make fun of us because we have no people; bring us a hunting net to surround and enclose us, since we are not many." Thus the village of Boyela of the Bakáala, never gives one of its members in marriage without this boéngo.

[184] 10) Wěngé w'ǎeke: a boéngo which is not known everywhere but which is customary in certain groups, for example among the Bakáala. One of the woman's relatives takes a piece of a young thorny trunk of the wěngé tree. Having scraped one end of it, he holds this

853 an ordeal or ask a magician's judgment or a magical practice to 837 reveal the culprit. The culprit who is discovered is not subject to any social sanction; he is punished by the ordeal itself or the spell cast against him.

If the mother's adultery is proven through her having been [684] caught in the act, her seducer is considered guilty. He must pay the death indemnity (20 to 30 copper rings). The woman is not at all involved as far as society is concerned; it is a matter between her and her husband.

In order to prevent any harmful effect on the child, the 751 Nkundó resort to a potion called bondandota, which will be ex-
854 plained in [479] the next article, 3. "Medication" by scarification might also be mentioned. This therapy is applied to the parents as well as to the child. If the father is wealthy, he invites the wife's family to come and perform the operation themselves. As in all comparable situations, the invitation is accompanied by the handing over of a pledge, and farewell presents (belingako) are given at the end of the visit. In addition the wife very often goes to live with her parents for some time after her seclusion in order to increase the efficacy of the treatment.

The sanction incurred for a violation of the secondary
843 stipulations is less serious. For instance, the pregnant woman suffers
[684] from violent migraines, which often cause fainting and sometimes make delivery very difficult; thus they can even cause death. The husband is seldom bothered by these headaches. But he takes great pains to faithfully observe the law in order to spare his wife such painful consequences and to avoid the death of the child being born.

Apart from sexual abstention and the rules connected with it, the couple are also subject to various prohibitions which are clearly based on superstitious ideas. Thus:

1) They must neither go down into a well nor dig in the earth. The woman would die, for it is as if they were digging her grave.

2) They must not carry anything together with another person, for that is how corpses are carried, and such carrying would be the cause of death, through imitation of the woman's funeral procession.

846 taking the child would cause the child's death. The same precau-
789 tion is also in order if the husband goes on a trip before the child's birth and does not return till after the delivery

We have just seen that the harmful effects of the father's 846 misconduct on his child's life is effectuated through the father's 837 act of taking the child on his knees. Thus the Nkundó speak of baóngó b'âbé, "a father's bad knees," to indicate his reprehensible
[826] conduct, and they say that the bondandota potion is administered to the child so that it will not die because of the father's bad
knees. (1)

> 1. The expression baóngó b'âbé is also used when an undertaking which requires continence is unsuccessful. (See Article II, 3).

When a child has painful and persistent diarrhea, it is often 753 interpreted as the effect of the father's infidelity. As soon as they 454 become aware of it, the couple separate for some time, and the father no longer touches the child. [492]

Contrary to what one reads on this subject about other peo-
837 ples of the Congo, Nkundó couples do not have to remain continent
834 beyond the period of seclusion. The separation ceremony gives the 789 husband back the freedom of action he had before his wife's pregnancy. For the wife the bokeka remains strict with respect to illicit relations until the child is weaned. However she, too, may regain her freedom by having recourse to an antidote, the ingredients of which she purchases from a person who holds the secret. The ingredients are placed in a small antelope horn which is then stopped [824] up by means of bolaká (resin from the Symphonia gabonensis). The interested party wears it about her loins on a string or a bead belt or, preferably, on a special creeper. This amulet protects the child's life from the harmful influence of the mother's acts of adultery, but it does so only on condition that she does not separate herself from the child, as we will explain further on. This procedure

853 262 may not eat meat if the child is male, or fish if it is female, until the child in question is grown and kills either an animal (or bird) or a fish, according to the case, and has given it to the victim of the accident. If the child dies young, the person is accused of having violated the prohibition and is obliged to pay a large indemnity. This extremity is not usually reached, however, for the one to whom the accident has befallen scrupulously keeps away from everything that might cause this sort of murder. Then, if death occurs and he has nothing with which to reproach himself, he can resort to an ordeal or to the verdict of a test based on superstition. In addition in villages that have Batswa, a woman of that [863] race must nurse the child for an instant after the accident before its mother gives it her breast again. [497]

6) The child is carried on the shoulder, and as soon as it is 854 capable of holding on, on the hip. It does not take many weeks for it to become accustomed to that position. When the mother has to hold it for a long period of time (during a march, on a trip, etc.), she puts it in a scarf-shoulder strap (lombě), made from creepers that are scraped and woven as for a mat, or from a cloth of raffia fibers, or even from a pelt (nowadays it is often made from a piece of European cloth). The scarf must be sturdy, for were it to tear and the infant fall, far-reaching consequences would result; all of that woman's subsequent children would be condemned to die in the mother's womb or during the period of nursing.

As the child grows it is sometimes carried astride the mother's back, either because she does not like to be separated from it, or because the tyranny of the little one forces her to keep it with her even during her work, errands, and even dances. She remedies this awkward situation if possible by resorting to the assistance of an older girl, a young niece or cousin, or a little boy from among the immediate kin.

When the child rests during the day, it is laid on an ordinary bed or on a movable bed (boánga), without any special arrangements. It has no difficulty sleeping soundly on such hard couches.

7) Weaning. Although a child is gradually accustomed 862 to solid food, it does not stop nursing. As it grows older, the nursing times are spaced farther and farther apart. But the child

862 does not really stop nursing till it is about two years old, and sometimes two and a half if it has a weak constitution.

Weaning is not accompanied by any ceremony or feast. In order to break the child's habit, the mother smears her nipples [824] with the sap of the lifété fruit (a kind of small sweet pimento or eggplant) or with a pimento-pepper extract (imbénga). Sometimes she leaves the child with some relative (daughter, sister, etc.) for a time [498] while she lives elsewhere.

As we have seen above, after weaning, the ekelé-bokeka period comes to an end for the mother, and her infidelities no longer have repercussions on the life of her child.

[853] 8) If the mother dies while the infant is still being nursed, [563] the task of nursing is turned over to some woman who is disposed to undertake it even a Botswa, and there always is one. After the child is weaned the woman is suitably recompensed. The use of [235] goat's milk is unknown.

●854 9) Young children frequently suffer convulsions. This illness
751 is thought to be caused by hawks, and for that reason it is called [853] mpulú (bird). The Nkundó try to prevent it by hanging an amulet around children's necks; it is usually the clavicular triangle of a hen's carcass. In addition they know a remedy whose purpose is to strengthen the nerves: the child is laid on a mat stretched out anywhere on the roof of the hut. An eyewash (bolóí) is prepared from the sap of leaves from the litóyansombo bush and extract of mbólé (fruit of the bosoombó). Using a leaf shaped into a horn, a few drops are put into the child's eyes. Then the father or some other relative pulls out the mat from under the child and lifts it several times, shouting: tá tá tá.

856 10) No special importance is attached to teething. But a child whose upper teeth come in before the lower ones (a defect called ingondo) is considered abnormal. Therefore he is forbidden to eat the first fruits of hunting or fishing in an enclosure (mpao), lest the latter lose their productivity.

no compulsion. If one of the contracting parties fails to fulfil its pledges in this matter 224
of giving part of the kill, or in anything else, the aggrieved party may call the council together. This consists not only of members of the molembe and ekopo, but of all 624 elders of the village or villages connected with this particular one. The party judged 596
in the wrong, whether ekopo or molembe, will be fined, the injured party receiving its 621 share, and both parties will be charged to live together harmoniously and observe their contracts.

The power of the nkumu was apparently limited, and did not supersede that of 624
the momene mokonda. When trials came up, the aggrieved party might go either to the momene mokonda or to the nkumu. If it was necessary to call the village elders together 695 about it, both these authorities were present at the hearing. First the young men of the group were allowed to give their verdict, then the old men, after that momene mokonda (or the molomi o eke), and finally the nkumu was given the privilege of the last word. He would comment on the opinions of each of the judges, criticizing one young man, commending another, and then giving his own verdict, at which the group would assent by saying, 'Even so, grandfather'. The whole group of judges would then fix the fines, a double portion of which went to the nkumu.

The actual manual labour which an nkumu may do excludes anything endangering 624 life or limb, or requiring agility and speed. He may clear the bush for his gardens:
this is a man's work. He may take part in the building of his houses, but may do no high work, and, among the inland groups, it is the work of the Batwa to put the [563] roof on for him. The nkumu may also prepare pitfalls for catching game, but cannot engage in any other type of hunting or do any fishing. Digging a grave is prohibited, for, as we shall see, everything pertaining to death must be ignored by the nkumu.

Other rules affecting the daily life of the nkumu may be roughly divided into three: those affecting his person, those having to do with his food, and social regulations.

One of the great points of observance in the first class of regulations is the impor- 624
tance of the montolo. The nkumu must on no account be seen during daylight hours 292 with an uncovered head. If he wishes relief from the cumbersome montolo he may take it off in the darkness of his house and put on an ordinary hat made of skins, and when night falls he may walk where he will bareheaded if he so desires. The skin hat, known as louku, may be made from two animals only, in the case of an [824]
nkumu, one being the nkulupa, a species of antelope with light-coloured hair, and the other the iyoko, an animal resembling a beaver. The skin of the nkulupa may be used by anyone, but the iyoko is reserved for the nkumu only with one exception. The skin of the iyoko may also be used for the carrying strap for infants known as nyamba, [854] which is worn over one shoulder in bandoleer fashion. For the nkumu the skin of the iyoko is limited to the informal hat, louku, and for making into the lokoto, a pouch used for carrying small objects and worn like a sporran. As a corollary to the importance of the montolo may be noted the importance attached to the head of the nkumu, which must never be seen uncovered in daylight.

The Bonginda nkumu never wash in the daytime, but may wash at night with hot 624 water. The inland nkumu never wash. Even the Bonginda nkumu never wash their heads, and no nkumu ever cuts his hair. If the nkumu becomes too greatly incon- 515
venienced, one of his wives may delouse his head, but only within the privacy of the [184]
house, by the light that enters the rear opening.

The first one includes the Bateke-Banfumu-Baboma, among whom ornaments are relatively rare for the women as well as for the men. 301 171

The second one encompasses all the peoples in the region of Lake Leopold II and the lower Lukenie and is characterized by the solid brass necklace worn by the women and the ornaments trimmed with cowries and the brass plaques worn by the dignitaries and chiefs.

The third one includes the Ipanga and the Batitu, with the belt ornamented with brass beads, rings on the fingers and toes, and solid brass rings worn above the ankles, all of which are peculiar to the women.

The fourth group is characterized by the sheath of brass rings covering the arm from wrist to elbow and worn as much by the men as by the women of the Bokala-Yaelima.

The fifth group includes the Bena Dibele-Kole region, where imported ornaments have replaced the primitive ones. [186]

In addition to all these adornments used regularly in common, everyday life, the native also has ornaments reserved for show and ceremony. 301

593x [882] If the whole family [26] suffers through the misbehaviour of adolescents, the latter will not be spared by the father. But the mother will often take their sides for, not belonging to her husband's family, she allows only her heart to speak. The familial-political organization of this people requires that fondness have its limits; otherwise it could lead to disorder and anarchy.

593x 855 It cannot be said of Nkundó parents, as one often reads about other peoples of the Congo, that they do not care for their children, who are self-sufficient and obliged to provide for their own needs from the age of six or seven. Our people are always feeding and even coddling their children; even when the latter are married they are always well received in their parents' home and lavishly treated. It is quite true that the young people spend much time in the forest looking for various kinds of food, but that is part of their games and amusements, a phase of their education, and at the same time their contribution to the maintenance of the household (a contribution which cannot be omitted from any serious education, and it is regrettable that it should be omitted by so many European families. (1)

1. Education will be dealt with more extensively in Chapter X, Article VIII.

593x 581 In the matter of marriage parents generally respect the feelings of their children. A father who is motivated by avarice and, above all, by the need for a certain sum of money or its equivalent, may sometimes let the voice of self-interest predominate over that of the heart.

It goes without saying that one may encounter aberrations of fatherly feeling, but such cases are exceedingly rare. (2)

2. For an example see Chapter II, Article XI, 3, B.

593x Though parents love their children without distinction and without consideration of their faults, vices, etc., they are not exempt from a certain amount of partiality; a particular child [27] will 855 Until he has reached the age of discretion and even a little later, the Nkundó child wears nothing more around his loins than a belt of beads or a plain string usually adorned with some amulet. Nobody is shocked by this rudimentary attire. Parents take great interest in the adornment of their children; from a very early age [301] they are seen wearing belts of trading beads, bracelets, rings around the ankles made of iron, copper, or brass, and in addition, at the present time, glass beads above the knees.

291 As the child grows older the clothing increases. From the outset there are differences on the basis of sex.

The boy acquires a thin strip of cloth which is attached to his string or belt simply by folding back the two ends. The cloth falls between his legs without being tight, allowing for great freedom of movement and the circulation of air; this is an excellent precaution against perspiration due to extreme heat, but it is not very effective protection against indiscreet looks, at least in certain positions. The fabric made of raffia may be decorated to a greater or a lesser extent. In former times there existed different kinds, which we need not describe here. The length of the hanging borders is dictated by vanity. The string was often replaced by a raffia belt or -- among prominent men -- by a leather thong.

The woman's garment consists of a broad raffia belt whose two ends are gradually narrowed, ending in cords which are tied on the [53] stomach. In the center of this belt (nkásá (1) a ball of raffia fibers is attached (bonkoko). A piece of cloth (efufa or lofufa) whose width may vary from 3 centimeters to 20 centimeters or more, depending on the age and the wearer's intensity of the feeling of modesty, is attached to the cords and falls more or less low on the body. For a [292] feast or display the efufa is replaced with a more valuable and longer [104] piece of cloth (intóló or, among the Elángá of Losanganya, ifika).

1. Or bokangá, bokangá wá nkásá. Among the Bombwanja it is called likóngâ.

Article I. Girls

According to Nkundó custom it is acceptable for an expected 584 child, not yet born or still very young, to be promised in marriage to X or Y. This practice was formerly very common and is still quite prevalent today. It is called banda bǒna or bǒmoto, literally, "to count a child" or "to count a woman." The ikulɛ is paid at the time of the promise. Later the matter is carried out in the usual fashion; the other parts of the bride price are paid either while the fiancée is young or, preferably, at the time when she goes to her husband.

Until that time, if one of the girl's relatives is already a 584 855 wife of a polygamist husband-to-be or of one of his relatives, the child is brought up in her husband's family from a fairly early age, depending on the circumstances. She lives with her relative. She may be barely seven or eight years old, for example. If no one in her husband's clan can take care of her, [232] she spends only one or two weeks there to become acquainted, little by little, with people and places; she repeats the visit from time to time. Her mother accompanies her, for being so young she could not get used to being there alone, without support, without her parents. Therefore it is necessary to wait till she is old enough to be somewhat independent and able to manage by herself. That time usually comes around the [145] beginning of puberty, thus sometime between the ages of twelve and fifteen.

Like an adult woman, she is already called bompáka or wǎlɛ, 584 833 depending on the portion of the bride price that has been paid. She has all the duties and privileges of a wife: sexual relations, food preparation, care of the household, etc. There is no set date or age for the beginning of cohabitation. This matter is settled between the husband and his parents-in-law. The latter do not have the right to [606] delay the time, even if their daughter is still too young, but they can make use of their great influence over their son-in-law. The modern [178] generation is not shocked by sexual relations between an adulterer [sic] [571] and a girl who has not reached puberty. Besides, all is in order from the legal standpoint; since the man has paid the bride price, he is the 584

572 When an engagement is arranged for an expected child, the events may betray the hopes of the parents; and the child for whom the ikulɛ has been paid may turn out to be a boy. This mischance is dealt with in the following manner: either the suitor waits for the birth of a girl, or an alliance of friendship and mutual assistance (boseka, see Chapter I, Part 1, Article III) is established between him and the newborn child. Such an alliance is called liɛla jǎ jwende, "the marriage of men," (matrimonium viri). In no case is restitution made for the ikulɛ that has been paid. If the friendship between the two men remains unbroken later, it results in the marriage of the daughter of the man for whom the ikulɛ was paid before his birth, to the man who paid it or to his son or grandson. No new ikulɛ is paid for such a marriage; the payment of the bride price simply has to be completed in the usual fashion.

584 A man may acquire a young child for himself, or for a son, a younger brother, etc. In the past the former was more frequently the case, for the old men kept the women for themselves and wanted [234] to benefit from having them before leaving them to the youths as inheritance. But the latter situation also arose.

The purpose [of obtaining a young child as wife for a relative] was to prevent inexperienced youths who were not able to defend themselves from being deprived of the means of obtaining a wife should the father die prematurely and the heirs monopolize the harem and bride-price valuables to their own profit, which theoretically they have a right to do. This practice is thus a means of favoring a son or other relative by furnishing him with a wife earlier than is customary. Nowadays this is even a stronger reason [178] than in the past, because boys marry earlier than formerly.

Other reasons for obtaining a child as a wife are involved in the two above-mentioned instances. There is a greater certainty of getting one's money's worth; valuables can disappear for various reasons during long unproductive years.

155 But the most fundamental reason, in my opinion, is the one very often invoked by the Nkundó, namely the opportunity of personally attending to the future wife's education. There is no

584 855 question but that it is in the husband's interest to take care of it himself. He can accustom her from childhood on to special circumstances, to the laws of the clan, to the particular habits (virtues, faults, way of living, etc.) of his family, his wives, and, last but not least, himself. He can mold her according to his tastes and desires. Enormous advantages result from his success in doing so. This does not mean that he takes care of her personally, for he knows he is not a born educator. He therefore usually prefers to hand this [593] task over to his mother (or aunt or sister), who enjoys this obligation and likes to help her son and to participate directly and intimately in his household.

584 572 A childhood engagement between their respective offspring often results from an alliance between "friends." If the children later on do not want the marriage, that is all there is to it. Restitution of payments is made, or a substitution is arranged. Such a situation arose while this book was being written. [235] At least twenty years ago, Lokóta of Bolíngo and Inkílo of Bonjoku made a bond of friendship (boseka). The former begot a boy (Ituwó), the latter a girl (Lokoku). The parents arranged the engagement of their children by means of the ikulá payment. When Ituwó grew old enough to marry, he had no desire to marry Lokoku, for his heart was taken by another. But he had a younger brother, Itoko, who had affectionate feelings for Lokoku. Ituwó explained the situation to his mother (since his father had died in the interim), and she resumed the relationship with Inkílo. They all came to an agreement without difficulty. Itokó therefore married Lokokó in place of his elder brother, after paying the bride price for her.

584 If a little girl is not satisfied with the union that has been arranged she is free, according to the rules of law, to break it -- and not simply by failing to give her consent. Note that in such a case the husband is not entitled to any compensation for having raised this child.

In spite of the advantages involved in childhood unions, they should be rigorously held in check, since the affections often stray from bonds formed at such an early age. More should be done to 586 act is equivalent to giving up his rights.

The wife's family makes no effort to keep the children born of a broken marriage. On the contrary, they insist that the husband pay the necessary valuables in order to retain his rights over his legitimate progeny. Nevertheless, they cannot force him to do so; the father is entirely free either to take his children or [412] to choose a given portion of the bride price in preference to them. But he is obliged to choose between the two alternatives.

855 586 All the natives care about their children. Therefore an indifference to them and preference for getting back the entire bride price is altogether unusual. Instances such as the following do occur, however.

Bumba, daughter of Lokâ of Bokenyola (Losenge, Bomwanja) was married to Elimîlele of Losáli. After some years of marriage, the latter repudiated his pregnant wife for reasons unknown to me. Although attempts were made to show him the stupidity of his act, nothing would move him. Bumba returned to her brother Ilfaó and there gave birth to a daughter. Ilfaó asked the father to come and see his child and at the same time be reconciled with his wife. Elimîlele refused. After a time, Bumba was married to another man, but that marriage did not last. A bankitaá was substituted for her, and she was married to Bokángo of Bokengé. The latter paid a bride price of 80 rings for her. Elimîlele was asked to come and get what was due him. This time he came. He took everything, without leaving the slightest thing as payment for his daughter. He was asked to leave 25 rings in order not to be deprived of his rights over his child. He wanted to hear nothing of this suggestion; he preferred to take back his bride price in its entirety. The daughter, Bombála, is about to marry Bolongólokolo of Bompela (Bokótola). The bride price to be paid will be received by her mother's clan, and her father will receive nothing at all. He can never claim the slightest payment from his son-in-law. Besides, the latter is not legally his son-in-law; for from the legal standpoint Elimîlele is not his father-in-law. Bombála, for her part, is no longer required to recognise her father, since he has disowned her. She belongs solely to her mother's clan, and her father's family can never again make any claim upon her or her descendants.

1. Generalities

842 The Nkundó like to have children. Not only do they like to have daughters, as some too superficial colonials sometimes maintain, but they like to have boys just as much. It is true that a daughter carries the hope of a bride price and all it represents for polygamists eager for pagan glory and carnal pleasures; yet a real preference for children of the weaker sex is seldom observed. What one does encounter, just as in Europe for that matter, is a desire to have a child of a particular sex when, for example, the other is already abundantly represented in the household. Thus a native who already has several boys but no girl or only one, will make offerings to obtain a sister for the boys. That he should do so is hardly astonishing since among these people a sister is the proper and sometimes the only means by which a man can acquire a wife. On the other hand, a father whose progeny are exclusively, or almost exclusively, members of the female sex ardently desires the birth of a son, an heir to the fruits of his labor and someone who would be able to aid and assist him in his old age by building him a hut, clearing the forest for him, and bringing him game or the products of fishing.

842
● 855 Actually one seldom hears these preferences expressed. The impression one gets is rather that the Nkundó love their children as such and also because, whatever their sex, they greatly contribute to the reinforcement of his social position; the two motives are inseparable in practice.

It is sometimes maintained that the natives do not refuse to have children because their coming does not inconvenience them in any way, nor do they impose crushing financial obligations

892 upon them; their upbringing costs them nothing, whereas among 855 Whites the maintenance, dress, food, instruction, and occupational placement involve considerable expenses. It cannot be [465] denied that while the modern European is exacting from all these viewpoints, enchained and blocked by an ever growing multitude of needs, the material life of the native is simple and his necessities are reduced to an indispensable minimum. Nevertheless, it can hardly be said that it is as easy for him to raise a large family with many children as it is to have the responsibility of a smaller number. Without speaking of clothing -- especially at the present time -- there is the food for growing children, which forces him to clear a greater expanse of forest and to work harder at the various ways of fishing and hunting; and when the time comes for the sons to find wives, he is the one who must arrange to procure the valuables needed for a bride price.

For their part, Nkundó women like to transmit life as much as the men, if not more so. Pregnancy may make them disagreeable and grumpy and sometimes cause them pain, but they put up with it and, as a very general rule, do not think of depriving themselves on that account of the happiness of giving birth to a cute little creature, of nursing it, of carrying it in their arms or on their shoulders. The difficulties and pains of maternity do not repel them. Although later, during the payment of her daughter's bride price, a Nkundó woman's greed will lead her to loudly claim the payment due her and even sometimes destroy her child's love because of delaying this financial operation, the delay does not come to their minds until the time comes.

In short, the Nkundó woman feels a perfectly natural, maternal love for her child.

There are of course exceptions to this general rule. And 842 the contrary would be astonishing for a pagan population who give 855 free rein to all their passions or, at least, restrain them only very 152 [466] slightly, and whose love is far from the perfection one may find among a people ennobled by fifteen centuries of Christianity. Moreover -- as all the preceding pages testify -- our Nkundó are not fashioned from a uniform mold notwithstanding the impression given by certain colonial and ethnological works. All the individual

842 differences can be found here, although they are less apparent to 855 a European observer since we usually approach the natives as a 152 group and our contact with them is often too impersonal.

2. Abortion

847 A great enemy of maternal love is the practice of abortion, which has always been known to the Nkundó. Here we cannot describe all the prescriptions used for that purpose. It will be sufficient to enumerate the reasons for which they have recourse to this practice. They are as follows:

1) A woman's lasciviousness: the procreation and subsequent care of a child to some extent prevent the indulging in carnal pleasures. Formerly this cause of abortion was nonexistent or very [178] rare. Needless to say, it has become more common, especially in the centers where it is constantly on the increase and where, in addition, occasional or regular "housekeepers" learn new means of sterilization and abortion.

2) A woman's antipathy or persistent anger toward her husband may encourage her to prevent conception or destroy its effect.

3) An excessive weakening of the mother's organism caused by a large number of conceptions and childbirths at too short intervals.

4) The encumberance and the difficulty of watching, carrying, and taking care of many small children -- bɛ́lota bɔkɔkɔsano [467] [535] wă bána mɛ́tɛ́lɛ́ mɛ́tɛ́lɛ́. This reason is especially important for well-known dancers.

It goes without saying that several of these motives may be combined in the same person. For instance, I knew of a woman who aborted at the time of her eighth child. Her recurrent pregnancies, together with continuous work, had greatly reduced her strength. A palaver with her husband was the last straw; she decided to get rid of the fruit she carried in her body.

Outside of these exceptions the natives of this country ardently desire their own continuation through a large number of progeny. (1)

[189] 1. The same is not true elsewhere. Examples to that effect are cited from regions that are

● 856 864 During a girl's early childhood beginning when she is still nursing, a mother with foresight will work to make her organs as perfect as possible. By applying pressure repeatedly and for long periods, she molds, so to speak, the outside in order to make it narrow, as this quality is greatly valued by our people.

It is the mother, too, who trains the girl in her preparations for married life. She teaches her how to behave toward her future husband, and at the same time instructs her in the duties of a good housewife (see Chapter X, Article VIII).

836 864 Certain forms of behavior, although their relationship to our subject is only superficial and external, must nevertheless be mentioned. An adult man will often take in his arms a little girl who has not yet been weaned, or perhaps only slightly more developed. He considers this child to be his wife. He has paid no bride price for her. But since she is a sister, cousin, or other relative of one of his wives, she is a "wife" from his point of view; that is, not only will it be possible for him to marry her later on, but even without becoming her husband he will enjoy a certain liberty in relation to her. (1) Thus, when such a man takes his young "wife" in his arms, he is enjoying an anticipation of the future and speaks to her [66] in that sense, often accompanying his words with intimate caresses.

1. See Chapter VI, Article V, 2.

The same practice, mutatis mutandis, may be observed on the part of a woman toward a small boy whom she can consider as her "husband."

304 512 2. Circumcision

Circumcision is generally practiced. It is usually performed at an early age. Without going into the details at this point (1) or

---

1. They will be found in Chapter X, Article VII.

862 does not really stop nursing till it is about two years old, and sometimes two and a half if it has a weak constitution.

Weaning is not accompanied by any ceremony or feast. In order to break the child's habit, the mother smears her nipples [824] with the sap of the lifété fruit (a kind of small sweet pimento or eggplant) or with a pimento-pepper extract (imbénga). Sometimes she leaves the child with some relative (daughter, sister, etc.) for a time [498] while she lives elsewhere.

As we have seen above, after weaning, the ekelé-bokeka period comes to an end for the mother, and her infidelities no longer have repercussions on the life of her child.

[653] 8) If the mother dies while the infant is still being nursed, [523] the task of nursing is turned over to some woman who is disposed to undertake it even a Botswa, and there always is one. After the child is weaned the woman is suitably recompensed. The use of [235] goat's milk is unknown.

854 751 9) Young children frequently suffer convulsions. This illness is thought to be caused by hawks, and for that reason it is called [553] mpulú (bird). The Nkundó try to prevent it by hanging an amulet around children's necks; it is usually the clavicular triangle of a hen's carcass. In addition they know a remedy whose purpose is to strengthen the nerves: the child is laid on a mat stretched out anywhere on the roof of the hut. An eyewash (bolóí) is prepared from the sap of leaves from the litóyansombo bush and extract of mbólé (fruit of the bosoombó). Using a leaf shaped into a horn, a few drops are put into the child's eyes. Then the father or some other relative pulls out the mat from under the child and lifts it several times, shouting: tɛ́ tɛ́ tɛ́.

856 10) No special importance is attached to teething. But a child whose upper teeth come in before the lower ones (a defect called ingondo) is considered abnormal. Therefore he is forbidden to eat the first fruits of hunting or fishing in an enclosure (mpao), lest the latter lose their productivity.

Teke FI33

M 243 The cultivation of rice serves less to nourish the native than for trade. He usually sells his harvest immediately after the husking.

T M 244 Peanuts thrive in the region of the Banfumu and among the Bankutshu. They grow best in light soil and are not suitable for land cleared from the great forest. The crop demands a great T M [462] deal of care and regular upkeep. Fields invaded by weeds yield nothing. The harvest takes place when the crop is mature and is the task of the women with the help of the children. The peanuts are placed in baskets carried on the back and taken to the village. The native spreads them out in the sun to dry. He turns them again and again, two or three times a day, and brings them into the hut at night.

M 249 Sugar-cane plantations are set up in marshy lowlands.

[462] All the work on this crop falls to the men. These plantations are found only in regions where the natives make masanga, sugar- [273] cane beer. Sugar-cane fields are especially numerous in the villages on the lower Lukenie and the Fimi.

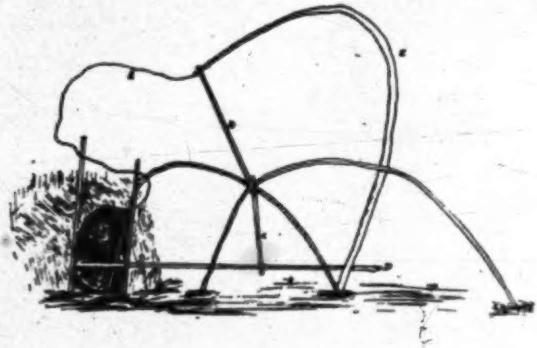
M 244 As a rule the natives also cultivate a few legumes, sweet potatoes, and yams, but on a small scale and without giving them any particular care. [61]

Hunting

M 224 462 Hunting is practiced only by men. They engage in it, not for sport, diversion, or relaxation, but for the sole purpose of procuring meat and fat.

M 224 ● 857 From their earliest childhood, the boys get together to beat the grass and catch mice, rats, and other rodents which swarm in the bush. Nothing is more interesting than to see them at work. Ten, fifteen, or sometimes twenty of them form a large circle. Armed with sticks, they beat the grass and make an unbelievable din. Little by little the circle narrows, moving in on a small well-cleared space. The oldest, most daring and most agile of the boys keep watch over this space, their eyes alert and riveted on the edge of the grass, ready to pounce. The beaters redouble their zeal, strike, shout, gesture, and gradually drive all the rodents

224 ●857 toward the small clearing. Badgered and frightened, the rats, mice, etc., run madly. Not daring to break through the line of beaters, they are pushed toward the clearing, hesitate an instant before entering it, then bound in. Without moving from their places, the little hunters wait for them and catch them in passing.



A sharp, quick blow and their ribs are smashed in, their skulls broken. Not one escapes; neither their size (some rodents are as big as hares) nor bites nor scratches frighten these tots of three, four, or five years of age.

224 223 857 The children also occupy themselves by capturing birds and small rodents with nets and snares. The latter are made with a flexible stalk for a spring and a cord with a noose. A system of small sticks which automatically trigger the release compels the bird to stick its head into the noose to reach the bait. At this moment, the mechanism is released, and the victim is pulled up by the cord attached to the stalk spring.

224 The natives also set snares of the same sort in front of holes of rodents and other animals or at a place where they habitually pass.

At the village of Madjuku, I had occasion to see the mechanism of a rat snare in action. In front of a hole, two arched sticks [62] intersect. A strong rattan stalk (E) has been stuck into the ground, and two piassava cords (A and B) are tied to its tip. One of the cords ends in a noose, which is placed in front of the entrance to the hole. A small stick (C) is attached to the end of the second cord. One of the ends of this stick passes behind the intersection 264 [415] spherical calotte, and also wooden plates. Sometimes also simple leaves are used as plates, unless the food is served in the cooking pots.

The whole meal is spread on the ground. [144]

The man squats on his mat and dips leisurely in the dishes with his hand, moving from one to another according to his taste.

[522] The meal is always eaten in silence. Even when several friends eat together, they never talk during the meal.

After the meal the natives carefully wash their hands and teeth and rinse out their mouths several times.

Beverages

271 415 Water is the only beverage they drink at mealtime, and they use it quite rarely. If they do not have a wooden or earthenware cup, they use part of a calabash or simply a leaf rolled into a little cone.

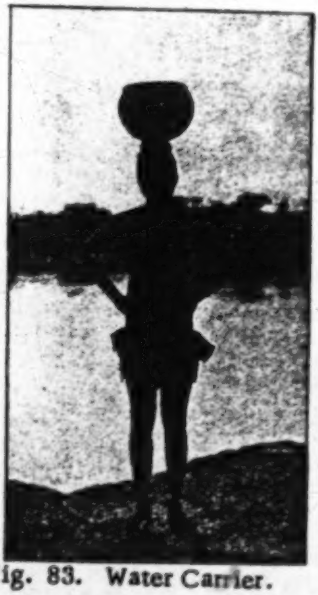

Fig. 83. Water Carrier.

312 462 ●857 482 Water usually comes from a spring near the village. The natives use river water only when it is quite clear. The women and children have the task of fetching water, a chore which is often quite hard. I visited many villages located along or near the river, whose source of drinking water was 20 to 30 minutes away.

At certain hours of the day and more especially in the morning as the sun first comes up, the women and children set out, a calabash or water jug balanced on their heads, to fetch the supply for the day.

271 415 Water is kept in large calabashes or earthenware jugs, sheltered from the sun in a corner of the hut.

684 D. Against the go-between (1) Nkundó law permits all sorts of invective, blows, and a good whipping. Formerly the most serious situation arose if a woman was called directly. In the past, if favored by circumstances (especially the social position of the families involved), certain of the more jealous and bold men caught the go-between and sold him as a slave. This punishment was entirely legitimate, even though the person for whom the go-between acted was the one primarily guilty and therefore the prisoner's family could attack him on that account. People cite the rather recent historic case of Bonkɛ́kɛ́ is Îloko of Ikengo (Ntómbá, Wǎngatá), who sold a Botswa named Bompáte into slavery because the latter had brought a lover's gift to Wǔfya, his favorite.

● [857]

1. The Nkundó generally use go-betweens to tender invitations to women; these are frequently children between the ages of six and fourteen. The disastrous effect of such a practice on the bringing up of young people is easily understood. In some groups it has inflicted a real moral evil.

E. Conclusion. In examining the various sanctions that Nkundó law provides against adulterers and their accomplices, we are struck by a noticeable difference among the cases. Although a wife has certain means to check her husband's misconduct, she is unquestionably less well armed than he. This is a logical consequence of the nature of Nkundó marriage. A husband defends his "property," whereas a wife is not an "owner." Furthermore, in this realm the requirements are stricter for a woman than for a man. Even in Europe the misconduct of a man is judged very differently than a woman's weakness, the latter being considered much more serious and shameful, even though -- in an absolute sense -- the two are equal. Finally, the system of polygamy plays a role, for it tends to weaken a wife's love and consequently her jealousy, so

845 puberty, by his father. The performance of this role entails continence (bokeka) for the person who undertakes it, even with respect to the spouse. A violation of this rule prevents healing of the wound or at least makes the process very long and difficult. (1)

[755] 1. A similar bokeka applies to anyone nursing a large gangrenous ulcer (wǎlé).

The foreskin that has been cut off is dried on the bolíkó (tray or shelf). Then no one bothers with it any longer, and it usually remains there, dusty and dirty, for an indefinite period of time if the rats leave it alone.

In the centers the young people are beginning to neglect [177] the native skilled in circumcising and resort instead to European surgeons.

Circumcision is not an occasion for feasts or ceremonies. [556] Sometimes a man who is rich and vain will give a feast, but this is not at all a common practice.

The term "to circumcise" is translated in Lonkundo as téna bọnsọé, "to cut off the foreskin." The less vulgar term and one used much more frequently is téna nsọ́ngẹ́, "to cut off the tip." A much too decent circumlocution is téna batói, "to cut off the ears."

The reason for this custom has already been given in Chapter I, Part II, Article II, 2.

Article VIII. Education

From an early age a Nkundó child must perform various 868 small services for his parents, especially in the household; he is 857 asked to draw water, fetch firewood, take care of a little brother or sister, etc. The demands for such services are addressed chiefly to girls, but boys are not at all exempt. By the very nature of things, however, the latter are less frequently asked to help.

Quite early a boy may accompany his father on trips, at meetings, legal debates, etc The father makes a bow and arrows for him and teaches him the art of using them. The great pastime

857 for young boys is hunting and fishing by all sorts of methods suitable 868 for their age. Little by little an adolescent learns the usual tasks and everything that he needs to know in order to survive and obtain food and shelter. His instruction is completed by his companions and above all by the exigencies of life.

A girl learns housework and farming. Very early her mother braids a small basket for her in order to accustom her to carrying loads. She also participates in the women's fishing.

In general one has the impression that the girls are far more active than the boys. But I think that this difference is due to the fact that the boys are almost always in the forest, while the girls remain in the village and are therefore noticed more. As a matter of fact in our missions it cannot be said that the boys work less well than the girls, quite the contrary.

The girls practice the culinary art, not only with their mothers but also -- as in Belgium -- in a game (ioto).

The children do not study the history, laws, and traditions
867 of their clan or tribe. They learn them in the [508] course of 869 events, either by hearing them described or by asking questions.
Often their parents explain such matters on their own initiative, not according to a definite program but rather when opportunities arise. A young man can learn many things especially by accompanying his father on visits, on trips, at meetings and deliberations, or by listening attentively to the performances of troubadours who play the longombé (mandolin). The astonishing knowledge of usages and customs, ancestral laws, history, the wisdom of the ancients, proverbs, fables, etc., possessed by some youngsters, to the point of excelling their elders, can be explained by their faithfulness in following papa instead of continuously enjoying the freedom of the forest. I have encountered more than one instance of this sort which was explained primarily on the basis of the boy's attachment to his father.

The Nkundó child begins to hum popular tunes and imitate 868 the rhythmic movements of the dancers when he is barely able to walk. Little girls, especially, practice special dances of their own. Then, little by little, the children mix with the group of adult dancers and are able to join the chorus, though they must remain in the rear.

567 Everywhere there were also abducted women and female 439 slaves; these were simply sold. Furthermore women were bought 562 and sold with women [as payment]. Also women who were inherited and no longer in the hands of their family were sold by their second, third, or other subsequent husband. In all of these cases, the family no longer came into consideration for the bride price. One would have to stretch the point in order to consider the sums paid in these cases as a bride price, and consequently as a native custom which one must respect.

562 Or one should have to assume that such a native woman re-439 mains a "bride" for her whole lifetime. It will be said that the woman consented to her sale by one man to the other.

Often this was indeed the case, but not always by any means, 858 for children and slaves were also sold. Even the consent of the woman did not prevent it from being a sale; her consent was rather an extra transaction that simplified the sale of a human article of trade. It still remains woman trade.

764 The Inheritance. Upon the death of a polygynist, the burial 567 ceremony was conducted according to the class and rank of the deceased. One or two or several [539] slaves were killed and buried with the polygynist in the same grave. Sometimes the arms and legs of those male and female slaves were broken, and then they were buried alive in the same grave with the body.

When these slaves still had family, it might happen that the family members, having learned of the unfortunate lot of their relative, would hasten from faraway districts to buy him or her free if it was not yet too late. Several Negroes have told us of those heart-breaking scenes at which they were present as children. The mourn-765 ing and the lamenting over the dead lasted from a week to a month.

768 The eldest son immediately succeeded his father in position 428 and immediately took one of the wives of his father.

The other sons divided among them the lances and knives of 587 their father.

If the deceased had left no son, or if he was still too young, the oldest brother succeeded the deceased. All of the wives had to remain in their own home, except the wife who was immediately taken by the eldest son. They were obliged to await the day of the distribution. This day was put off for from one to four months.

868 Parents teach their children the trades that they themselves know: forging, wood sculpture, the weaving of mats and baskets, pottery making, etc.

867 With respect to ethics, the children learn a great deal from experience, but parents do not fail to teach them rules of politeness, decorum, good breeding, and the great principles of social relations. As in Europe, however, there are degrees of concern or indifference in this realm. The moral code taught is the one the parents themselves practice. It is centered above all on family and society: respect toward members of the family, mutual assistance, respect for the welfare of others, fear of the opposite sex, etc. But all of it has a naturalistic basis: the reason given for adherence to such precepts is limited to the unpleasant consequences [509] that would otherwise result. Reprimands and even corporal punishments for infractions are not unknown. But they are chiefly due to exasperation and therefore mixed with anger and without any continuity or consistent idea. Once the anger has passed the threats remain sterile. For punishment the parents
● [61] resort chiefly to blows, but other penalties are also common. For instance, one of our catechists when he was young (between 1880 and 1895) had removed a little bird trapped in a snare belonging to one of his cousins. As soon as his father heard what he had done, he gave the youngster a good scolding and made him go to bed without supper.

As a girl approaches puberty, her mother teaches her the rights and duties of a married woman. She teaches her how to behave and conduct herself in order to be a good wife and mother. She does this so that her daughter may find a good husband, and so that the union may be stable and not produce too many palavers or trouble.

Formerly children were not allowed to see the dances of adults. They were chased away and had to amuse each other. This was an excellent means for preserving morality among the youth and retaining their respect for their elders. Therefore it is most regrettable that it has been abandoned.

882 When the children reach puberty, they no longer like to sleep in their parent's home. The parents do not send them away, but on the other hand, they do not oppose this desire on the part of young people which, they say, springs from a feeling of modesty. The boys go one way, the girls another; for example, they may appropriate an unoccupied hut belonging to their father or go to close relatives, or they may try and find a place in quarters occupied by a group of boys or girls. If no house is available, the boys band together to build a hut which they share. Nowadays they begin very early [510] to build individual huts or one for two, in order to thus enjoy a greater freedom.

868 On the trees in the forest one finds a kind of hard mushroom called losikitela. When a child begins to speak, the mushroom is placed between his teeth, so that he will bite into it and thus learn not to express himself thoughtlessly but to hold back his words (-sikitela) and think before speaking.

One can often observe parents and other persons actively helping children to express themselves correctly, especially in correcting mistakes, pronunciation, and errors with regard to proper nouns, by giving them the proper words and even explaining grammatical forms and subtle distinctions between certain terms. "This is how it must be said; that means something else. This plant is called thus and so, etc."

● 861 Therefore, although a Nkundó child is very free to spend his days as he pleases and, perforce, learns many things through personal experience, it would be wrong to say that his parents are not interested in his education and do not contribute to it. They participate actively by their advice, their explanations, and their demonstrations. Needless to say, their role is neither as important nor as continuous as in many civilized societies. Besides it is very difficult, and often unfair, to compare our people's situation with that of Europeans; the difference in circumstances is too great. But we must point out in all fairness that the Nkundó do make efforts in this realm, although the results are hardly apparent with respect to moral education (1), because there are many flaws, gaps,

1. We will say no more about material and economic education, which can not be criticized.

86 efforts, and obstacles, the most important of which should be considered. [511]

1) First of all education begins too late. To be crowned with success such efforts should be begun as early as possible. And among the Nkundó, a child is not considered old enough to be given lessons or punished until he is fairly well developed (usually at about six years of age).

2) In their pedagogy the Nkundó do not take into account the relationship between cause and effect with respect to the acquisition of bad habits. They react against censurable actions, but they do not attack their roots by opposing the beginning of vices. Thus, they do not understand that if the desires and whims of a small child, for example with respect to nursing, demands for food, the desire to be fondled and carried, etc., are continually satisfied, he will necessarily become an unruly little tyrant who wants to be satisfied in every way.

3) The Nkundó have no systematic idea or consistency in correcting faults and punishing misbehavior; as we have seen, punishment by Nkundó parents most frequently takes the form of sudden explosions of anger and indignation. The purpose of the punishment is not apparent to the child, and the only result obtained is a fear of being chastised. There may be fortunate exceptions, but these are surely extremely rare. Generally, parents follow the impulse of the moment, and the youngsters take advantage of these impulses. The gravity of such a situation stands out clearly in the following case history: Isia (now a man between thirty and forty) was amusing himself by shooting arrows. One of his father's wives, named Bokeli, appeared, accompanied by Bakutu, a young sister of Isia. The youngster reproved Bokeli: "What are you doing here with my sister? If she is hit by an arrow, the palaver will be yours." The woman insulted him. The boy threatened to shoot at her. Thereupon his father, Bolfidlu, intervened, saying, "If you dare touch my wife, I [512] will kill one of your mothers." (1) Isia's retort was to shoot at Bokeli saying,

1. That is, either his mother (Botafoanya) or her sister and ohfsa, Basfini.

861 "Well, then, let them both die." (2) His father wanted to catch

> 2. That is, if my mother is to die, you, Bokeli, will die also (a common retort in such cases).

him, but the agile youngster fled to the forest. As he did not return home that evening, everyone became frightened. Finally, he answered the call of his aunt Bongôla and came back. The moral of the story: everyone was happy to see him again, and there was no more question of punishment. (3)

> 3. According to the Nkundó jurisprudence, the wrong was actually on Bokeli's side because she started the insults. But the reaction was excessive, nevertheless.

An even stronger example is that of Esaló (now between forty and fifty), who was insulted by his mother Bosola for some misdeed. He shot at her and wounded her on the forehead. To flee his father's anger he withdrew to the forest. He was called and came back. That ended the palaver. (4)

> 4. As a matter of fact, a Nkundó fable teaches that a person should not be left under the sway of rage, especially if he has withdrawn to the forest, because he may become a misanthrope as a result, producing even more deplorable consequences (vagrancy, murders, etc.).

593 861 4) There is a lack of cooperation between the spouses. Each one acts on his own initiative and out of his own indignation. More than that they contradict each other; one will punish the child, and the other tries to protect it, either directly or indirectly, by reprimanding the spouse.

593 561 Women in particular are very intolerant of having anyone touch their children, even the child's own father. This fact can be attributed in part to a lack of any unity of feeling between the spouses and partly to maternal love, which is purely natural, psycho-physiological, so to speak.

Measures taken against a child who has misbehaved often 578 561 result in serious domestic quarrels, sometimes followed by the wife's flight to her family. Such was the case of Bakutu b'Ŏfóngé (born around 1880). His father, Bolónjó, had forbidden him to peel a piece of sugar cane [513] in a clumsy and wasteful manner. The boy did not want to listen to reason. Next thing you know he had cut a deep wound in his finger. "What did I tell you?" shouted the father. "Now you are punished for your disobedience." Thereupon the mother, Mbélé, flew into a rage. "Oh! You are killing my child!" and so on. She rolled up her mats, took her baskets on her back, and took the path leading to her village.

Nkundó casuistry includes the case -- which seems hypothetical or at least belonging to the past, for I have never known or heard of a real instance -- of a man taking revenge on his wife for having insulted his child. His revenge took the form of ordering the child to go and kill a goat belonging to her mother's clan, thus obliging the child to pay an indemnity to the owner, so that the mother finds herself thus being punished by her family. The father's right to do this is recognized in Nkundó jurisprudence. But from the standpoint of education the solution is far from ideal.

5) The influence of the kin group also plays a great role. 602 561 The Nkundó are very much attached to their families. Their children are at home everywhere in the group. A wife has very close ties to her own family. The father's brothers and sisters are a child's "fathers"; his maternal aunts and uncles are his "mothers." A child's real father does not do much to defend his son against scolding or punishment from his own close kin but does not readily accept the intervention of his wife's family, and vice versa. And again the child can take advantage of such dissension. The situation occurs quite frequently although there are many exceptions.

6) The parent's opposition to reprimands by strangers is 861 even greater as a general rule. They try to cover up and justify 609 the faults of their progeny, whom they will fiercely defend. The children naturally know all this and take advantage of it.

7) The polygamous household, with all its rivalries among 595 co-wives, cannot but accentuate all such [514] adverse effects
593 on the children's education. The conflicts, spiteful comments, 861 palavers, etc., are easily extended to the children. And each wife defends her own.

8) Everything is public; there are no secrets; everything
593 is known, seen, and heard. People do not restrain themselves 861 and the presence of children does not stop the flow of insults and obscenities which anger provokes. The young people see many things it would be better for them not to know. They are present at domestic quarrels and are witnesses to dissensions. All this is increased by life outdoors, in the street, and by the thinness of partitions.

9) Another factor is added nowadays: the facility of com-
177 munications and the presence of European stations. Boys can al-
593 ways run away and find shelter with the Whites or their native em-861 ployees. The girls seek out kinswomen who live at such stations, even though they must help a little with the housework, in the hope of later enjoying a greater freedom and living in luxury.
Parental influence and authority are naturally weakened as a result.

10) Finally, Nkundó education lacks any solid basis, any 861 religion or religious morality. Everything is based on natural, physical fear: the fear of punishments (physical or based on superstition), harmful consequences of bad actions (palavers, difficulties, fines, indemnities, sometimes the shame of being caught -- as in theft). It is especially this lack of religious motivation that makes their moral education bear so little fruit. As the Nkundó are accustomed to this imperfect state, they do not feel the need for 000 such a foundation. That is why it is so difficult to instill any moral conscience into them. The patient and perservering action of the great Christian truths with their institutions for moral formation (uninterrupted preaching, confession, prayer) are needed to endow

853 may not eat meat if the child is male, or fish if it is female, un-262 til the child in question is grown and kills either an animal (or bird) or a fish, according to the case, and has given it to the victim of the accident. If the child dies young, the person is accused of having violated the prohibition and is obliged to pay a large indemnity. This extremity is not usually reached, however, for the one to whom the accident has befallen scrupulously keeps away from everything that might cause this sort of murder. Then, if death occurs and he has nothing with which to reproach himself, he can resort to an ordeal or to the verdict of a test based on superstition. In addition in villages that have Batswa, a woman of that [563] race must nurse the child for an instant after the accident before its mother gives it her breast again. [497]

6) The child is carried on the shoulder, and as soon as it is 854 capable of holding on, on the hip. It does not take many weeks for it to become accustomed to that position. When the mother has to hold it for a long period of time (during a march, on a trip, etc.), she puts it in a scarf-shoulder strap (lombě), made from creepers that are scraped and woven as for a mat, or from a cloth of raffia fibers, or even from a pelt (nowadays it is often made from a piece of European cloth). The scarf must be sturdy, for were it to tear and the infant fall, far-reaching consequences would result;
all of that woman's subsequent children would be condemned to die in the mother's womb or during the period of nursing.

As the child grows it is sometimes carried astride the mother's back, either because she does not like to be separated from it, or because the tyranny of the little one forces her to keep it with her even during her work, errands, and even dances. She remedies this awkward situation if possible by resorting to the assistance of an older girl, a young niece or cousin, or a little boy from among the immediate kin.

When the child rests during the day, it is laid on an ordinary bed or on a movable bed (bośnga), without any special arrangements. It has no difficulty sleeping soundly on such hard couches.

7) Weaning. Although a child is gradually accustomed 862 to solid food, it does not stop nursing. As it grows older, the nursing times are spaced farther and farther apart. But the child

● 862 does not really stop nursing till it is about two years old, and sometimes two and a half if it has a weak constitution.

Weaning is not accompanied by any ceremony or feast. In order to break the child's habit, the mother smears her nipples with the sap of the lilété fruit (a kind of small sweet pimento or eggplant) or with a pimento-pepper extract (imbóngo). Sometimes she leaves the child with some relative (daughter, sister, etc.) for a time [498] while she lives elsewhere. [824]

As we have seen above, after weaning, the ekelé-bokeka period comes to an end for the mother, and her infidelities no longer have repercussions on the life of her child.

[451] 8) If the mother dies while the infant is still being nursed, the task of nursing is turned over to some woman who is disposed to undertake it even a Botswa, and there always is one. After the child is weaned the woman is suitably recompensed. The use of goat's milk is unknown. [589] [235]

854/ 751/ 9) Young children frequently suffer convulsions. This illness is thought to be caused by hawks, and for that reason it is called mpulú (bird). The Nkundó try to prevent it by hanging an amulet around children's necks; it is usually the clavicular triangle of a hen's carcass. In addition they know a remedy whose purpose is to strengthen the nerves: the child is laid on a mat stretched out anywhere on the roof of the hut. An eyewash (bolólé) is prepared from the sap of leaves from the litóyanzombo bush and extract of mbóló (fruit of the bosombó). Using a leaf shaped into a horn, a few drops are put into the child's eyes. Then the father or some other relative pulls out the mat from under the child and lifts it several times, shouting: té té té. [151]

864 10) No special importance is attached to teething. But a child whose upper teeth come in before the lower ones (a defect called ingondo) is considered abnormal. Therefore he is forbidden to eat the first fruits of hunting or fishing in an enclosure (mpao), lest the latter lose their productivity.

864 During a girl's early childhood beginning when she is still nursing, a mother with foresight will work to make her organs as perfect as possible. By applying pressure repeatedly and for long periods, she molds, so to speak, the outside in order to make it narrow, as this quality is greatly valued by our people.

It is the mother, too, who trains the girl in her preparations for married life. She teaches her how to behave toward her future husband, and at the same time instructs her in the duties of a good housewife (see Chapter X, Article VIII).

864 Certain forms of behavior, although their relationship to our subject is only superficial and external, must nevertheless be mentioned. An adult man will often take in his arms a little girl who has not yet been weaned, or perhaps only slightly more developed. He considers this child to be his wife. He has paid no bride price for her. But since she is a sister, cousin, or other relative of one of his wives, she is a "wife" from his point of view; that is, not only will it be possible for him to marry her later on, but even without becoming her husband he will enjoy a certain liberty in relation to her. (1) Thus, when such a man takes his young "wife" in his arms, he is enjoying an anticipation of the future and speaks to her [66] in that sense, often accompanying his words with intimate caresses.

The same practice, mutatis mutandis, may be observed on the part of a woman toward a small boy whom she can consider as her "husband."

2. Circumcision

Circumcision is generally practiced. It is usually performed at an early age. Without going into the details at this point (1) or 000 which specifically expresses our idea of virginity, nor deduce from its absence that the thing itself is unknown to them. The Greeks and Romans were well acquainted with it, yet they had no precise word for it. Parthenos and Virgo mean simply "unmarried girl." The Germanic words such as Maagd and Jungfrau, which now signify "virgin," originally had the same meaning as the Greek and Latin terms.

585
836 The foregoing does not imply that every Nkundó girl is free to have sexual relations and that public opinion approves of libertinism among single people. We will examine this question in the following paragraphs.

896 2. Sexual relations between single people

164 In dealing with this question we must distinguish between relations between adults and the contacts between nonadults. We will therefore examine the two situations separately so that at the end we can attempt to explain the changes in native attitudes in this realm that have occurred. [80]

A. Before physical maturity. We will first relate what the natives tell about customary practices in the past, and then describe the practices of the present day.

In the past, sexual contacts between young people not yet marriageable were severely punished by their parents. The children were taught that those who were guilty would be struck down by a very serious illness which was inevitably fatal. This illness was called by the generic term ndota (1), and the more specific one, gsémbéji.

1. Ndota is the name of the illness which is the punishment for an infraction of a sexual prohibition under any circumstances. I have heard these same terms used also by the natives in the vicinity of Coquilhatville.

The body becomes flabby and without strength, and this weakness ends in a fatal paralysis (byongɛ́ nnyǎnyuka or nkatɛ́ɛ́nɛ́). In addition, the girls feared that their sexual organs, not yet fully formed, would be torn. They were also imbued with a very intense fear: bofolu w'aende, "the fear of males," bofolu w'ǎmato, "the fear of females." They also feared death -- bɛ́lotɛ́kɛ́ iwɛ́. The parents added that sexual acts were free from danger only between persons of the requisite age.

864
838 This does not mean that children did not commit indecent acts. The game of ioto, in which little girls try to cook (and which is always one of their favorite games (2) as it probably is throughout the world), often gave rise to it. Small boys joined in the game in order to taste the meal. And quite naturally they began to play at "husband and wife," more or less. Often this game involved only innocent imitations, but other times touching and exhibitions occurred between children of the same sex or of opposite sexes. This game is far more dangerous nowadays, [81] because of a change in the attitude of young people toward sexual matters.

The game of yembankongo, in which boys, imitating monkeys, chase each other through the trees and creepers can -- and does - result in reprehensible scenes.

178 In former times most girls were married before puberty. But their husbands did not touch them until they had completed their normal development.

582
835
864 Among some individuals the fear of sexual relations was so deeply rooted that it persisted even beyond the age limit and was

2. Some boys imitate this game in order to acquire the habit of preparing their own meals. Later they benefit from it on more than one occasion.

582 conquered only by repeated assaults of passion. Thus it is generally 833 known among the natives that young women used to seek refuge in 864 their mother's house when the husband wanted to begin making use of his rights as a husband. The mother would try to persuade her daughter to submit to the law of life. But sometimes, if her child seemed too resistant, the mother made excuses for her and asked the husband to consider her daughter's youth. The man usually wanted to remain on good terms with his mother-in-law so he did not insist and resigned himself to waiting till nature influenced the spirit and heart of his wife.

Since young people were brought up in deep fear of dangerous relations, it should not surprise us that this feeling became a real habit and did not disappear spontaneously the moment a certain degree of liberty was permitted. As a matter of fact, could we not make similar observations in Europe?

This is the natural explanation for the praiseworthy degree of morality among adolescents in the past.

Nowadays all that has changed. The young people follow
178 where their passions lead them. Not the slightest check is placed on 836 their impulses. Parents pay only slight attention to the conduct of 864 their children. [82] It is better not to inquire into the morality of modern youth. Husbands no longer respect the bodies of their adolescent brides, who are themselves quite used to a sexual life and eagerly look forward to it; and no longer know the feeling of "the fear of men." Should we then be astonished at the frightening de-[164] crease in the birth rate (1) and the ever increasing spread of venereal diseases, which seem to have been unknown in the past?

The reasons for this change will be investigated further on, under the letter C.

836 B. Between adults. Here the Nkundó are very lenient. There is a difference, however, between the socio-legal and moral viewpoints, although as we shall see the latter is influenced by the former.

[562] A woman is entirely free, legally speaking, as long as the first payment on her bride price has not been made. No man has

---

1. The natives say that in the past young wives quickly became pregnant. And now ...

562 exclusive rights over her. Hence the proverb: Mbɔ́mbo ǐle nd'ânsɔ bimbo 836 ńa la nkɔ́lɔ́, "boimbo fruit found under the tree have no owner; they [539] belong to the first person who gathers them." Thus a girl for whom nothing has been paid belongs to no one. A woman free in this manner does not infringe on the rights of any man in her sexual relations. There are therefore no sanctions against her licentiousness.

836
864 Furthermore, the discovery of her activities gives rise to no shame. At most more serious parents will rebuke children who go too far -- the girls because they abuse the body and reduce their value for a prospective marriage (2), the boys because they [83] run the risk of financial difficulties (the dangers of adultery, indemnity for childbirth with death as a result, etc.).

626
836 Public opinion is even more lenient than the parents. This attitude is easy to understand: strangers need fear no unpleasant consequences. Errors of this sort are generally considered natural weaknesses, provided that they do not occur too frequently. For public opinion is hard on people who run from one to another; they are stigmatized with the name ebɔ́bɔ́ɔ́, "unfaithful, flighty, without intelligence or reasoning powers," or ebɔ́ngɔ́, a stronger term with the same meaning.

836 From all the foregoing should we deduce that every woman is free to indulge fully in fornication? On the basis of the above considerations we could frankly conclude the affirmative. The behavior that can be observed from day to day fully confirms this answer. Some people stray more or less accidentally, but for others the practice quickly becomes a habit. And it can be said of all of them that

[585] 2. Not that a smaller bride price would be given for them. But a serious man would rather not take a woman for wife who has "run around" a great deal and therefore is more likely to commit adultery, to be unfaithful, and less likely to become the mother of a numerous progeny.

836 they succumb to any favorable opportunity. The validity of this generalization is not affected by extremely rare exceptions which may be encountered and which are due either to a constitutional abnormality or to an extraordinarily firm Christian conviction. How should 834 178 these observations be reconciled with the statement so often heard from natives that the situation was entirely different before the coming of the white men? It was not unusual to see young women not only abstaining from sexual relations but having such a "fear of men" that they drove away seducers and defended their chastity by hitting them with a stick.

When the woman did not accept the young man's proposition, she considered it a grave insult. The initiator was entitled to no indemnity "for blows and wounds." The woman replied only in violent terms, in word or act. [84] Often she went and insulted the mother of the guilty party. When the latter was told the reason for this behavior, she could only turn on her misbehaving son and usually gave him a good talking to; if he was young enough she gave him a good beating. Thus the girl had every right to defend herself.

If the provocation gave rise to no complications in family or society, the parents paid a lot less attention. But they tried to teach [864] their children discretion in these dangerous matters, though their instruction primarily took the form of a lesson after an error was committed, or sometimes apropos of an incident that had befallen someone else. Some parents were very severe. These attitudes were based on a vague sense of morality which was not deduced from philosophical reasoning or religious or superstitious ideas but which was innate and instinctive so to speak. In addition, the fear of excesses and eventual social consequences no doubt also played a considerable [577] role. Excesses were feared above all, and an isolated occurrence was regarded more or less as a momentary weakness.

To form an accurate picture of the situation that existed in the past, we must not lose sight of the fact that, because of very early marriages, the number of young single women was necessarily limited.

562 836 The attitude toward single men was more lenient than toward girls, unless their behavior had any consequences and apart from the danger of their actions becoming habitual, leading inevitably to palavers.

593x themselves of the usual and ordinary obligations incumbent upon 577 them on the death of a son-in-law. Should this be taken as a kind
762 of implied condemnation of suicide? [278]

The wisdom of the elders recommends to youth that they 593x not let anger lead them to brutal acts even where, legally, it is 578 permissible to use force. They do not act in such a way through a
● 867 policy of adaptation to the present regime. Even before the arrival 626 of the white men, they gave lessons in calm and self-mastery. For serious blows, wounds, and especially homicide could have deplorable consequences legally and even politically (war). They preferred recourse to punishments, such as abstention from food and the refusal of debitum conjugale, which although less violent, are not without efficacity. In that way they were also spared the vexation of in-laws, whose pity would be aroused by the wounds and bodily suffering of their child or sister.

578 One thing that deserves blows or a good whipping because it
593x is considered a serious failure in the fulfillment of the duties of married life is indifference and negligence in housework. A husband may safely deal forcefully with the situation, although he must first inform the qualified authorities. The following are some examples of such faults: the wife does not give the necessary attention to the kitchen, her children, the cleaning of the hut and court; she neglects her crops, does not go fishing, makes no attempt to obtain salt, etc.; in short, she does not give the required time and care to the tasks incumbent upon her. She herself, her children, and her house remain disgustingly filthy, her fields and banana groves are invaded by weeds and her pantry is devoid of utensils and food, while she wastes her time doing nothing or rather spends it running about the village, going to one woman's house, chatting with another, spending the better part of her day gossiping. The Nkundó does not put up with this sort of behavior, and no one can reproach him. Even other men and the woman's companions condemn [279] such conduct. Often the woman is ridiculed, and on occasion she may [B4] hear unflattering comments such as bɔ̃mot'ɔ̃w'asolɔ́, efufa etɛ́ngamaka,
"a gossip, her cloth is to the side," that is, the interminable chatting

857 for young boys is hunting and fishing by all sorts of methods suitable 868 for their age. Little by little an adolescent learns the usual tasks and everything that he needs to know in order to survive and obtain food and shelter. His instruction is completed by his companions and above all by the exigencies of life.

A girl learns housework and farming. Very early her mother braids a small basket for her in order to accustom her to carrying loads. She also participates in the women's fishing.

In general one has the impression that the girls are far more active than the boys. But I think that this difference is due to the fact that the boys are almost always in the forest, while the girls remain in the village and are therefore noticed more. As a matter of fact in our missions it cannot be said that the boys work less well than the girls, quite the contrary.

The girls practice the culinary art, not only with their mothers but also -- as in Belgium -- in a game (ioto).

● The children do not study the history, laws, and traditions
867 of their clan or tribe. They learn them in the [508] course of 869 events, either by hearing them described or by asking questions. Often their parents explain such matters on their own initiative, not according to a definite program but rather when opportunities arise. A young man can learn many things especially by accompanying his father on visits, on trips, at meetings and deliberations, or by listening attentively to the performances of troubadours who play the longombé (mandolin). The astonishing knowledge of usages and customs, ancestral laws, history, the wisdom of the ancients, proverbs, fables, etc., possessed by some youngsters, to the point of excelling their elders, can be explained by their faithfulness in following papa instead of continuously enjoying the freedom of the forest. I have encountered more than one instance of this sort which was explained primarily on the basis of the boy's attachment to his father.

The Nkundó child begins to hum popular tunes and imitate
[illegible] the rhythmic movements of the dancers when he is barely able to walk. Little girls, especially, practice special dances of their own. Then, little by little, the children mix with the group of adult dancers and are able to join the chorus, though they must remain in the rear.

868 Parents teach their children the trades that they themselves know: forging, wood sculpture, the weaving of mats and baskets, pottery making, etc.

● 867 With respect to ethics, the children learn a great deal from experience, but parents do not fail to teach them rules of politeness, decorum, good breeding, and the great principles of social relations. As in Europe, however, there are degrees of concern or indifference in this realm. The moral code taught is the one the parents themselves practice. It is centered above all on family and society; respect toward members of the family, mutual assistance, respect for the welfare of others, fear of the opposite sex, etc. But all of it has a naturalistic basis: the reason given for adherence to such precepts is limited to the unpleasant consequences [509] that would otherwise result. Reprimands and even corporal punishments for infractions are not unknown. But they are chiefly due to exasperation and therefore mixed with anger and without any continuity or consistent idea. Once the anger has passed the threats remain sterile. For punishment the parents [861] resort chiefly to blows, but other penalties are also common. For instance, one of our catechists when he was young (between 1880 and 1895) had removed a little bird trapped in a snare belonging to one of his cousins. As soon as his father heard what he had done, he gave the youngster a good scolding and made him go to bed without supper.

As a girl approaches puberty, her mother teaches her the rights and duties of a married woman. She teaches her how to behave and conduct herself in order to be a good wife and mother. She does this so that her daughter may find a good husband, and so that the union may be stable and not produce too many palavers or trouble.

Formerly, children were not allowed to see the dances of adults. They were chased away and had to amuse each other. This was an excellent means for preserving morality among the youth and retaining their respect for their elders. Therefore it is most regrettable that it has been abandoned.

845 puberty, by his father. The performance of this role entails continence (bokeka) for the person who undertakes it, even with respect to the spouse. A violation of this rule prevents healing of the wound or at least makes the process very long and difficult. (1)

[755] 1. A similar bokeka applies to anyone nursing a large gangrenous ulcer (wălɛ́).

The foreskin that has been cut off is dried on the bolíkó (tray or shelf). Then no one bothers with it any longer, and it usually remains there, dusty and dirty, for an indefinite period of time if the rats leave it alone.

In the centers the young people are beginning to neglect [177] the native skilled in circumcising and resort instead to European surgeons.

Circumcision is not an occasion for feasts or ceremonies. [594] Sometimes a man who is rich and vain will give a feast, but this is not at all a common practice.

The term "to circumcise" is translated in Lonkundo as téna bɔnsɛ́, "to cut off the foreskin." The less vulgar term and one used much more frequently is téna nsɔ́ngɛ́, "to cut off the tip." A much too decent circumlocution is téna batɔ́i, "to cut off the ears."

The reason for this custom has already been given in Chapter I, Part II, Article II, 2.

Article VIII. Education

● 566 567 From an early age a Nkundó child must perform various small services for his parents, especially in the household; he is asked to draw water, fetch firewood, take care of a little brother or sister, etc. The demands for such services are addressed chiefly to girls, but boys are not at all exempt. By the very nature of things, however, the latter are less frequently asked to help.

Quite early a boy may accompany his father on trips, at meetings, legal debates, etc. The father makes a bow and arrows for him and teaches him the art of using them. The great pastime

882 When the children reach puberty, they no longer like to sleep in their parent's home. The parents do not send them away, but on the other hand, they do not oppose this desire on the part of young people which, they say, springs from a feeling of modesty. The boys go one way, the girls another; for example, they may appropriate an unoccupied hut belonging to their father or go to close relatives, or they may try and find a place in quarters occupied by a group of boys or girls. If no house is available, the boys band together to build a hut which they share. Nowadays they begin very early [510] to build individual huts or one for two, in order to thus enjoy a greater freedom.

● 861 On the trees in the forest one finds a kind of hard mushroom called losikitela. When a child begins to speak, the mushroom is placed between his teeth, so that he will bite into it and thus learn not to express himself thoughtlessly but to hold back his words (-sikitela) and think before speaking.

One can often observe parents and other persons actively helping children to express themselves correctly, especially in correcting mistakes, pronunciation, and errors with regard to proper nouns, by giving them the proper words and even explaining grammatical forms and subtle distinctions between certain terms. "This is how it must be said; that means something else. This plant is called thus and so, etc."

861 Therefore, although a Nkundó child is very free to spend his days as he pleases and, perforce, learns many things through personal experience, it would be wrong to say that his parents are not interested in his education and do not contribute to it. They participate actively by their advice, their explanations, and their demonstrations. Needless to say, their role is neither as important nor as continuous as in many civilized societies. Besides it is very difficult, and often unfair, to compare our people's situation with that of Europeans; the difference in circumstances is too great. But we must point out in all fairness that the Nkundó do make efforts in this realm, although the results are hardly apparent with respect to moral education (1), because there are many flaws, gaps,

But I think that this difference is due to the fact that the boys are almost always in the forest, while the girls remain in the village and are therefore noticed more. As a matter of fact in our missions it cannot be said that the boys work less well than the girls, quite the contrary.

The girls practice the culinary art, not only with their mothers but also -- as in Belgium -- in a game (ioto).

The children do not study the history, laws, and traditions
867 of their clan or tribe. They learn them in the [508] course of 869 events, either by hearing them described or by asking questions. Often their parents explain such matters on their own initiative, not according to a definite program but rather when opportunities arise. A young man can learn many things especially by accompanying his father on visits, on trips, at meetings and deliberations, or by listening attentively to the performances of troubadours who play the longombé (mandolin). The astonishing knowledge of usages and customs, ancestral laws, history, the wisdom of the ancients, proverbs, fables, etc., possessed by some youngsters, to the point of excelling their elders, can be explained by their faithfulness in following papa instead of continuously enjoying the freedom of the forest. I have encountered more than one instance of this sort which was explained primarily on the basis of the boy's attachment to his father.

[illegible] The Nkundó child begins to hum popular tunes and imitate the rhythmic movements of the dancers when he is barely able to walk. Little girls, especially, practice special dances of their own. Then, little by little, the children mix with the group of adult dancers and are able to join the chorus, though they must remain in the rear.

593 ● [882] If the whole family [26] suffers through the misbehaviour of adolescents, the latter will not be spared by the father. But the mother will often take their sides for, not belonging to her husband's family, she allows only her heart to speak. The familial-political organization of this people requires that fondness have its limits; otherwise it could lead to disorder and anarchy.

593 855 It cannot be said of Nkundo parents, as one often reads about other peoples of the Congo, that they do not care for their children, who are self-sufficient and obliged to provide for their own needs from the age of six or seven. Our people are always feeding and even coddling their children; even when the latter are married they are always well received in their parents' home and lavishly treated. It is quite true that the young people spend much time in the forest looking for various kinds of food, but that is part of their games and amusements, a phase of their education, and at the same time their contribution to the maintenance of the household (a contribution which cannot be omitted from any serious education, and it is regrettable that it should be omitted by so many European families. (1)

1. Education will be dealt with more extensively in Chapter X, Article VIII.

593 581 In the matter of marriage parents generally respect the feelings of their children. A father who is motivated by avarice and, above all, by the need for a certain sum of money or its equivalent, may sometimes let the voice of self-interest predominate over that of the heart.

It goes without saying that one may encounter aberrations of fatherly feeling, but such cases are exceedingly rare. (2)

2. For an example see Chapter II, Article XI, 3, B.

593 Though parents love their children without distinction and without consideration of their faults, vices, etc., they are not exempt from a certain amount of partiality; a particular child [27] will 548 ornaments or objects for her toilette (hairpins, for example), and it is probable therefore that individual cases of this sort occurred. But it is altogether unlikely that the practice was widespread, as it does not fit in with the economic organization of this people, among whom wealth is more or less collectively owned and, moreover, (as will be shown in Chapter VI, Article II) a woman has no property rights. [72] Therefore we can assume that there were only a few occasional prostitutes.

On the other hand, there have never been any professional prostitutes; that is, Nkundó women have never made a job out of prostitution, and the same thing may be said of the other forms listed above.

The number of prostitutes was necessarily limited, however, by the fact that the great majority of women were always married young (Chapter IV, Article I), and that adultery was severely punished (Chapter VI, Article VII).

Nevertheless, there is something which superficially resembles prostitution; that is, there is a category of girls and women whom at first glance one would be tempted to call prostitutes. Therefore it would be useful to examine the situation somewhat more closely, for though in itself it is entirely different from prostitution, it could easily lend itself to it.

It sometimes happens that a girl, besides the bolumbu (a socio-political institution in no way related to the degeneration of female sexuality), is kept in the home of her parents beyond the customary age before she is given in marriage. Such a girl is called elûmwâla, "the one who does not marry." She is not bolumbu. Externally or -- to use philosophical terminology -- materially, the two customs resemble each other; but formally they are entirely different. Creating a bolumbu involves authority and influence and is thus a public matter. Whether a girl becomes an elûmwâla, on the other hand, is a private matter between father and daughter. While the creation of a bolumbu is accompanied by public feasts and a decree officially proclaimed (bofho) by the father and accepted by the council of family heads [73], the establishment of a elûmwâla involves no official act or ceremony.

548 572. 582. The name efotswâfla does not mean that the girl will stay single all her life. Her marriage is not permanently excluded; it is only postponed.

As for her behaviour, the efotswâfla conducts herself like any Nkundó girl. Nothing distinguishes her from her companions. If a good match is proposed to her, she marries like everyone else.

This custom -- if one can use the term -- therefore has no real connection with prostitution. All that can be said is that the girl who stays single longer and until adulthood, is exposed to more libertinism and a life of debauchery.

586 It also happens that parents who are angry because their daughter has dissolved a marriage to a man they consider a good son-in-law prevent her from remarrying in an effort to make her return to her legitimate husband. If the parents and their child each hold to their viewpoint without yielding, such a situation can go on for many months until the wife is -- practically speaking -- no longer under the authority of her husband. And since the opposition of her parents prevents her from being married by another man, she easily comes to give herself to all. It should be added that at present this case is chiefly hypothetical. Parents no longer have the authority [75] to thwart the desires of an adult daughter in this way; if she is stubborn they have to yield out of fear that she will run far away. And that would be to go from the frying pan into the fire. But in the past the kind of situation I have described was not unusual.

558 569 The most fertile places for the breeding and development of prostitution are to be sought in the centers. The following principal causes can be given:

1) Female vanity is overexcited by the sight [76] of all the dazzling riches which have been imported by white men and which are such a temptation to Negro women. It requires a considerable income to satisfy this desire to enhance one's native beauty. Ordinary laborers and artisans do not earn enough money to satisfy their wives or daughters in this respect. Mistresses of Europeans or of foreign black men, the wives of "clerks" and other representatives of Negro high society display a degree of luxury startling and striking to the rest.

legitimate husband and is entitled to his wife. Everything depends on his personal attitude, his passion, or his respect for the body of his young wife. If he is reasonable he will be very careful during his relations with her or will abstain altogether, so as not to "damage" her body. But from the legal standpoint he may do as he chooses. Thus there are adults who have regular relations -- one way or another -- with a wife whose breasts are not in the least developed. In such cases marital relations take place before nubility. (1) The consequences with respect to the birth rate may easily be guessed. [231] It may also happen that the husband himself has not reached puberty. This fact presents no obstacle to cohabitation. As soon as he feels that he is a man, he builds his hut and the couple live there together. In all these cases the girl often goes to her parents' home, and sometimes her visits extend for weeks during which she does not see her husband.

Formerly things did not work out in this fashion. The young wife often refused to participate in the sexual act, especially if the husband was considerably older than she. Her reaction was due to her natural modesty and timidity, together with her education. A polygamous husband usually respected her feelings, till she gradually came around. When her normal physiological development was completed and her love reached a sufficient intensity, she would begin to follow her instincts. In the light of what was said in Chapter I, Part 2, Article IV, 2, A, we may readily accept our informants' statements on this score; the situation seems altogether natural.

1. Note that the immature girl is not called filingo in Nkundó, as Engels ("Les Wangata," Revue congolaise, 1910, p. 36) maintains. This word is but the Nkundó transformation of the word virgo. There is no specific term for "prepubescent." A girl who is not yet a woman but is no longer a child is called jembelake.

882 When the children reach puberty, they no longer like to sleep in their parent's home. The parents do not send them away, but on the other hand, they do not oppose this desire on the part of young people which, they say, springs from a feeling of modesty. The boys go one way, the girls another; for example, they may appropriate an unoccupied hut belonging to their father or go to close relatives, or they may try and find a place in quarters occupied by a group of boys or girls. If no house is available, the boys band together to build a hut which they share. Nowadays they begin very early [510] to build individual huts or one for two, in order to thus enjoy a greater freedom.

866 On the trees in the forest one finds a kind of hard mushroom called losik'tela. When a child begins to speak, the mushroom is placed between his teeth, so that he will bite into it and thus learn not to express himself thoughtlessly but to hold back his words (-sikitela) and think before speaking.

One can often observe parents and other persons actively helping children to express themselves correctly, especially in correcting mistakes, pronunciation, and errors with regard to proper nouns, by giving them the proper words and even explaining grammatical forms and subtle distinctions between certain terms. "This is how it must be said; that means something else. This plant is called thus and so, etc."

861 Therefore, although a Nkundó child is very free to spend his days as he pleases and, perforce, learns many things through personal experience, it would be wrong to say that his parents are not interested in his education and do not contribute to it. They participate actively by their advice, their explanations, and their demonstrations. Needless to say, their role is neither as important nor as continuous as in many civilized societies. Besides it is very difficult, and often unfair, to compare our people's situation with that of Europeans; the difference in circumstances is too great. But we must point out in all fairness that the Nkundó do make efforts in this realm, although the results are hardly apparent with respect to moral education (1), because there are many flaws, gaps,

1. We will say no more about material and economic education, which can not be criticized.
